The books the titles of which we have grouped together below, have one important trait in common: a more or less distinctly expressed, unquestioning belief in the genuineness, almost perfect correctness, and inspired character of the Hebrew Scriptures. But only Dr. Lange's critical standpoint—we use these words in the broad sense which would lead Dr. Lange himself to speak of the religious standpoint of even pantheism—is fully and argumentatively, though neither lucidly nor satisfactorily, defined and explained. This is done in the "Theological and Homiletical Introduction to the Old Testament" which the author has prefixed to the "Genesis," and which Dr. Gosman has so poorly translated that some of its obscurities are manifestly owing to deficient rendering. The more tangible points, however, are sufficiently discernible. According to Dr. Lange, "the great, profound, all-pervading formative element" in all the books of the Bible "is the ideal fact of the saving self-revelation of God even to his incarnation, i. e., the soteriological messianic idea," and as regards the "outward connection and articulation" of the various component parts of the Canon "it cannot be denied, there must have been not only an inspiration of the records themselves, but of the records in their present form, and that it is just as one-sided to deny the traces of this inspired editing of the sacred records (Luke i. 1) as to enfeeble their testimony by the supposition of an uncanonical biblical book-making, of a painful and laborious compilation and fusion of diverse elements or parts into one." And this broad declaration of belief implies not only a vindication of the correctness of the Hebrew superscriptions, given in the text, concerning the authorship of certain books, prophecies, or psalms; it also implies an assertion of authenticity in regard to traditional or external titles. Thus all the unheaded prophecies connected in one book with those marked as Isaiah's are acknowledged by our author as belonging to that prophet, not excluding those that speak of Cyrus by name, and of the temple of Jerusalem as already destroyed, although that monarch was not born nor that sanctuary burned within a century after Isaiah. For "the prophet would in these prophecies have placed himself upon that, to him, far distant standpoint of the Babylonish captivity as in his historical present, in order from that point to predict events still more distant in the future. This is not the method of the prophets, but it is the method of the Apocalyptics. . . . . We regard then the second part of the Book of Isaiah (ch. xl.–lxvi.) as the first Old Testament Apocalypse." And what is, according to this view, the theme of the first part of that book? "The personal Christ as prophet, priest, and king." And what is the theme of Obadiah? "The judgment upon Edom—as the type of Antichrist." Of Nahum? "The judgment upon Nineveh as the type of the fleshly Antichrist." Of Habakkuk? "The judgment upon Babylon as the type of the demoniac, self-deifying Antichrist." Jeremiah has his Apocalypse. So has Ezekiel. Daniel is "throughout Apocalyptic." Yet there are exceptions to the author's orthodox rule concerning authorship. He admits portions of Daniel to have been interpolated, on account of "grave circumstances," against which the more orthodox translator, Dr. Gosman, refers to Hengstenberg. He believes the Preacher of Solomon to have been written long after that king, and the title affixed "in the use of poetical license." "That the Song, also, is not correctly attributed to Solomon as its author," he infers from its fundamental thought, to which Dr. Gosman decidedly objects. This translator also disputes various points of the author's dissertation on the "so-called difficult places in the Old Testament," which forms one of the numerous additions to the American edition of the book before us, many of which are from the scholarly pen of Professor Tayler Lewis. He is satisfied with Dr. Lange's orthodoxy concerning the account of creation, paradise, the first human pair, "the long-lived fathers and Enoch," the flood and the ark, the tower of Babel, "the sexual difficulties in the history of the patriarchs," the Egyptian miracles and plagues, and other difficult points, but he is far from being edified by what is said, in explanation, about Balaam's ass and the arresting of the sun by Joshua—though of the ass Dr. Lange piously says that he "is no subject for ridicule," and that "the Spirit of God has made this ass to be a standing irony upon the thoughtlessness (to speak euphemistically) of the knights of free-thought as they go upon the expedition to destroy Christianity." In view of the vast labor and scholarship bestowed upon this work by Dr. Lange, we cannot refrain from thinking that Dr. Gosman would have better employed his time had he devoted it more exclusively to the cares of a translator, which might have saved him the triple reproach of inaccuracy, inelegance, and gross haste in execution. In illustration of his carelessness, we but refer to pp. 61, 62, and 416, where, after the mention of Von Hetzel, Staehelin, and Tuch, respectively, parts of the sentences are given untranslated, in the original German. The American edition is, besides, disfigured by numerous misprints in Hebrew words (see f. i. p. 178) and numerous minor inaccuracies of various kinds. But Dr. Lange himself, with whom the theological and homiletical parts are, after all, the most important, is not free of highly blamable carelessness. Thus, after correctly stating (p. 15) "the sum of the reigns of the Jewish kings"—that is, of the kings of Judah from Rehoboam to Zedekiah—to have been a little upward of 380 years, he informs us (p. 45) that the period embraced by "the two Books of Kings" was "about 380 years," forgetting that those books embrace also the forty years of the reign of Solomon, the predecessor of Rehoboam, and, in their concluding passage, about thirty years posterior to the reign of Zedekiah; while, on the other hand, for reasons unexplained, he extends the period covered by the Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther to "about 130 years," which is either too long or, if meant to include the time covered by the list of high-priests interpolated in Nehemiah, too short.

If Dr. Lange's orthodoxy may appear to some imperfect, Dr. Keil's, we have no doubt, is apt to satisfy the most exacting scrutinizers; while he also excels in Semitic erudition and in exegetical minuteness and precision. While the former speaks of the Book of Jonah as allegorical—at least to a degree—the latter, almost without hesitation, swallows that prophet with his "shark" and everything as historical. Hitzig's rather sharp criticism on this point so provokes him that he stigmatizes it as a "coarse view of God and of Divine Providence, . . . which borders very closely upon atheism;" he endeavors to prove that "even the two most striking miracles—the three days' imprisonment in the belly of the sea-fish, and the growth of a Qīqāyōn to a sufficient height to overshadow a sitting man—have analogies in nature;" he makes this view the more acceptable by stating that "the three days and three nights are not to be regarded as fully three times twenty [sic in the translation] hours, but are to be interpreted according to Hebrew usage, as signifying that Jonah was vomited up again on the third day after he had been swallowed;" and he not only defends the genuineness of the prayer of Jonah against Knobel and De Wette, but also declares it to have been uttered in the belly of the fish, and "in perfect accordance with the prophet's" rather queer "circumstances and the state of his mind." That Jonah praises God for a deliverance already received, instead of praying for it, can, of course, be no strong objection for a critical conscience of such calibre. Nor will Dr. Keil hesitate to declare Jonah the author of the narrative of his mission, which, according to him, took place as early as 800 B.C., though the style of the narrative most decidedly resembles that of the latest compositions in the Hebrew Canon. Still less does he waver in upholding the identity of origin of the two parts of Zechariah (i.–viii. and ix.–xiv.), in spite of their glaring difference in contents, tone, and language. In fact, he does not even stoop to mention the existence of a different opinion on this subject. This is perhaps going a little too far, as it might subject him to the suspicion of avoiding a conflict from fear of an inadequacy of weapons. And yet it requires almost equal anti-critical courage to place Obadiah in time at the head of all the minor prophets, by making him the contemporary of Joram, King of Judah ("between 889 and 884 B.C.")—which Dr. Keil bravely does. The next in time he makes Joel ("between 875 and 848 B.C.") Like Dr. Lange, he evidently believes in the Jewish collectors' "inspired editing;" he goes, however, a step further, attributing the headings of the books, incorporated with the texts, to the prophets themselves. The later editors are thus relieved of a great deal of responsibility. Their literal revision of the text Dr. Keil considers trustworthy in the highest degree, and he staunchly clings to their readings. He is also a very strict grammarian, to the detriment here and there of his, in so many respects, eminent exegesis. The English edition of this ample and erudite commentary is comparatively fair, and, as regards the Hebrew, printed with admirable accuracy, but otherwise less carefully. Thus, we find "Jehoiada" for Joash (Vol. I., p. 6) and "Hezekiah" for Jotham (Vol. I., p. 420, in one instance).

"Barnes on the Psalms" is a model of careful elaboration, correctness of revision, and external neatness. It is chiefly homiletical, in this respect equalling the fulness of Lange's Commentary. In critical matters, the author moves apparently somewhat more freely than both Lange and Keil. Thus, he says in an introductory remark to Psalm xxii.: "It cannot be absolutely demonstrated that these titles to the psalms are all of them correct, as it cannot be supposed that they were affixed to them by authors of the psalms themselves; and it is not absolutely known by whom they were prefixed. Of course, there is no certain evidence that they were attached to the psalms by an inspired writer." But, as he immediately adds, "Still they are to be presumed to be correct unless there is some clear evidence to the contrary," and as he consistently acts upon this principle, his critical license almost entirely vanishes in the application, so that the psalms are classified, and, of course, their contents explained, not according to their inner evidence, but mainly in accordance with their superscriptions, and other traditional indications, emanating from "the collector of the Psalms, whoever he might be." In the introduction we find a very elaborate—though perhaps not quite successful—apologetic discourse on the "imprecatory" portions of the Psalter, in which the writer by very ingenious processes endeavors to justify, among others, expressions like the following from Ps. cix.: "When he shall be judged, let him be condemned; and let his prayer become sin. . . . Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow. . . . Let there be none to extend mercy unto him; neither let there be any favor to his fatherless children. . . . Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the Lord; and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out." In the preface, as likewise in a short closing postscript, the aged author—who has been for years afflicted with a partial failure of vision—speaks in touching words of his manifold labors "in endeavoring to explain and illustrate the sacred Scriptures," and of the emotion with which he now resigns himself to "attempt no more."

Dr. Cowles concludes with the volume on "Jeremiah and his Lamentations" his "series on the Old Testament prophets." The main object of this new work, to which is somewhat strangely affixed a dissertation on "The Premillennial Advent of Christ," is "to bring out the great points of prophetic revelation with a richer practical force." To this end most of the author's labor is devoted; the introductory, historical, and purely exegetical remarks are comparatively short and insignificant. Criticism, in the narrower sense of the word, he nowhere attempts. Objections, based upon critical grounds, to the genuineness of a portion of his prophet's writings, he cuts short by an assertion which renders all further and similar disquisition unnecessary: "Jeremiah was not merely a man; he was also a prophet of God. Hence, he was not dependent upon his knowledge of history, or his personal observation, or his shrewdness in forecasting future results from present indications. The Lord showed him what no human eye could see, and taught him what to say and to write. . . . Hence, the fact that Jeremiah, in the fourth year of Zedekiah, speaks by anticipation and in prophecy of Jerusalem and its temple as destroyed, creates not the least difficulty. Nor does the fact that he saw the Medes preparing war against Babylon [half a century after Zedekiah] create any sort of difficulty. Did not the Lord know that fact as early as the reign of Zedekiah?" We are rather surprised to find that our author thinks it possibly "admissible" to change the reading of the word mibtzar (Jer. vi. 27) "slightly," that is, by the insertion of a dot. At the same time, he has overlooked the fact that his compositor has, by the omission of three dots and one vowel, slightly spoiled the reading of four words out of the twelve given in this book in Hebrew letters—s(h)eruth, hag(g)eber, mas(s)a, al(a)y.

Eight Years' Wanderings in Ceylon. By Sir Samuel W. Baker. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.)—The title of this book would not lead the reader to expect an account of a settlement undertaken by the author in the year 1848–9, and such descriptions of the country, its geography, products, capacity, etc., as would be of value to intending colonists. These, however, are what he will get, and the "Wanderings" consist chiefly in digressions relating to the chase that might properly have been included in the "Rifle and Hound." We confess to liking the present work better than that just named, on grounds with which we shall not ask sportsmen to sympathize. It presents Mr. Baker in the rôle of a civilizing pioneer in a tropical wilderness, among a degenerate people, and under a government of whose inefficiency he does not hesitate to speak with the greatest frankness. As his experiment in the highlands of Newera Ellia was to prove his fitness for the grander experiment in which he is now engaged in equatorial Africa, it cannot fail to be read with interest, apart from the attractive style in which all his narratives are clothed. A number of years have passed since this book was written, and Ceylon is probably better cultivated and better ruled than formerly, but the nature of its soil, of course, remains unchanged, and it must be still true that no crops will thrive without manure, and that even with manure wheat does not prosper, and pasturage is precarious, that the native fruits are generally inferior to those of other parts of India, and, in short, that the island—except in scenery—is quite other than the paradise which it has often been reported to be. What it might produce, and how dense a population it might sustain, is inferrible from the stupendous monuments of that elder race which constructed the tanks and the water-courses that once fertilized all the land, and gave an extension to the rice-culture which it is now difficult to realize. The Cingalese of to-day inherit the modes of culture of their ancestors, without their indomitable enterprise or high civilization, nor have they been perceptibly elevated under the British rule, which, at the time when Sir Samuel wrote, was changed every five years, and generally for the worse, which had paralyzed the coffee trade by a sudden resort to free trade, had destroyed the pearl fishery with retributive greediness, held a monopoly of salt and of the precious metals, and, in a word, did nothing to foster and much to retard the development of the island. However this may now be, the relation of Ceylon to the new currents of trade through the Isthmus of Suez, on the one hand, and from our Pacific Coast, on the other, may, we imagine, revive its colonial importance, and ensure its progress.

The Science of Government in connection with American Institutions. By Joseph Alden, D.D., LL.D. (New York: Sheldon & Co. 1869.)—Dr. Alden's "Science of Government" is, for a book of its scope and aim, nearly all that could be desired. Colleges will of course use some more complete treatise, like those of Story, Duer, and Pomeroy; for high-schools and academies the one before us can hardly be surpassed. It is very brief, but one wishes only a very little in the way of commentary, and the views are always judicious and clearly expressed. This judgment will be confirmed by the trial of use in the schoolroom. It needs, however, tables (lists of Presidents, etc.), and, especially, the Appendix ought to contain the Constitution as a whole, instead of having it merely distributed through the book in clauses. It errs, perhaps, on the side of brevity; for instance, Art. 9 of the Amendment requires a commentary; and Art. 4, § 3, clause 1, has its sense spoiled by the use of a semicolon instead of a comma after the words, "within the jurisdiction of any other State."

The Week.

The preparations in this State for the fall elections are tolerably lively. Frequent meetings of the two Gangs in this city have been held with a view to reunion; but then the combination, if they succeed, will be mechanical merely, and not chemical: that is, nothing new will result from it. The two Gangs united will simply form one big Gang, with the same aims, processes, and probably increased powers of mischief. Committees are made of men, and you cannot make a good committee out of bad men. In the country districts there is much confusion. The conventions seem to nominate some of the worst "corruptionists," as they are called, of the last Legislature, with the regularity of clockwork, but independent tickets are springing up in some places in opposition to them, with what chance of success it would be difficult to say. The readiness of the regular conventions to offer the notorious old hacks once more to the voters is a striking indication of the demoralization of the party in some districts. So also is the boldness of some of the "corruptionists." Mr. Younglove, for instance, the Speaker of the late Assembly, and one of its most suspected members, is openly canvassing the Fifteenth District in quest of the nomination. Indeed, the invention and rapid diffusion of the word "corruptionists" as a designation for men who take bribes, or support those who take them, is a sign of the times worth noting. It is now really used as the name of a section of the Republican party, just as "abolitionist" and "annexationist" might be, and is rapidly losing its moral significance, and becoming merely an announcement of the fact that the person bearing it belongs to the bolder class of politicians, who, as long as they are sound on "great issues," really believe themselves entitled to whatever they can make in the party ranks, and not to be spoken lightly of.

The war in the Democratic ranks over Mr. Belmont still continues, and the points of objection to him multiply. One of the last is that he is a foreigner, and only "an American citizen on paper;" but this is a delicate matter to speak of in the Democratic ranks, inasmuch as if the foreigners abandon it in this city, it would vanish like a dream. The "Father of his Country," even, has been invoked against him—that passage in the Farewell Address which bids his countrymen "beware of foreign influence" being held to be, under the circumstances, applicable to the present Chairman of the National Committee. Another defect in him, which, unlike this one, is his fault, and not his misfortune—for he could not help being born in Germany—is that he has advocated the payment of the bonds in gold. A fair set-off to this disgraceful piece of honesty is, however, that he first of all advised his friends not to buy them on any terms. The discussion of his nativity is in many respects inopportune, inasmuch as it is leading the Germans to "arouse" and look after the city offices, now monopolized by their fellow-citizens of Irish origin. The revelations made on this subject have really been of a heart-rending character. The Irish have about nine-tenths of the spoils; and if the Germans, who now cast half the Democratic vote, are to have their share, there will be a convulsion of the first order.

It appears that the recent noteworthy action taken by the Pennsylvania Democrats in withdrawing their candidates of bad character was taken by the City Executive Committee, acting under the advice of Judge Packer himself, who has no notion of being beaten if hard, business-like work will save him. His chances of election are certainly not less than the Republican press of Pennsylvania are disposed to concede. He counts, of course, on the regular vote of his party in the other sections of the State, and he has a good many friends in the city of Philadelphia, even among the Republicans—especially among the well-to-do Quakers, who have borne with him a part of the labor of developing the Lehigh Valley. The new ticket which this Democratic committee has put up is, as we have said already, a very strong one; and this is not their only means of local strength, as they have raised the cry that the municipal rights of the city have been invaded by the bill which gives the management of Girard College and other lesser charities to a board appointed by the judges, and the cry has all the more force because, as it happens, the board that has actually been appointed cannot be said to be well chosen. The general feeling throughout the State in regard to the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment by the last Legislature, which many people hold to be directly in contravention of the State Constitution, may also assist the Democrats. But, on the other hand, it is not to be forgotten that the Republicans are, if somewhat apathetic, still firmly and well organized; that they have to help them what they had not last year nor the year before—the Federal patronage, which is no small thing; that Secretary Robeson will not refuse them the help of the Philadelphia Navy Yard; and in case the decisions in the "contested election cases"—"contested elections" are getting to be a Pennsylvanian political "institution"—are in favor of the Republicans, the police and other branches of municipal patronage will be restored to their hands. Altogether, the Pennsylvania fight will be a close one.

The New York Times announces that enormous frauds have been discovered in the Methodist Book Concern, the largest publishing house in the world, and the magnitude and honesty of whose operations have hitherto given just matter for national pride. The difficulty of keeping in force any good system of accountability in so large an establishment, managed by agents, who were necessarily frequently changed, and whose watchfulness was not stimulated by self-interest, must always have been very great, and the wonder is not that frauds should now appear, but that they should not have appeared sooner. We suspect that even when the worst is known, it will prove that the establishment has fared on the whole better than many commercial enterprises of similar magnitude.

The centenary celebration of Alexander von Humboldt's birthday went off very successfully. A great number of Americans as well as Germans took part in it; for Humboldt's glories belong to the whole race, as well as to Germans; though it must be admitted that a great number of those who did take part in it knew very little about him. He was neither poet, orator, conqueror, politician, nor discoverer; but simply a philosopher—and philosophers and their memories are not yet popular in the broad sense of the word. A colossal bust of the great man was presented to the Central Park Commissioners by Mr. C. E. Detmold, on behalf of the subscribers for its purchase, and Dr. Lieber afterwards delivered an excellent address, in which Humboldt's various claims to the admiration of posterity were very well condensed. In Boston, Professor Agassiz spoke, and so did Ralph Waldo Emerson and others, and, barring some questionings as to Humboldt's religious views which a correspondent notices elsewhere, "nothing occurred," as the reporters say, "to mar the pleasure of the occasion." One of the curious things connected with the anniversary is that in Berlin the celebration of it has been treated as a Liberal movement, and the upper classes have consequently abstained from participation, and thus made it "shabby."

The state of depression in which the English cotton manufactures find themselves is naturally exciting a good deal of speculation as to its causes. One of the theories started, and which finds most general acceptance, is that the cotton-spinners, stimulated by the prosperity of former years, put their gains into new mills and machinery, thus making themselves every year dependent on a steady increase of the supply. Now the supply has fallen off, while the capital invested in the mills is fixed, and cannot be turned into any other channel. The deduction from this is that the spinners ought also to have looked to the supply, and put money into planting or plantations. A strong effort is now being made to induce them to invest money in the South, and a Mr. Morehead has been sent over by the late Memphis Convention to stir them up on the subject. But he is drawing some rather too glowing pictures of what may be accomplished. He says, for instance, that cotton plantations in Mississippi are yielding 100 per cent. Perhaps they are; but what did they yield last year, and the year before? No prudent man ought to go into cotton-planting without basing his calculations on averages of five years. There is undoubtedly, owing to the delicacy of the plant, a gambling element in all cotton-raising. We do not mean to say it is sufficient to deter anybody from devoting his time and money to the work; but it has to be kept in mind.

The English papers seem to be working themselves up into a terrible state of excitement over General Sickles's notes to the Spanish Government about Cuba, and will have it that they are of a highly minatory character, and point to an immediate interference on the part of the United States in favor of the insurrection. We believe the fact of the matter is that General Sickles has been instructed to offer mediation, and to recommend the Spaniards to conduct their military operations like civilized men and not like savages, but that the Government means, with regard to all other action, to follow international usage—that is, to recognize the insurgents as belligerents when the facts justify it, and to recognize the independence of the island when the Spanish inability to hold it has been fairly demonstrated. In the meantime, there is a ridiculous telegram to the effect that the French Emperor wishes Spain to retain the island; and the Spanish paper in this city openly menaces us with the iron-clads of that nation, and threatens to blockade the principal eastern ports, and reduce the country to a state of abject submission to the present Spanish Government. We hope things may not reach this pass; but if the worst comes to the worst, we may at least draw courage from the example of the republic of Peru, which, a year or two ago, did not shrink from a conflict with the Spanish giant, and certainly did not get the worst of it. The editor of the Cronista ought, however, to understand that our citizens will imperatively demand his head on the appearance of his iron-clads. His passports he shall not have. He knows, it seems, that we are weak, and weakness, driven to the wall, is apt to be cruel.

The Irish Catholic prelates, Cardinal Cullen presiding, have issued a manifesto on education, in which they denounce all schemes of mixed or non-sectarian education either in school or college, and refuse to accept as a peace-offering the abolition of religious tests in the Dublin University. They ask for a distinctly Catholic University for themselves, to be founded and apparently endowed by Government; or else the establishment of a National University, like the London University, granting degrees and honors to the students of Catholic colleges on equal terms with Protestants; or else "the arrangement of the Queen's Colleges on a denominational basis"—that is, we suppose, the allotment of those of Cork and Galway to the Catholics and of Belfast to the Protestants—the University still granting degrees to each impartially. To do any of these things, except the second, would, however, be a step backward, which would not be made now by the Government of any Catholic country, and will hardly be made by that of England. Cardinal Cullen has supported the manifesto by an announcement that Catholics who allow their children to attend the National (Common) Schools will hereafter be refused the sacraments. As there are no other schools accessible to the poor, Catholic parents have now, therefore, the alternative presented to them of letting their children grow up in ignorance or exposing themselves to everlasting damnation. The length of time this extreme measure has been threatened without being resorted to shows how serious the ecclesiastical authorities consider it, and its seriousness lies in the strain it puts on the popular reverence for the church machinery. Should the prohibition be even partially disregarded, the effects would be calamitous. It is now a long while since the Church imposed so heavy a task on the Devil, and we shall be curious to see how much of his mediæval freshness and vigor he has preserved.

On the other hand, the disestablished Protestant Church is showing more life than even its friends gave it credit for; but this is not saying much for it. Still, as was confidently expected, the separation from the state seems to have roused an amount of interest in the Church amongst the laity which they have never before displayed, and which, indeed, the clergy begin to find somewhat inconvenient. It was a matter of debate amongst the latter a few weeks ago, whether the laity should be admitted to the Church Synods; but at a meeting of leading laymen in Dublin, the other day, it plainly appeared not only that the laity were determined on being represented in the government of the Church, but they were inclined to demand a preponderating influence in it. To their equal representation there will apparently be no opposition. Subscriptions to a considerable amount have already been made to a "Church Sustentation Fund."

The new land movement in Ireland is making good progress, and a striking illustration of the rapidity with which popular demands advance in our day is to be found in the fact that the old concession of mere "tenant right"—that is, the right of the outgoing tenant to sell his "good-will" to the incoming tenant, and of the ejected tenant's right to compensation for his improvements—is now pronounced and is antiquated; that is, nobody would dream of being satisfied with it; and the chances are that the landlords, after having refused it for years, would now be only too glad to get off with making it. The new agitators demand perpetuity of tenure, at a fixed rent, or, at all events, at a rent fixed by periodical valuations, in which tenants' improvements would be allowed for. There is no danger in predicting that to this it must come at last, athough this would be but a very little way removed from Mr. Mill's plan of two years ago, which then seemed so revolutionary.

There is a curious controversy going on in the London Times about the state of religion in Germany. Its Berlin correspondent, who is a well-known Prussian, some weeks ago, apropos of the attempted assassination of the clergyman while repeating the Creed in the Berlin Dom, declared that the great body of Protestant Germans were rationalists of the most advanced type; that not only did they not go to church, but they held the clergy in contempt, and even abhorrence, as dunces or hypocrites. This led to a reply from Mr. Ernest Bunsen, or de Bunsen, as he absurdly calls himself, questioning the statements but very feebly; and then the controversy, after one reply from the Berlin correspondent, passed into the hands of Mr. Wright, an English clergyman, formerly of Dresden, now of Boulogne, and Mr. Anketell, the American minister of St. John's Church, Dresden. Mr. Wright maintains "that though the state of religion in Germany is not satisfactory, there is a decided reaction in favor of evangelical truth;" and that "the attendance at public worship in Dresden is now greater than it was twenty years ago;" and that "among the educated laity in Germany are to be found not a few believers in the leading doctrines of Christianity." This last assertion certainly has not a very hopeful sound. To this Mr. Anketell replies, that out of a Protestant population of 150,000, only 7,000 at most attend public worship; that at a meeting of the Protestant clergy of Dresden, held last February, "the sentiments broached" were that "Arius was as good a Christian as Athanasius;" "that the Lord's Prayer was creed enough for Christendom;" and that all persons present, except himself, gave in their adhesion to these doctrines. Pastoral visiting, he says, is unknown; and he cites a saying of a brother student of his—the son of a Lutheran clergyman—a dozen years ago, that, "if resorted to, it would be ascribed to licentious motives." He says, too, that the Dresden Protestant-Verein decided last March "that the doctrine of Christ's atonement for human sin was an exploded superstition;" and sums up with the remark, quoted from some one else, that "Luther may have discovered a pearl of great price, but it has a wonderfully poor setting in his own land." Here the matter now rests. Religious statistics are always untrustworthy or misleading, because they try to weigh what is imponderable and measure what is immeasurable. You cannot put down in figures "the state of religion" in any country. There is nevertheless no country whose religious condition is of more importance than that of Germany, for no country so powerfully influences the thought of all other countries. By-the-by, we wish more was known of the religious condition of Americanized Germans. Who ever hears of religion amongst them at all?

The full report of Prince Napoleon's speech has reached us by last mail, and it more than justifies the accounts given of its radicalism. He protests his devotion to the Emperor and his son, and then proceeds deliberately to ridicule the senatus-consultum while approving of it, because, though very good as far as it goes, it does not go far enough. He says the autocratic empire must burn its ships and become a liberal empire; that, with everything else moving and changing, politics cannot stand still; that it is folly to say that only some countries are fit for liberty; that liberty is everywhere the same—"cosmopolitan, human, like the beautiful in its unity;" that the Constitution of 1852 was very imperfect, and that, great as are the changes which have been already made in it, or are now proposed, they are nothing to those which will have to be made during the next two or three years; that, in fact, the more it is changed, the better it will be; that "you may do anything you like with bayonets except sit down on them;" that the senatus-consultum is defective in five things: in that it does not say specifically to whom the Ministry is to be responsible; in that it contains no provision for making the Senate a second legislative chamber instead of a nondescript body with nondescript powers; in that the Senate is still allowed to act legislatively during the prorogation of the Corps Législatif, which may last for six months; in that it does not abolish the Senate's exclusive power of discussing the constitution, when, in truth, the lower House discusses it also, and the present changes are made on the demand of the latter; and in that it does not make mayors elective by the municipal councils. He wound up by telling them that, by-and-by, they would have to repeal the law of Public Safety, giving monstrous police powers to the Government; Art. 75 of the constitution, releasing functionaries from responsibility for official acts before the courts; and that would soon come up the still greater questions of education, decentralization, individual freedom, and governmental economy—and then sat down, leaving the old Bonapartists "scandalized" and the younger ones dumfounded.

The curious little farce, known as the reprimand of the Pasha of Egypt by the Sultan, of which the public has been hearing for some weeks, is now at an end—the vassal having made his submission in due form. The most striking thing in the whole affair was the lofty moral and philosophic tone of the Turkish despatch, which read very much as if it had been composed by John Stuart Mill with the assistance of a committee of the Massachusetts Prohibitionists. People who are familiar with the ways of the Turkish Government and the condition of Turkish society read it with great astonishment. It contained a sharp lecture on economy from one of the most absurdly extravagant governments in the world; some remarks on the wickedness of luxury, unsupported by wealth, from officials who live in the most outrageous luxury in one of the poorest countries in the world; and expressions of concern for the condition of the Egyptian peasants from rulers whose own peasantry does not, up to this day, know what legal protection is, and has never seen a good road. The main causes of the offence given by the "Khedive," as the Pasha is called, are, however, that he has been acting as an independent sovereign in sending representatives to foreign courts; in accepting regal honors himself at their hands; in inviting foreign sovereigns to his dominions; and in buying himself iron-clads.

In his reply, the Khedive comes down handsomely. He says he has invited the sovereigns to the opening of the Suez Canal, in virtue of the high position he holds under the Sultan; whatever respect was shown him abroad was due to the favor with which the Sultan is known to regard him. His representative abroad went with the Sultan's knowledge; Egypt has thriven under his rule; the finances are carefully managed, and the taxation not heavy, and the Khedive's devotion to the Sultan is unalterable; but he says nothing about the iron-clads, which may yet cause trouble. What heightens the effect of all this is, that it is extremely doubtful whether the Khedive is not as well able to take Constantinople as the Sultan to take Cairo or Alexandria. The Egyptian army is small compared to the Ottoman, but both officers and men are vastly superior. During the last Russian war, the Egyptian contingent was everywhere the corps d'élite of the Turkish army—the one body which could be counted on to stand in confusion; it furnished the only sentinels whose vigilance was absolutely reliable, and submitted to slaughter with something of real Mussulman resignation. In fact, with another Ibrahim Pasha, a repetition of the events of 1840 would not be at all difficult; but the present Khedive is a reformer and administrator rather than a man of war. Both he and the Sultan owe their position solely to the jealousy of the Great Powers, and their quarrelling in public about their respective rights and duties has, therefore, afforded a good deal of amusement to the realistic diplomatists of Christendom.

Some fresh light has been thrown on the Chinese question by the publication of a presumably genuine report of Tsang, a high Chinese functionary, on the subject of intercourse with foreigners. He is decidedly hostile to the extension of trade, to the introduction of railroads, telegraphs, and steamers into the heart of the empire, and for the very reasons for which many people resisted their introduction in Europe—that they would throw a great number of people out of employment. Coal-mines, however, he would allow to be worked. If foreigners should force the Government of Peking to yield to their wishes in these matters, he thinks the provincial governors should resist vigorously. As regards the toleration of missionaries, he expresses himself with great contempt with regard to all Western creeds, as transitory and feeble, which China, with her ancient and impregnable faith, need not fear. So, with a confidence and scorn which the Pope, with his eighteen centuries behind him, would give a good deal to be able to feel, Tsang advises that the missionaries be allowed to do their worst. He approves of embassies to foreign powers, and recommends firmness and fairness and sincerity in all dealings with the West; but with regard to all "the modern improvements"—in fact, everything that is commonly called "progress" by practical men—he is inexorable. The paper is, on the whole, very much what a good old English Tory squire of the year 1760 might have written in reply to similar questions.

THE DEFENCES OF SOCIETY AGAINST THE SPECULATORS.

THERE was an announcement last week, made by the Tribune in leaded type, that there was going to be another "gold corner" created by "certain financiers of our city in combination with European capitalists," who were bent on buying and withdrawing from use thirty millions of coin, thus forcing those who need gold for duties and other purposes to buy of them at exorbitant rates; and the Tribune thereupon calls on Secretary Boutwell "to ascertain the facts," and, if he discovered the combination, to step in with his gold, sell it at the artificially raised price, and thus make money for the Government and ruin the speculators at one blow. "Mr. Boutwell," adds the same paper, "can surely ascertain whether such a conspiracy does or does not exist, and, if it exists, his duty is plain and imperative," etc., etc.

We do not doubt that the Tribune made this appeal in good faith —that it really believes that there is a combination, and that it is the business of Mr. Boutwell to frustrate it. Nevertheless, we have very little question that nine persons out of ten of those who have even a faint knowledge of what goes on in Wall Street, and do not share our confidence in the Tribune's integrity, looked upon the cry as simply part of a gold-jobbing operation. A little consideration is all that is needed to show how the matter stands. We have admitted, we believe, more than once that, since Mr. Boutwell has gold to sell, it is his duty to sell it as nearly as he can when he thinks the market is at its highest; but then, if, instead of watching the market, and stepping in when he thinks the right moment has come, he takes upon himself to find out beforehand whether conspiracies to put gold up exist, so as to be ready for the conspirators and frustrate their schemes, and, above all, if he institutes these enquiries on the demand either of newspapers or individuals, one of two things is sure to follow—either he will actually be made in a large number of cases the tool of speculators, or the public will suspect him of being their tool, and either would be a great misfortune. Confidence in Mr. Boutwell's integrity now exists, and, considering the magnitude of the interests committed to his discretion, the destruction of this confidence would be a calamity second in importance only to the loss of his integrity itself.

It has to be borne in mind that in the gold market, as in the stock market, there are bears as well as bulls—that is, there are speculators for a fall as well as for a rise, though the consciousness that the Treasury gold is impending over them doubtless keeps both in check; and as long as the game is confined to themselves, it may do great harm if one party believes or knows that it has only to cry "combination" or "conspiracy" when it finds itself in a "tight place"—when, for instance, after having made time sales of gold, it finds it rising or likely to rise—to get the Secretary to come to its aid. The game would be carried on with loaded dice, and, what is worse, the Secretary would seem to be, or would be, a party to it, and the Treasury gold sales become one of the most tremendous instruments of demoralization ever witnessed. His preliminary investigation, or attempt to ascertain whether "the combination" existed, would of course be a mere farce. Mr. Boutwell has no machinery for any such investigation. He has no power to send for persons and papers, or take testimony under oath, and would from first to last have to depend for his information on mere assertions, made to him, probably, by the bears anxious to produce an immediate effect on the market. It would be hard indeed to devise a better mode of sending gold down, suddenly and on a pinch—there are plenty of ways of sending it up—than getting such a paragraph into the papers as the one in the Tribune on which we are commenting; and how ready the public would be to suspect the investigation of being a mere step in the speculators' game, somewhat like Judge Barnard's injunctions in the Erie war, one has only to read the following, which we find in the money article of the World of the same date:

"Mr. Boutwell, Secretary of the Treasury, will be in New York tomorrow (Wednesday), and notified some of his friends yesterday of this fact. Some influential parties who are heavily short of gold at low prices —in the neighborhood of 131 and 132—are bringing a pressure to bear upon the Secretary in order to induce him to sell about $10,000,000 gold, and to pay at once the gold interest due on November 1 without rebate. The Secretary will do well to pause before he decides to make any alteration in his published official monthly programme for buying bonds and selling gold."

And again, on the following day:

"The Secretary of the Treasury was expected to arrive in the city this morning, but left Boston this morning, and arrived here this afternoon about 4.30 P.M. This evening Mr. Boutwell is to hold confidential consultations with Mr. Horace Greeley and Mr. Bigelow, in regard to the best means of running down the price of gold, of which an ex-Loyal-League Mayor of the city, and other influential persons of the 'trooly loil' type, are said to be largely short at 131 to 132. The plans proposed by these Loyal League 'bears' in gold embrace the prepayment of the November interest by Government and the immediate sale of $10,000,000 of gold."

Now, it makes no difference whether the imputations here thrown out have any foundation or not; they might have a foundation, and it would be nearly as bad for people to believe them true as for them to be true. We trust, therefore, Mr. Boutwell will take no evidence and institute no enquiries as to the existence or non-existence of "combinations" and "conspiracies." They are none of his business. He could not get at the truth about Wall-Street "corners" if he were ten times as knowing as he is, and he could not establish the reign of pure justice in Wall Street if he were the Archangel Michael himself; and he may rest assured that nobody can give a stronger proof of fatuity than asking him to try his hand at either job.

To provide protection for the public against combinations either to raise the price of gold or the interest on money, is no easy matter. If a band of men of large capital are able and willing to enter into a combination to withdraw an immense quantity of gold from the market, it would be impossible to devise a law that would prevent them while leaving gold in the position of a commodity purchasable in the market; and if you attempt to interfere by law with the transfer or possession of gold in any way, you produce precisely the effect at which the combinations aim, viz., a rise in price. Consequences far more disastrous have been produced by "locking up" greenbacks than are ever again likely to be produced by locking up gold; but this performance also seems hardly capable of legal prevention, although it is, we believe, not possible without the co-operation of the banks. A group of speculators for a fall determine, in order to bring stocks down, to make money "tight," and for this purpose go to the banks and borrow all the money the latter are not using, but leave it on deposit, and the banks are, of course, only too glad to receive interest on immense sums which do not pass out of their hands. But, of course, also their power of lending to their other customers is so far diminished, money becomes "tight," stocks have to be sold, and the object of the speculators is answered. The shocking effects of these combinations on trade and commerce we described in our columns some months ago; but they can be readily imagined without description.

Now, to prevent them we should have either to inspire the great stock-jobbers with scruples and a regard for the general weal—which of course is hopeless—or to provide some means of punishing banks for aiding and abetting them. The loan to the operators is, however, on its surface a perfectly legitimate loan; it only differs from ordinary loans in the money being allowed to lie in the banker's hands. There is an understanding between him and the borrower that it shall not be drawn out. The difficulty of devising a legal process which would prevent the banker from lending money to a set of men without being sure that they were not going to use it for legitimate purposes, or convict the bank of having lent it without taking the proper precautions, or compel the borrowers of money to draw their balances out, or compel the bankers to exact a particular kind and amount of security for loans, must be apparent to anybody who has ever given any attention to the practical working of legislation. And yet some such process is sorely needed; but how futile all attempts to interfere between dealers in money are likely to prove has been well illustrated by the late usury trials. Here the speculators not only succeeded in making money tight, but when the private dealers endeavored to relieve the pressure by getting money in from every quarter, and lending at such rates of interest as those who needed it thought it worth to them, the speculators actually prosecuted them for interfering with their "game," got them convicted of usury, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment; and what gives a touch of the ludicrous to the transaction is, that in doing so they had the hearty applause and support of an influential portion of the press—the New York Tribune included. Better still, they raised a subscription to pay the expense of having put the District Attorney and the court in motion. A better illustration of the way in which all legal remedies are apt not only to fail in this field of wrong, but actually to help the wrong-doers, it would be difficult to light upon, and the dexterity of the operators was not a whit more remarkable than the fatuity of the press and public.

We do not mean to say that nothing can or ought to be done by way of legal remedy. The banks are the creatures of the state, and doubtless legislation against the co-operation of banks in locking up greenbacks, though it might not put a complete stop to it, and although the proof of offences would always be difficult, would sharpen the consciences of bankers, and help to make complicity with these raids on the community more disreputable; and whatever was very disreputable few bank officers would probably be willing to engage in. But the true remedy, after all, must be sought in public opinion. Commercial morals will never in any country be very much higher than the community requires them to be; and it is useless to expect men whose one passion is money-making, and to whom stock-jobbing is a delightful game, to refrain from schemes by which a fortune may be made in an hour, and which is followed by no retribution of any kind, which in no perceptible way lowers them in the estimation of their neighbors or subjects them to any social inconvenience. Few people think much the worse of a man for having been engaged in a successful "corner," even though it may have carried ruin to a thousand homes. A few "fossils" may grumble, but nobody minds them; clergymen may lift up their voices in the pulpit in general condemnation of roguery; but then nobody clings much faster to the horns of the altar, or comes down more handsomely for philanthropic objects, than the individual rogues; so that, although we may feel sure there is a good deal of knavery going on, there is nothing scarcer than a distinct, well-defined, and generally recognized knave.

ENGLAND AND HER INFLUENTIAL COLONISTS.

To readers whose memory goes back thirty or forty years, what seems almost a miracle is now getting itself accomplished within the limits of the British empire. The people whose drum-beat accompanies the sun in his journey round the world, are talking of the British colonies as "what used to be called our dependencies." That is the phrase of the Times. And the present Government, in which the most distinguished of colonists holds a place of the highest rank, and of which another colonist is a promising and distinguished member, is understood to be almost more than willing to sever the connection now existing between England and every other important possession of the crown except India. For the fact is that none of them can any longer be said to be possessions of the crown. For years they have all been independent, even to the extent of being able to tax British goods imported within their borders, and they are all a source of weakness to "the mother country"—as she begins to protest against being called—who is able to set to the credit side of their account only these entries: that they afford places to some of the needier members of the English governing classes; that they offer her in case of war coaling and refitting stations in all parts of the world; and that the nominal ownership of them gratifies to some extent the sentiment of national pride.

But, on the other hand, when the proper deductions are made, these entries really foot up very much less than their nominal amount. The tide has well turned that has so long carried "the governing classes" into all places of power and profit, and the country is every year to be more and more Americanized, and governed more and more in the interest of the main body of the people. Then, again, with this main body of the people sentimental considerations, not of the moral and religious order, have much less weight than with their betters, and will less and less shape the policy of the nation—to say nothing of the fact that with all classes, everywhere, the utilitarian question, Does it pay? constantly assumes larger importance. Moreover, the national pride is in its greatest danger of a severe fall by reason of this connection with wide, scattered, feeble, dependent communities, which would be the first points of attack sought by any maritime enemy. England is not to-day mistress of the seas, and if she were she would never feel sure from day to day that some accident of lucky invention would not deprive her of her ascendency and expose her to the deep humiliation of being at once shorn of her world-wide empire. As to the necessity of her possessing stations for her fleets, we suppose that beyond a doubt it would be easily possible for her to secure in all parts of the seas small stations, like Aden, Malta, the Bermudas, Gibraltar, which could be formed into coaling and refitting stations, susceptible of defence as so many first-class fortresses, and infinitely less expensive in all ways than the colonies either are or else constantly threaten to be.

There is no point of view, then, from which an outsider considers the question from which it does not seem to appear likely that the growing opinion in England in favor of a nominal, as well as the present real, independence of the colonies will continue to grow rapidly and will before long result in decided action. But the colonies have their opinion also; and so much is the possible and probable decision of England feared by some colonists that it is not many days since a meeting of "influential" Pacific colonists was held in London, and an address adopted which urges a general conference of colonial delegates who shall protest against the policy which Mr. Gladstone's Government seems to have adopted. Partial protection in case of foreign war, say these influential colonists, seems to be all that the mother country is willing to do for her children, so they suggest that some scheme of giving the colonies a voice in the government of the empire, or in some way making the ties stronger that bind the two together, should be as soon as possible adopted.

From "influential colonists" language like this was to have been expected; but whether it is not easy to allow it too much weight in concluding upon the real feeling and opinions of their fellow-colonists who are not so influential, but after all are the colonies, is another question, and one that, in the case of the Pacific colonies, we are not at all able to decide. Of the Canadas and the lower British Provinces we know something more, and we confess that our confidence in the ability of influential colonists to express the wishes of their fellow-citizens is not very great. In all the Provinces there are three pretty well-defined classes of people, who represent respectively the nobility and gentry, the merchants and middle classes generally, and, thirdly, the lower classes, as these all exist in England; and two of these three classes, but more particularly the first, are engaged all their lives in keeping up a shabby-genteel and more or less ludicrous caricature of the worst aspects of society in the old country. The Governor's state and military family, Government officials—no matter how petty, lawyers, clergymen of the Episcopalian Church, and officers of the army, make up the "influential class"—the last-named element of it consisting of Englishmen with a pretty thorough contempt for the people among whom they mix, for such number of years as may please Providence and the Horse Guards. Some of the heavier merchants are also, by grace, sometimes admitted to good society. But merchants are usually reckoned in the second class, and that is as good as being reckoned of another race, created for other and inferior ends—by a wise Providence, to be sure; but still for other and inferior ends. There was a little story told, not three years ago, of an incident that occurred in St. John's, New Brunswick, which is really of very considerable value as an indication of the way in which society is carried on in many parts of her Majesty's New Dominion. An officer—an English gentleman—taking a walk in the street sees two pretty girls, whom he at once technically assaults, and we suppose batters; that is to say, he walks up to them and takes the liberty of kissing them, and then walks off. The affair made some little talk, and probably excuses were and very well could be made for the young gentleman—young gentlemen, especially in garrison towns, not always being in a condition to behave their very best. But our point is, that the story being told to the wife of a small Government official, she remarked, "Oh! well, they were only a merchant's daughters;" and so the case was closed. The men of this class are called "gentlemen," and are not expected to be prompt in the payment of their debts, civil to their inferiors, well-informed in politics, or, in fact, anything but gentlemen. They wear knickerbockers when they shoot; they import their clothes or their patterns; they are Tories in British politics, and Conservatives in Provincial politics; they are densely and complacently ignorant of what goes on across the line among the Yankees; and, of course, they require the British Constitution behind their little social fabric, and while they continue to be influential colonists they will clamor for the British connection.

More or less hurt by the tone which is adopted towards them by their betters, the merchants and trading classes, though they have a good deal of the sentiment of loyalty which it is so hard to eradicate from the heart of an Englishman, especially if he is born abroad, nevertheless have little of the selfish loyalty which is exhibited by the people whose social superiority is in good part maintained by their being citizens of an oligarchical empire. The business interests of the merchants serve to allay a good deal the heat of their patriotism, and throughout the Canadas there is to-day a great deal of quiet counting of the cost of giving up their allegiance. There will be no loud talk of independence or annexation except by Irish agitators, who will deceive only the unwary; but there will be very little resistance to the inevitable in the shape of protests such as the London meeting has just put forth, and what little there is will rather be due to the subserviency which this class has long had to show; to their habit of letting their superiors take the initiative in political movements and of acquiescing in their action. This is, however, a policy that will not wear very much longer, as Nova Scotia has for a year or two indicated; and when the English decide to set the colonies afloat, they need not apprehend that the capital of any one of them, or the labor of any one of them, will be bitterly opposed to the change.

Of the laboring classes of the Canadas, the mechanics, and the farmers, there is probably a greater number of men in Upper Canada—immigrants—who would feel a pang at parting with the old flag than can elsewhere be found on this side of the water. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, with their native population, cisatlantic for many generations, are much less loyal, and Nova Scotia, shamefully used at the time of forming the Canadian Confederation, would see the separation of the old country from the new with comparative indifference. As for the French Canadians, they also would be at least indifferent. Hardy, brave, enterprising, intelligent, frugal, and moral, the farmers and mechanics of British blood in the Provinces yet have had no very great amount of practice in political discussion and action,—no amount that would seem great to an American, unless, indeed, we accept the anti-Confederative fight in Nova Scotia, which has done more for the political education of that community than anything that ever before happened in it. It will, therefore, take longer to get the sense of the people than it would in some other countries; but by the time England is ready to set herself free, we have little doubt that the American colonies will, on their part, be ready to accept freedom. It is, however, the opinions of the uninfluential colonists that it will be best to consult.

THE BOHEMIAN QUESTION.

When, after the catastrophe of Königgrätz, Von Beust undertook the difficult task of saving Austria by transforming her, two points were patent to him as well as to every unprejudiced observer of the situation: the system of centralization, which had prevailed in an absolutistic form under Schwarzenberg and Bach, and in a sham constitutional form under Schmerling, had to be definitively given up; and the Hungarians not only to be conciliated by the restoration of their constitution, but to be converted into the main support of the Empire. The solution of the latter part of this programme was unequivocally indicated by the demands of the Diet of Pesth, as formulated by its leader, Deák. What he would declare to be the ultimatum of his nation was to be granted; nothing less or more. But what was to replace centralism as the general system of the Empire? The nature of things pointed towards federalism as the most, and perhaps the only, satisfactory solution; political tradition and international circumstances advised the adoption of dualism. Austria consisted of distinct territorial groups, each animated by historical remembrances of the past, and claiming national life for the future: these parts could as little be welded into two unities as into one. But for centuries only the Hungarian division had, by jealously guarding and often heroically defending its constitutional life, preserved intact its national individuality; all others had been ruled by decrees and officials from Vienna, and accustomed to look to that city as their only centre. This was probably a consideration of little moment in the eyes of Von Beust; much weightier was the fact that the formation of a kind of semi-independent Polish kingdom out of Galicia and Bukowina would have been a challenge to a deadly duel flung into the face of Russia, and that the reconstituting of the Cechic element as the dominant in Bohemia and Moravia would have driven the German population of those—and also of other—provinces into a more or less secret and fatal alliance with Prussia. Exhausted, disorganized, and still on the brink of dissolution, Austria durst then neither provoke the Czar nor increase her conqueror's facilities for Pan-Germanic agitation among her subjects. Dualism was decided upon; possibly as a transitional solution. The non-Hungarian divisions of the Empire received provincial autonomy, but no more; the Reichsrath of Vienna was to be their common parliament, while Hungary and her dependencies had their own in Pesth, the two communicating by delegations in common affairs.

The Cechs of Bohemia were in a rage. This solution, if made permanent, was a deadly blow to their aspirations; it frustrated the patriotic efforts of two generations for the national regeneration of their country and race. Austro-Hungarian dualism was worse to them than Austrian centralism. As long as the latter lasted, the Cechs were not only a kind of favored people, enjoying thrice their share of imperial bureaucratic patronage, they could also cherish the hope of one day transforming Austria, with the aid, chiefly, of the Slovacks, Croats, and other Slavic tribes of Hungary, into a Slavic empire, of which they, the most advanced of the Austrian Slavi, would be the leaders. For that idea they had worked in their Panslavic agitations and conspiracies in the times of Metternich; to realize it, they had convoked, after his fall, the Panslavic Congress of Prague; for it they had fought, in June, 1848, on the barricades of that city, against Windischgrätz; and for it also, under Windischgrätz, against revolutionary Vienna and Hungary. Now, being definitively detached from their Slavic brethren in the Transleithan half of the Empire, which was surrendered to the Hungarians, they were doomed to succumb to the Germans, who, by their wealth and culture, so largely preponderated in the Cisleithan. To be sacrificed to the German element at the moment when Austria, whose most faithful subjects they had been for two centuries, was forced out of her connections with Germany, seemed to them as unjust as strange. And then, they argued, were not their historical claims to national autonomy as good as those of the Hungarians? Had not the realm of St. Wenceslas existed and flourished before that of St. Stephen? Did not the real independence of both perish on one day, on the battle-field of Mohács (August 29, 1526), when the dread of the victorious Turk drove both to offer their crowns to the Hapsburgs? Could the extorted decrees of the "Bloody Diet" of 1547, under Ferdinand I., or the trampling under foot of their charter by Ferdinand II., after the battle of Prague in 1620, legally deprive the Cechic nation of its ancient and sacred rights? And had not the last of the Ferdinands, in April, 1848, revived those rights by a new, though ephemeral, imperial sanction? Or had the Cechic people, in spite of most terrible proscriptions and spoliations, and a flood of foreign immigration, ever given up the palladium of its nationality, its beautiful and refined language?

The parallel was, however, far from being perfect. The Hungarians had, throughout the time of their connection with the House of Austria, guarded and preserved their autonomy, their institutions, and liberties. None of their diets ever sanctioned the attempted usurpations of the Hapsburgs. What violence extorted for a moment, they always reconquered by the sword or regained by a threatening attitude. They could never, even for a moment, be forced to submit to religious dictation. Their Lutheranism, their Calvinism, their Unitarianism in Transylvania had been triumphantly defended. Bohemia, on the other hand, had for more than two centuries submitted to the imperial sway without an attempt to revindicate her rights, and almost without protest. She had been absorbed in both Germany and Austria. Her ancient charters were buried in oblivion. Two-fifths of her territory was Germanized. Nearly the same was the case with Moravia and (Austrian) Silesia, which she claimed as the dependencies of her crown. Her nobility was half-denationalized. Worse than that, the Protestantism of her Cechic population had been uprooted; the people of Huss and Ziska, of Podiebrad and Thurn, had been converted into a people of bigoted Catholics—the most bigoted of Northern Europe. They had long been contented with their yoke, and the readiest tools of bureaucratic oppression, of reaction, and even of Germanization. Besides, they were inferior in culture to their German fellow-citizens, over whom they claimed a superiority by right of numbers.

Maddened by objections of this kind to their natural demands, which were but too insultingly and provokingly uttered and repeated in Vienna and elsewhere, no less than by the perils of the new situation, the Cechs not only determined entirely to abstain from any participation in the parliamentary life of Cisleithan Austria, but also, for the first time, gave open vent to disloyal feelings towards the Empire, threatening to promote its final dissolution, if their demands should not be heeded, by complicity with Russian Panslavism. With Russia they had, in fact, long been coquetting, though more or less disguisedly. They had not only fought against Bem and Dembinski in 1849, in Hungary, but they had also shown sympathies with Russia during the Polish insurrection of 1863. Russia, in her turn, overwhelmed them with her attentions. Their principal leaders, the renowned, aged historiographer of Bohemia, Palacky, and his son-in-law, the eloquent Rieger, had now no hesitation in appearing at the grand Slavic gathering in Moscow, convoked by the Russian Panslavists, and at which Poland naturally remained unrepresented. This was an act of defiance provoking alike to Germans, Poles, Hungarians, and the Austrian authorities. Accompanied, as it was, by violent anti-German manifestations of both the Cechic press and populace in Bohemia, it was answered, on the part of Count Beust, by acts of compression, which the Vienna Reichsrath readily approved, and the public opinion of almost all Western Europe applauded. As the consolidation of transformed Austria was in the meanwhile rapidly and successfully advancing, with the ready co-operation of both Moravia and Silesia, the sympathies of their Russian friends were a poor consolation to the Cechs, who, on this new turn of things and public opinion, began keenly to feel their powerlessness to resist or even effectually to threaten. The paroxysm of their irritation being over, they failed not to perceive the error they had committed, and unhesitatingly returned to a more moderate and, under the circumstances, much wiser course.

And here begins the last phase of the Bohemian question. The Cechs—whose discipline under tried leadership is perfect—have retracted all disloyal utterances. They brand as calumnies all imputations of connivance with Russian intrigues. They have renewed their friendly relation with the Poles of Galicia. They even try to conciliate the Hungarians by abandoning their former claims to the Slovack territories, as inhabited by a people speaking a Cechic dialect. In the same way, giving up the idea of national rights founded on race and clinging only to that of rights historically developed, they admit the propriety of the whole of South-western Austria forming an undivided German group in the Empire—notwithstanding the predominant Slavic populations in some of its parts—and even begin to fraternize with their own German neighbors, with whom they are ready to share all the benefits of the North-western group, which is to consist of Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia (containing about 4,500,000 Cechs and 2,500,000 Germans). They continue to keep aloof from the new parliamentary machinery of the Empire, but they show evident symptoms of a readiness to compromise with the men in power. In return, both Count Beust and most of the formerly offended nationalities seem to be equally inclined to approach an amicable solution. Having reorganized Austria and placed her by a series of radical reforms on a constitutional level superior to that occupied by Prussia, the Chancellor of the Empire is now much less alarmed by the threats of Russia or by the centrifugal tendencies of the Austrian Germans. The Poles see in the realization of Austrian federalism, as now urged by the Cechs, the beginning of a restoration of their country. The Hungarians warmly sympathize with the Poles, and can now afford to be magnanimous towards the Cechs, on condition of their abjuring Panslavism. The Germans alone hesitate, and with them, we believe, the decision rests. In every case, however, the situation of the Empire must continue to have its grave difficulties. Without the Cechs of Bohemia, and the condition of affairs in Galicia remaining unsettled, the Cisleithan workings of the adopted dualism must continue to be imperfect. A new transformation of Austria, by the substitution of federalism for dualism, will not only again temporarily disorganize her, but probably expose her to a violent attack on the part of the Czar, who will not quietly suffer the organization of a semi-independent Poland on his own Polish borders. The question is a highly complicated and interesting one, and it more and more attracts the attention of Europe.

JEFFERSON IN "RIP VAN WINKLE."

He is certainly a great actor who can make the acting of one of Boucicault's worst plays a triumph of realistic art. And certainly "Rip Van Winkle" vies in atrocity with the most atrocious of that author's performances. Imagine the hazy, antique style of Irving—a style admirably adapted to the mysterious legends which he was so fond of telling—changed into the rough-and-ready, pepper-and-salt lingo of the modern sensational playwright; imagine the haunted Katskills transformed by devilish, Circe-like enchantment into practicable mountains, with a Right Upper Entrance and a Left Upper Entrance; imagine Hendrick Hudson and his immortal crew changed into business ghosts; imagine the old tale supplied with a ballet dénoûment, in which lovers are reconciled, the devices of the wicked confounded, and the virtuous comfortably provided for for the remainder of their lives—imagine all this, and you have not imagined half the baseness of the dramatist.

For as yet you have only pictured to yourself difficulties of detail. It is only when you see the play before you that you perceive the fundanental crime of the whole—then first do you see that Boucicault's cardinal sin consisted in the attempt to dramatize a legend. You may forgive him for his grotesqueness and his sensationalism, you may forget his commonplace, but you can neither pardon nor forget his deliberate assault upon the life of one of the few legends possessed by our prosaic America. When Boucicault deals with underground railroads, and locomotives, and telegraphs, and with gambling-hells, he knows his tools, and uses them with success, but the machinery of legend he does not understand. He is so accustomed to the full glare either of the sun or of gas, that the delicate shadows of twilight are displeasing to him. But the great beauty of Irving's story lay in these mysterious half-lights. You were allowed to see just enough of the supernatural to reconcile you to the impossibilities of the adventures of the hero. But Boucicault, as it were, takes you into the confidence of the supernatural, tells you with a wink how it is all managed, and necessarily leaves on your mind the impression that there was not very much in it after all. He hides nothing, he displays everything; for example, when Rip Van Winkle has fallen asleep on the top of the mountains, and the curtain has gone down, and you know the sleep of twenty years has begun, you naturally expect something to be done to reconcile your mind to the supposition of this enormous lapse of time. But nothing is further from the practical mind of the dramatist. Instead of letting the curtain rise on some totally different scene, as, for example, to the village of Falling Waters, where changed circumstances and characters may gradually accustom the audience to the idea of a long interval, back you go to the top of the Katskills, and find a graybeard asleep where you saw, five minutes before, a hale and hearty middle-aged man. The idea that twenty years have elapsed is too preposterous to be entertained; you feel that you are laughed at—a feeling which never arises in reading Irving's story.

It has been so universally admitted that Jefferson is a great actor that it hardly seems worth while to dwell much here on the fact. But it appears to us that his acting possesses an interest as an indication of the future of the American drama which has not received sufficient attention. Jefferson's acting is the very antipodes of all that is considered most refined and classical in our theatres of the present day. He is the apostle of reality; those who have hitherto occupied the stage have been the apostles of the unreal. Certainly, up to the time of the appearance of Jefferson, Booth has been our greatest tragedian, and Wallack's has been, on the whole, the best depository of high comedy. Both have aimed at what is called classicism in art; both have succeeded in attaining a certain degree of it. But most people are beginning to doubt whether their goal was not after all, a mistaken one. What they were really trying to do was to reproduce the dramatic methods of a bygone age, in a period to which they were no longer suited. No doubt there was a time when the manners of the day were represented in the practice of the English stage—or at least when the manners of the day were not so very far removed from the latter as to cause in the minds of the audience a disagreeable sense of contrast. No doubt there was a time when the sonorous tones, the studied pitch, the modulated rise and fall of the English style were near enough the fashion of a certain section of society to appear natural in society. Indeed, you may occasionally perceive, even to-day, in the address and carriage of some nonagenarian who has come down to us from ante-locomotive times, the effect of the old social traditions, which have fastened themselves much more firmly upon the drama than they have upon society. But even this will not explain fully the rise and progress of the classical drama. After making all possible allowance for change of manners, we are forced to admit that the classic drama can never have been a natural copy of any actual society. It must always have been unreal. It would be a curious speculation to enquire why it is that the popular taste has changed—whether because the destruction of superstitious belief by science has destroyed at the same time the reverence of the unreal in art, or whether the classic and the realistic are two natural stages in the growth of the drama, which are to be observed in all periods in which the arts are cultivated.

Jefferson is as quiet as a French actor. He never rants, he never gives utterance to a stage laugh, his asides are not stage asides. From the moment when he first appears on the stage with the little Dutch children rolling and playing and tumbling about him, to the passionate recognition of his child in the last scene, all is as natural as if there were no footlights, no audience, no orchestra, no scenery, and no prompter. He seems unaware of the audience's presence. He is thoroughly filled with his part. And the audience evidently enjoy the reality of the performance immensely. One of the most real touches in the whole play is a conversation in the scene at the foot of the mountain between Rip Van Winkle, who is the only person on the stage, and a ghost (neither visible nor audible), who is off the stage and trying to induce the former to follow him up the mountain. The nicety of acting required to give the impression of a real conversation, and of the desire of Rip Van Winkle to hear precisely what it is the ghost is saying, is very great. Nothing seems to please the audience more than the simplicity of the questions, and answers to other imaginary questions, in this scene. It is quite plain that the truth of the acting is what tickled them, for there is absolutely nothing else in the scene. It is his evident success in such passages as these that makes us feel confident that the days of the classic drama are numbered. In the touching parts of the play, you necessarily felt a doubt whether the audience was not carried away by the pathos of the situation or by some sensational mechanism of the dramatist, but in the scenes devoid of all interest except such as might come from the excellence of the acting itself, you felt sure that it was this which so profoundly contented them.

Considering the excellence of Jefferson's talent, it is somewhat surprising to find him acting on such a low level as that which he has chosen. The play is bad enough, but the corruption of the character is worse. Those who remember with affection the old story cannot be very much pleased at seeing their Rip Van Winkle transformed into a drunken loafer. Yet such he unquestionably is in the play as Jefferson represents him. We have heard a most amusing charge made against the play, that the moral of it is the advisability of drinking to excess, inasmuch as the hero, after a life of idleness and dissipation, finally triumphs over his enemies, retrieves the ruin which his intemperate habits had originally induced, and, finally, is presented in the last act with a glass of clear liquor by his wife, who apparently attributes to his old ways his final success. Now, we have an accusation also to make against this last scene of a far graver kind than that of immorality. It is paltry; it is unworthy the occasion. Whether the playwright or the actor introduced it we do not know, but it ought certainly to be struck out. Can they find nothing better for a man to do who has gone through the tragedy of Rip Van Winkle's life than to call for something to drink? The play properly ends—if so wretched a production can be said properly to end anywhere except at the beginning—at the recognition of the daughter; a most effective piece of acting, which is sure to bring tears to the eyes of the audience, and yet at the same time to assure them that it will all end well. But the end is not the only defect. The interest of the play does not lie in the affection of the hero for the bottle, and such scenes as that between him and his wife, on his unsuccessful return from the mountains, are beneath contempt. In making Rip Van Winkle a good-natured toper, you make all the early part of the play a farce, and seriously detract from the sympathy which his fortunes are intended to excite. You feel, instead of sympathy, a good-natured contempt. It is not of much consequence to such a man whether he meets Hendrick Hudson and his ghostly crew on the Kaaterskills or not, and not much consequence either if he sleeps until the last trump instead of twenty years. However, we are bound to say that nothing seems to tickle the audience so much as the drunken part of the play, and nothing so much excites their approbation as the dénoûment.

MR. SUMNER AND THE ALABAMA TREATY.

It may save two or three papers from a good deal of future embarrassment about what we said a fortnight ago of Mr. Sumner's correspondence with Mr. Bright to mention that we have taken much more effective measures than they show any sign of taking to secure the exposure of any errors there may be in our assertions respecting the contents of the letters, inasmuch as we have used, and are using, due diligence to obtain the letters for publication. We shall present them to our readers at the earliest possible moment. The two journals which have undertaken to contradict what we have said confess they know absolutely nothing about the matter, and have nothing better to contribute to the controversy than the announcement that they do not believe our story—a fact which, for our present purpose, is of no importance whatever. As the case stands, we allege that there are two letters in Mr. Bright's possession from the Chairman of the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs, which Mr. Bright has shown to Americans, with strong expressions of indignation, as proofs that Mr. Sumner, in delivering his speech on the treaty, was guilty of bad faith. Mr. Sumner ought not to allow this to go on. If the letters are not his, or if Mr. Bright is putting a false construction on them, he ought to set himself right before the public. If we are not misinformed, his attention has already been called to Mr. Bright's feeling and language about the matter. If, on the other hand, these letters are genuine, and justify Mr. Bright's language, which, we repeat, is very strong, American taxpayers ought to know in what spirit politicians in high places have been dealing with one of the most momentous questions ever brought before the country.

As regards the letter of recommendation (not of "introduction"—perish the thought!) of which the Springfield Republican so ingenuously tried to conceal the existence, we happen now to have before us Mr. Bright's account of it in his note to Mr. Reverdy Johnson. He says he has a letter "from his [my] friend, Mr. Charles Sumner, speaking in very high terms of [you] Mr. Johnson, and of the general satisfaction with which his [your] apppointment was regarded by men of all parties in the States." There is nothing remarkable about this, but there is something very remarkable in Mr. Sumner's afterwards expressing to the correspondent of the New York Herald his surprise that the British Government should not have known better than to negotiate with the ambassador of a retiring administration, and adding that he "thought of saying this to Mr. Thornton, but concluded it would not be right for him to do so." The Springfield Republican tries to dispose of this difficulty by suggesting that Mr. Sumner "doubted the wisdom of the British Cabinet," but "had too much delicacy to say so to Mr. Thornton." Now, why should the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs doubt the wisdom of a foreign government which negotiates with an American ambassador, possessing regular credentials, and unanimously nominated by the Senate and warmly commended by him (not "introduced") to a member of that Government as a man of high qualifications for his post, whose appointment had been viewed with favor "by men of all parties?" And what about Mr. Sumner's "delicacy" in saying to a Herald reporter for publication all that it would have been "indelicate" to say to Mr. Thornton, and a great deal more?

We have thus far only parole evidence of the contents of the letters, but it is the evidence of a person who has read them, and who has listened to Mr. Bright's remarks on them, and felt some mortification on the occasion; but we have always felt the letters themselves were also needed, and have lost no time in applying for them. It is very pertinent to the matter in hand that, according to Mr. Reverdy Johnson, Mr. Sumner "advised with him several times in relation to the negotiations after Mr. Johnson's appointment, and exhibited an apparently sincere desire that he [Mr. Johnson] should bring the negotiations to an early and successful termination. In none of these interviews did he mention the peculiar views set forth in his subsequent speech. It is hardly to be supposed that as Chairman of the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs, and in constant intercourse with Mr. Seward, he did not know what Mr. Johnson's instructions were. He certainly knew what Mr. Adams's were, and these were precisely the same as Mr. Johnson's." According to the speech, however, both Mr. Adams's and Mr. Johnson's instructions were simply folly, not far removed from crime.

We need hardly say that we shall take good care to point out any inaccuracies into which we may have fallen in describing the correspondence, when we succeed in securing it for publication. In the meantime, let us modestly suggest to those friends of Mr. Sumner who doubt its existence, that a much more effectual way of bringing his detractors to justice than rolling one's eyes over the Nation's blasphemies, will be to get Mr. Sumner or Mr. Bright to deny the existence of the letters. There is the mail and the telegraph both at their service. Mr. Bright, owing to the achievements of modern science, is within easy reach; and, should he feel reluctant to place the correspondence at our disposal, he cannot in decency refuse to publish it at Mr. Sumner's request. The accuracy of the Nation's version of it is, after all, a matter of comparatively small consequence, and we shall take care not to allow the matter to go off on that issue. We must also remark that the badness of Mr. Reverdy Johnson's speeches has nothing to do with the question. It may have been well to reject the treaty because it was negotiated by an unpopular agent, or because it was defective; but the real question before us is, did Mr. Sumner's speech against it contain the deliberate views of a statesman on important points of international law and public policy, or were they simply an afterthought, suggested by the popular exasperation and excitement produced by Mr. Johnson's course in England? Everybody whom the settlement of the Alabama matter may affect in mind, body, or estate, has a right to have this question answered.

FRANCE.—PROFESSIONAL SCHOOLS FOR WOMEN.

PARIS, September 3, 1869.

IN one of my recent letters, I spoke to you of the want of useful or practical education in France chiefly for females. It is a very serious question, and one which has a terrible importance in a country where the proportion of women born is as nine to one man, and where the soil, as in all European lands, will soon be measured out by the square inch. What are women to do? How are they to earn their living if, as a numerical fact, it is to be made evident that a vast number of them cannot find men to divide life with them and support them honorably? A century and more ago the answer to this was furnished by the priests, who said, "Go to a nunnery!" as says Hamlet to Ophelia. But now that answer will no longer serve, and women must work; must know how to do something by which they can live independently.

Neither the state nor public opinion does anything in France to help a woman towards helping herself. She gets her education as she can—very indifferently, very narrowly, either one way or the other, as I will explain: If a woman be destined to what is termed the career of instruction, she has to pass certain competitive examinations at the Hôtel de Ville; and without the diploma of the state, delivered at the Hôtel de Ville in Paris, she cannot set up a class or school, neither can she be regularly a governess. When she adopts this line, she is mostly made a narrow unbeliever, and practically the consequences are of the very worst kind. If she does not take this line, she goes to a convent, and is made as narrowly bigoted and superstitious. One thing is to be noted—namely, that she knows as little, in fact, of her religion when she leaves the convent as when she leaves the classes which depend on the university; as to what she has acquired, that is pretty much the same thing in one place as in the other—but she is said to be qualified to teach. To teach what? Well, to "teach generally." After all, this turns out to be a sorry mode of gaining her livelihood; and in her old age she is dependent upon any help she can obtain for a mere crust. These necessities of women of the middle and lower middle class struck the thinking of both sexes in this country; and, a year or two ago, a society established what was called a "professional school" for young girls. Now, the teaching at this establishment, though in many respects good, leaves too completely on one side the higher or more idealistic training of the mind, is too merely positive, and too evidently hostile to religion of every description. It is, in its line, as narrow as the worst Jesuit schooling.

About eighteen months back, M. Duruy, speaking on this subject, which occupied him intensely, lamented that a mean term could not be found for educating girls "professionally" without making of them either atheists or fanatics, seeing clearly, at the same time, that private initiative alone could do anything effective. A lady, well known for her benevolence and for her great ability and accomplishments, the Princess Charles de Beauvan (a Pole by birth), seized upon the idea, took it up energetically, and set to work to found the establishment in question. She has founded it, and almost entirely with her own resources; for what she has been able to scrape together from external aid has been comparatively nothing. What she has done is this:

At No. 15 in the Rue de Richelieu has been opened an institution in which, for the small sum of ten francs a month, a girl, between the ages of six and eighteen, can be radically and practically taught all those things which will enable her to earn her living independently. Ten francs a month comes within the scope of the pettiest tradesmen, whether green-grocer, charcoal-retailer, or what not. They can give that; they cannot give more—which is the reason of the neglected state of education of their daughters and their subsequent wretchedness. Well, then, for ten francs a month, the girl may be, according to the parents' wish, qualified as a governess, and put in a condition to pass her examination at the Hôtel de Ville; or as a femme de chambre, or a dressmaker, or a modiste, or a laundress, or an engraver on wood (a lucrative employment), or an embroideress, or a teacher of drawing or music. What the parents desire is done. And this principle is also strictly adhered to in the matter of religion. At this establishment there are pupils of three creeds—Catholic, Protestant, and Israelite; and the Princess de Beauvan takes the most scrupulous care that no child's conscience be tampered with. This is one of the reasons of the immense success achieved by the "professional school for girls" of the Rue de Richelieu. The parents feel absolutely secure; they know that not the shadow of an influence opposed to their own will be exercised over their children; and they see that, for the trifling sum of one hundred and twenty francs a year (less than twenty-five dollars), they can ensure to their girls the attainment of a profession and the possibility of supporting themselves later in life.

One of the surest and most lucrative employments taught them is the art (or I should say the various arts) of ornamental embroidery. Formerly, both in France and Germany, embroidery in gold and silver, and in flat silks, was the occupation of many. The Revolution came, fortunes were destroyed, and such luxuries as these were no longer useful. This has again altered, and the rapid development of industry having re-created large fortunes, they are spent, as heretofore, in the acquisition of costly materials, whether for the adornment of the person or the abode. One of the kinds of embroidery specially taught these girls is one of which the Princess de Beauvan herself would seem to possess the secret; it is the art of copying with perfect exactness the Gobelins and Beauvais tapestry, without either incurring the expenditure of money or loss of time attendant on the purchase of a "subject" from either of these looms.

If you order a picture to be hung in a great hall, from either Beauvais or Gobelins, you must wait several years for it, and you must pay between ten thousand and twenty thousand dollars, and upwards, according to size. The Princess de Beauvan's art consists in giving you a copy of any of these pictures in a few months and at a quarter the cost. Many visitors to the great Paris Exhibition of '67 will remember her wonderful copy in tapestry of a portrait of Vanloo's. This, amongst others, is a profession which ensures a woman a really comfortable existence in the lower middle class. So do, more or less, all the professions connected with drawing. A young person of either sex, who can draw well, has many chances in many trades of fairly remunerated employment.

The school I allude to began eighteen months ago with six pupils; these are now over a hundred, and applications have to be refused. The thing to hope is that, sooner or later, such an institution will be set up in every quarter of the town; but as yet the "private initiative" required is wanting. Whilst the parents recognize to the full the genuine liberality of the instruction given, and the impartiality shown to all sects—this in itself arms against the undertaking all the narrowest of the two opposite factions. The atheistic, or so-called "free-thinkers," try with might and main to ruin the school of the Rue de Richelieu because religion is admitted in its instruction; and the red-hot Ultramontanes and Jesuits would all but petition for its excommunication because all creeds are tolerated in it, and received on equal grounds.

It is a most praiseworthy attempt of its kind, and, I believe, of this kind the only one; and it is not a thing to be overlooked by any one curious about the development of France. Female education is one of the points which are open to the severest censure in this country, and any effort to improve it ought to be studied. It is worth while.

Correspondence.

HUMBOLDT NO ATHEIST.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I have before me a Boston journal of September 15, containing a full account of the celebration in honor of Alexander von Humboldt which took place in that city on the preceding day. I find that several of the speakers who there addressed the admirers of the great German tried to enlighten their hearers in regard to his belief, or disbelief, in the existence of God, doubtless presuming that some of them would be anxious to know what so profound an enquirer into the secrets of nature thought concerning its origin and supreme rule, while others would be tormented by the idea that so admirable a man might, after all, be doomed to eternal damnation from want of the saving faith. One of the speakers alone, a noted materialistic writer, Carl Heinzen, who addressed a separate circle in the tongue of the hero of the day, seemed to be actuated by the desire of vindicating his memory from the aspersion, which some of the English-speaking orators might possibly cast upon it, of a belief in a divine ruler or in something equally horrible. Thinking that "full justice will be meted out to him by those only who will show that he saved the honor, as we might say, and the independence of nature by . . . repelling from her side all distorting conceptions," Mr. Heinzen devoted the principal portion of his oration to representing Humboldt in the bright light of a pure "atheist and materialist," though acknowledging that there was no direct evidence to prove such assertions, for "as far as we know, Humboldt has never, directly or openly, avowed himself to be an atheist or a materialist, being content with showing himself as such in his writings," and "he was even weak enough to make apparent concessions to the belief of others by using phrases which could be misconstrued by means of a forced interpretation."

While Mr. Heinzen thus defiantly proclaimed the materialism and atheism of Humboldt, and by means of a little Jesuitry explained away all n the life or writings of the naturalist that might militate against this theory, the defenders of the opposite view seem to have been rather timid in propounding it, or not well prepared to do it. Rev. Dr. Hedge is reported to have found the strongest evidence against the charge of atheism proffered against Humboldt in his "love for nature and reverence for the laws and works of God," which implied "a recognition of a divine intelligence, even though it might have been an unconscious recognition." Professor Agassiz, too, in endeavoring to prove that where Humboldt "in his works . . . uses the name of God, it appears plainly that he believes in a Creator as the lawgiver and primary originator of all things," found no better support in direct words than his calling nature "God's majestic realm," and his using in the description of the earthquake of Caracas—when the bells began to toll with the first shock—the poetical words: "It was the hand of God, and not of man, which rang that funeral dirge." Now, is there no more positive evidence to be found? Did Humboldt always use "phrases which could be misconstrued" when touching on these topics? Is the passage referring to his brother's treatise, which Mr. Heinzen quoted, the most conclusive of Humboldt's confidential utterances in his letters to Varnhagen von Ense, whom he made "the exclusive keeper" of his "impieties" till his "departure from life," and whom he honored as one of the few to whom full "truth is due?" The following extracts—in reference to both atheism and materialism—may serve as an answer. The first is from Friedrich Kapp's translation of those posthumous "Letters" (Letter 101); the second contains the solemn concluding lines of the first volume of Humboldt's "Kosmos," which, as being written for the public, I quote in the original, in order that the readers of your journal may the better judge whether they were framed to be "misconstrued." I give both passages exactly as I find them, italics and all:

"Humboldt to Varnhagen. . . . . In the Westminster Review a certain Dr. Cross says the style of 'Kosmos' is . . . . very indifferent . . . . Then follows the denunciation of atheism, although 'creation' and the 'created world' are never lost sight of in the book. And did I not, only eight months ago, in the French translation, say, in the plainest terms:—It is this necessity of things, this occult but permanent connection, this periodical return in the progress, development of formation, phenomena, and events, which constitute Nature submissive to a controlling power. Physics, as the name itself implies, can only deduce the phenomena of the physical world from the properties of matter; the highest end of experimental science is therefore to ascend to the existence of the laws, and progressively to generalize the same. Whatever lies beyond is no object for physical demonstration, it belongs to another order of more elevated speculations. Immanuel Kant, one of the few philosophers whom no one has yet accused of impiety, has, with rare sagacity, indicated the limits of physical explanation in his renowned Essai sur la Théorie et la Construction des Cieux."

"Mit diesen Worten . . . . sei es erlaubt . . . die allgemeine Darstellung der Naturerscheinungen im Weltall zu beschliessen . . . . Nach theilweise erkannten Gesetzen konnten hier die Erscheinungen geordnet werden. Gesetze anderer, geheimnissvollerer Art walten in den höchsten Lebenskreisen der organischen Welt; in denen des vielfach gestalteten, mit schaffender Geisteskraft begabten, spracherzeugenden Menschengeschlechts. Ein physisches Naturgemälde bezeichnet die Grenze, wo die Sphäre der Intelligenz beginnt und der ferne Blick sich senkt in eine andere Welt. Es bezeichnet die Grenze, und überschreitet sie nicht."

Philalethes.

New York, Sept. 19, 1869.

[For the benefit of some of our readers, we annex an almost literal translation of the last given passage:

"With these words . . . let it be permitted . . . to conclude the general sketch of the natural phenomena of the universe . . . These phenomena we have been able to arrange here according to partially discovered laws. Other laws, of a more mysterious nature, rule the higher life-spheres of the organic world—those of man, a being of varied formation, endowed with creative mental power, and speech-producing. A physical delineation of nature marks the boundary line where the sphere of the intellect begins, and where our remote gaze loses itself in a different world. It marks the line, but transcends it not."

Notes.

LITERARY.

Mr. T. O. H. P. Burnham, the very well known owner of an antiquarian book-store in Boston—of the antiquarian book-store, we may as well say—has in press a new edition of Miss Sheppard's "Counterparts," which is to be printed on tinted paper, and is to be otherwise handsome, and suited to the peculiar class of readers who find pleasure in it. Mr. Burnham has, it appears, a project of publishing—translated, we suppose—all the "Bibles of the World," and is to begin with the Vedas, which he talks of putting into the printer's hands at an early day, the Rev. Dr. J. F. Clarke being the editor he has selected for the series.——Mr. James H. Burr, of Hartford, has just published a book, to be sold by book-agents, which is written by Mr. P. T. Barnum, and is entitled "Struggles and Triumphs; or, Forty Years' Recollections."

— A new evening paper has just been started in this city, which bids fair to be clever and successful. It certainly will be if its "reportorial corps" can do their work as well as its editor can write the reportorial English which used to vex so much the not unserene soul of De Quincey. And in fact it is an evil under the sun—though we are so much more hardened to it, or indurated to it, than the brilliant writer's earliest victims were—to have prospectuses written in this high strain: "We would not, in any spirit of affectation, disavow the potency of pecuniary considerations in inaugurating this enterprise, but we do pronounce emphatically our conviction that the cheaper class of newspaper literature in this city is pervaded by an alarming tendency toward licentiousness and infidelity, and is characterized by a general recklessness of moral responsibility which helps to aggravate, rather than check or counteract, the corruption of the day. It shall be our ambition to make a newspaper which shall in some measure satisfy the popular craving for that which is sprightly, we might say sensational, at the same time endeavoring to discriminate between dignity and stupidity, between genial vivacity and senseless frivolity." He is not going to deny, you see, that the paper must pay its expenses; but he thinks a paper need not be dirty or rascally merely because it is cheap. In this we fully agree with him; and we shall all the more heartily wish him success if he will from this time out take to reading regularly in his Bible, and his Bunyan, and his Cobbett, and his Boswell, and learn to give us a style fit for a Christian, as well as the sound morality which is to accompany the sprightly, not to say sensational, matter that we, like the rest of the public, are perhaps craving.

—Three numbers of the monthly Journal of the Gynæcological Society of Boston have now appeared, and afford the means of judging whether the society and its official organ supply, or are likely to supply, a desideratum. On both these points we cannot err in deciding affirmatively, especially so far as concerns the medical profession, to whose members among our readers our remarks are principally directed. The aim of this new organization is the advancement of the knowledge of the diseases of women; but while it adopts for its motto "Propter uterum est mulier," it excludes obstetrics as a branch already well-worked and well-established. In practice, we opine, obstetrics cannot be always ignored, but even if they could be, the society would be busily and worthily employed. The editors of the Journal are Drs. Winslow Lewis, Horatio R. Storer, and George H. Bixby—the first a local celebrity, the second more widely known, and the last not unfamiliar to thousands of Federal sick and wounded whose lot was cast in the campaign along the Mississippi. Taken together, they bring experience, energy, and skill, in an uncommon degree, to the work they have undertaken, and their independence is pretty sure to excite hostility in certain quarters in Boston, where "respectability" is too much thought of for the good of a profession so empirical and unstable as that of medicine. We judge that the society, small as it has bound itself to be, numerically, will not only exercise a wholesome influence upon general practice, but upon State legislation in matters where it may properly offer counsel. Dr. Storer and his colleagues agree in discountenancing female physicians, which of course is no new thing in the former, radical as he undoubtedly is; but we must say strong evidence on the other side is furnished in several papers reported in the society's proceedings. Besides recommending the Journal to physicians, we take the liberty of thinking that intelligent laymen would be not a little benefited by perusing it. A moderate knowledge of anatomy, a little Latin and less Greek, will enable a man to read understandingly a large proportion of current medical literature, and by watching the growth of systems, the discovery of new drugs and operations, and the tendency of practice as therein recorded, he will be competent to distinguish between a quack and a man of science much more surely than he otherwise could, and can perhaps often anticipate the services of a doctor, by seasonably detecting the malady or by administering a preventive or a remedy of the simpler sort. The greatest difficulties in the physician's practice arise from the dense ignorance of even the best classes of society as to the nature and cause of disease and the effects of misconduct, and it is deeply to be regretted that medical reading does not form some part of every person's self-culture or education.

—The contributions to the literature of the Byron controversy during the week are of some importance. The solicitors of the Byron family write to the London papers, denouncing Mrs. Stowe and the editor of Macmillan's Magazine rather sharply, and denying, point-blank, that it is, as the editor has asserted, a "complete" and "authentic statement" of the facts connected with the separation. They also denounce Mrs. Stowe's article "as a gross breach of trust and confidence," as "inconsistent with her own recommendation to Lady Byron," and "as an ignorant violation of the terms of Lady Byron's last will and testament." They say Lady Byron, a few days before her death, committed to three persons as trustees—of whom Mrs. Stowe is not one—the whole of her MSS., with directions that nobody else, however nearly connected with her, should be allowed access to them, or to inspect them, and that these trustees should make such use of them as they deemed best for the interests of her grandchildren. But, as the Daily News well remarks, since Mrs. Stowe was not one of the trustees, what has she got to do with the terms of the trust? Other letters in the London papers are mostly from persons who evidently know nothing about the matter, and devote themselves mainly to personal abuse of Mrs. Stowe, while one or two make a critical examination of the article under the rules of evidence, and this, of course, it bears badly. On this side of the water, Carl Benson comes out in the Turf, Field, and Farm in a letter, in which, besides arguing against the probability of Mrs. Stowe's story on grounds with which our readers are already familiar, he asserts that the accusation was distinctly made "in an American literary paper" at least a year ago, but being anonymous no notice was taken of it; and that Lady Byron communicated "the secret" to Mrs. Jameson, and Mrs. Jameson to Miss Catharine Sedgwick, and Miss Sedgwick to at least one other person. He also makes some strong points against what was perhaps the weakest part of Mrs. Stowe's article—the attempt to find corroborative evidence in "Manfred." Mr. James Parton also appears in the field, in a letter to the Tribune, containing a string of those curious non sequiturs for which he is now becoming famous, and which he produces with such perfect innocence of manner. He says Mrs. Stowe was justified in publishing the article by the facts—(1) That she was a friend of Lady Byron, who was calumniated by Guiccioli; (2) That the New York Times had reviewed the Guiccioli book favorably; (3) That a "veteran journalist" in New York knows of twenty-three young men who have destroyed themselves by "the nasty vices"—"he [Mr. Parton] might say the Byronic vices." (This mode of bridging over the logical chasm, and connecting Byron with the death of the twenty-three young men by the use of the question-begging epithet "Byronic," is in the best Parton manner, and is really delicious.) From the number Mr. Parton himself has known, however, he feels justified in saying that the veteran journalist has rather understated than overstated "in putting the number of these lamentable suicides at twenty-three." (We suppose the real number must be twenty-five.) (4) That Byron, in some mysterious manner, is the cause of the vices of young literary men; (5) That Mrs. Stowe, being a good and pure woman, "as superior to the average of mankind in character as she is in genius," and "having been the organ of the national conscience," to question her decision on the propriety of publishing this article is, to Mr. Parton's mind, like questioning the dictum "of Professor Agassiz with reference to a fish, or charging Professor Peirce with error in a mathematical calculation!" We suppose there is no intelligent friend of Mrs. Stowe or Mr. Parton who does not wish that Mr. Parton would leave ethical and scientific questions alone, and confine himself to his proper business of narrating.

—But the most important contribution to the Byron controversy that has been made since the discussion began was made last week by Lord Lindsay who writes to the London Times a letter which contains some passages copied from the private diary of Lady Anne Barnard, which in turn contain some passages quoted from a letter of Lady Byron's written to Lady Anne shortly after the separation from Lord Byron had taken place. The two women had been friends from childhood, it appears; and when Lady Anne, who had just been undergoing a long fit of illness, heard of the separation, she wrote to Lady Byron to come to her to be comforted. This request was complied with, and we may imagine that the talk between the friends was long; and it is probable to a very high degree that we shall not go far wrong if we believe it to have been not only long but exhaustive. Now, then, this is, in substance, what the injured wife told her bosom friend in 1816. The newly married pair, who were on their way from London into the country, had not been an hour in the country when the husband said, "Oh! what a dupe you have been to your imagination. How is it possible that a woman of your sense could form the wild hope of reforming me? Many are the tears you will have to shed ere that plan is accomplished. It is enough for me that you are my wife for me to hate you. If you were the wife of any other man, I own you might have charms." Lady Byron thought he was jesting—"had not a conception he was in earnest." It will be remembered that Miss Harriet Martineau, in her biographical notice of Lady Byron, refers to this scene in the carriage, and, describing the arrival of the pair at the country-house, speaks of the amazed and pained expression of the wife's face when left to ascend the steps alone; and says that it attracted the compassionate notice of the servant who hastened to meet her. Mrs. Stowe also mentions the affair; and we suppose there is no need of doubting its occurrence, though there is a little unreality in Lady Anne's phraseology—an unreality to be attributed, doubtless, to the fact of her being to some extent a "literary lady" of the period—and though there is improbability in the case abstractly considered. It was not the abstract newly married man, however, who was in the carriage, but Lord Byron, who certainly was capable of such brutality, who was never content unless he was picturing and doing the melodramatic, and who clearly did not marry his wife for love. Then followed the perturbed married life, which gave his wife a year of misery, but very seldom and very briefly lightened by a moment of happiness for her or of decency in him. He was a profligate, a drunkard, and a mean tyrant. To-day he would tell his wife that he had married her for her money, as she him from vanity; to-morrow he would roll on the floor and call himself insane; next day he would tell her of his haunts, and boast of them; next he would insult her by base proposals; then, perhaps, he would call himself a monster, fall at her feet, and beg for pardon, till he had got her into a forgiving mood and shedding tears of gladness at his return to virtue, whereupon he would laugh at her, and inform her that he had merely been experimenting with her. All this time, according to Lady Anne's account of Lady Byron's disclosures, "she kept his sister with her as much as possible." "Oh! what an implement of torture have I acquired in you," was his remark when he first saw his daughter; and he appears to have actually kept his wife in a state of alarm for the child's safety. She, meantime, was in a state of uncertainty as to the insanity which it pleased him to affect. She consulted Dr. Baillie, who was not inclined to believe in it, but advised her to go out of town, to part in friendship, and not to excite him by writing cold letters. "She went, regretting, as she told me, to wear any semblance but the truth"—which means, we take it, that she had become satisfied that her husband was pretty thoroughly bad, and that it was useless to offer him affection, or to pretend that she could live with him. Finally, the diary says that Lady Byron corresponded with Lady Anne after the separation; that the latter saw that her friend would be misjudged by the world; and that, therefore, she decided to place on record some of her letters, although she had been compelled to promise that she would not publish them, Lady Byron still loving Byron, and wishing not to injure him by any act or word of hers.

—One of the letters Lord Lindsay proceeds to quote, and it furnishes strong negative testimony that Lady Byron, some year or two after she had begun to live a widow, had no charges to make against her sister-in-law. At all events, she makes none, and she uses language in regard to Byron and herself which, as she expressly says she knows his insanity to be a sham, she could not have used in regard to an incestuous adulterer. To the fact that "she kept his sister with her as much as possible," add the further fact that she knew Byron was as sane as need be, and how could she thus write of him to her friend: "Though he would not suffer me to remain his wife, he cannot prevent me from continuing his friend"? Again, she says of this same incestuous adulterer, as we are now asked to believe him: "It is not necessary to speak ill of his heart in general; it is sufficient that to me it is hard and impenetrable—that my own must have been broken before his could have been touched. I would rather represent this as my misfortune than as his guilt; but surely that misfortune is not to be made my crime. . . . . It is not my duty to give way to hopeless and wholly unrequited affection, but so long as I live my chief struggle will probably be not to remember him too kindly."

—The East Indian Archipelago is getting a good deal of attention this year, in consequence of the fortuitous publication of several narratives of travel in that part of the world in previous years. Professor Bickmore's and Mr. Wallace's ample volumes—the former covering portions of 1865–66, the latter the eight years 1854–1862—are now reinforced by Dr. Adolf Bastian's "Reisen im Indischen Archipel" (Jena: Hermann Costenoble). This work is the fifth of a series of studies and journeys among the people of Eastern Asia by the same author, and comes between his observations in Siam, Cambodia, and Cochin-China, and those in China, Siberia, the Ural, the Caucasus, etc.—the latter to be comprised in a forthcoming sixth and final volume. Bastian appeared in the Archipelago in the interval between Wallace and Bickmore (March—June, 1864); but he by no means takes up the thread of the one or paves the way for the other. His travels are of quite a different order; for he touched only at Singapore, Batavia, and Manila on his way to Japan (of which country he has much to say), and was content to see men, and men only, and in crowded places—it being part of his theory that the present moment of contact between the barbarous and civilized races in the East is most favorable for those ethnological collections of facts on which comparative psychology, in his opinion, must ultimately repose. It is this subject (already treated by him in his work on "Das Beständige in den Menschenrassen," and now regularly discussed in his Zeitschrift für Ethnologie) which wholly engrosses him in his fifth volume; his voyages are hardly visible enough to warrant the title he has selected. What strikes the reader in this as in his former works is his enormous industry and acquirements, on the one hand, and the difficulty he has in deploying his material, on the other. His speculative style is often animated and lofty, but in the presence of facts which need statement, description, arrangement, he tries even the patience of his countrymen.

— Of the new or forthcoming English Religious and Theological works, clergymen of the Church of England will be interested in a compilation made by the Rev. C. H. Davis and called the "English Church Canons of 1604; with Historical Introduction, and Notes Critical and Explanatory, showing the modifications of each Canon by subsequent Act of Parliament." The volume also contains appendices on the new Canons of 1865, the vestment question, and other matters; but altogether it is not a large one. Another little book of value to the same class of readers, or to a part of it, is the Rev. W. B. Marriott's "Vestments of the Church," which is a lecture printed with illustrations. Dr. J. M. Neale's "Sermons for Children" go into a second edition, and the same author's hand appears—and we may be sure with all its best force and skill—in a book called "The Office of the Most Holy Name," which is a devotional help to young persons, and is written by an anonymous author, who has taken from Dr. Neale the translations of several of the hymns of the early Church. In work of that kind, perhaps, Dr. Neale never had an equal. The book in question will no doubt be much more satisfactory to the Anglo-Catholic churchman than to any other. The Rev. T. H. Ingraham's "Prince of the House of David"—a book that once had such a run in this country, and for anything we know may be running yet—is reprinted in England by Routledge. The recently deceased Bishop of Salisbury had for a friend and admirer, and we believe for a chaplain, the Rev. Henry Parry Liddon, the most eloquent Church of England divine, who, on the day following the funeral of his patron, preached a commemorative sermon which the saintliness of the prelate's life well deserved, and which well depicted it in eloquent language. It is now printed. The Rev. Mr. Leathes, Hebrew professor in Kings College, London, writes "The Witness of St. Paul to Christ, with an Appendix on the Credibility of the Acts"—being a reply to the strictures of Dr. Donaldson. "Apostolical Succession in the Church of England," by the Rev. Arthur Haddan, is one of an interminable succession of works on a question which will never be settled if it is not settled already. The Rev. H. B. Walton and the Rev. P. G. Medd have united to edit a reprint of the First Book of Common Prayer of Edward VI. and the Ordinal of 1549, together with the Order of the Communion, 1548.

— New English works of Poetry are almost none at all. "Monk" Lewis's fearful "Tales of Wonder" are, however, just reprinted, much, we should imagine, to almost everybody's surprise. We had been fearing that his fluent, grisly, eyeless graveyard muse had vanished—"disappearing with a melodious twang." But perhaps we have been hasty in grieving over the loss of the good old chain-clanking ghost, the blood-bedabbled, good solid old British spectre, with signs most palpable upon him of being of housemaid manufacture, and ghastly enough for anybody. Schiller's "Wilhelm Tell" has been translated by somebody unknown into English verse; and there is added to the Clarendon Press Series "The Idylls and Epigrams of Theocritus," annotated by Mr. Herbert Snow. Routledge issues a new edition of N. P. Willis's "Poetical Works." Among works in History and Biography first in interest is probably Mr. George Masterman's "Seven Eventful Years in Paraguay," which is a narrative of personal experience, but happens in this case to belong to current history, and to be needed. Mr. G. R. Gleig writes a "Continuation of the Marquis of Londonderry's Story of the Peninsular War." Mr. Froude's eleventh and twelfth volumes, the last two, are soon to appear. A Miss Jane Williams has written a "History of Wales, drawn from authentic sources," which will be good, if well done. In Fiction, the book that will be welcomed most warmly, we fancy—at any rate, by those who know "L'Arrabbiata"—is a translation of a new volume of novelettes by Paul Heyse. There are, besides, Miss Marryatt's "Veronique"—which she tells her American publishers she considers her best work, and which might be that, some of her critics think, and still lack something. Mr. E. J. Worboise's "Story of a Pervert;" "A Country Family," by the author of "Lost Sir Massingberd;" Mr. William Gilbert's "Sir Thomas Branston;" "The Experiences of a Real Detective"—which we take to be fictitious; "Give a Dog a Bad Name and ——," a story with a violent title, written by A. Fonblanque, jr.; Arthur Sketchley's "Mrs. Brown in the Highlands;" and one or two more which seem to promise less than these.

— At the head of Miscellaneous Works and Works of General Literature we may well put the fifth volume of Spedding's "Bacon." It contains all the occasional works, including letters, tracts, state papers, speeches, memorials, devices, and all authentic writings not already printed, with Mr. Spedding's historical and biographical comments. Messrs. Longmans are to publish later in the year "The Scenery of England and Wales," which will be an attempt to trace the nature of the geological causes, particularly denudation, which have given English and Welsh scenery its present character. The work is by Mr. D. Macintosh, and will be profusely illustrated with wood-cuts from photographs. "Country Walks of a Naturalist with his Children" is by the Rev. W. Houghton, and is for youthful learners and observers in natural history. A book commended as being instructive to young mothers, and as being written simply, honestly, and wisely, is by Mr. Pye Henry Chavasse. Its title is "Counsel to a Mother," and it is in continuation of a similar work. Mr. Edward Newman has written "The Work on British Moths," "An Illustrated History," etc., with life-size figures and full descriptions. In the present time of curiosity about the probable future of the British colonies, editors and others may find useful Mr. John Bowes's "Notes, Topographical, Geographical, and otherwise, on the Colonial Empire of Great Britain," which now appears in a revised and corrected edition.

REMINISCENCES OF AN AMERICAN OCTOGENARIAN.*

JUST on the verge of his eightieth year—now at the close of a life almost coeval with that of the Government which his celebrated father did so much to establish, and which the son has often served in private and public capacities—Colonel James Hamilton narrates his recollections of the great men whom he has known from the time of Washington down to to-day, and of the public events of which he has been cognizant in his protracted career. He has seen and conversed with the men of the Revolution; he began political life by making a Federal speech before Burr had killed his father; he talks familiarly of all our "illustrious founders," and is not afraid to record that Jefferson was a consummate hypocrite, and that Madison was one of the most spiteful little fellows that ever existed; he was a young man rising in his profession when the battle of New Orleans was won and lost; he knows the pre-Adamite wars about the successions to the early presidencies, and was himself a part, and no small one, of the famous Nullification troubles, to say nothing of the tremendous struggle over Mrs. Eaton's reputation; he saw the rise and decadence and death of the Whig party; he knew the Democrats when they called themselves Republicans; and he has lived to see his friend and fellow-Whig, Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State under a President who was not born when the great Scott was a man of renown; to see Nullification become secession; to see the Revolution dwarfed almost into nothingness by campaigns fought in regions that were subject to Spain and France when he was a child; to see Perry and Preble and Decatur and Macdonough give place to Farragut and Foote; to see Benton and Crawford and Rives and Randolph and Pickering and Polk fading away into insubstantial figures, and Lincoln and Chase and Davis and Fessenden and Andrew Johnson and Sumner supplanting them; and of these, too, he has seen that some of them begin to fade and vanish in turn; he assisted in the fight about the removal of the Bank deposits, and he has seen Government bonds and a national banking system that would have reduced the Hero of New Orleans to imbecility, through mere gasping amazement, if he could have conceived of them. And he has known not only the celebrities of this country, but many of the distinguished men and women of England and the Continent—men of the court of Louis XVI., of the First Empire, of the days of '48, and of the Second Empire; and not a little of the interest of his book depends on the too few stories that he has to tell of his intercourse with such personages. He has always been too political, it would seem, to be a good gossipper or collector of ana, and has mightily failed to use his chances. But he made some slight use of them. Here, for example, is a rencontre with a celebrated man, who showed himself to our sturdy American in rather a queer light, and took little or nothing for his pains. Colonel Hamilton is dining at the Lansdowne House:

"At length the nobleman who handed the mother in to dinner, and who was, of course, the person of highest rank at the table, invited the daughter to drink wine with him. I turned to my next neighbor, a large, burly-looking man, who turned directly to me and said, 'An American, I perceive?' 'Yes, sir, I have the honor to be an American.' 'Well, sir, there is an account up there (pointing with his forefinger) which your country will find it very difficult to settle.' I understood his allusion, and being a little nettled, I retorted by saying: 'Slavery? If that account is properly entered, your country must settle it. You brought slavery upon us, and when, as colonies, we asked to be permitted to abolish it, our parental Government refused to allow us to do so. And let me add, too, in India, the English judges have decided that the Hindoo law which sanctioned slavery was the law of the land, the law of a British territory. If I recollect aright, we are informed by the best authority that, in a great famine in British India, the women sold their children to obtain bread.' My tone was earnest, and my manner so emphatic as to invite the attention of others. The company rose to retire, and the Marquis said: 'Macaulay! Colonel Hamilton! what! what!' I thus learned who my antagonist was. He afterward met me at a breakfast, and, when introduced to me, apologized" —as, indeed, he had need.

Two or three more of these stories we shall quote; but before doing so we must say that the quality of the book is not accurately presented in them—that is to say, so far as concerns the general reader. A great deal of space is filled with letters on political and financial topics that interested the author from the early days when "Little Van" was Governor of this State, down to the other day when Mr. Hugh McCulloch was Secretary of the Treasury. Colonel Hamilton wrote a great many letters to a great many public men on all sorts of subjects. Often they are able letters, and sometimes they have helped to shape national policy; no doubt, many of them did very good service in their season; but while we are not going to object to their publication, we must say that they are not precisely succulent reading now, useful as they may be to the unfortunate future historian of the Rebellion, and to him also who is to do American politics generally. We wish they had been published by themselves, and that the colonel had made also a handy volume of personal memoirs.

Visiting in Scotland, in 1837, his father's cousin, Mr. Alexander Hamilton, of Grange, in Ayrshire, the colonel got a glimpse of the disappearing Scottish life of the period—the Highlander; the "ancient, very clever woman" with her stories, whom we all know; the untaxed usquebaugh and the toddy; the bitter politics:

"The clergyman of the parish, and several other gentlemen, visited him while I was there. They addressed him as 'Grange' and as 'My Laird.' He had living with him Captain Wright, and two young maiden ladies—relations; also an ancient, very clever woman, a visitor. The laird showed me the portraits of many departed members of the family, and, among others, Sir John Pellick, of that ilk. His two waiters were dressed in small clothes and plain livery. He said to me, 'Cousin, as you have been in Paris and London, I fear you will not find my cooking agreeable, for, to say the truth, my cook has lived with me forty years.' A very agreeable and singular reunion of the family was as follows: At about nine o'clock at night, all the party sat around the dining-table; the laird had a plate of oatmeal for his supper; before each gentleman, Captain Wright, my son, and myself, were placed a small carrat of whiskey, a goblet, wine-glasses, sugar, and a silver ladle with ebony handle; warm water was in a tea-urn within reach, and a plate with soft biscuit before each person. This reunion was for conversation. Each gentleman made his whiskey toddy in his goblet, and with the ladle filled one or more of his glasses with the mixture he had prepared, and sent it to one of the ladies of his choice. This simple and agreeable tipple occupied the party for an hour or so in lively chat. The elder lady repeated to the laird a gossiping story of another lady, to which he replied, 'Ah! she is a rinsing hussy.' I write according to the sound. The whiskey was far better than any I had ever tasted, and wishing to send some of the same to America, I said, 'Laird, this is the best whiskey I ever tasted. Where do you get it?' After a pause, he said, 'Cousin, that is a question never asked nor answered in this part of Scotland.' I felt that I had made a blunder. He said shortly afterward, 'Cousin James, to-morrow morning, before breakfast, if you go down to the entry you will probably find on the marble table a few black bottles well corked, and if you go round the house you may encounter a naked-legged Highlandman.' The next morning I was up early, and found all things that had been intimated. It was obvious why such a question was never asked nor answered. At breakfast, I laughingly said, 'Captain Wright, I found this morning a very civil Scot walking round the house in a costume I had never seen before, except on the stage. I should like to have a cask of any liquor he might have put into my coach.' Wright replied, 'I think I can manage it.' The laird said promptly, 'Hout, man, they would find it and seize the carriage, cask and all. Cousin, stay here and enjoy the liquor, but do not attempt to carry any away in any other manner. Nothing can escape the vigilance of the exciseman.' The explanation was that the bottles were placed on the table, and the naked legged fellow was found near the house and received payment for his liquor.

'I said to the laird, 'Cousin, is not the Duke of Hamilton the chief or head of our clan?' 'I believe he is,' he replied. 'Do you not, as a liege, go sometimes to pay your respects to your chief?' 'Nay, cousin, not I; he is a damn Whig Radical.' This good gentleman was so high a Tory that he would not allow a questionable newspaper to come into his house."

Here is something as much to Samuel Rogers's credit—though it was his father who did it, to be sure—as most of the stories which are told of him. Perhaps it partly accounts for the poet's general civility to Americans:

"I returned to London, and to the society of my dear friend, Samuel Rogers. I had the pleasure, in the course of my five voyages to Europe, to visit London eight or ten times, and until the last two, in 1847 and 1848, always breakfasted at his house and enjoyed much of his society. His father, as he told me, was accustomed to have family prayers. When he heard of the Declaration of Independence, he added a prayer for the success of the Colonies, which he repeated every day until the peace. He believed the feelings which prompted this prayer were more common in England than is generally supposed. He said, when an armament was ordered to be taken from the Tower to be sent to America, the officer in command resigned the place rather than to be instrumental in subduing the Colonies. The Recorder of London, when he heard of the outbreak of the rebellion, went to order a suit of mourning. His tailor expressed the hope that his lordship had not met with a serious loss. 'Yes,' was the answer, 'my country's loss, by the rebellion, induced by injustice and tyranny.'"

In Russia, in 1841, where Hamilton was received with a great deal of the civility and cordiality which Americans now expect in that country, he heard this anecdote of John Randolph, who was not just the man to be amused at an incident of this kind, we may be sure:

* "Reminiscences of James A. Hamilton; or, Men and Events, at Home and Abroad, during Three-quarters of a Century." New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 8vo, pp. ix.; 647.

"The following story was told to me in relation to the presentation of John Randolph, who was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to Russia by President Jackson. When he was presented to the Empress, and she put out her hand, he went down on his knee, and having on tight gauntlets, he was for some time in that position, tugging at the one on his right hand in order to take her Majesty's hand and kiss it, it being contrary to etiquette to touch the lady's bare hand with a gloved hand. This took him so long, that her Majesty smiled, and the courtiers laughed out. Randolph soon took his leave, and left Russia."

The Hero of New Orleans thus makes his appearance as he and Hamilton, with a party of Southern ladies, were on their way to New Orleans, where a medal was to be presented to the General, and where, too, he was to deliver that year's cotton crop, which he had on board with him:

"During the voyage we stopped at the different towns on the river, at the most of which the people were assembled; and at the principal ones, committees addressed the General, to whom he made appropriate replies. In the course of the voyage an event occurred, which I repeat, as it is suggestive of character. A steamer of greater speed than ours, going in the same direction, passed us, crossed our bow; then stopped and let us pass her; and then passed us again in triumph. This was repeated again and again, until the General, being excited by the offensive course, ordered a rifle to be brought to him; hailed the pilot of the other steamer, and swore that if he did the same thing again he would shoot him. As I believed the General was in earnest, and as such an outrage could not be of service to our cause, I went below and stated to Mrs. Jackson what had occurred; she said mildly, 'Colonel, do me the favor to say to the General I wish to speak to him.' I did so. He went to the cabin with me, and remained there in chat with her."

Mrs. Jackson, if she was extraordinarily ugly, and if she was the first lady Colonel Hamilton had ever seen smoke cigars, nevertheless struck him as being a very sensible woman, who, had she lived, would have deserved well of the Republic by checking her husband's violence when afterwards on a larger stage he played similar pranks, to the great detriment of us all. The worst legacy of his Administration, however, we owe to his Secretary of State. Van Buren, Colonel Hamilton avows, was the author of that fatal policy of making a clean sweep of office-holders in the interests of the victorious party, which since his time has occurred quadrennially, or oftener. Or rather, it was he who made application to the nation of the policy which the Albany Regency had invented for use in this State, and which Marcy, one of the regents, laid down in his famous maxim—nothing less than infamous, as it has turned out, and nationally calamitous—"To the victors belong the spoils."

But if the general reader will find this work one the reading of which would be impossible if the art of skipping had never been found out, the student of our political history will find it of great value—a volume not to be slighted, and by no means of immitigable dryness. The vindication of the Colonel's father—the only distinguished American of those times who has been popularly underrated—indeed, we may say the only great American of those times who has not been considerably overrated—is conclusive of many points. That Hamilton wrote the Farewell Address is made manifest; and it is made tolerably clear that he must have not only written it, but furnished many, if not most, of its ideas. But on this point the author does not put us into possession of the drafts which are the evidence, and we are not able to satisfy ourselves or to speak fully. He proves, too, so that there will hardly be any more dispute about it, that Jefferson's and Madison's accusations against his father were unfounded and, on the part of Jefferson, probably malicious; and that Hamilton was entirely uncorrupt; was a poor man when he said he was, and was poorer when he came out of the Treasury than when he went into it. All this calumny has been mostly given up a good while since, as springing from partisan heat and recklessness; still it is as well to have the testimony and the accusation set plainly before us; and one feels some of the son's gratification in reading the story—several times repeated, by the way—of Albert Gallatin's having been set by Jefferson, when he became President, to hunt for proofs of his former friend's frauds and faults, and being disappointed by having to hear Gallatin report that Hamilton's financial system was perfect, and could not be changed in any part without injury to the country, and that he had been absolutely honest in his management. The Burr and Hamilton affair of honor also gets our author's attention, and incidentally he discredits the story which is related by Mr. Parton in the "Life of Aaron Burr," and which tells how Burr behaved magnanimously when a challenge was brought him purporting to have come from our author. The challenge was a forgery; and Burr's imputed intention "not to hurt the Boy"—then thirty years old, he was—probably had no existence.

Of Colonel Hamilton himself the reader will get a pleasant impression. He appears to have been, throughout his life, a man of courage and decision—as witness the effectiveness of his efforts to stop the great fire in this city by blowing up buildings to leeward, a course which he suggested and made the officials adopt. He was pretty early in all the good political movements that arose in his day of activity, and passed by rapid rather than slow stages from being a Federalist to being a Whig, and then on to Republicanism of a fighting and practical, radical kind. His mind seems to have been always active, and though he makes no claim to possessing his father's genius, he appears as a person of very sound sense, of very considerable cultivation, and of more than usual reasoning powers. On the whole, he will not be denied praise as able, patriotic, courageous, kind-hearted, and just—a valuable citizen and a good man, whose busy life has been well spent in the service of his fellow-citizens more than in his own.

GLADSTONE'S JUVENTUS MUNDI.*

"The Youth of the World" is a subject which has a peculiar fascination for the present age of men—a subject, too, which no age before the present has possessed adequate means of investigating. Wild theories and inferences from very inadequate data have heretofore marked enquiries in this field; but a genuine scientific method has led at last to well-established and important results, which are every day becoming wider and better grounded. In these enquiries into the condition of society, religion, and government in the primitive ages, no testimony is more valuable than that of Homer; and the work which Mr. Gladstone has undertaken, in ascertaining the precise nature and extent of Homer's contribution to our knowledge of this, is a most praiseworthy one. Wherever he has had this object distinctly in view, and has sought to learn from Homer alone what Homer alone can teach, we are heartily grateful to him for a work which he has done exceedingly well. It does not matter whether or not we agree with him as to the unity of the poems, and their trustworthiness in regard to names and events; if we have the poet's testimony distinctly before us, we can sift and judge it for ourselves.

Thus, the chapter on "The Three Great Appellatives" contains a very able and interesting discussion, arriving at the result that, "at the time of Homer, the name most nearly approaching to what we mean by a national name was that of the Achaioi;" further, "as the specific shades of meaning attaching to the three Appellatives respectively, (1) for Danaoi, the soldiery, the people in warfare; (2) for Argeioi, the masses, the people engaged in tillage; (3) for Achaioi, the chiefs or aristocracy, the people regarded through the governing class" (p. 70). A prime feature of the book is the characterizing this Achaian nationality. He goes on:

"This class, and the race that formed it, appear to me to be entitled to a more separate and concentrated attention than it has yet received in the investigation of Greek history. It forms a distinct type of Hellenic character, the earliest in time, and certainly not the least remarkable in grandeur or in completeness. The Greek of Homer is neither the man of Athens nor the man of Sparta; he is neither cast in the Dorian nor in the Ionian pattern; he is the Achaian Greek. Simple, and yet shrewd; passionate, and yet self-contained; brave in battle and gentle in converse; keenly living in the present, yet with a 'large discourse' over the future and the past; as he is in body 'full-limbed and tall,' so he is in mind towering and full-formed. His portrait could never have been drawn but from the life; and disregarding what I conceive to have been the figments of the first renaissance after the wild and rude Dorian revolution, I set down Homer himself as the Achaian painter of his own kith and kin." Again, p. 172: "After him, as Hesiod tells us, a ruder and a darker age is sung in with a wilder music. The traditions and the families of the older time are submerged by the flood of Dorian conquest. The noble and refined Achaian succumbs to the half-savage Heraclid. The Hellenic world is resolved into a chaos, which devours its ancient ideas and institutions; though the spirit of life still breathes over the formless mass, and gradually moulds it into a new and more organized and splendid, if not a more pure and healthful, civilization."

Probably the Achaian character, as here depicted, belongs quite as much to the epoch as to the race: but the passages we have quoted are in a genuine and appreciative historical spirit, and most of the volume is equally good.

But in passing out from this limited field of enquiry, and taking up the more general considerations suggested by the title of his book, Mr. Gladstone fails in two ways—first, by starting with a favorite theory, which soon becomes a hobby with him; secondly, by not possessing, or at least not manifesting, sufficient acquaintance with what has been done by others in this wide field. It will not be necessary to delay long upon his improbable and wholly unsubstantiated theory of an affinity with Hebrew traditions; it will be enough to notice his remark (p. 250) that the

* "Juventus Mundi: The Gods and Men of the Heroic Age. By the Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone." London: Macmillan & Co. 1869. 8vo, pp. 541.

Trident "appears evidently to point to some tradition of a Trinity." Such a suggestion as this is symbolism run mad.

We cannot, however, but think it very strange, seeing that Mr. Gladstone treats of comparative mythology at all, that he hardly notices the facts of this science as established by other students. He quotes Max Müller's second series of lectures respectfully, but—if we remember rightly—only twice makes a doubtful reference to his etymologies, in the unimportant cases of the Charites and Erinyes, and does not even mention the connection of Zeus with the Sanskrit Dyaus, to say nothing of the generally accepted etymologies of Athene, Hermes, etc. Can this be because Professor Müller's investigations tell directly against Mr. Gladstone's pet theories, by proving that, so far as any origin at all can be shown for the Greek divinities, they were originally pure nature-powers?

Mr. Gladstone's view of the influence of Homer upon the Greek theology is ingenious and well developed, and in many points very attractive. He considers him to have been the great reconciler of the varied elements in the Greek worship—especially the Pelasgian and Hellenic—and thus the creator of the later Grecian theology. The old Pelasgian nature-worship was, he holds, superseded by the Olympian anthropomorphic system, and Homer was the chief instrument in making permanent the new order of things, and reconciling with it whatever of the old could be preserved and made permanent. The Trojan War would appear to represent one stage in this contest—the Trojan gods being chiefly Pelasgian—and the victory was that of the Hellenizing over the Pelasgian divinities. The theory, as we have said, is an attractive one; we know that there were transitions and conflicts in the history of the Greek religion, and that the Pelasgian age preceded the Hellenic. And the obvious objection that Zeus, the Pelasgian Zeus, became the head of the new Olympus, and a completely anthropomorphized god—indeed, "the type of anthropomorphism"—is anticipated by Mr. Gladstone, who suggests, very probably, that the Olympian Zeus, in his finally developed shape, was formed out of "two separate clusters of tradition." This we consider certain—two, or many more than two; but what this points at is the wide extent of the worship of Zeus as an elemental spirit (as in the Roman Jupiter), making him not only the highest, but the most widely recognized of all the gods, and therefore the centre of the greatest variety of legend and worship. The Zeus who sat on Olympus, no less than the earlier Zeus of Dodona, Lycæus, and Crete, was in his essence nothing but the spirit of the firmament; and if we may trust Sanskrit scholars, Athene—the purest Hellenic divinity, according to Mr. Gladstone—is herself nothing but the dawn. How, by the way, does it come about that this eminently Hellenic goddess was the patron deity of Pelasgic Athens?

We cannot, therefore, think that the contest commemorated in the Iliad was between a nature-worship and a revealed worship, as Mr. Gladstone would have us believe; but, if between theologies at all, between one which still recognized as divine the powers of nature and one which had outgrown this, and worshipped anthropomorphic gods. Even this, however, we doubt, for the reason that the gods who fought with Troy—Apollo, Artemis, Ares—are quite as fully developed Hellenic and anthropomorphized deities as those on the other side—Hera, Athene, and Poseidon. Indeed, one becomes suspicious the moment the dangerous word Pelasgian is mentioned, and still more distrustful when Mr. Gladstone gravely brings forward Niebuhr's exploded Pelasgian theory as an accepted one; the fatuity which haunts this word is well illustrated, too, by his thinking it worth while (p. 92) to mention its proposed derivation "from Peleg of the tenth chapter of Genesis, a name said to mean 'partition'—that is, of the earth: this opinion is questioned by Marsh, and rejected by Clinton"! After all, Mr. Gladstone advances the safe and probably sound view "that the Pelasgians formed the basis of the Greek nation;" considering this, it is strange that he should insist as he does upon the antagonism between Pelasgian and Hellene. Ernst Curtius says: "There is no Pelasgian myth, no Pelasgian gods, which can be opposed to the Hellenic. The first genuine Hellene whom we know—the Homeric Achilles—prays to the Pelasgian Zeus; and Dodona, in all times regarded as the original seat of the Pelasgians, was also the oldest Hellas in Europe."

The First Six Books of Virgil's Æneid; with Explanatory Notes, a Lexicon, and Map; together with an Appendix, containing Dr. S. H. Taylor's Questions on Virgil, and a Metrical Index. Illustrated with numerous Engravings and a Facsimile Page of one of the oldest existing Manuscripts of the Latin Text. By Edward Searing, A.M., Professor of Latin in Milton College, Wisconsin. (A. S. Barnes & Co., New York and Chicago. 1869. 8vo, pp. xxii. and 421.)—The title-page of Professor Searing's Virgil describes the book so fully that it needs few words to direct attention to its merits and its special value. It is very well fitted for the use of those schools, of which there are many, which make a sort of specialty of Virgil, passing to the Æneid after a brief introduction of Cæsar, and reading nothing else. Although this course is so common, we do not think it a judicious one. Virgil ought to come at the end, not at the beginning, and ought never to be used as a drill-book. For this reason we differ from the editor in regard to the advisability of having a vocabulary: by the time a scholar comes to read Virgil, he ought to have in his hands a complete dictionary of the language. The vocabulary, by the way, seems to us one of the best in plan and details with which we are acquainted; of its completeness it is impossible to judge without further trial. Neither do we think he is right in having the notes at the foot of the page. For school use, we like the American practice better than the German; for a scholar's attention, which ought to be fixed upon the text before him during recitation, will inevitably be distracted by the tempting explanations a few lines below. The notes are in themselves generally good; but the practice of grammatical references, which at the present day is often excessive, is here carried to a ridiculous excess. From the three-hundredth to the four-hundredth verses of the First Book, we count twenty-three references to the rule of ablative of cause, manner, and means. Now, we submit that any person who cannot recognize this principle at sight in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, has no business to be reading Virgil at all. We are pleased with the illustrations, especially those of the views from original sketches (e. g., Delos, the Plain of Troy, and Crete); these cannot fail to aid the student in appreciating the author he is reading. It was a mistake, however, not to give the authority for the genuineness of all of them; some we suspect not to be antiques. In neither class of illustrations has the engraver done justice to the elegant book he was engaged upon. For those who desire to use Virgil as a drill-book, Taylor's questions will be found invaluable, and all will be glad to have the facsimile of the manuscript.

Histoire des Doctrines Chimiques depuis Lavoisier jusqu'à nos jours. Par Adolphe Wurtz. Paris: 1868. (History of Chemical Theory. From the Age of Lavoisier to the Present Time. By Adolph Wurtz.) Translated and Edited by Henry Watts, B.A. (London: 1869. pp. 220.)—Wurtz is very celebrated in the scientific world as one of the chief experimental promoters of chemistry, as the author of a remarkable course of "Leçons de Philosophie Chimique," published in 1864, and as the editor of a very complete "Dictionnaire de Chimie, Pure et Appliquée," which he is now issuing with the help of a large number of eminent collaborators. The "Discours Préliminaire" with which M. Wurtz prefaces the latter work (recently embodied in a small volume and rendered accessible to English readers by Mr. Watts's annotated translation) is a masterly sketch of the progress of chemical science during the last century, or, more correctly speaking, since Lavoisier overthrew the phlogistic theory of Stahl, and revolutionized chemistry by showing the true nature of combustion and the importance of oxygen in producing this phenomenon. Prior to this discovery, combustion was regarded as a violent disengagement of phlogiston instead of a rapid attraction and assimilation of oxygen, and the increase of weight in calcined metals was attributed to the absorption of heat. Lavoisier, by the nice use of the balance in a series of careful quantitative analyses, established the fact that sulphur, phosphorus, and other substances become heavier by being burned in the air because they absorb a portion of the air; and when, in 1774, Priestley discovered oxygen gas, Lavoisier immediately recognized this gas as the element of the air which combined with metallic bodies in combustion and also performed vital physiological functions in respiration. A few years later, he developed a general theory of acids, oxyds, and salts, thus giving still greater preponderance to the rôle of oxygen in chemistry, and formulating a system fundamentally opposed to the ideas of Stahl. Nevertheless, phlogiston continued to have its champions, and it is a striking illustration of the tyranny of scientific traditions that men of acute and ardent minds, like Priestley, Cavendish, and Scheele, defended the old dogma by a thousand ingenious arguments long after it had ceased to furnish a satisfactory explanation of the newly discovered facts. Wurtz gives an admirable account of the manner in which a new chemical nomenclature was formed through the combined labors of Guyton de Morveau, Lavoisier, Berthollet, and Fourcroy, and substituted for the mass of whimsical and incongruous terms invented by the old alchemists. Notwithstanding the coldness with which the innovation of these four reformers was received by the French Academy, the clearness which the new nomenclature introduced into the history of chemistry, and the ease and exactness with which it indicated the composition of bodies and their various degrees of oxygenation, soon caused its merits to be generally recognized, and before Lavoisier's head fell under the guillotine, in 1794, it had acquired an almost uncontested authority. About ten or fifteen years later, Dalton, Thomson, and Proust developed the theory of atomic weights, and Gay-Lussac established the volumetric relations of gases. In 1811, an Italian chemist, Amedeo Avogrado, published a treatise, in which both these laws of weights and volumes were merged in a higher generalization and shown to be two phases of a single great principle. We shall not attempt to follow M. Wurtz through his interesting sketch of the life and labors of Berzelius, the long and ardent controversy excited by M. Dumas' theory of substitutions and its final triumph over the dualistic hypothesis of Berzelius, the expansion and transformation of the theory of substitutions by Laurent and Gerhardt, the subsequent evolution of the doctrine of types by Williamson and others, and the final metamorphosis of this doctrine into the theory of atomic attraction, as set forth by Odling, Hoffmann, Kékulé, and especially by Wurtz, who by his lectures and writings has contributed greatly to elucidate and popularize the ideas which underlie the new school of chemistry, of which he has been styled "le grand maître"—and not unjustly, if we take into account his experimental researches, especially his discovery of the ammonia bases.

Mademoiselle Fifty-Millions. By the Countess Dash. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1869.)—A stupider novel than this it would not be easy to find, and why anybody should have thought it worth while to translate it we do not see. However, it is very badly translated. The author has taken the memoirs of a time rich in the materials for the construction of the most stirring romances, and has succeeded in making a story as weak and unreadable as if there had been no Brinvilliers, no poudre de succession, no intriguing going on about the Cardinal, no half-crazy De la Porte, no poisoning Sainte Croix, no Anne of Austria, no secret passages, nor stabbing in the dark, nor black magic, nor gallantry, nor plots and counterplots, nor, in short, anything else in the Paris of Mazarin and the Fronde. The story bears the same relation to the novels of Dumas, which begot it, that the dime novels bear to "Waverley" and the "Pioneers;" and we warn all readers away from it as being capable of making duller the dullest day.

The Week.

THE operations of the gold "ring," which had been talked of for some days as impending, culminated on Thursday of last week in a "crisis" of the first rank, gold being rapidly pushed up to 161, the Exchange thrown into a condition of the wildest excitement, brokers driven half or wholly mad, and business completely suspended all over the Union. At last, an announcement that the Government was going to put $4,000,000 in the market brought everything down by the run within a few minutes. The wreck still encumbers Wall Street; and though the officers of the Gold Clearing-House have been working night and day, the precise extent of the damage done has not as yet been clearly ascertained. But it has announced the failure of nine firms, one of which, however, says there is a mistake about it. Of the amounts lost by the dealers little or nothing is as yet known. Fisk, jr., and Gould, and their clan, apparently got the "combination" up, and carried it on with the wildest recklessness and an apparently devilish delight in the ruin they were causing, and are now said to be repudiating a good many of the obligations contracted in their name. Threats of killing one or more of them are freely made by exasperated losers; and it was reported on Monday and Tuesday that Fisk, if not others, was guarded by policemen. The loss sustained by the country at large is of course incalculable. It may be safely said that there was an absolute suspension in the wholesale trade in every commodity for three days, nobody knowing what to ask or give for goods. The operations in the Exchange were of course simply gambling on a scale never before witnessed, dozens of enormous fortunes being on the table at once, and lost or won in the twinkling of an eye, and this not in a quiet, well-furnished room, by a dozen silent men, but publicly by hundreds of howling, desperate men, maddened out of all calculation by frightful alternations of hope and fear, protracted through fifty-six hours, and all this literally in the presence of an astonished, disgusted, and alarmed nation.

The worst of it all is that nobody can tell how soon these scenes may be repeated. No rational man can doubt that they will be repeated. There is no reason why they should not be. Nothing is more certain than that we are only witnessing the beginning of these combinations; that the conspirators are only learning their trade; and that, when they have once fairly mastered their art, they will, with a corrupt judiciary at their back, treat us to exhibitions of their skill such as we now have little idea of. All that is needed to spread this devastation over the country is the agreement of a few bold and unscrupulous men to stand by each other, and the command of two or three million dollars, than which nothing is now easier. What is more, they will show the rest of the country that it will not do to treat New York as an accursed place, which the rest of the Union can keep clear of or laugh over, and whose wickedness godly men elsewhere can afford to pass by as none of their concern. New York speculators have now a rope round the neck of every business man in the United States; and there is not one of Barnard's orders or injunctions which does not strike nearly as deeply in Boston or Philadelphia as here. There is no town or city in which his writs do not really run. As regards these gold corners, there is absolutely no safeguard against them but a return to specie payments, and of this there is at present no hope, because the country will not submit to contraction, though probably the loss sustained by one corner is treble the cost of going back to the ancient ways. Nothing can be more delusive than the idea that Mr. Boutwell can be converted into a kind of special providence to protect the community from the gold gamblers. They can always dodge his golden showers, or can make their coups when his tank is low; and besides, is it not disgraceful to a commercial community to have its business constantly dependent on the result of the attempts of a parcel of unscrupulous rogues to outwit the Secretary of the Treasury? The only thing we have to look forward to at present is Mr. Boutwell's four per cent. loan; but it is indefinitely remote, and indeed it is doubtful whether he will ever be in office long enough to contract it; and yet there is no doubt that he is doing his best, and that nobody could do more without vigorous measures in aid from Congress.

There was some expectation, not at all well founded, as it turns out, that there would be a severe fight between the Massachusetts Liberal Republicans and the Prohibitionists for the control of the late State Convention; that the Prohibitionists would be victorious; and that there would be a secession—made quietly at the polls—which would result in a very light Republican vote and an increased Democratic vote, and which not impossibly might give the State to Mr. Adams. But the convention was managed with a skill to which hasty people might give the name of astuteness. Mr. Sumner was put into the chair, and the rank-and-file of the party listened with complacency and admiration to his elaborate speech on the foreign affairs of the nation, and readily acquiesced in the necessity of the Republican party in all the States still keeping its eye fixed on national politics and undiverted yet by State issues. Caucusing was discouraged, a meeting for speechification taking its place, and finally the committee on resolutions reported, among the rest, one that was beautifully ambiguous in its treatment of the liquor question. The truth of the matter seems to be this: The Republican party in the country is honestly in favor of the rigorous enforcement of a prohibitory law; the rural dissentients are so few in number in any given village that they may safely be disregarded by the managers. In several of the large cities and the urbanized country adjacent, the party is to some extent opposed to prohibition—that is, to practical prohibition—and a rigorous enforcement of the law during the past few months would have driven very many Republicans into voting for Adams, though that gentleman is not to be called popular with any section of the party which he has left. But the understanding is now perfect that in the rural districts the law shall be really an effective law, and that where there is danger of alienating any large body of Republican voters it shall be enforced as it is in Boston, where to-day open and semi-closed bars abound, and liquors are sold across the counter within ten feet of open doors and the crowded street; and where on Sunday evenings beer and spirits are more easily purchasable by a casual customer than they are in New York. There will be a pretty heavy vote for Adams, which will be thrown by the Democrats—who almost to a man actively oppose prohibition—by some Republicans who, on sociological grounds, oppose it, and by more Republicans who habitually drink liquors, and resent interference with their habits. These latter compose the S.O.L. leagues, which probably number several thousand members. There are some few Republicans who even now talk of the possibility of Adams carrying the State, but Governor Claflin will, no doubt, be re-elected, although some of the men who voted for him last year will vote for his opponent, or will "scratch" him, either for reasons derived from the temperance legislation, or because of his gubernatorial connection with a railroad of which he is or was a director and stockholder.

Mr. Sumner's address at the opening of the convention was, as we have said, very elaborate, and dealt entirely with national topics, and contained little to call for much remark. He took ground on Cuba which much needed to be taken by somebody of weight; and what he said was so forcible and sensible that it makes one regret more than ever his aberration in the Alabama case. Up to the delivery of that "effort," he was invaluable in Congress for his good sense and sound doctrine on all international questions; but since his indulgence in that little debauch with the Blatherskites, his utterances are naturally somewhat less weighty, and it will take a year or two of steady habits to bring him back his old influence. He asked a few questions about the basis of the Cuban claims to belligerency which, applied to a good many of the "Cuban articles" of our contemporaries, would produce an enormous quantity of light vapor. The organs of the Junta naturally ascribe his position on this point to a desire to strengthen his position on the English question; but it is difficult to see the necessity for this hypothesis. His definition of belligerency, except his division of it into aqueous and terrestrial, is not new, and is not of his contrivance, and has been held by every publicist now living since he became capable of holding "views" at all. On the question of repudiation, he was sound as a bell, arguing for payment of the bonds, according to the spirit of the contract, in gold, and pointing out, what most people have long felt, that the talk of repudiation has done, and is doing, more than anything else to lower the national credit, and prevent our getting loans at a low rate of interest. Let us add, and in no ill-natured spirit, that a few manly, courageous words from Mr. Sumner on this subject, when the Honorable B. F. Butler, hot from the work of repudiation in Congress, was running for the Fifth District last year, would have saved the nation millions of dollars; but they came not—a circumstance which suggests various passages from the poets.

In New York, the main issue is the adoption of the new constitution, against which the Democrats have sworn open war, and seem to find no good in it. In the Republican ranks, there is a slight feud between the "corruptionists" and the rest of the party—the former presenting themselves, as we remarked in our last, once more unblushingly to the public gaze as men who, like other men, have their peculiarities, but are entitled to have them, and ought not on this account to be lightly rejected. The result is, extensive preparations for "scratching"—the New York Tribune advocating that powerful mode of expressing disapprobation, and publishing lists of corruptionists who should on no account receive further Republican support. The prospects of the election depend largely, we regret to say, on the extent to which frauds will be committed by the Democrats in this city. Their powers of mischief are probably somewhat lessened by the coalition between the three Republican committees in this city. The two old "gangs" were unquestionably sold out to the Democrats at the last election, but the cheating machinery of the Democrats in this city is now in such perfect working order that it will not be easy to throw it out of gear. There are, however, deep divisions in the Democratic ranks—the Manhattan Club and the country districts being seriously roused against Tammany, whose delegates had to "take back seats" at the State Convention, and have come back sorrowful. The other faction has got out a pamphlet against Tammany, in which there are many disclosures of its corruption, painful but not new. The curious thing about all this, and the thing most worthy of attention, is that we have here in New York the most perfect political equality—every man has the ballot, and poor men have two ballots if they like—so that, theoretically, "injustice" ought not to be possible; and yet there is probably no similar area in Christendom which is the scene of more *in*justice. There is hardly an abuse of the worst days of the most corrupt monarchies of the seventeenth or eighteenth century of which we cannot furnish a specimen. Take, for instance, one of the greatest abuses of those monarchies—the holding of sinecures by court favorites; we have in the case of Mr. Tweed—who is said to hold seventeen city offices, and who certainly holds a large portion of that number—something for which, we venture to say, neither the England of George II. nor the France of Louis XIV. affords a parallel. So that universal suffrage, per se, does not afford the slightest safeguard against some of the worst evils of absolute monarchy or oligarchy.

Both parties are warming to their work in Pennsylvania. The State Central Committee (Republican) has issued an address to the people, in which it castigates the Democratic party severely, and mentions "casually," as it were, that Mr. Packer, the Democratic candidate for governorship, evades the payment of his taxes. The candidate for the vacant judgeship it derides as an unknown and incompetent man; and then, turning to the record of the Republican party, of Governor Geary, and of Judge Williams, draws a picture which, though the colors are laid on very heavily, and the promise of happiness it contains is almost too brilliant for mortal faith, nevertheless is weighty, and ought to be telling, by its contrast of facts and figures. There is, however, strong opposition in the Republican ranks to Geary; and Judge Williams is to many the principal, if not the only, attraction of the ticket. All accounts represent the Philadelphia courts as in a bad way—not so bad as our own; but the political boa is covering the judges steadily with his slime, in preparation for a grand final swallow. The Supreme Court has adjourned, so as to avoid naturalizing for this election; but the Democrats declare that if they get a majority in the Legislature they will impeach Judge Read.

Accounts from Tennessee, which are about as good as most of the accounts which come from that State, represent Andrew Johnson's chances of the Senatorship as improving. The correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial represents his friends as enthusiastic beyond measure; that "the nearest thing to a party, even in Nashville, is the Johnson party, and the next nearest thing the anti-Johnson party." The principal argument in his favor used by his supporters is a very powerful one, that but for him they would all have been "hanged, confiscated, and quartered." Favors of this kind will of course be only feebly repaid even by keeping him in the Senate for the rest of his life. The objections made to him are his military governorship, when he was a rampant Radical and persecutor, and his St. Cloud speech to drunken negroes, and his behavior towards Mrs. Surratt. He is said to be himself satisfied that his success is certain; and if he is, his tuneful voice will probably be heard every day of his term. No man in the country has so many grievances to ventilate, or is so much struck by his own resemblance to the principal martyrs and confessors of ancient and modern times. Indeed, there are occasional indications in his language that he believes there is something divine in his nature, and an examination of his views on this point might throw some needed light on the most curious phenomenon of Roman history—the sober deification of some of the emperors at a time of great enlightenment and indeed of general sceptisism.

General Reynolds has made a report to the President on the condition of political affairs in Texas, from which it appears that the Republicans in that State are divided into two factions, the Davis faction and the Hamilton faction—a Radical and Conservative. The Davis men charge the Hamilton men with having secretly entered into a coalition with the Democrats; and though at first General Reynolds was unable to see any evidence of this, and did all he could to promote harmony, even to the extent of dividing the Federal offices equally between the two, he has since come to the conclusion that the charge is true. He says the platforms of the two "wings," as he euphemistically calls them, are precisely the same; so that their aims can be only judged by their acts. Both profess hearty adhesion to the Reconstruction Acts; but the Radicals prove their sincerity by carrying them out in the spirit as well as in the letter, while the Conservatives evade them—by nominating men for office, for instance, who are known to be disqualified under the law, simply because they are acceptable to the Democrats. The general therefore concludes that the success of the Hamilton faction, if it succeeds, will be accomplished by the aid of Democratic votes, and will result in putting the State into the hands of the very men who labored to destroy the Union during the war.

Two leading politicians, Governor Hoffman and Mr. B. F. Butler, have delivered addresses to farmers within the last week—a laudable innovation in this country, though a common fall amusement of English members of Parliament—and a good sign, too—for something has to be done to revive the popular taste for farming life and the popular faith in it. The addresses differed widely in character, however—Hoffman's being hortatory, poetic, and emotional; Butler's severely economical and critical. Mr. Butler first justified his own appearance as a discourser on agriculture, then showed the reason of the constant collisions between labor and capital in our day, which was that workingmen had as yet derived no benefit from the enormous increase in production wrought by machinery, but were now determined to have either higher wages or shorter hours, or both; and how to gratify them, and at the same time content the capitalists, is the great problem of the day. The farm laborer does not strike, partly because the profits of farming, not having increased, there is not much to strike for, and partly because the farm laborer, being fed by his "boss," does not care about a rise in prices of provisions. One great cause of the depression of farming is the neglect of agriculture by the Legislature. Out of 466 acts passed by the Massachusetts General Court last session, only one related to agriculture, while 173 were devoted to the interests of individuals and corporations, a large number of them affording capital increased facilities for combining for commercial purposes. The farmer should demand, therefore, that an end be put to special legislation; and, in fact, Mr. Butler strongly suggests that no facilities at all for creating moneyed corporations should be afforded, the reason which first called them into existence—the scarcity of capital in individual hands—no longer appearing. It is worth mention, however, that the wages of labor come out of capital; and that if you lessen the means of employing capital with ease and safety, the less demand there will be for labor. In fact, a more ingenious device for breaking down labor than depriving small capitalists of the chance of engaging in industrial enterprises with limited liability it would be hard to hit on.

Governor Hoffman, on the other hand, urged on farmers the advantages of education, the desirableness of having pleasant homes and taking pains to beautify them, warned the young farmers of the dangers and disappointments of city life, spoke darkly of commercial pursuits, drew a glowing picture of the content which reigns in the farm-house—which, however, did not tally with the account previously given of the farmers' eagerness to get to the city—and concluded with an enforcement of the doctrine that the way to pay the National Debt is to labor and economize. The two speeches are worth reading side by side for the sake of the contrast. Hoffman's reveals an amount of didactic power of which probably nobody suspected the existence; and it was easy to trace in Butler's, amidst much that is good and interesting, the evidences of his curious love of setting people by the ears. There are very few of his discourses which do not read as if he had the dolorous history of the Kilkenny cats constantly in his mind, and enjoyed it.

There is but little that is new from abroad. The Emperor is better, and able to show himself once more in public; but it is not likely the dynasty will ever recover from the shock given it by his sickness. The discussion and alarm excited by the prospect of his death showed the feebleness of the fabric even more than the concessions previously made to the Liberals. The Empress is again making ready for the Eastern trip. But everything connected with the court is for the moment thrown into the shade by Father Hyacinthe's (the celebrated preacher) bold revolt against Papal supremacy, which has taken everybody by surprise, as he has during the past two years been one of the glories of the Church. He has, however, been always rather too much inclined to participation in philanthropic work carried on under secular auspices to make him a safe man, ecclesiastically considered, and has for some time been under a slight cloud. He figured somewhat unclerically at a peace meeting a month ago, and had evidently been undergoing a kind of fermentation that bade fair before long to make him restive under Church discipline. The effect produced by his revolt has been aggravated by some expressions of discontent about the coming Council from M. de Montalembert also. This gentleman is slowly dying, but takes the keenest interest still in the ideas which absorbed his life and energies during the last thirty years, and foremost amongst these was the reconciliation of Catholicism and modern civilization. The influences which seem likely to predominate at the Council, of course, if triumphant, would send him disappointed to his grave.

Mr. John Bright seems to have a short method with protectionists not unlike that which Mr. Greeley occasionally employs in dealing with troublesome opponents. Talking of the new "revivers of British industry," who have begun to agitate a return to high duties, he explains their appearance by the statement "that there are knaves in the world, and there are simpletons, and the one class preys on the other." A pamphlet which they have issued, and which somebody sent him, he says, "bears the mark of having been written in Bedlam," and is a mere confusion of figures, wholly without logic or sense! "It is more cotton," he says, "Lancashire wants, and not more taxes on imports." We are greatly afraid this explanation of the matter will not generally be accepted as exhaustive, and wish he had taken the pains to show specifically on what points the lunacy of the author of the pamphlet showed itself. We are sorry to learn, on the other hand, from the address of the Pennsylvania Republican Central Committee, that free-traders are also knaves. The address says that if Pennsylvania "should now fall into the hands of an effete and corrupt Democracy, it may throw the next national administration into the power of rebels, free-traders, and repudiators."

A fresh and important contribution to the controversy about the position of the Chinese Government towards "progress," and about the objects of the Burlingame mission, has just been made by Mr. Robert Hart, who was appointed Inspector-General of Customs on the recommendation of the British and American Ministers. He says that the object of the mission was to explain to foreign powers the difficulties the Chinese Government has in introducing novelties, and to bespeak their forbearance, and to stave off pressure. The notion that the mission was an expression of the readiness of China to accept Western ideas and "modern improvements" he ascribes to newspaper "misinterpretation," and says that nothing but complete ignorance of China could have led the public to assume that China herself was ready for or desired the vast changes now looked for. The press, he says, hoping all things, has "in its speculations as to the object of the mission completely overshot the mark," and "has inferred from the arrival of the mission much that, however likely to come to pass in the future, China did not intend to publish as feasible now." But, he says, a commencement of progress has been made, in that China feels the want of physical strength, and he argues that, feeling it, she will now seek to supply it gradually by an investigation of the sources of Western strength, and the adoption of them. The best way, he thinks, to stimulate this appetite for improvement is to leave her alone. It must be admitted, however, that if the sole object of the mission was simply to ask us to leave her alone, there has been a good deal of fuss about a very small matter.

THE CUBAN CASE.

Mr. Sumner, touching on the Cuban question at the Worcester Convention, applied to Cuban demands for recognition as belligerents a test which disposed of them very effectually by asking:

"But where are their cities, towns, provinces? Where is their Government? Where are their ports? Where are their tribunals of justice? and where are their prize courts? To put these questions is to answer them. Where then is the 'fact' of belligerence?"

Nobody, so far as our knowledge goes, pretends that the insurgents have anything worthy of the name of an army—that they have anything like a regular government—that they have a revenue, or arsenals, or prize courts, or ports, blockaded or unblockaded, or are responsible, or could be made responsible, for the wrong-doing of their officers. If they put cruisers to sea to-morrow, under a recognized flag, no matter what outrages or violations of law these cruisers committed, no one could tell where to look for redress. Under these circumstances, "belligerency being a fact, and not a principle," there would seem to be but one answer to be made to their claims for recognition as belligerents, and that a negative one. They have not fulfilled the conditions on which the usages of civilized nations and the dicta of the ablest jurists declare the concession of belligerency to depend—usages and dicta of which no nation has more solemnly, continuously, and tenaciously acknowledged the authority than the United States. If it be now incumbent on us to recognize the Cubans, the course pursued by this Government, as Mr. Sumner pointed out, towards the other Spanish American republics, towards Poland, towards Hungary, and towards Crete, was a gross neglect both of legal and moral duty, if, indeed, in international relations, there be any distinction between the two. In fact, if it be incumbent on us to recognize the Cubans, there has hardly been an insurrection since this Government came into existence in which the American people have not used their discretion for the confusion and discouragement of the weak and oppressed. Those chapters in the diplomatic history of the United States on which Americans are in the habit of dwelling with most pride and satisfaction, instead of being the glory of the country, are its shame, and American professions of sympathy with "down-trodden peoples" have been amongst the most lamentable exhibitions of cold-blooded hypocrisy on record. The Spanish South American colonies fought for long years, and had practically established their independence, before we took any notice of their existence as political organizations; Hungary maintained a regular government for two years, kept on foot some of the finest armies the world has ever seen, won pitched battles against the whole force of a great military monarchy, and was in a fair way to seize the very capital of her oppressor, and we gave no sign—never even said, "We acknowledge that you are an organized fighting power; we see your army, your treasury, your arsenals, and your parliament"—one of the oldest legislative assemblies on earth, though this would have cost nothing but a few sheets of paper and a controversy with the Austrian Minister, which, as it was, we did not escape. Poland has been three times in arms within the last ninety years, and in arms with regular marching armies, with a government, great cities, stores, and arsenals behind them, with world-renowned generals at their head, and has won bloody battles and made displays of devotion such as have rarely been equalled. The Cretes, in like manner, struggled heroically against the Turks for three years, had more of an army, according to all accounts, than the Cubans have ever had, have been living for nearly two centuries under rule compared to which the worst oppression laid to the charge of the Spaniards was mild, beneficent, and humane, and yet they got no official notice from the United States. If the claims made for the Cubans be well founded, the course of the United States in all these cases was positively base.

It is now said, however, that on the showing of one of the principal members of the Spanish Government—Serrano, for instance—in a report made two years ago, as well as on that of other distinguished Spaniards, the Cuban revolt is justifiable—that is, that the inhabitants have serious grievances against the mother country, and are all but unanimous in hostility to her rule; and that, according to another distinguished Spaniard, a revolt once begun, the contest would prove for Spain not only a costly, but a hopeless one. It is therefore asked, What, supposing all this to be true, is the duty of the American Government? and the New York Times actually pronounces the situation to be a very puzzling one, and appeals fervently to Mr. Sumner for guidance. Now it is rather surprising, and indeed we think it shows to what an extent the idea that there is such a thing as international law is drifting away from people's minds, that a first-class newspaper should have to call for help on such a question, or, indeed, should base such a question on such considerations. The justifiability or non-justifiability of a revolt is a question which has never yet been allowed openly and ostensibly to justify the concession of belligerent rights to revolters. There is no trace in history of a government's having claimed the right, under international law, to treat its own opinion of the moral status of insurgents as a sufficient reason for treating them as a political power capable of carrying on war; and the adoption of any such rule would introduce monstrous confusion into international relations; for if we once concede that the physical proportions of an insurrection have nothing to do with its claims to a belligerency, we put it in the power of a band of brigands on land to legalize the operations of a pirate at sea. A score or two of malcontents would only have to take to the mountains for a few weeks, with a fair show of grievances, and resist the troops of a regular government, to furnish any foreign power with an excuse for calling them belligerents, and to furnish them with the privilege of issuing letters of marque. But its absurdity is not the only objection to such a rule; a greater one is that it does not exist. Is the United States going to add it to the international code? Should it add it if it could? Would it be a gain for civilization? Would it diminish causes of war, and promote the cause of peaceful and rational reform? Besides all this, a recognition of belligerency is or ought to be a statement of facts—an assertion that the power making it sees certain things with the physical eye which in the case of Cuba do not exist. If our Government, therefore, issued a proclamation calling Cuba a belligerent, and directing her to be so treated, it would literally lie.

To be sure, it seems hard to allow the Spaniards to buy gunboats in our ports and not to allow the insurgents, but the distinction is no harder than any legal restriction. It is hard to have no remedy against a government which does not pay its just debts. It is hard to have a good claim barred by the statute of limitations, or an honest contract vitiated by the statute of frauds; but the rules of international law, like the rules of the civil law, are framed for the greatest good of the greatest number, and any objection to them based on the fact that they bear harshly in particular cases would, if sound, tell against all law whatever, and go far to break up civilized society. The fact is that Spain is an old and established government, with which we are on friendly relations, and whose right to buy ships and arms in our ports is undoubted, and to which we stand under a mutual obligation not to allow rebels against her authority, of whose force, activity, and prospects we have formed no decided opinion, to arm themselves on our soil for her injury. To admit the Cuban Junta to the same privileges would, therefore, be an insult and act of ill-will, because it would be putting them on a footing, not of moral equality simply, but of political equality—political equality "being a fact and not a principle."

The argument that Cuban belligerency ought not to be recognized because it would damage the American position towards England, is one which is as unworthy of the consideration of the friends of Cuba as of its enemies. There is no American who ought not to be ashamed either to use it or see it used. If the United States has reached such a pass that the only rules of law it acknowledges are such as suit its temporary convenience, it has to all intents and purposes dropped out of the family of civilized nations. The effect of our policy on the Alabama case, and our duty in the Cuban case, are two separate things. We can abandon the Alabama claims if we please, but we cannot, or at least ought not, to refuse the Cubans the character of belligerents one minute after, or grant it one minute sooner than, they are entitled to it. We are not nearly as much interested either in effecting the independence of Cuba, or securing payment of the Alabama damages, as in maintaining the principles of international law.

A FIELD FOR THE HUMANE.

Suppose you were manager of a great joint-stock bank or of a mercantile firm, and hired your employees. Suppose, as would most probably be the case, that your employees were poor men, dependent upon your wages for means of subsistence for themselves, their wives, and their children, and who would be forced, in case of dismissal, to choose between the poor-house and starvation. Say, also, that your bank was doing a large business. And now suppose, as soon as your employees were fairly at work, attending to your business and furthering the interests of your concern, you were to select ten or a dozen of them, whose places yielded a fair income, and summarily turn them into the streets, filling the vacancies with a number of your private creditors, in order that the money received by them should cover your debts. Suppose, also, when called upon for explanation, you gave as your reason some such fact as that a relative of the employee had refused to buy goods at your brother's store, and, when even this contemptible accusation was disproved, neither replaced him nor offered any reparation. Imagine, too, that in the majority of cases you gave no reason at all. Suppose that every man in your employment knew that no amount of fidelity, industry, or honesty could give him the smallest security in his place, and that he entered your bank every morning with the sickening consciousness that he might at any moment see a summary dismissal placed on his desk. Suppose, moreover, that you selected your employees without any regard to their fitness, on the recommendation of third persons, well knowing that these third persons were to pocket a percentage on their salaries in payment for the recommendation—in other words, that you became a party to a corrupt arrangement, involving the spoliation of your clerks and gross indifference to the interests of your corporation.

Suppose that, while pursuing this system for the most part, changing your men not when they proved themselves unfit for business, but whenever it seemed possible, by means of a change, to cancel some private debt, you still were obliged to retain a few old and tried servants for the sake of efficiency, and to prevent a general chaos. You keep these men for years, paying them their salaries (perhaps at intervals cutting their salaries down without any notice or excuse, and lowering their grade, but still paying them something), thus enabling them to support their families, and leading them to believe that their places are permanent and their service a necessity to you. They grow gray in your employment, and begin to look forward to a competence in their declining years, when, presto! the door is shut in their face, and they are told that the wages of their lifetime of faithful labor is dismissal. They plead their long service; you wish them "good morning." They urge their poverty; you commiserate them, and suggest other employment. They press upon you the impossibility of this for aged men who have been accustomed to but one kind of business, and cannot begin the struggle of life anew; you shrug your shoulders, and mutter something about the "necessities of business."

To be more particular, suppose such a case as this: A. B., an industrious and thrifty fellow from the country, comes to you with the best recommendations, and at once obtains a situation. He serves you for a dozen years, confining himself closely to his business, coming early and going away late, eschewing even necessary recreation, that he may the more faithfully perform his duties. He suddenly falls sick, and it becomes necessary for him to economize in every way, for he has a family to support, and his daughter is sick as well as he. He can hardly see his way from month to month. Under these circumstances, you request him to give you—not lend, but give you a sum of money for private purposes of your own, in no way connected with the bank business or with his own interests. Not having any money, he is compelled to decline. Here is a difficult case: to dismiss him would embarrass the transaction of business, so necessary has his industry and knowledge become to you; to retain him would furnish a precedent very convenient for any of your men who might wish to refuse the payment of tribute. Accordingly, you resort to an effective method of at once humbling his pride and retaining the benefit of his skill. You "cut him down." In fact, you cut him down so effectually that he dies. The money for his burial is furnished by his fellow-servants, who also contribute a small sum out of their earnings to assist his family in getting to their former home.

If you conducted your business in this way; if you treated your employees after this fashion, gentle subscriber, what do you think your neighbors would say of your behavior? What would the stockholders of your bank say? What would the church of which you are a member think of it? What would the newspapers, and the magazines, and the quarterly reviews, and the lyceum think of it? They would all say with one voice that your conduct was infamous; that it was the very depth of inhumanity, cruelty, perfidy, and injustice; that you were a cheat, who betrayed his trust; a barbarian, who treated free men as slaves; and that, if no legal remedy existed against such an abuse of power, one ought to be speedily invented, that an outraged society might avenge itself upon you.

Is our parable intelligible? The employer is the Government of the United States; the employees are the civil servants of this employer; their wages are the salaries paid out of the United States Treasury; the private creditors of the employer are the regular party hacks; and the tribute of which we have spoken is an "assessment for political purposes."

Those who find any difficulty in understanding what we have said should read the New York Times of September 20. In that paper is a full account, apparently written by some one of experience, of the system of appointment and dismissal now in vogue in Washington. That our readers may judge for themselves whether our statements as to the brutality of the present practice are at all exaggerated, we give a few of the facts: A clerk in the Fourth Auditor's office, who was appointed in 1812, and had held his position during all the intervening time, except a few years of Buchanan's administration, was turned out this spring "because some relative had left him property." A descendant of Washington, who had risen from a clerkship in 1820, was turned out because he had risen too far. If he had remained content with his humble station as clerk, he might perhaps have retained it; but unfortunately his good qualities carried him as high as the Assistant-Secretaryship of the Treasury. That place was wanted, and he was turned adrift.

"Charles Mix, the Indian Commissioner, entered the Government service as a subordinate clerk many years since, and through various gradations rose to the head of his Bureau, rendering himself so familiar with its intricacies as to be invaluable to the public service, and universally acknowledged to be a splendid officer, whose place could scarcely be filled by another. Rev. Mr. Newman, of the Metropolitan Methodist Church, having secured the President as a regular attendant, coveted the position of Commissioner Mix for his friend Waugh, a relative of the Bishop." So he was turned out.

"John Wilson, the Third Auditor, had become very efficient through many years of training, and considered himself pretty secure in his position; but he, too, this spring, received a polite note, and thinking to only delay the inevitable, sent in his resignation, to take effect on the confirmation of his successor. He reckoned without his host. The man was already 'knocking at the door;' for, to his amazement, his resignation was accepted in three hours, and an Acting Auditor appointed! His successor, R. W. Clark, was formerly Representative from Batavia, Ohio."

All these cases are of recent occurrence. But the most atrocious case mentioned is the following:

"Mr. B., from a Western State, had served a dozen years in a responsible position, eschewing all politics, rendering himself familiar with his duties and valuable to the department. Sickness and misfortune rendered it necessary to retrench in every possible way. He could not see his way through the coming month, but paid off the most of his bills, reserving a trifling sum to purchase some needed delicacies for a sick daughter. An assessment for political purposes was presented, which, he explained, he was compelled to decline. The case was 'reported,' and he was tabooed. To dismiss him would embarrass the office. He was 'cut down.' Sick at heart, he struggled awhile against this new calamity, sought extra work at night, broke down, and died. Through the charity of other clerks, he was buried in the plainest manner, and the family assisted (with the aid of a few disposable articles of dress) to their friends in the West."

A little while ago, Mr. Boutwell, happening to find himself near the scene of a railroad accident, exerted himself to save the lives of the victims. Straightway some of his newspaper friends made a devout noise over him as "the man with a heart." No doubt he has a heart, and no doubt, having a heart, he regrets profoundly the odious machinery of dismissal from office which his party retainers compel him to use. But how must the assembled clerks in the Treasury have laughed when they read the anecdote.

If such things as these happened only occasionally, various excuses might be framed for the government which permitted them. But they do not happen occasionally. They have become a part of the very machinery of government. An administration which refused to make use of patronage, or, in other words, an administration which should decline to drive faithful servants into beggary, ruin, and it may be death, would be considered visionary, if not positively wicked. Its supporters demand that patronage shall be used. For example, at the present moment we hear that the Government has determined to break down the Hamilton movement in Texas. It is going to be done by driving out into the streets, beggaring, starving, and degrading clerks, postmasters, marshals, storekeepers, and a host of minor officials whose bread depends on the pay of their employer, the Government of the United States. Their fate will not be known, for they are nothing after all but "small clerks," and this great age of ours cares but little for anything that is small. A few will die, perhaps, and be buried by the assistance of their friends, and their family will be removed to their home, and then everything will move on as before. But though we forget it, or never know it, the offence is rank. It smells to heaven. The inefficiency of the Civil Service is bad enough, but the cruelty of it is worse.

IRISH LAND QUESTION.

Land legislation in Northern Europe has gone through three stages. In the first, the land was treated as an instrument for the maintenance of an aristocracy—a policy which was embodied in the old French law maxim: Nulle terre sans seigneur. Elaborate legislative precautions were taken to prevent large estates being broken up; and this policy prevailed in full vigor over the greater part of Europe till the French Revolution. These precautions were of various kinds; some strict entails, others elaborate and expensive formalities in the transfer of lands, others the reservation of certain estates for born nobles. On this policy, however, the political economists in the early part of the century made vigorous and successful assaults, and succeeded in securing very general acceptance for the doctrine that land was a commodity, and ought to be treated, in all that regards its possession and transfer, as nearly as possible like any other commodity—that is, that the lawyers' distinction between personal and real property should be done away with, as far as the nature of the two things would admit. This theory had a very successful run for a while; but it may be said to have now utterly broken down, and to have few or no preachers, owing mainly to the course things have taken in England. There the effects of free trade in land, combined with freedom of testamentary disposition, have for the first time been witnessed. It is now clearly perceived that, even if all the great estates were broken up and divided into small freeholds, in about thirty years the freeholders would, in the existing condition of English society, have begun to disappear rapidly; in seventy years, there would be but few traces of them left. The same thing is true of Ireland. As long as large fortunes are accumulated in commerce, and the possession of land brings with it either dignity or influence or enjoyment, rich men will buy land up, and will be glad to buy it at fancy prices—that is, for far more than its value for farming purposes. Few estates in England now pay more than from two to three per cent. on their market value, and yet they are in eager demand. In the presence of this demand on the part of rich capitalists—and there is little prospect of its ceasing—the small freeholder would be constantly exposed to almost overwhelming temptation. Whenever his crops failed, or his health failed, or he had children to settle in life, his thoughts would inevitably turn to his rich neighbor, who stood always ready, purse in hand, to give him one-third more than, or even twice as much as, his farm was worth—in other words, a sum with which it would seem to him he could advantageously emigrate, or go into some trading speculation in the large towns; and he would sooner or later sell out. This is what has actually happened in England. Through just such a process a whole class—the most valuable the country has ever produced, the class which won Cressy and Agincourt, and charged behind Cromwell at Naseby—has totally disappeared; and if such a class were again called into existence by law, it would, with free trade in land, and land limited in quantity, inevitably disappear in the same fashion.

It consequently now begins to be acknowledged, even by the foremost apostles of the laissez-aller policy, that land is a peculiar commodity in this—that it is limited in quantity, and that though its principal function be the furnishing of products for human food and clothing, it has another hardly less important—the furnishing of surface for human habitations. It has not only to be lived off, but lived on—a fact which is entirely overlooked in most of the discussions about the comparative merits of large and small farms. The advocates of large farms always talk as if the food-producing function of land were the only one worthy of attention, and as if the state ought, therefore, to favor any distribution of landed property which promised the greatest agricultural yield. But the fact is, that the man who owns land has a large share in deciding where and how a certain number of his fellow-creatures shall live. They must live somewhere; but they cannot live anywhere; and if you allow a few persons to own the soil, you give them an enormous amount of power over their neighbors, inasmuch as you enable them to fix the site and the fashion of people's habitations, to decide whether they shall live near or far from their work, near or far from the most attractive centres of business, in healthy places or unhealthy places, and even in some cases whether they shall have roofs over their heads at all. The notion that men can move freely from place to place, and fix their homes where they please, is, in fact, a pure fiction. The great mass of the human race are, and always must be, tied to particular places by all sorts of reasons, most of them invincible. It is only the rich who are absolutely free in the matter of locomotion, and the most atrocious pieces of tyranny of modern times have been practised by Irish landlords, not in the eviction of farmers, but of cottiers, who asked for nothing but shelter, and by English landlords and farmers in refusing habitations to laborers lest they should become chargeable to the parish under the law of settlement, thus compelling half-fed and overworked men to walk five or six miles a day to and from their labor.

The radical demand, therefore, is now no longer for free trade in land, or a free testamentary disposition of land, but for the use of land as the instrument of giving a certain character to the social organization. As it has been used to create and perpetuate an aristocratic system, so it may be made to create and perpetuate a democratic system; or, indeed, the form which any society assumes may be said to depend on the mode in which the tenure and transmission of landed property is regulated. If the quantity of land be limited, and the amount of capital seeking investment in it be great, as in England, the result will inevitably be an aristocratic system. The growth of commercial and manufacturing interests in England during the last fifty years, so far from weakening, has strengthened the landed interest. If, on the other hand, artificial means be taken to prevent the accumulation of much land in single hands, as in France, or if the quantity of land be so great in proportion to population as to render the renting of land impossible, and therefore prevent heavy investment in it, as in the United States, the result will be a democratic society. If this be true, it appears plainly enough that, no matter what may be the comparative yield of large or of small farms, the land movement which is now beginning or going on in many European countries is hardly likely to stop short of some legislative precautions against the formation of large estates, such as exist in France, in the shape of restrictions on the power of testamentary disposition. The aristocracy have laid so much stress on the importance of landed property, on the dignity of it, and of its elevating effects on human character, that they are very likely to have their own guns turned against them.

The growth of commerce, so far from weakening this tendency, will strengthen it. Trade, as we have said, increases the value of a demand for land, and in addition to this it is constantly creating enormous fortunes, and the owners of these fortunes cannot and never will in any country be satisfied without trying to make them instruments in the acquisition of power. In England, rich men buy estates, in order thereby to acquire influence over a large body of tenants; in America, they go into great railroad and other speculations to acquire similar influence over large bodies of employees and clients and dependents. It is doubtful, too, whether the desire of founding and perpetuating families be not inherent in the Aryan race at all events, and whether public opinion or legislation will ever do more than hold it in check. As the difficulties of acquiring fortunes grow, the desire for security of investment will increase, and fathers will be more and more reluctant to leave their children dependent on their own skill and energies. This is pretty sure to make land, as the surest and most permanent of investments, more and more an object of desire everywhere, and nothing but stringent prohibitions will probably ever prevent its accumulation in large quantities for purposes of investment. In fact, the passion for the ownership of a portion of the soil is one of the most striking and, when properly regulated, one of the most valuable of the social forces, and it may be safely said that on its proper regulation human happiness largely depends. The history of the land tenures in Ireland is the history of a series of outrageous attempts to stifle or ignore it, and perhaps one of the most threatening defects of French society is due to its over-stimulation. Here, we are luckily able for the present to leave the matter to nature, but the day will come when we shall not be.

SOCIAL EQUALITY IN ITALY.

LEGHORN, Sept. 1.

THIS age is often called a fast age. The metaphor is a good one. For whether we imagine ourselves to be moving on through avenues of phenomena or to be sitting still by the stream of current events, the result is practically always this, that in a given length of time a greater number and a greater variety of phenomena come under our notice than our fathers ever saw or dreamt of in a whole lifetime. Heraclitus is right once more: all is in Werdenlust, intent not on being but on becoming what it is not. Even old England is sprouting like a young tree, and seems to be undergoing unprecedented changes with comparative noiselessness. And Italy, unshackled as she is by precedent or prejudice, might move on much faster than she does, if she were not a southern country. Astronomically, southern countries have a wider circumaxial orbit, a longer revolutionary course to traverse, on which, the politicians might say, they have to waste a good part of their strength. Yet Italy speeds on like any other European state. This universal fastness naturally renders observation somewhat unsteady, and the sketches of the describer are often dim and ill-defined, like photographs of railway trains in full motion. In speaking of Italian traits, in particular, and of the curious changes which the wrinkled yet classical features of Italy are just now undergoing, it is important to make a distinction between those changes which are the result of her undisturbed individual growth and development and those adventitious changes wrought by the more general (and cosmopolitan) agency of the spirit of the age. The former alone are typical, but they are doomed, in the course of time, to be effaced and eclipsed by the latter. While there is still time, therefore—while national types still remain as clearly defined as they are at present, it is a useful task to fix as much of the fleeting images as one can. Italy has not ceased yet to be the land of wonders to the northern visitor. He not only finds a new sky and scenery, a new vegetation, and a new architecture, but if he looks below the surface he will find that society itself is based on obsolete, though to him new, principles, and is living on terms widely different from what he is accustomed to in his hyperborean home. He finds society, of course, divided into classes and ranks, but these classes and ranks seem co-ordinate rather than stratified. The gulf between the rich man and the poor man, between master and servant, employer and employed, patrician and plebeian, is partly filled up and partly bridged over by a thousand symbols of equality and fraternity, and, what is more, the lower classes avail themselves of this equality without boasting, and the upper classes meet them half-way without any visible condescension. Redeunt Saturnia regna, one might exclaim.

But, in truth, the Saturnian kingdom has never departed from Italy. In this respect, Italian society is, or has been hitherto, quite unique in the civilized world; for "equality and fraternity" existed long before the dawn of liberty in Italy. It is as if matronly Italy, the mother of so many civilizations, had long outgrown those childish squabbles about precedence and prerogative which render Rome's early history so interesting to school-boys. "Let the greater fool go first," said Frederick II., when appealed to by two ladies of the court debating at the door. Surely Italy has seen too many dukes and counts and court-fools, and also too many ragged beggars, to be impressed by clothes and titles, and not to remember on all occasions that "a man 's a man for a' that." This is a pleasant trait—a homage paid to the dignity of human nature. It has given an indescribable tone to Italian society—a tone which, at all events, may be qualified as the reverse of vulgarity and snobbishness. We find it in every relation and sphere of life. The servant feels on free and easy terms with the master, and shows, generally speaking, great tact in finding out what degree of familiarity his master requires or tolerates. Both parties want a good deal of it, and the consequence is a considerable intimacy, and sometimes (for instance, in cases of family secrets or intrigues) a mutual dependence, which no northern man could endure for a week, much less for life. When an Italian servant has been in a house for some years, you may be sure that he knows as much about the family as the padrone himself, and sometimes a good deal more. It is at this stage that an Italian man-servant becomes faithful and sincerely attached to his employers, whose petites faiblesses will only the more endear them to him. He will then be found to be a far more efficient helpmate than any number of northern flunkeys put together, because he has no pride and no fanatical notions about the divisions of labor. I have seen a white-aproned cook run to and fro between the kitchen and his master's sick-room, doing the nursing and the cooking with equal willingness and efficiency; finding time for answering the door-bell, for waiting on the family at dinner, and for driving them out in a pony-chaise, dressed and gloved comme il faut. All this was done cheerfully, and, what is stranger still, it had never been bargained for. There are only a very few things which Italian servants of either sex refuse to do: they will not carry water (many refuse even to draw it from the well in the court-yard), and they will not clean the staircases, which, in ordinary Italian houses, are considered as part of the street. And street-sweepers and water-carriers are two distinct professional guilds. But whether the servants are afraid of them, or whether they see something degrading in those two occupations, it would be difficult to decide. I feel inclined to think the latter. In Tuscany, at least, the women think they lose caste by carrying anything on their heads, as the acquaiole do; and even these latter seem to have got hold of the same crotchet, as the graceful Caryatides, with their Etruscan vases on their heads, are becoming rarer every year—in the cities, at least. But, apart from a few peculiarities of this kind, the average Italian domestic servant is a most willing, many-sided, and useful servant, and when he once begins to consider himself as one of the family, he never dreams of leaving his service or of looking out for a better (i. e., more lucrative) situation.

It is in this curious relation between master and servant that some of the most pleasing qualities of the Italian character become apparent—qualities such as disinterestedness and honesty, of which most travellers or season guests in Italy see nothing but the reverse. But it must be remembered that all this is true only as long as that peculiar footing—I will not say of absolute equality or even familiarity, for that may convey a somewhat offensive meaning to Anglo-Saxon ears—but a footing of free and easy cordiality is maintained. If either party withdraws into his shell; if the master limits his conversation to giving orders and hearing messages; if no chat, no gossip, no joke, no laughter, no burst of temper, enlivens the servant's mental solitude, the spell is broken. The master, however just and polite he may be, is then called "superbo," and is considered as an alien—as a person belonging to a different order of beings, and requiring a different mode of treatment. Consciously or unconsciously, the servant assumes a new attitude—not merely the cold attitude of a man of business who has sold his labor to an employer, but one of real hostility. It is difficult for an Italian to be merely just. He will be more than just, if you have once gained his heart. You may then find him forbearing, generous, and self-denying. But if you do not take the trouble of courting favor, you run the risk of not even finding justice.

Hence the great importance of politeness and palavering in all transactions in Italy. This is tiresome, but often indispensable. A tersely expressed claim is rarely heeded, be it ever so just and obvious. If a boy throws pebbles at you or amuses himself by ringing your door-bell, the best thing you can do is to swallow your just indignation as well as you can, and blandly to address the lad thus: "Do me the favor, my boy, of discontinuing this." Perhaps you might go so far as to say, "For shame!" but you must not go further if you wish to make an impression on the transgressor's mind. You will find how true this is if you send your thunderbolt by your servant, who will translate your fiercest message into either of the above sentences; adding, perhaps, an appeal to the rchin's reason or to his heart, on the fictitious ground that the master is asleep or unwell. One cannot deny that these bland remedies are generally efficacious enough; but one must be born in Italy to have them always at one's command. Kind words go further than money in this country. They effect a great deal; scolding and threatening absolutely nothing. Harsh words, provided they are not uttered deliberately, but in a passion, are ludicrously ineffective. The most timid woman or child, the most pugnacious ruffian, will stare at the thunderer like one who cannot comprehend his meaning or his manners. There will be no contradiction, no exchange of angry words; but it may happen that the offender will repeat (not necessarily from spite) the very thing for which he had been reprimanded, then and there, with the most perfect coolness and self-possession. That threats are not heeded is natural in a country where promises are not always intended, or understood, to imply performance. But that angry words fall so dead upon the ears of the lower classes in Italy is mainly due to the difference of manners and mental standards. Our sentiments are not their sentiments, and what provokes us does not provoke them. It is as difficult for us to understand their quarrelling and stabbing each other for the sake of a penny, as it seems to be for them to comprehend our indignation at the sight of some act of cruelty or other misdemeanor.

In general, it may be said that those who are best off in Italy—that is to say, who can live there with the smallest loss of individuality—are either dreamers, living in a sphere of their own, or "spoons" (to use a vulgar term), or mercurial persons possessing great savoir vivre. Part of this art will be found to consist in carrying little coppers in one's pocket and little lies in one's mouth. Even those who refuse to do the latter have to learn this lesson—that many things in Italy, but especially those which deserve our loudest denunciation, are not to be called by their proper names. One word will often serve as a euphemistic substitute for many others. If, for instance, you call all lies, cheatings, rogueries, and thefts "sbagli"—i. e., "mistakes"—you will avoid a great many annoyances and many otherwise irretrievable losses.

The Italian rogues are not clever thieves. They may like brigandage, extortion, or the ordinary cheating by false accounts or short weights; but real thieving seems to be considered as something degrading. Cheating, after all, is "only" practical lying, which sits lightly on their consciences and is considered by them as a kind of intellectual sport. But to be convicted of stealing is intolerable to them. I have seen men faint away on such occasions, and many sudden deaths are caused by these accusations, especially when they are well-founded. An artist, whose studio is often frequented by female models, has told me that when he misses something after a sitting (and especially silk scarfs were apt to disappear), he is in the habit of engaging the same model for the next day, and of asking her, incidentally, in the course of the sitting, whether she remembers having seen such and such a scarf, or whether, "by mistake," she has picked it up with her own shawl on leaving the studio. This generally has the desired effect. The stolen article is either forthcoming at once or sent back in the afternoon. If anything like a suspicion or accusation were uttered, a stout denial and possibly a scene of hysterics would be the consequence, and the loss would be irretrievable.

Evidently, the Italian dislikes all that creates distance or tends to widen the gulf between class and class, or between individual and individual. The lower classes cannot see that, by embracing the rogue, society gains less than by exposing and punishing him. They like to connive and want to be connived at; and any application of principles is deemed a sign of northern hardness. It is "duro"—an epithet constantly heard when northern barbarians invoke justice before mercy, law before expediency, duty before convenience. A friend of mine was once sitting in a Roman restaurant, anxiously waiting for the soup he had ordered. After some delay, the waiter returned from the kitchen, plate in hand; but, recognizing an old habitué who had meanwhile entered the room, he stopped before him, and began discussing politics. "The Emperor of Austria, depend upon it, sir, will never grant a constitution; but—" and he was going to expatiate on the subject when the Inglese, who saw that his soup was getting cold, reminded the waiter that he had no business to keep him waiting. Nothing seemed fairer, but the waiter could not see it, and said, with a tone of arrogance quite unnatural to him: "Sir, I am as good as you are, and you need not treat me as if I were your servant."

This is a very crude conception of equality. Yet it is more than ever rampant among the lower orders here. When a policeman arrests a cabman for furious driving, the cabman is sure to say to him: "Don't think you are better than I am." And I believe that this silly kind of self-assertion, which is becoming the fashion of the day, has already reacted in a very perceptible degree on the manners of the lower classes in Tuscany. There was a time when their manners were as refined as the manners of the upper classes (provided we take refined as an adjective expressing a state; not as a participle past, expressing the result of an action)—when every Italian seemed "nature's gentleman," born into this world with good manners and good grammar. All this is changed or changing. Education may one day replace natural refinement; but the interregnum is marked by comparative coarseness and boorishness. "Excuse him, sir, he is a man without education," said a beggar to me in 1848, apologizing for the rudeness of a fellow-beggar who was following me too persistently. Twenty-one years later, I saw a beggar woman on a public promenade standing in the middle of the road, and doing what a certain statue in Brussels does, yet begging me all the while to stop and give her something.

Many of these unpleasant, though transitory, changes are undoubtedly the indirect effects of political liberty and the incipient reign of law. Liberty being the medium in which everything and everybody is allowed to find his proper level, according to his specific mental gravity, it seems but natural that this liberty, when superadded to pre-existing social equality, should prove detrimental to the latter, which admits of only one level. Differences in power, wealth, and education must arise undreamt of in those halcyon days when everybody was refined and nobody educated. The man of the people now perceives, for the first time, that he belongs to a class, and he sees, face to face, or rather face to back, another class which is distancing him at an alarming rate. The sight distresses him; but instead of following onward himself—instead of reconquering the lost equality, he claims it back as an inalienable right from those before him. The gift of political and legal equality cannot console him for the loss. And thus, while the consciousness of social equality, which alone is the source of good manners, is fading away from him, his own manners and the collective demeanor of his class must necessarily suffer a certain change.

Society may be divided according to any arbitrary fundamentum divisionis. For instance, it may be divided into clean people and unwashed people. If these sit together in a theatre or church, the latter cannot help interfering with the comfort of the former. In the same manner, a man may, by staring at a lady, unconsciously spoil the pleasure of her solitary walk, and a loud voice, or an organ-grinder, may disturb the quiet happiness of a student or thinker. Now this is not equality. On the contrary, in all these cases, the uneducated classes have the greater power of mischief (unintentional though it may be), and the refined classes have the greater capacity for suffering. Nevertheless, this is tacitly submitted to, because in the chance contact of private individuals no malice prepense need be suspected. But suppose that all that is coarse, unwashed, and loud were to constitute itself a class, animated by a real esprit de corps, fully conscious of their difference from other classes, and thus implicitly proclaiming coarseness and loudness as their common platform. What would be the result? The better classes would naturally begin to react, and either avoid all contact with the lower orders (which is difficult in a southern country like Italy, where the streets and the cafés are everybody's home), or else enact and enforce police laws. Both alternatives being equally offensive to the lower classes, these would become defiant in their turn, and thus a vicious circle would be created, widening daily the incipient chasm.

This may be said to be the present stage of Italian society. The mobile vulgus sees clearly that, of their long-cherished idyllic equality, very little can survive in the new order of things; but it refuses to see that the same order of things which has created the chasm has also furnished inexhaustible materials for bridging it over. As yet it sees only the chasm, and a thousand little circumstances (too small, perhaps, for many observers) of everyday life in Italy will remind the well-dressed man that he is considered fair game by those who walk about in their shirt-sleeves. Not that his pockets will be picked. But where he formerly received unsought tributes of politeness, he will nowadays fail to obtain what in fairness is due to everybody.

Veniet cordatior ætas. When the rising generation has passed through a few years' training and drilling, in the schools and in the army, new ideas about liberty and duty may prevail, and the people may learn that the only equality which can be officially recognized in human society is the equality of civil duties, the equality of rights being a mere deduction from it; and that social equality is a prize to be fought for and toiled for, and for this very reason an ever-receding mirage, which may very well be ignored altogether, at least by those few elect who aim at higher things than wealth and power, and who would be rich even in rags and free in chains. To the honor of Italy, let it be said that some of these royal natures are still to be found among her sons. At all events, the type of the Italian character makes it easy to predict that, whatever revolutions may be in store for it, Italian society, even when unavoidably split into classes, will never be split into castes; that it will never assume the shape of the proverbial pyramid with its proverbial apex, which may do very well for Egypt; but that it will rather be like a race-course, where everybody has a fair field and a fair start; where few only win, but all may win.

Correspondence.

"MANUAL LABOR" AGAIN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The article on this subject in your paper of September 16 seems to me so erroneous in matters of fact, and so objectionable in its tone, that I beg to enter my protest against it in the name of Christianity and true civilization. I am quite ready to admit, with the writer, that there has been a great deal of cant about the dignity of labor, an absurd disproportion between theory and practice. So it has been with other modes of living, when described by persons who had no practical acquaintance with them. What a vast amount of trash is uttered every year about the farmer's life is but too well known, I suppose, to the frequenters of agricultural fairs. But I read with amazement the assertion that "there is nothing which everybody in the community more carefully and strenuously avoids, if he can, than manual labor." Without supposing that such a sweeping statement was meant to be taken literally (for it is to be hoped that in a well-ordered community there are some persons who would "avoid" the staining of their souls even more than the soiling of their hands), I deny that there is any such universal dislike to muscular exertion as here intended. I know that there are those who take a positive pleasure in working with their hands—strange that this writer does not! Of course there are sluggards enough everywhere; but it may well be questioned whether there are not more who shirk thinking than there are who shrink from manual toil. Does the writer really believe that brain-work is any more attractive to the mass of the community than hand-work? There are lazy temperaments to whom any exertion, of mind or body, is hateful; but also there are active temperaments, who delight in exercises of bodily strength. I had not supposed, until now, that anybody doubted this. And is it indeed "notorious that all muscular toil exercises a more or less deadening influence on the mental perceptions?" How then is it so desirable to have a "sound mind in a sound body?"—for perfect health of body is certainly not attainable without some muscular exertion, such as might often justly be called "toil." I had thought it was admitted, on the contrary, that the brain worked to the greatest advantage, or, in other words, really accomplished more, where nervous action was judiciously balanced by muscular.

But the writer in question seems to me not more erroneous in his facts than he is unwarranted in his conclusions. On the supposition that "everybody" is anxious to avoid manual labor as much as possible, he concludes: First, that they are insincere who preach up the dignity of this kind of labor; and, secondly, that it is really a mark of civilization, a sign of the true progress of society, that such labor is more and more shunned. Now, as to the first conclusion, it is only another form of the old charge, that a man cannot be said to believe anything which does not square with his practice. But is there anybody that could stand such a test? Is there anybody who lives perfectly in accordance with his professed belief? I may cordially admire the beauty of a self-denying and noble life in others, and may sincerely believe that such a life is far preferable to one of inglorious ease and self-indulgence; and yet I may confess with shame that I often yield to the seductions of the latter. Does not the drunkard, in his lucid intervals, believe with all his heart in the advantages of sobriety? Does not the coward believe that it is much nobler to face danger than to run away from it? And why, then, may not a man believe that a certain amount of muscular toil is conducive to the more manly virtues, even though he may deem himself unsuited to such toil, or may have no heart for it?

I protest, however, most of all against the second of the two conclusions referred to. It is of the very essence of aristocracy in its most offensive form. It would go far to justify the existence of a servile class in society, to do the drudgery which an intelligent and educated race, like the American, justly despises. It also virtually denies any Divine Providence in the affairs of men, since it dooms the majority of the human race to a toil which is necessarily degrading. That there is a disposition in this country, in spite of the professions of democracy, to turn away from manual labor as ignoble, not less than disagreeable, is unfortunately too true. But instead of recognizing this disposition as the fruit of true cultivation—taking for granted that the "spirit of the age" must be right—I would rather endeavor to show how weak, and unmanly, and selfish, and mean such a disposition often is; and, notwithstanding the sneers of this writer to the contrary, I would insist again and again, both by preaching and practice, that it is the man who ennobles the calling, and not the calling the man; that in this sense "the end" not only "justifies" but glorifies "the means;" that dress, and delicate bringing up, and leisure, and polished manners do not "make the man"—no, not even the gentleman. But it is mortifying to have to argue for such truisms. Can the writer read Burns's "A man 's a man for a' that," and call that "humbug," or an amiable fiction, or a mere piece of sentimentalism? Or, to put a more personal question, did he ever feel degraded in doing for a sick friend some service of manual labor which might be, to the last degree, repulsive in itself?

W. S.

[There is, it seems to us, a good deal of misconception and some fallacy running through the foregoing. The fact that many people dislike brain labor does not prove that more do not dislike manual labor. The dislike of all labor is general or widely diffused. All we say is, that give the choice between brain labor and manual labor to any man competent to do both, and he will choose the brain labor. There are, of course, persons who take "a positive pleasure in working with their hands;" but we have never yet had the privilege of seeing a person who, being offered the chance of getting a livelihood in some other honest way, failed to accept it. "W. S." confounds "muscular exertion," which may be and is constantly resorted to for pleasure, with manual labor as an occupation; he also confounds manual labor with exercise taken for health and taken voluntarily; result in both cases, fallacy. The writer of the article does not say or "conclude" that persons who preach up the dignity of manual labor are "insincere." What he says is that workingmen suspect some of them of being so, or look on much of their preaching as an attempt to "humbug" them into contentedness with an unnecessarily hard lot. That this is true nobody who has given much attention to the "labor problem" can deny. That the dislike of manual labor is a "mark of civilization, and a sign of the progress of society," we have nowhere said. What we say is, that the preference for brain labor is a sign of the progress of society, and also a mark of civilization. In fact, civilization consists almost entirely of a series of successful attempts to diminish the amount of manual labor necessary to human subsistence and comfort; and these attempts are due to the general desire to escape from manual labor; and a country is civilized in proportion to the amount of its work which is done by brain. If this be of "the essence of aristocracy," or a "denial of Divine Providence in the affairs of men," our understanding must be out of gear. Finally, let us say that our belief is that what society needs is not to have manual labor preached up, because this will not produce any effect—every human being feeling in the marrow of his bones that the respectability of any kind of labor depends on the amount of mind it calls for; that is, on the extent to which it requires the exercise of human as distinguished from brute faculties—but to have duty preached up. Everybody who is engaged in doing his duty is respectable; he does not ennoble his employment in doing it, the poems and sermons to the contrary notwithstanding, but he ennobles himself. You cannot make hod-carrying or drawing an iron roller over a pavement a dignified occupation, because a horse can do it; but the man who does either faithfully, because it is his duty, is a man to be honored. The greatest evil of the day is not the prevailing dislike to manual labor; it is the prevailing dislike to do what is disagreeable or uncomfortable or hard, and the wretched moral shifts to which men resort to avoid it; and the best work preachers can do is to revive, if they can, in the teeth of the prevailing passion for material enjoyment, that noble disregard for personal ease, and the noble obedience to duty, however stern or disagreeable, which the training of past ages, numerous as were its faults, undoubtedly produced in a greater degree than this. If this were done successfully, we should have less need of attaching a kind of mystic value to muscular labor. A man in good moral "condition" labors with his hands, if that be plainly his calling, cheerfully and pluckily, without having the pill sugared for him; and with such a man we would, in a lonely place, sing "A man's a man for a' that" just as heartily as, though probably much less effectively than, "W. S." himself.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Bros. announce the following additions to their inexhaustible line of fiction: "The Prince of Darkness," by Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth; "Popping the Question," by Mrs. Gordon Smythies; "Wives and Widows," by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens; "Major Jones's Courtship," and the same subject's "Sketches of Travel;" and "The Countess of Monte Cristo."

—Mr. Henry C. Lea is now carrying through the press another work, the fruit of his mediæval researches, to be called perhaps "Studies in Church History;" at least that title will cover the contents. These consist of four essays, two of which have already appeared in the North American Review, but will now be enlarged; and two as yet unpublished, of which one relates to Excommunication, and is likely to have an exceptional interest. Good proof of Mr. Lea's standing in the estimation of foreign scholars may be found in the very liberal use which Mr. Lecky, in his latest work, has made of the "History of Sacerdotal Celibacy." There are many kindred fields which Mr. Lea might work to better advantage than any writer we know of, and with which he is of necessity more or less familiar already. Attention has been called to his fitness for writing a history of the Inquisition, for which there is considerable unused material in manuscript at Trinity College, Dublin, that was brought from Rome by Napoleon's agency.

—The American Social Science Association hold a general meeting in this city on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of next month, at the rooms of the Historical Society. There will be afternoon and evening sessions, and the reading of seventeen papers by as many experts. It is seldom indeed that the programme of any convention is so full of excellence and so free from padding. Dr. Samuel Eliot, President of the Association, will read the opening address, to be followed by Professor T. W. Dwight on the "Public Charities of New York." Mr. Joseph D. Potts, President of one of those fast-freight lines which have revolutionized the carrying business in this country, will treat of "Transportation as a Science." Mr. Speaker Blaine will propose a "Change in the mode of electing United States Senators," as Mr. C. F. Adams, jr., will of electing Presidents. Other political papers are as follows: "Reform of the Civil Service," by Mr. G. W. Curtis; "Procedure in Contested Election Cases," by Hon. H. L. Dawes; and an "International Code," by David Dudley Field. Kindred topics, with a social phase, are: "Immigration," by Mr. Frederic Kapp, one of our New York Commissioners; "Health Laws and their Administration," by Dr. Elisha Harris; "Vaccination as an Element of Public Health," by Professor Francis Bacon, of Yale College, who will perhaps refer to the agitation now going on in England against vaccination—one of the signs of which, we may remark, was the recent attempt of a bereaved parent to put upon the tombstone of his child the inscription, Killed by vaccination; "The Census of 1870," by Hon. Jas. A. Garfield, to whom we must look for whatever improvement the new system of taking the census is to have over the old; "Life Insurance," by Mr. Sheppard Homans; "Education"—a broad theme for the close of an afternoon session—by Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution; "Industrial Schools," by Professor D. C. Gilman, of Yale; and the "Public Libraries of the United States," by Mr. A. R. Spofford, Librarian of Congress, from whose paper Mr. Edward Edwards may likely learn something worth adding to his book on the same subject. These topics, and the names of the gentlemen who are to discuss them, not only promise highly interesting meetings, but a valuable number of the Society's Journal for the next quarter, which will, we suppose, be composed of the best of the papers named above. The Journal for January will find ample material in a series of twelve independent lectures to be delivered under the auspices of the Association at the Lowell Institution in Boston this winter.

—The Boston lecture courses this fall will be remarkable for nothing so much as the unusual proportion of women who will take the stage, side by side with the men whose names are already familiar to the lecture-going public. The Parker Fraternity course, which does not allow anything to pass it on the road to radicalism, is to be opened by Miss Dickinson with an account of the Mormons, whom she calls "Whited Sepulchres." Mrs. Lucy Stone follows, on "Woman and the Bible;" Miss Kate Field, having fairly earned her title to lecture, has a place after "Nasby," who would seem to have woman's rights in his mind in talking of the "Lords of Creation." The Boston Lyceum, with a less sober-sided programme, contrives to admit Mrs. Livermore, of Chicago, who will open up "A Long Look Ahead." Miss Dickinson reappears in the Bay State course, which terminates with an entertainment to which Miss Granger contributes singing and Mrs. Fanny M. Carter readings; and finally, the Union Course appoints a "woman's evening," devoted to readings by Mrs. Ames and Mrs. Carter, vocal music by Mrs. Smith, and organ-playing by Mrs. Frohock. That Boston can sustain all these is a proof, we suppose, that the lecture system has yet a mission in that city; but the mission is still clearly social rather than intellectual, and the committees still bring forward the celebrities who will draw rather than the men who really have something to say and know what they are talking about—in a word, adepts, and not orators or humorists merely.

—The Dana-Lawrence controversy has passed through its first stage—decision having been rendered by Judge Clifford against the Dana edition, finding that there has been more or less legal plagiarism of Mr. Lawrence's notes, and directing a Master (in Chancery) to examine and report; and such passages of Mr. Dana's notes as he finds to be within the rule as to the use of citations laid down by Judge Clifford, are ordered to be omitted in future editions. But the court refuses to enjoin the sale of the Dana edition as it stands. We believe we have nothing to add to what appeared in the Nation in September, 1866, and probably shall have nothing till we see the Master's report. Moreover, Judge Clifford's rule will be appealed from, and until the case is finally decided all further discussion of its legal aspects is out of the question. There is already, of course, a good deal of talk about the matter, both in the newspapers and in private circles, and the unfortunate circumstance—for unfortunate it undoubtedly was—that Mr. Dana's edition owed its production in some degree to political reasons—Mr. Lawrence's having given offence by its leaning to Southern views—has introduced a good deal of acrimony into the controversy. As we understand the matter, no question of good faith is raised in the decision.

—The late General T. Perronet Thompson, just deceased in England at the age of eighty-six, was a remarkable character, and deserved well the eulogiums which are now pronounced upon him. The present generation has well-nigh forgotten his early services as an associate of Wilberforce against the slave-trade, both while governor of Sierra Leone, and afterwards in concluding a treaty with the tribes on the Persian Gulf; his part in the Peninsular campaign; his efficient labors with the Anti-Corn-Law League; his Parliamentary career; his editing, as proprietor, the Westminster Review. His mental force and activity remained unimpaired perhaps to the day of his death. During the rebellion he was indefatigable in contributing to the daily press of England letters and articles on the progress of the war, always in the interest of the Union, and with profound abhorrence and contempt of the slaveholders. His style was à la militaire—terse, epigrammatic, sometimes obscurely elliptical; and abounded in illustrations borrowed from his experience of three continents and the recollections of a green old age. General Thompson's home was at Blackheath, and in his social circle he was, says the Pall Mall Gazette, "one of the most gentle, considerate, and kind of men."

—The reckless humorist who remarked that a pair of Jersey lovers ought to revel in the thought that their blood might meet in the veins of the same mosquito, has been quite outdone by a writer in the London Telegraph, who was inspired as follows by the fate of a young couple struck dead by lightning, which happened to mark both their faces:

"Wrapped in the discreet darkness of the night, his lips would naturally be so close to hers that to kiss her fears away was an obvious course to take. In a few minutes the rain would be over, and, alas! the happy evening walk also. So, perhaps, he whispered that he wished it might thunder and lighten longer, to keep her by his side. If so, the quick messenger of heaven answered the wish with infinite compliance; and as they stood there, lip pressed to lip, the flash sealed the pledge of love, and took them away together. If it were not a direct favor of heaven for these lowly lovers thus to pass, it was certainly not in anger nor in punishment that the blue gleam searched them out where they stood, and, while their lips met, crowned them with the pale marriage-wreath of death."

—The rehearsal of Wagner's new opera, "Rheingold," occurred at Munich on the 27th of August, the King attending in person, and being well satisfied with the way in which it went off. Not so, however, the music-director Richter, who represented the impossibility of carrying out the author's ideas if the first public performance should take place, as ordered, on the 29th. To this the King was inclined to listen; but a conflict having arisen between Richter and the intendant of the theatre, Perfall, the latter gave in his resignation because he was told by the director that the only person competent to give orders in the case was Wagner himself. This imprudent speech procured his suspension from office, leaving the performance in abeyance. Wagner's solicitude for the smallest details of his works is too well known to need comment. The story reminds us—as it puts the musician in hot water, to which, however, he has been accustomed for the last twenty years—of his recent pamphlet on the Jewish element in music ("Das Judenthum in der Musik;" Leipzig: J. J. Weber). In answer to a lady's enquiry why he is pursued and condemned on every hand, Wagner reprints his essay of 1850, with the title just quoted, and then shows what the offence thus given to the Jews cost him, and to what an extent they control public opinion and the press in every European country but Russia. The essay is curious reading, for its study of Jewish character, and for its conclusions, that the Jewish nature, as such, is incapable of eminence in the fine arts, and in music can only be an imitator of form, never a creator of substance; or, as the author expresses it, can attain to the Wie, but not to the Was. Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer are thus taken away from their admirers, and Heine is reduced from the rank of poet to the poor office of exposing the pretences of his cultivated brethren—of being "the conscience of Jewry, as Jewry is the evil conscience of our modern civilization." Wagner asserts that he has the people on his side, and that the sole reason why his later works are not received as freely and as favorably as his first, is the fact that they have appeared since his criticism on the Jews—a criticism which they declined to meet with counter-arguments, preferring a concerted and implacable assault on his art-theories and productions from that day forward. Thus far, he says, they have triumphed, and their corrupting influence in music still continues.

—We wish most sincerely we had done with the Byron controversy, but as long as it occupies so large a share of public attention there is no getting rid of it. The most important contributions to it during the week have been a letter from Mr. T. Arnold, the brother of the better known Matthew, who ridicules the idea that there was any need of Mrs. Stowe's disclosures; calls attention to the fact that she has nowhere produced sufficient authorization for making them, Lady Byron having simply consulted her as to the propriety of making them; and dwells upon the destruction of Byron's Memoirs, bequeathed to Moore for publication, as a still stronger reason for silence. Lastly, he says, no good cause could be served by these disclosures, not certainly the cause of morality, because no more complete demonstration of the folly of a vicious course could be afforded than Byron's own history, which every one knew already. If the story of his miserable life and his early unhappy death could not prevent people from imitating him, neither would the announcement that in addition to his other sins he had committed incest. Bearing on this point comes a story of a large circulating library in Glasgow, which reports quite a "run" on Byron's works since the appearance of Mrs. Stowe's article—the demand being much greater than the supply, and growing, and most from very young men and women—"Parisina" and "Don Juan" being in greatest request. Mr. William Howitt also writes a second letter, in which he comments very severely on Lady Byron, whom he knew well, and says the notion of her having made Mrs. Stowe the exclusive repository of the secret is all "fudge," one of Lady Byron's weaknesses having been the admission of nearly every intimate female friend to participation in this and other secrets. Mrs. Leigh left, it appears, two daughters, whose life the publication of the story has of course blasted, and whose case calls for as deep sympathy as human hearts can bestow.

—Mr. John Robertson also writes to the Pall Mall Gazette, saying that he was well acquainted with Lady Byron at Brighton for many years—and that one of her well-known peculiarities was the habit of accusing persons about her or connected with her—her daughter, her eldest grandson, and her servants—of various offences, and communicating the charges to "confidantes" right and left, for the vindication of her character, conduct, or memory. She accused her dead husband of two crimes, and she made her "confidential" communications to six persons more or less known to Mr. Robertson, of whom three were Americans. Three of her friends, himself being one, came separately to the conclusion "that her mind was touched." Her stories, he says too, differed. The Rev. Frederick Robertson was one of the recipients of her revelations, but he received them as Mrs. Stowe did, in sober earnest.

We have received the following from a lawyer of distinction about the matter:

"As to Mrs. Stowe's part in this Byron business, allow me to suggest: She has made the charge:

"1. Without solicitation. None in or out of Lady Byron's family asked her to. Her action was entirely voluntary. She acted because no one else was acting. The responsibility begins and ends with herself.

"2. Without authority. Lady Byron did not authorize the publication; nor did her family, nor her executors, nor did any one having the color of authority. A family matter, she has intruded into it, and attempted a vindication where it was neither needed nor asked.

"3. In violation of confidence. The communication was not made to her to publish. It was a confidential communication relating to a matter between a woman and her husband, made simply that she, Mrs. Stowe, might give advice. She gave it, and there her speaking should have ended. Lady Byron did not follow the advice, so far as it implied a duty of publication after death, and the counsellor has done what the party (apparently) determined should not be done. If Mrs. Stowe had stumbled on the information elsewhere, this communication might not have barred her use of the information otherwise obtained. But she did not. All that she says came in confidence. As well might any lawyer—Dr. Lushington, for example—violate his client's confidence in the name of truth. This conduct of so respectable, conscientious, strong-minded, clear-visioned a woman (as Mrs. Stowe is) makes one doubt whether a woman can ever take the place of a professional adviser, or be trusted in those matters whereof she must, as every honorable lawyer does, live and die dumb.

"As to Lady Byron, I beg you ever to bear in mind that she has made no charge, as General Butler says and all the newspapers imply. She consulted an adviser confidentially; she lived a long time thereafter in the full possession of her faculties; she died saying nothing. Her 'privileged communication' to her confidential adviser was never intended for publication: it cannot be given in evidence against her. To weigh her statement as General Butler does by the principles applicable to a suspicious witness making an improbable charge against a respectable citizen in a court of justice, is not allowable; it overlooks the principle that her communication was sacred in the eye of the law."

A RUSSIAN EXILE ON RUSSIA.*

The words of a political refugee must always be taken with a certain amount of qualification when he speaks of his own country, for exile sorrows a man; and the very fact of his absence from the country, and his viewing what passes there through the medium of his own sufferings, makes him paint its situation in too dark colors. The pureness and singleness of M. Turgeneff's life, his honesty of character, his devotion to a great idea, his freedom from petty plots and conspiracies, make us, however, listen to him with more respect than we would give to the indiscriminate attacks of Hertzenor Prince Dolgorukoff. Nicholas Turgeneff, who should not be confounded with Ivan Turgeneff, the novelist, is of a good noble Russian family; and in the year 1824, when still a young man, stood in close relations to the Emperor Alexander I., and held the office of State Secretary of the Council of the Empire, a dignity nearly equal to that of Minister. While occupying this position, M. Turgeneff was a firm supporter of emancipation, and presented a paper on the subject to the emperor, which was favorably received, and made the emperor promise actually to do something in the matter. His persistent efforts in this way gained him numerous enemies among the obstinate supporters of the serf system. After the publication of a somewhat remarkable book for that time in Russia—the "Theory of Imposts"—he was asked to become a member of a secret society called the "Union of Prosperity," and, thinking he might thus gain adherents to the cause of emancipation, joined it. But, finding that the society was of no practical use, he, with other members, thought it useless to keep up the organization, and it was accordingly dissolved. In 1824, he went abroad. On the death of the Emperor Alexander on the 26th of December, 1825, occurred what is called the conspiracy of the Decembrists, originated by a few enthusiastic, earnest young men—Ryleyeff, Muravieff, Prince Obolensky, Prince Odoyefsky, and others; and Pestal, a selfish, ambitious officer, who was one of the leading spirits, with the idea of putting the Grand-Duke Constantine on the throne, and wresting from him a constitution. The conspiracy was at once put down, and the persons engaged all executed or exiled. The conspirators had all been members of the "Union of Prosperity," and had been dissatisfied with its dissolution. Suspicion, of course, fell on all persons connected with the society, and, among others, on Turgeneff. He was accused of conspiracy and treason, and without the shadow of proof, as some of the judges who signed the warrant admit, was condemned to death. He had not returned to stand his trial, because he had received assurances from St. Petersburg that it was unnecessary. At the accession of the Emperor Alexander II., all of the other persons convicted who were not dead were pardoned. Turgeneff has ever since lived abroad, working, so far as he could, to secure the emancipation of the serfs, and writing frequent books and pamphlets on Russian affairs.

* "Tchevo zhelat dlya Rossii? (Que faut-il désirer pour la Russie?) N. Turgeneff." Leipzig: F. A. Brockhaus 1869. 8vo, xxxvi., 233 pp.

The book before us is his last work, and is in a way the legacy of a dying man. It was written originally in 1864, with the purpose of showing what were the great questions of the day in Russia, and what reforms in the solution of them were absolutely necessary. It lay unpublished till last year, and is now printed as then written, but with numerous notes showing how far the problems have already been solved by the reforms proposed by the Russian Government since that time. As an independent judgment of the efforts of the Emperor Alexander II., it is certainly valuable.

The questions which M. Turgeneff sets forth as of the most importance to Russia at the present time, and demanding a speedy and thorough solution, relate to the affairs of the serfs, the local representative bodies, judicial reforms, paper money, the censorship of the press, the corporal punishments still permitted, the dissenting sects, the railways, and a general code of laws. He has one panacea—namely, a legislative representative assembly, which he thinks capable—and alone capable—of solving thoroughly all questions arising on these points. Two methods of emancipation were advocated: one gave the peasant a small quantity of land, but granted him entire personal freedom and the right of free locomotion, and transferred the heavy personal taxes to a land-tax, after the Prussian style. This M. Turgeneff preferred. The second assigned to the peasant a considerable quantity of land, but required him to buy it, and to live on it and work it till he had paid for it, leaving other things very much as they were. This was the method adopted by the Government. Now, seeing that emancipation was actually accomplished in this way, that the peasant has enough land to enable him to live with comfort, and that the buying process, and even the heavy taxes, have given him a feeling of independence and importance, and that the other method might have been adopted without in the end lightening his burdens, Turgeneff feels compelled to admit that it was the best both for the Government and the peasant. The question of importance is to change the method of taxation and free the peasant from a load which is exceedingly heavy. In the North, there are often several bad harvests in succession, and the cattle and utensils of the peasant in arrears for taxes may be sold by auction, leaving him totally unable to work in the ensuing year. On the 3d of March, 1870, the emancipation will be finally accomplished, the period of temporary obligation will be passed, and the peasant entirely free. It is interesting to know that about one-half of the former serfs have now entirely bought their land —the majority of purchasers being residents of the southern governments, which are the more fertile.

With regard to the zemstva, or representative assemblies of the "districts" and "governments" with powers of local government, Turgeneff finds their introduction an advantage, as being a great advance toward popular self-government, and approves of them. He, however, makes some slight criticisms on the members and the mode of procedure, and regrets the little interest which is taken in them by the public. But during the sessions of this last winter—only the fourth year of the institution—all orders have shown an interest, and many very important measures have been taken for the spread of education, the welfare of the peasantry, and the advancement of agriculture. Turgeneff's chief complaint is that the members wish to receive pay for their services, though he acknowledges that he does not see how the necessity of payment can be avoided, for unpaid attendance is a great burden to the poor men who are members.

At the time when the book was written, the judicial reforms were still under consideration by the Council of the Empire, and nothing but the first propositions had been published, which, in M. Turgeneff's opinion, were not sufficiently full or satisfactory. In the appendix, he gives an account of the reforms as they were finally introduced, and adds: "All my propositions, expectations, and hopes did not reach the great dimensions which characterize the present judicial reform; I merely say I never dared hope for all this immense good which is now a fact." The too great amount of paper-money in Russia, and its easy forgery, combined with constant loans made by the Government, are injurious to trade and commerce, and demand a remedy. The new notes which were made by American engravers have in great measure removed the danger of counterfeits, and the exchange is better for Russia than it has been. During the present summer, it has been higher than for some time past, and during July a pound sterling was worth about eight rubles, and the paper, half-imperial, stood to the gold coin as 5.15 to 6. The publication of the budget of the Empire for the last three years in detail has had a good influence in making the Russians study finance and understand something about the immense Government expenditures. Attention should also be given to the fact that for two years and a half the Government has made no loans, and that in 1867 and 1868 there was actually a surplus. Still, the Treasury needs a thorough overhauling.

The censorship is a disagreeable thing for everybody who may be in Russia. M. Turgeneff tells us that all seem to admit that the censorship is at present a mere temporary institution. Certainly, the Government appears to give the public some reason for thinking so. The newspapers of Moscow and St. Petersburg have been freed from the yoke—and the freedom has produced a marked improvement in their character. A proposition is now under consideration to apply this law, based on the French system, of warnings and fines to all the journals of the provinces, as well as those of the two great cities, and to modify the censorship of foreign journals. As it is, the foreign papers are delivered, if subscribed for at the post-office, but obnoxious articles are erased—a thing which has occurred at least six times in the last two years. Still, as the author remarks, no matter how mitigated, a censorship is yet an exercise of arbitrary power, and as such to be condemned. In one respect, the author does not find a complete satisfaction of his expectations—that corporal punishments are not entirely abolished. "A great step has, however, been taken; bodily punishments are entirely abolished as judicial punishments, and are almost entirely abolished in the army." The knout and the whip are gone, but the rods of the police and sergeant-major still are in use. Through the action of the zemstvo of Poltava they even have been abolished for all men of the peasant class—(the only class subject to them)—who are members of the zemstva, or hold other offices.

With regard to the dissenting sects, everybody in Russia agrees with M. Turgeneff that something must be done. Every thinking man believes in universal education and in complete liberty for all of the sects that do not, like the Castrati, engaged in unlawful and inhuman practices. The clergy, though not all disposed to grant liberty, wish no more persecution.

Writing in 1864, the author complained of the slowness with which railway enterprises are prosecuted. There is now no reason for complaint. There are to-day in operation in Russia twenty-six lines of railway, with a combined length of 4,452 miles, and there are in actual construction thirteen new lines, or extensions, with a combined length of over 2,200 miles, all of which will be opened within two years, and nearly 900 miles of which will be opened this autumn.

The last question of M. Turgeneff is the codification of the laws, and he shows the confusion and contradiction which exist in the immense mass of the Russian laws. There are few who doubt the utility of codification either in Russia or elsewhere, and we have all to hope for a time when our statute-books shall be cleared of all that is antiquated, confused, and tautological.

What greatly surprises us in the author's account of the evils in Russia which demand remedy is that he has referred but incidentally to the great question of all others—the most pressing one—and the one which now occupies the Government, the newspapers, and all intelligent men in Russia—namely, popular education. Until that is successfully begun, it will be difficult to make any real improvements in the country. It is only fair to say that a system of common schools has been created on paper; but the money to put it in practice is lacking. The Government this year, while it spends 136,774,108 rubles for the army, thought it could allow only 9,281,220 for education; but since, a grant of 300,000 rubles has been devoted especially to village schools. The zemstva, however, have taken up the matter vigorously, and their chief efforts now are turned to preparing teachers, the first want. In Russia, one has to begin at the beginning.

M. Turgeneff's remedy for everything is, as we have said, a parliament. He thinks that at first this must be in the nature of an advisory body; and as definite parties do not exist in Russia, he is of opinion that, in order to preserve the influence of the crown, one-third or one-fifth of the members should be appointed by the emperor. Such an arrangement he considers better than an upper house. That a parliament will come in Russia all liberal Russians believe. When, no one knows. Many think that the present emperor will crown his reforms by granting it. If we may believe the well-authenticated accounts of the disposition and ideas of the Crown Prince, and may hope that he will continue in them, we may be sure of a parliament and a responsible ministry when he comes to the throne. He is reputed to have a stronger will than his father, and will be more successful in putting down the camarilla which surrounds Alexander and tries to thwart his plans. All reflecting liberal men will agree with the remark of an eminent Russian senator, the late Prince O——, that we could not be too thankful that no constitution had been made before the emancipation. Then it would have been an aristocracy, and the people would have been longer in gaining their rights than in England; now, all classes will be treated alike.

In a concluding chapter Turgeneff reviews the Polish question, and shows how the world, through a laudable sympathy with the Polish efforts, has been unjust to Russia. He asks the commendation of all men for the emancipation of the Polish serfs, accomplished by Russia, and says that "three or four times as many peaceful people were killed by the Polish insurgents in the cities, and especially in the villages, than were shot or hung by the Russian judges and proconsuls." To this statement, confirmed in part by Mr. Sutherland Edwards, he brings no proof, and we leave it to rest on his own word. M. Turgeneff's book has, we may add, been condemned by the censorship.

MAGAZINES FOR OCTOBER.

Four chapters of Mrs. Edwards's rather dull story of "Susan Fielding" open the Galaxy, though it is to Mr. Reade's "Put Yourself in his Place" that all novel-readers, habitual or occasional, will first turn. They will be sorry, we suppose, to find that in this October instalment Mr. Reade is apparently bringing his vigorous and interesting story rapidly towards its close. If he is, his newest novel is not going to take rank with his best ones. It has little enough freshness and value in its presentation of character, although Jael Dence recalls our author—not very vividly—when he is at his best: when he is delineating a young woman who is pretty frankly in love and pretty deeply in trouble, and in whom love by no means takes either its most sentimental or its most spiritual form. The incidents of the story are certainly striking, and very cleverly put together; but the periodic recurrence of what—borrowing phrases from Mr. Boucicault's fraternity—we may call red-light situations and effective tableaux, gives a theatrical rather than a dramatic air to the plot, and produces an impression of cheapness. And everything except this management of situations is done sketchily rather than thoroughly. One would suppose that the author had it in view, first, to make a story to be issued in monthly parts, each of which should wind up with a bang, and leave the reader hungry for the next month's batch of chapters; secondly, to make a story which it should be easy to adapt for the stage, and which should have a good run as a sensational drama; thirdly, and only thirdly, to make a good story—to do as well as he could and as he ought. Prophesying is not, however, the safest business in the world, and it is possible that Mr. Reade may have only just begun to unreel the thread of his tale, and there be as great an abundance, not to say redundance, of matter behind as there is in "Very Hard Cash." If so, the applicability of these foregoing remarks ceases, perhaps, with the beginning of the twentieth chapter—for which we do not mind saying we are waiting with eagerness.

Perhaps magazine readers will turn, in the second place, to somebody's recollections of the Countess Guiccioli. The writer is nobody very competent to talk on such subjects, we should say, and has made an article which is not particularly good in point of taste or tone, and has but slight interest of any sort. But then, since the heroine set her poetical lover to doing "The Prophecy of Dante" in terza rima, down to the time when she or some gentleman of the press wrote her recollections, or memoirs, she has been almost a sort of a demigoddess of literary dulness. Apparently, when the story of her old amour is told, there is nothing else of her. "Little Bopeep," by "The Author of Emily Chester," is by a writer who not only was, but who evidently still is, "The Author of Emily Chester," for it is hardly an improvement on that novel in any essential respect. Yet it is, in degree, healthier than many of the kind of stories of which it is one. It closes happily, to be sure, for in the end it releases a young fellow from the nameless spell of the "influence"—"sphere" the spiritualists used to call it, we believe—of a woman who, in virtue of her atmosphere, draws all men after her, and also draws some even of the women. Bopeep gets her wandering sheep back again, and the pair settle down in a cot together, and are happy. It is good, too, to find the young gentleman admitted to be a sheep—a better name for him than to call him the "sport of his destiny" and of "inscrutable affinities;" which is how he figures in certain novels that we could mention. But while this is well, it certainly is not enough. Our author gives no indication that she thinks there are other than male sheep of this kind, and some indication she gives that, in her opinion, when the subdued one is female, that mysterious and irresistible Affinity has been at work for ages preparing this poor girl for her fate. Poets, if they are great enough, are permitted such themes; and students of psychology must be permitted them also, just as the law winks a little at the robbing of graveyards for anatomical purposes; but young writers in magazines which young people read should keep them away, for their own sakes and for everybody's else. The cause of intellectual and moral and spiritual unhealthiness is fostered by the class of stories of which "Little Bopeep" is a small one. It is a small one, and it is not very ripe and not very poisonous, and so, perhaps, we have said too much about it—given it more mention than its merits require, or than is required either by its faults. But it is one of a bad class. No one who is sound and reasonably happy, and who would do nothing that should make others less brave and cheerful and clear-minded, should indulge himself in publishing abroad these relaxing dreams; such things as this the "Charles Auchester" school of novelists once made very popular, and which still are more popular, especially here in America, than is for anybody's good.

Two of the Galaxy's articles that are of more consequence than those of which we have been speaking are Mr. Grant White's "Shakespearian Mares' Nests" and Professor Pumpelly's "Journey in Northern China." Mr. White gives us what we should call some very good verbal criticism, and throws light on a good many passages which many of us had not been understanding before. But perhaps he is not entirely free from those sudden and unaccountable fits of stone-blindness which afflict commentators. Unaccountable, we say; but they are to be accounted for by the inherent weakness of all human nature; everybody is liable to them. Why, now, need anybody go further than the Sixth Commandment to find God's canon against self-slaughter? Especially, since the man who is deliberating about suicide is a Roman Catholic—a member of a Church which makes self-slaughter a peculiarly heinous and hopeless form of the crime of taking human life. Again, in elucidating this passage from "Macbeth," Mr. White seems to us to be probably in error, and the error is one that has recently been pointed out in the case of another commentator by still a third, who wrote in we forget what paper or magazine. The verses are these:

> "The right valiant Banquo walked too late;
> Whom you may say, if 't please you, Fleance killed;
> For Fleance fled. Men must not walk too late.
> Who cannot want the thought how monstrous
> It was for Malcolm and for Donaldbain
> To kill their gracious father?"

The word "want" in the fourth line is the particular word which Mr. White is explicating; and he remarks that it has been pointed out that in the north of England and the south of Scotland "want" means "to do without," to dispense with. But then he goes on to say that to give it that sense in this passage is altogether wrong—a blunder of the largest sort. "Do without," he says, is just the meaning that here must be done without: "the speaker surely means to ask, Who can be without the thought how monstrous it was for Malcolm and Donaldbain to kill their gracious father?" But, most probably, "do without" is precisely the meaning we want here. If Mr. White will strike out the full stop at the end of the third line, and will give up the notion that the speech is an interrogative one, he will have what appears to us to be the best imaginable interpretation of it. Macbeth has put off Banquo's murder on the shoulders of Fleance, who is self-exiled; and would have men believe that the sons of the king, also, were parricides. The speaker, in the passage quoted, sarcastically says that "Banquo (whom, if you choose, Fleance killed) walked out too late at night, and is dead; men who (like Banquo) cannot suppress the thought that the tale of the king's death at his own son's hands is a mere monstrous improbable invention would do well to keep under cover after dark, or they will go Banquo's road."

Mr. Pumpelly's article is curious and interesting, and too short. Too short, both because what there is in it is readable—enough to make one wish for more; and also because it would have been well to have given us more details of a trip which must have presented so much that is novel to the American reader. We get, however, several highly pictorial pieces (not word-painting, by any means) which are vivid, and see a good deal of local color. The journey was made out of Peking towards the west, and its object was to explore certain coal-mines whence Prince Kung's government might get fuel for its flotilla of English-built war-vessels. For the rest, the Galaxy has a gossiping article on the Astor Library by a Mr. F. H. Norton, who was for many years employed there; some account of "The Thieves of New York" by Mr. Edward Cropsey; a poem by Mrs. J. W. Howe, the general drift of which is familiar and ordinary enough, but the details of which are done in such a way as to make it simply bewildering; an article on "The Real Louis Napoleon" by Mr. Justin McCarthy, who gives us in a sufficiently taking way what has for some years been the opinion of most well-informed people as to the Emperor's character; a paper on "The Renaissance" by Mr. T. M. Coan, who seems quite as well qualified as a good many other art-writers on art to fit one out with a regular theory of architectural art; and, finally, there is the usual miscellaneous matter.

Before examining the contents of Putnam's, let us express our regret that our comments on the September number—a very good one—were by accident credited apparently to the Galaxy. The best of the articles in the number before us is by Mr. Pumpelly, again, who relates some really thrilling adventures that he and his miners had with the Apaches when he was out in New Mexico in '60 and '61. The "lowness of tone" in the narration is very effective on the reader. "Old Boston and St. Botolph's" is another of the very pleasant letters which Mrs. Hawthorne wrote home —to some of her children, apparently—when she and her husband were in England. There is not more in them than there ought to be in such letters; and, naturally, they are written in an affectionate manner, which takes them still a little further out of literature; but all the good reading is not in literature, and this is very agreeable. Agreeable, too, is a slight little article which she calls "Childhood: A Voluntary" by Miss Mary Dean, who writes kindly of some of the thoughts and pursuits of children. Mr. Putnam himself contributes from his letter-book some possibly interesting letters written him by Mr. Prescott, and one or two written by Cooper. Mr. Putnam rather amusingly remarks that even of the late distinguished Edward Everett Mr. Cooper permitted himself to speak rather disrespectfully. Considering Mr. Cooper's disposition and the peculiar abilities of Mr. Everett, this is not astonishing. Mr. Vincent Colyer continues his "Notes among the Indians," and we find as we read that our confidence in the new Indian policy steadily increases. The more the working of it can be kept before the people, the more certainly there will be that no future administration will be allowed or be willing to take any step backward, and Mr. Colyer, therefore, has it in his power to be a national benefactor. What he writes is not, however, very well written.

The poetry of the October Putnam's hardly needs mention. Mr. Cranch's "Dream of Pilate's Wife" takes its place with the mass of poetry founded on Bible scenes and incidents; there is next to none of it that ever gets much above smooth mediocrity. It would be worth the while of some of the men of ability who occupy themselves with the attempt to make poetry out of Biblical passages to study the works of the very few men who have had any success in that way and to see how much of their best work is utterly disconnected with their nominal theme, and how very little has any closeness of connection with it. We are sorry to find Mr. J. T. McKay "dropping into poetry" in "The Charge at Valley Maloy"—one of those pieces of poetry the goodness of which blinds the maker of them to the badness of them; and so he is led on, having as much vocation for poetry as Monsieur Jourdain himself. "Fallen Angels" is by Mrs. J. J. Piatt, who seems determined to wrap up her thoughts in obscurity of expression, which is what absolutely no great poet ever did. A poet, that is to say, one at least of the great ones—after his poetical days were done—riddled in rhyme; but the rule holds that obscurity is either affectation or some less blamable form of weakness. The criticism of "Literature at Home" is varied rather than copious, and is not so good as it used to be. The department of "Art and Literature Abroad" is, on the other hand, somewhat better; but it is still very dry and scrappy, and must, we should hope, be a grief to the readers of the magazine.

Mr. De Forest, without forsaking the field in which he has made a decided success as a magazine writer—the field which he explored to such good purpose when he was among our white and colored brethren—has latterly joined to it a field out of which, we should say, he is not going to get any adequate reward for his labor in cultivating it. To our thinking, he gives no sign of ability to work to great advantage in the supernatural and fantastical, for which suddenly—so far as we know—he has developed so strong an affection; and the mixture of the two elements spoils the completeness of his later works, although it certainly does not destroy their interest, for his hand retains all its cunning in the portraiture of Southern life. Southern white men, in particular, he sketches, as we have often said, with great spirit and correctness; no one with more correctness, except the author of "Inside: a Chronicle of Secession," who, we think, has come as near doing "the American novel"—nearer, in fact—than any of the better-known writers who have attempted it. Not, for that matter, that he has really made a novel, strictly speaking, at all. But some aspects of American Southern life, and some types of Southern character, he has done most remarkably well. Next to him, as we think, comes Mr. De Forest, who is indeed his equal, if not his superior, in the portraiture of the negro, though this latter figure got very much less of the attention of either writer than one would think might be well for their readers and well for their own reputations. But the ghosts, and bell-ringings, and spirit-drummers, and Oriental fables in which Mr. De Forest has been dealing for a year or so, are always so much alloy in his works not worth his or any one's attention, and, worse for him, not distracting anybody's attention except his own. The ghost in "Lieutenant Barber's Ghost Story," in this number of Harper's, is really of no possible use to the author, whose work is done when he has given us the lieutenant and old Mr. Marshall. To be sure, Mr. De Forest habitually explains away his mysteries when he comes to make an end, but that would seem to show that he is one of the writers who ought to leave ghosts alone. In the Atlantic for this month, his "City of Brass" is another example of his new and inferior work. The reconstruction policy of Congress, the probable future of the negro, and the fate that is in store for the country, are treated of under cover of an Oriental allegory—a somewhat blind and incoherent Arabian Nights tale. There are some clever things in it, of course, but for Mr. De Forest to write it seems a waste of power.

The illustrated papers in Harper's are an article on Brazil, which every one who reads will seem to himself to remember as very many years old, and like a thousand others that he has read; an article on "The Woodcock;" a good description of the Helderbergs, which are the little known range of mountains which cross this State from east to west, beginning near the Hudson, and ending beyond Niagara; and, fourth, some Border reminiscences by R. B. Marcy, U.S.A. This last is quite amusing, and will help any one who reads it to understand both the Indian and the West Pointer. There are more chapters of "The New Timothy," of Mrs. Craik's "Brave Lady," and of Mr. McCarthy's "My Enemy's Daughter," while there are a couple of love stories, very filling, of the kind that the Messrs. Harper might almost take out a patent for. There is, however, not much harm in them usually; self-sacrifice when young men are in the case is not a virtue, let us be thankful, that we need fear to find many sensible young ladies actually practising for the benefit of light, frivolous girls with doll-like faces whom the sensible ones' blinded lovers are apt to prefer. One might fear to say what one thinks of the probable attractiveness in face and form and manner of the ladies who prepare these little fables for Harper's. The pink-faced, doll-like girls have a right to be heard, however; and till they appear in their own defence it is no more than just to presume that there is no self-sacrifice in these affairs, the real truth being that the instances are very few in which the grave Marians really do themselves put the sour grapes up so far above their heads in order that the flighty Millicents should enjoy them in their graceful, lazy way.

Mr. Curtis, in the "Easy Chair," talks about the Byron case, and seems to be decidedly of opinion that his lordship was quite capable of committing the crime laid to his charge, and thinks it most probable, too, that the charge is literally true. So much evidence is daily coming out, however, that no one is called upon to make up his mind just yet, though we are very near it ourselves. The Oxford-Harvard boat-race also gets a word from Mr. Curtis, and so does the Massachusetts nose-pulling, which latter is treated of very well.

The last number of Hours at Home seems to be better than any of its predecessors; and the magazine steadily gains in capacity to fill the place for which it is designed—that of a magazine which, without being strictly religious, or at all hortatory in any way, shall furnish suitable secular reading for all the intelligent members of religiously regulated families. This number begins with a very sensible article on "Trades Unions and Strikes," which would do good service if widely distributed among both workmen and masters. A point is made by Dr. Hunt, its author, which we do not remember to have seen made before, and to which we take pleasure in calling the attention of General Butler, General Cary, Senator Sprague, and some other gentlemen whom perhaps we can thus save some labor. Dr. Hunt remarks that the eight-hour question, which is overtasking the brains of so many statesmen, is really of very little importance in comparison with the noise it makes. An eight-hour law is really the demand of only a very few trades, and they neither the most numerous nor the most influential classes of workingmen. The whole article is, as we have said, a sensible one, though it is of course but rudimentary.

Dr. E. H. Gillette contributes an article which should get some of the attention of bibliographers and critics. He says that some months since, while he was examining some London booksellers' catalogues with a view of making purchases for the Union Theological Seminary of this city, he observed the titles of a "lot" of pamphlets, some of which he knew to be valuable, and which he therefore bought. Among the tracts lumped under the head of "etc." Doctor Gillette found a pamphlet which had this for its title-page: "A Reply to the Answer (Printed by his Majesty's command at Oxford) to a Printed Booke Intituled Observations upon some of His Majesties late Answers and Expresses. By J. M."—and this he believes to be a work of Milton's. It is of date 1642, and contains 46 closely printed quarto pages. Another treatise, entitled "A Soveraigne Salve to Cure the Blind, or a Vindication of the Power and Priviledges claim'd or executed by the Lords and Commons in Parliament from the Calumnies and Slanders of Men, whose eyes (their Conscience being before blinded) ignorance or malice hath hoodwinckt, wherein the fallacie and falsity of the Anti-parliamentary party is discovered, their plots for introducing Popery into the CHURCH, and Tyranny into the STATE are manifested; the pretended fears of danger from Separatists, Brownists, etc., blowne away, And a right way proposed for the advancing the just Honour of the King, the due reverence of the clergy, the Rights and Liberty of the people, and the renewing a GOLDEN AGE," by "J. M., Esquire," was also found. This pamphlet, too, is a quarto, and is of date 1643, and has 42 pages.

Other meritorious articles in Hours at Home are Mr. Johnson's laudatory account of Ahmed Agha, the brave and faithful Consular Guard in Syria, whom the churches ought to reward, for they seem to be in debt to him, to say nothing of their wanting more like him; "Tommy" is a brief sketch of a truculent hater of boys—a writer whom we hope to meet again; "The Great Fire in New York" is from the recently published "Reminiscences" of Colonel Hamilton; the author of "Mary Powell" contributes one more chapter of "Compton Friars;" Mr. R. H. Stoddard has "A Chinese Love Song." "Marion Harland" and Professor Porter go on with their "Sunnybank Papers" and "Books and Reading;" Miss Maria Mitchell describes the late eclipse; and there are a score or two more of pages equally well filled.

Next after the "City of Brass," in the Atlantic, comes Mr. Giles's "Egotist in Life," which will not easily be read, and next after that is an article of the merits of which we can hardly judge, which discusses "Parlor Singing." The writer seems to be one of the rare persons who know how to sing with whom an uncultivated singer can at all agree as to what is good in the way of songs to sing. Very good indeed for a light article is "Hunting in England," the writer of which must himself, one would say, have a strong liking for the chase. Not so much is to be said in praise of "German Songs and a few other Matters," which would be all the better if the other matters had been left out—at least, so far as concerns the dramatic setting for the remarks about the songs. There is, however, more than one touch of humor that is pleasing. "The Brick Moon," by Mr. Hale, is yet to go on; so far we find it unintelligible and a weariness to the flesh—a charge not to be brought against most of its author's stories. But good again is "The Pennsylvania Dutch," which, by the way, readers of "The Foe in the Household" may be very glad to read, as it describes very fully the Mennonites who have puzzled some readers; and good, too, in some particulars is "Wettstein." "Garibaldi" and "An August Pastoral," which are both in verse, we are not going to praise; but "At Rydal" might be praised, comparatively at all events. The heavy articles of the number are "The Increase of Human Life," by Dr. Jarvis, and "The Earthquakes of the American Continent," by Mr. Shaler, both writers who are authorities in their respective branches of science.

An article by Karl Blind, on "The Democratic Movement in France," is about as noticeable as anything in Lippincott's Magazine; but we do not know that there is much in it that is new. Mr. Blind, like every other politician of his school, of course lives in constant expectation of severe political convulsions in Europe. One would hardly like to say of the school in question that it is for ever in the position of the boy who cried Wolf, but certainly most people believe what it predicts only after the predictions have come to pass, and are not much to blame for their tendency to unbelief. Mr. Blind, however, talks with a good degree of moderation, and this time his talk is about the recent increase in the numbers of French Liberal newspapers; about the fact that it is the ignorant districts of France, and those alone, that are Imperialist; about the attitude of the army; about the expenses of the court, and various other matters. Rather a readable little piece in this number of the magazine is Mr. George Jones's "Dick Libby." As Mr. Jones has for many years been a navy chaplain, and has gone with the flag to almost every quarter of the globe, he might give a good many reminiscences fully as interesting as these concerning the old quartermaster and his vagaries. "The Freedman and his Future" is by Mr. George Fitzhugh, a Virginian, who writes kindly about the negro, but rather like a benevolent master than like any kind of a sociologist. It is written, we fear Mr. Fitzhugh will find, that the negro is not to be cared for by good-natured semi-masters, as in some patriarchal age, but that he is to work out his own salvation or to perish away. Mr. Frank Thurber makes some rather graceful verses, and "What I saw of the Suez Canal" is not without value, but is not clear enough. Geographical writing, unaccompanied by maps, cannot be made too clear—cannot be made clear enough, unless by a person who is more of a natural-born geographer and has a more pictorial eye than Mr. Grubb.

The leading article in the Catholic World is entitled "An Imaginary Contradiction," and is devoted to defending Father Hecker, of the Paulists, against the charge of contradicting himself—he being now a Roman Catholic—when, in his "Aspirations of Nature"—written, we suppose, before his conversion—he says this: "Endowed with reason, man has no right to surrender his judgment; endowed with free will, man has no right to yield up his liberty. Reason and free will constitute man a responsible being, and he has no right to abdicate his independence." Now, says in effect the Christian Quarterly, Roman Catholicism compels every good member of its communion to submit his reason and will to the absolute authority of the Church. Father Hecker then says Yes to-day, while yesterday he said No, point-blank; contradicts himself, and so forth. But the entirely imaginary character of this contradiction will at once appear, says the Catholic World, if we stop but a moment and consider that Father Hecker, when he said independence, clearly must have meant independence of merely human interference. But the voice of the Church is the voice of God. The contradiction vanishes, then. The answer is certainly plenty good enough for the argumentum ad hominem, and if the Christian Quarterly is not satisfied, it ought to be. There is nothing, we believe, in the October number of the magazine that calls for special mention, unless we are to speak of the good sense of several of the short book-notices that follow the first one or two. The second one declares that "altogether the wittiest of English writers" is Mr. T. W. M. Marshall, of Baltimore. The magazine is still valuable chiefly to those Romanist laymen who are apt to be involved in controversies with their Protestant neighbors, and are willing to take more or less heat with their light. Occasionally, however, there is a solid article on some historico-religious or historico-ecclesiastical question; and almost every number has a specimen of argumentation that, as mere reasoning, is agreeable, if only by contrast with the slip-slop of most of the argumentation carried on by the polemical press. Also, one may occasionally get a glimpse of the foreign Romanist world; but there is no systematic provision for giving regularly a full view of this generally interesting field; and perhaps more judgment and tact than is often available would be required for such work; and, after all, most probably it would be the general reader who would care most for it.

What is Said of

PUTNAM'S MAGAZINE.

The success of Putnam demonstrates anew the truth of the saying that there is always plenty of room in the upper tiers of the literary edifice.—Portland Press.

The publishers of Putnam do not aim to be "sensational," but rather to fill every number with articles of lively interest and solid worth.—Middletown Mercury.

Altogether, Putnam goes far towards meeting our idea of a popular magazine—keeping constantly on fresh, interesting themes, and free from that pedantic dulness so often affected by magazines which would like to be considered profound.—Cleveland Leader.

Putnam's still keeps the lead of all the magazines in point of time, and falls behind none in variety of its contents.—Evening Post, N. Y.

Putnam's for October is an unusually good number—combining this month with its wonted solidity much that is lively and gossipy.—Evening Mail, N. Y.

The new Putnam is an established institution, and the literary public expect much of it, with good reason, we think.—Syracuse Journal.

New Subscribers for 1870 who send in their subscriptions before November 1 will receive the last two numbers of this year gratis.

The Week.

THE exact truth, we believe, about the Spanish gunboats is that the Government unwarily seized them, or, rather, put them under surveillance in the nature of a seizure, in the belief or on the pretext that they were to be used against Peru, with whom Spain is technically at war; but we are warranted in saying that not a particle of evidence exists that they are or were ever intended to be used against Peru, and yet, under the statute, evidence of intent to use them against a particular power, with whom we are at peace, is absolutely necessary to justify the seizure. Having held them so long, however, the sympathy for Cuba in the meantime growing, the Administration may now find it impossible to release them in the teeth of popular clamor, and may be driven into recognizing Cuban belligerency in obedience not to precedent and principle, but to pressure and political expediency. This would of course cut the ground from under the feet of the Alabama claimants in a woful manner; and though, as we have often said, we do not think their interests should in any way affect the action of the Administration towards Cuba, if they are likely to be injured by precipitate or illegal action towards Cuba they ought to lift up their voices. Not that the Alabama claims would be any way legally affected by the premature recognition of Cuban belligerency, but it would render the statement of the American case, as made by Messrs. Seward, Sumner, and others, ridiculous, and even contemptible, in the eyes of foreign nations.

About the claims of Cuba to belligerency, there is little to be added to what Mr. Sumner has said. With every conceivable motive for putting a good face on the insurgent cause, and with hundreds of persons all over the country interested in giving value to the now worthless Cuban bonds, not a particle of proof has ever been offered by the Junta to the American public that they have even the simulacrum of an army; that there is an acre of Cuban soil which the Spanish troops do not traverse in large and small parties whenever they please; and that the insurrectionary "operations" consist of anything better than sudden attacks on convoys and detachments by bodies of guerillas, who owe their ability to "report" to their early retreat. As we have often said, the seat of war is literally here, and the hopes of the Junta are based almost entirely on the chance of dragging the United States into the fray. There is therefore plenty of sympathy for the cause in "halls" in New York and Philadelphia, but those who have seen the filibusters who go out to "pay with their person," as the French say, are filled with even deeper commiseration for the rebels they are going to help, than for the Spaniards who will have to chase them.

In the meantime, the ordnance manufactured at Cold Spring, in this State, and which was to have been put in the gunboats, has sailed, or was to have sailed, on Tuesday last, on board the Euterpe, the Government refusing to interfere under advice of the Attorney-General. The Hornet, which has just been seized at Wilmington, was bought at Philadelphia, and partly at least with Cuban money, and was seized there by the United States Marshal, but released for want of proof. She then went to Halifax, and was seized there, but released for a similar reason. She is now undoubtedly ready for active operations, but unless she is supplied with letters of marque from Peru, she is technically a pirate. She is said to be manned and officered in such fashion as to make it doubtful whether the elements will not speedily deliver Spain from her, even if she escapes the United States Courts.

A curious Washington dispatch appeared on Monday in the Tribune, which is a very good friend of Cuba—one of the best it has—announcing that—

"Letters from Cuba, received here yesterday, confirm previous accounts of the insubordination and treachery in the Cuban army. Gen. Cespedes and Gen. Quesada are untiring in their endeavors to harmonize the conflicting elements, but without success. The Americans are anxious to get away. They report that every promise made them before leaving New York has been violated, and the representations of the state of affairs on the island are equally false. The Americans who have escaped describe the condition of their comrades as most piteous. They are compelled to take the front in all contests, and receive no quarter from the Spaniards. The wounded, who in the exigency of battle are left upon the field, are invariably murdered. To this is to be added the almost daily assassination of their comrades by those whose independence and liberty they were induced to volunteer to assist in securing. Several engagements have taken place, in all of which the Spaniards have been defeated, and in each of which the Americans have lost largely. These fights are stated to have been unimportant in their results as affects the conclusion of the war."

A subsequent despatch says the "Cuban leaders" in Washington are "greatly incensed" at the publication of this, and that other private letters make no mention of American discontent, and say the Americans are going to stay till all is over. The Sun requests us to take note of the fact that Senator Sumner misrepresented the case in his Worcester speech when he denied that Cespedes had abolished slavery. We honestly confess that we are unable to say whether Cespedes has abolished slavery or not. We have no doubt he means to do so, whenever he has the power; and what we should like to know is, whether he has the power now.

There is a report current, and believed, we know, by some sober men, that the late gold operation was planned by Mr. Abel Corbin, the President's brother-in-law, with the President's connivance or approval—a large portion of the profits to be appropriated to him or his family—that the scheme was carried out with the aid of General Butterfield, the Assistant-Treasurer in this city, and that Gould and Fisk were called in to aid and abet it; and that Fisk was actually allowed to discuss the matter with General Grant on his boat. Fisk swears to Corbin's complicity, and Corbin says Fisk lies, as he will show when he gets well, being now sick. The matter is already a common topic of conversation and of newspaper discussion; and we mention it for the purpose simply of saying that, if untrue, the author of so atrocious a calumny ought to be promptly exposed and punished and that the indifference, whether real or affected, of public officers to charges of this nature has its limits. Some persons worth disabusing do now believe it, and more will come to believe it if the story is allowed to run. One thing we believe is certain, and that is, that bankers here see, or think they see, traces in the operation of the hand of somebody in authority. Let us know who that person is.

One of the results of the eagerness with which charges of this kind are made for party purposes, combined with the growing indifference of public men to all charges whatever, is that public opinion is really ceasing to act with much force as a represser of villany of any kind. There is just now a good deal of indignation against Fisk, jr., but it in no way interferes with Fisk's operations. Nothing is said about him that has not been said about men generally considered respectable; and he follows their example in despising "newspaper abuse," and finds his account in it. A clergyman, to whom we happened to be talking the other day of Gould, said he saw a good deal of evil said of Gould in the papers, but that he felt satisfied "there was another side to it." On the other hand, if a man has a good following, you may catch him in a burglary; but if you expose him, tools and all, the chances are ten to one you will yourself come worse out of the affair than he will.

The Republican Convention of this State has met, and made its nominations and adopted its platform most harmoniously, and, what is more to the purpose, the platform is very good, and so are the nominations. When we remember the way most of the conventions shirked the question of paying the bonds in gold in 1867, and the disinclination even of the Chicago Convention to use the word "gold" in its protest against all schemes of repudiation, and see the boldness with which the conventions now declare the payment of the bonds in gold to be the only honest and expedient course, we are conscious of solid progress, conscious that the party has been really "educated up," and has been "educating" the public too. The other important points in the platform consisted of protests against grants to sectarian schools, and against electoral frauds, and a demand for an improvement of the canals. The remaining resolutions were mostly general statements, intended rather to protect the party from suspicion than as positive affirmations of principle, and may be set down among the sentiments which do equal honor to the head and heart of the utterer—such as expressions of sympathy with the downtrodden and oppressed, of a desire for equality and simplicity in taxation, of hostility to electoral discrimination based on color, religion, or race. Cuba received a warm declaration of sympathy also, but the question of recognition was left, where it belongs, in the hands of the Administration.

Perhaps the best and most encouraging feature in the proceedings was the nomination by acclamation of George William Curtis for the Secretaryship of State. Mr. Curtis has not been by any means a thorough-going party man. Throughout the Reconstruction period, he kept his private conscience going in full blast, in spite of the very widely diffused feeling that it was an expensive luxury, in which a "faithful" man had no right to indulge. He had doubts about impeachment; he never believed that Trumbull and Fessenden and Chase were sold out to the Whiskey Ring; and he even lifted up his voice against the Honorable B. F. Butler's election. He refused to join in the party laugh over the idea that a United States Senator could have a "conscience" and be guided by it; and he has gone about the country delivering an incendiary lecture, in which he maintains that a politician ought to be a man of good moral character, and if he is not, and yet gets on the party ticket, ought to be scratched, with much other childish, if not mischievous, matter of the same sort. Many feared it was, politically speaking, all up with him, and that he would hereafter be relegated to the party garret amongst the cherished but useless lumber of the household. His nomination shows, however, that character grows in value in the party ranks, and that Republicans honor other things than reckless fidelity. Many a poor devil, who for years past has been afraid to call his soul his own, and almost blushed at the suggestion that there was any party doctrine he could not swallow, will be encouraged by this nomination into coming out in the likeness of a man. But, we are sorry to say, Mr. Curtis has for personal reasons declined it.

Mr. Boutwell continues to have as pleasant a tale to tell as ever. The last monthly statement shows a reduction of the debt during the month of September of nearly seven millions and a half, making a total decrease since March 1, 1869, of nearly fifty-seven millions. This s reducing at the rate of one hundred millions a year; and if the Treasury can "stay," as the sporting men say, there will soon be a serious hole made in the total amount.

The coming month promises to be fruitful in political results of greater or less magnitude. Governors are to be elected in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Iowa, and in California judges of the Supreme Court. Of the state of affairs in Pennsylvania we have already more than once spoken. In Ohio, there is nothing very remarkable beyond the fact that the State has to be redeemed from Democratic rule, the last Legislature having been Democratic, and having ousted Mr. Wade from the Senate, and substituted Judge Thurman; and that the Prohibitionists are taking the field with a separate ticket, having nominated Mr. Samuel Scott, of Dayton; but the movement is not considered formidable. In Iowa, the contest always ends in the one way, which saves editors trouble in the matter of speculation. In California, the judges of the Supreme Court are to be elected—their election having been separated from the State election, which occurs in August, for the purpose of securing for it the undivided popular attention; but the opinion gains ground, and the facts warrant it, that no device will ever deprive an elective judiciary of its evils.

Isaac V. Fowler, recently deceased, was postmaster in this city under Buchanan, and in 1858 was discovered to be a defaulter to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars or thereabouts. A warrant was issued for his apprehension, but he effected his escape to Cuba, as was believed, with the connivance of the then United States Marshal, the celebrated Captain Rynders. The Government sued his sureties, but was defeated, on the ground that it had condoned his offence; and the District Attorney soon after entered a nolle prosequi as against him. About four years ago he returned to the city on a short visit, and was entertained at a semi-public banquet by many prominent citizens, including the then Chief-Justice of the Superior Court. He has since lived, we believe, in Mexico. One morning paper, noticing his career, speaks of his defalcation as a "failure;" another, of the banquet as a "quiet ovation." The Tammany Society have passed resolutions expressive of highest admiration of him.

Chicago is just now the scene of a remarkable movement for the purification of the city government. Affairs there have been for some time going very much as they have gone here, the party hacks converting the city into a kind of hunting-ground, and securing the support of decent people under pretence of devotion to the rights of man, the Congressional policy of reconstruction, and other vast and tremendous issues. People gradually grew tired, however, of seeing notorious rogues sitting at the receipt of custom, under the shadow of Federal politics, and resolved on a reform. So far, there is nothing peculiar in the matter. We have had here plenty of disgust with knavery and desire for reform, and a keen and even humorous perception of the base uses often made of national questions by local knaves, and we have even had reform movements, and "independent tickets," and "citizens' tickets," and "people's tickets," and we now have a Citizens' Association. The peculiarity of the Chicago effort after reform is, that men of all parties have gone into it with equal zest; and, what is more remarkable, the leading daily papers of both parties give it their united support. The address of the committee to the citizens, too, is as terse and vigorous and clear a piece of political writing as we ever remember to have seen, and recalls the fact that one of the earliest and most powerful utterances against the great greenback heresy in 1867 came from the Chicago Chamber of Commerce.

A statement is going the rounds of the press, accompanied with some ill-natured remarks, that our old friend, Mr. J. M. Ashley, the Original Impeacher and sometime member of Congress from Ohio, having, in spite of the Case correspondence, been appointed Governor of Montana, and the Territory having gone Democratic, and Mr. Ashley being desirous of representing it in the Senate at the first convenient opportunity, he has "bowed to the will of the people," he says, and he, the whilom friend of mankind, accepts the "white man's government" platform in its entirety. Some very ungenerous deductions have been drawn from this performance, in forgetfulness of the fact that when a man has no opinions of his own, he is at liberty—nay, it is his duty—to adopt the opinions prevailing in the neighborhood of his domicile. "Views," like contracts, depend on the lex loci, and it is ridiculous to expect even the most "faithful" person to hold in Montana the doctrines which made him comfortable in Ohio or Massachusetts. Mr. Ashley was probably emboldened in his present defection by the impunity he secured for his corrupt agreement with Case to prostitute his official position, but he will find any offence against party discipline treated in a very different spirit.

Two accounts have been published during the week of remarkable explorations in opposite parts of the continent. The Tribune of Thursday printed a letter from Colonel J. W. Powell, describing his romantic voyage through the cañons of the Colorado River, in which interested parties had rumored that he and his companions had perished. Nothing, certainly, could have been easier than to go to destruction; but there was, perhaps, as much in the situation to inspire as to depress the mind. The savage and awful scenery through and under which they were swept it would be worth running many risks to see; and there may yet be excursions to the Colorado as there are now to the Yo-Semite. The same paper contained Captain C. F. Hall's letter to Mr. Grinnell, giving an account of the successful termination of nearly five years' search in the Arctic regions for the remains of Sir John Franklin. He visited, by means of sledges, King William's Land, examining the numerous places on the coast where traces of Crozier and his party have been found, and finding a great abundance of relics, of which he has brought home as many as he could, including, we believe, an entire skeleton of one of the unfortunate men. He is of opinion that rearches prosecuted on the same island in the summer would reveal the depository of the documents of the Franklin expedition, which he locates with some confidence "a little way inward, eastward of Cape Victory." Captain Hall speaks in a regretful way of having been obliged to kill a seaman—one of five whom he engaged from whaling vessels—for mutinous conduct. Two of these, however, have published a letter pronouncing the act a cold-blooded murder, and we have heard that the same judgment is expressed by a third. The fourth is praised by Captain Hall for his constancy on all occasions, and the two are alleged to have kept the others disarmed and defenceless.

As we have at various times predicted that the Chinaman would supersede Bridget as a domestic servant, and have even expressed our satisfaction at the prospect, we feel bound in candor to mention any unfavorable reports about his character or conduct which reach us. A correspondent informs us that in Oregon, where the Chinaman is getting into vogue, he has already begun to display a lamentable disinclination to work for low wages, and already rates himself as high as forty dollars a month, and shows a strong disposition to define his duties with somewhat inconvenient exactness, refusing even to sweep the piazza, unless expressly bound to it by the contract. All this is, however, defensible on one ground or another; but we confess we are somewhat perplexed by his practice of filling his mouth with water and spurting it, by way of sprinkling, over the clothes he happens to be ironing. Is this allowable? We cannot say—and doubt if anybody is competent to decide except a jury of washerwomen. But we have no hesitation whatever in condemning his practice of spurting water into his pastry in the same manner. This no American family of moderate means, and in the habit of frequenting its own kitchen, could possibly put up with. No pie, openly made at home in this manner, could give pleasure to anybody of the smallest taste or refinement. Public bakers, indeed, might indulge in the practice, because, in the matter of preparing food and drink, it is only what we see that disgusts us. We drink with gusto wine in which able-bodied men have rolled about a good deal in a state of total nature. We are glad to say that our correspondent reports most favorably as to the Chinaman's capacity for making cake. He only needs to see the most complicated varieties prepared once, in order to repeat the process ever after with unfailing accuracy, and we do not understand that he introduces into it any repulsive "wrinkles" of his own or of his ancestors'.

In England, the land question begins to occupy all minds, and politicians coming back from their vacation rambles find themselves face to face with a problem compared to which the Irish Church was a bagatelle. One fine old Tory, Mr. Newdegate, tells the farmers of his county that they must not, for various reasons, suppose that what is good for the Irish farmer in the way of tenure would be good for them, but the mere fact of his saying so is a significant indication of what is running in people's minds, and of the conclusions people are likely to draw from the change which must inevitably be made in the Irish land laws. The effect of the abolition of the Irish Church on the English Church already begins to show itself in a proposal to disestablish the church in Wales. That or something needs to be done to improve Welsh morals, which are of the lowest, in spite of considerable religious zeal; and according to one style of political reasoning, the church establishment, as being on general grounds objectionable, must be at the bottom of it.

The protectionist agitation in England seems to grow, but it has as yet only assumed the form of a demand for reciprocity—that is, for protection against nations which do not open their ports to English products, or only open them partially. Manchester, strange to say, is the headquarters of the movement, and manufacturers, as well as workingmen, are engaged in it. Some of the newspapers—the Spectator, for instance—treat it with scorn and contumely, as Mr. Bright has done; but this will hardly impede it—if, indeed, it does not stimulate it. Of course, reduced to its simplest elements, it is a movement in favor of raising the cost of production in England, by way of punishing foreigners for keeping up the cost of their production—or is, in other words, an elaborate mode of biting one's own nose off to be revenged on one's enemies. The most powerful blow it has received comes from a Mr. Ashton—a Lancashire manufacturer, we believe—in a letter to the Manchester Examiner, in which he makes short work of the agitators. He shows, in the first place, that, so far from free trade being responsible for the present pauperized condition of the English population—one in every twenty being now a pauper—for several years prior to free trade one man in eleven was a pauper. In 1847, before free trade, Lancashire consumed 26,379 bales of cotton; in 1868, she consumed, in spite of high prices, 53,689 bales. In 1854—the earliest record—the exports of the kingdom were £115,821,092; in 1868, they were £225,835,088—having nearly doubled in fourteen years of free trade. In 1859, England sent to France nine and a half millions sterling; in 1867, twenty-three millions sterling. In 1859, she took from France £16,870,859; in 1867, £33,734,803. He adds, that if anybody wants to know how the difference between the value of what England exported to France and what she received from France was paid, that matter may safely be left to the bankers who did the business; if they were satisfied, nobody else need complain—an answer which, mutatis mutandis, might be given to those who, amongst ourselves, keep up the perpetual lamentation about our "running in debt for foreign luxuries." If the importers are able to square their accounts every year, other people's minds may be easy. Mr. Ashton furnishes some other striking facts. In 1854, England exported £3 10s. 2d. per head of her population; in 1867, £6 0s. 2d. per head of her population; in 1854, she imported £5 10s. 2d. per head of her population; in 1867, £9 2s. 6d. per head.

The excitement in Spain about Cuba seems to continue, and is in some degree helping the Government, by producing a forgetfulness more or less deep of domestic differences in the common hostility to foreign dictation, the Sickles note being still popularly believed to be a threat. The volunteers are roused into a good deal of enthusiasm, and there are even signs amongst them of readiness to volunteer for foreign service, or, at all events, to take the place of the regulars at home. The popularity enjoyed by the Americans during the early days of the revolution seems to be rapidly dying out, and threats against the Yankees, somewhat in the style of those uttered by the Cronista in this city, begin to make themselves heard, showing that Spaniards, in spite of their misfortunes, are yet hardly conscious of their weakness.

THE GOLD ROOM.

Next to our military operations during the war, there is no one topic that has elicited so much complacent twaddle as our financial operations since the peace. Notably have the gold premium and the resumption of specie payments furnished brilliant illustrations of the confidence which ignorance inspires, and of the contemptuous facility with which all our difficulties can be overcome—on paper. The recent excitement in Wall Street is proof sufficient, if proof were needed, that all that ever was required to restore our finances to a healthy condition was to adopt the suggestions made years ago by any one of the numerous amateur financiers whose clear and practical schemes are divided in unequal proportions between the "Voices of the People" of the Daily Tom-tom and the editorial waste-paper basket. These various schemes differ somewhat in trifling details, but in the main principles they all agree: the greenbacks must be redeemed in coin by the Treasury; all buying and selling of coin for future delivery must be strictly prohibited by law, and made a penal offence; and, above all, that sink of iniquity, that national curse, that robbers' den—the Gold Room—must be destroyed, abolished, annihilated, or otherwise done away with, in whatever language seems most forcible to express the just wrath of an indignant patriot. Not only fools, but a great many sensible people, seriously believe that if the Gold Room were closed, there would be no dealings in gold; that if there were no dealings in gold, gold would not be at a premium; and that if gold were not at a premium, we should at once resume specie payments; hence, that all that is necessary in order to secure resumption is to close the Gold Room, and prevent dealings in gold. Even men from whom better things might be expected display the most lamentable ignorance on this subject; and Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, it is announced through the telegraph, is preparing to introduce a bill in Congress which shall prohibit all dealings in gold for future delivery under heavy penalties.

Now, all these people make the radical mistake of confounding the symptoms of the disease with the disease itself; they look upon the boil upon their patient's neck as the real illness, instead of the weakened constitution and impure blood of which the boil is simply the expression. They want to cure one boil, but leave the patient's constitution unchanged; and they forget that a dozen boils will speedily break out in other places. We select on purpose an unpleasant simile. The Gold Room is a nuisance. It has been, is, and will be prostituted to vile uses. It has fostered speculation of the wildest kind. It has been perverted from a legitimate market into the facile instrument of a series of infamous cheats. It is a boil upon the neck of the community; but it is not self-created. It is the direct, legitimate, inevitable offspring of our financial blunders in the past. It is not only not responsible for much of the evil done in its name, but it has, on the contrary, been the means of preventing much worse evils. Above all, as long as the people of the United States persist in transacting their business in a currency which bears no direct and established relation to the currency in use anywhere else, just so long will they absolutely require a Gold Room, or some similar establishment, in which their transactions with the outer world can be translated from the vicious, fluctuating, unsettled, local greenback currency into the sound, stable, international gold currency which alone is recognized in all other parts of the world.

We shall try to explain some of these transactions in a manner intelligible to all. The cotton crop, our largest export staple, is about beginning to go forward. Its value in round figures, say 3,000,000 bales, at $100 a bale, is $300,000,000—three hundred millions of dollars. Of this about one-third is worked up in our home factories, and two-thirds, say to the value of two hundred millions of dollars, are exported. The process of exporting this cotton is practically as follows: The Liverpool cotton merchant telegraphs to the New York commission-house: If you can buy one thousand bales of middling cotton so as not to cost me more than tenpence, or twenty cents gold, per pound, laid down here in Liverpool, you can do so. The commission merchant finds that the freight, insurance, and other charges will amount to about two cents; he can therefore afford to give eighteen cents gold for the cotton itself. He goes into the cotton market and enquires the price of cotton per pound in gold. The dealers answer that cotton is sold for currency, not for gold; the planters at the South have to pay their laborers in currency; they buy their provisions, their agricultural implements, and their manures for currency; they owe their debts in currency; all freights and expenses on their cotton are currency; they can tell what their cotton costs them in currency; and they don't want to sell it except for currency. The commission merchant telegraphs to Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans—from all these places he gets the same answer: Middling cotton is selling for about twenty-seven cents a pound in currency; no price can be given in gold. Finding that he cannot buy the cotton for gold, but knowing that he is authorized to pay eighteen cents gold per pound, he next proceeds to the Gold Room to ascertain the price of gold, so as to know how much currency he can get for his eighteen cents gold, or, in other words, how much in currency he can afford to pay for the cotton without exceeding the orders of his Liverpool correspondent. He finds gold selling at 150—in other words, his eighteen cents gold are worth exactly twenty-seven cents in currency; he can pay twenty-seven cents in currency per pound for his middling cotton without exceeding his correspondent's orders.

Now, if business were all as simple as some wiseacres imagine, the proceeding of the commission merchant would be simple enough. He would only have to take as much gold as would pay for the thousand bales of cotton, sell it at 150, and with the currency pay the cotton-dealer, and the whole transaction would be concluded. But, to begin with, he has not got the gold. The Liverpool cotton merchant did not send the gold to pay for the cotton; and if he had sent it, it would not arrive for some time, as the order came by the Atlantic Cable, which is not yet arranged for the transportation of specie. The way in which the New York commission merchant expects to get the necessary gold is this: He receives the order by Cable on Monday, and concludes the purchase of the cotton the same day. He then has to engage a vessel to take the cotton to Liverpool, the arrangements for which occupy the next day. On Thursday or Friday, the vessel is ready to take her cargo on board—a process which is perhaps completed by next Monday. The captain of the vessel signs the receipt for the cotton on a document called a bill of lading; the merchant makes out a bill for the amount of the cotton, at the price in gold which his Liverpool correspondent authorized him to pay, attaches the bill of lading to it, as evidence that the cotton has been shipped, and takes the bill to one of the foreign banking houses, like Belmont or Brown Brothers, who thereupon pay him in gold the amount of the bill, less a small commission for forwarding the bill and collecting it from the merchant in Liverpool. Two or three days are lost in negotiating and settling with the banker, so that at least ten or twelve days elapse between the time of contracting for the cotton and obtaining the gold to pay for it. With this gold the merchant goes to the Gold Room, in order to sell it at 150, and obtain the currency to pay for the cotton. To his disappointment, he finds that gold has fallen to 145, and that instead of getting twenty-seven cents currency for the eighteen cents gold which his Liverpool correspondent authorized him to pay for the cotton, he only gets twenty-six cents currency, while he has actually bought the cotton and agreed to pay twenty-seven cents for it. In other words, he has lost one cent on every pound of cotton purchased, or $5,000 on the thousand bales. It is very true that it might have been the other way. The market might have gone up five per cent. instead of down, and then the merchant would have gained $5,000 instead of losing. But that is not what he wants. He does not want to speculate on the market—to gamble. His is legitimate business. All he wants is to convert his gold into currency so as to pay for the cotton he has bought. He wanted to buy his cotton for gold, in accordance with his orders, but the owners would not sell to him for gold. They compelled him to buy for currency, and in doing so compelled him to run the risk of all the fluctuations of the gold market from the time he purchased the cotton until the day when he sold his bill. Now, this is a risk which no prudent business man will run, or indeed can run, without degenerating into a mere gambler. But the risk is forced upon the business community by the existence of our present currency. Of course, the risk is evaded; unless it could be evaded there would be a total stoppage of all foreign trade, as there was a few weeks ago when the disturbances in the Gold Room first commenced, and as is virtually the case now. But it was the attempt to evade this improper risk, forced upon the business community by our unnatural currency, that delivered the merchants, bound hand and foot, into the arms of the desperate clique of gamblers and cheats who have made havoc of Wall Street for several weeks past.

We have seen that gold was at 150 on the day when the commission merchant executed his Liverpool correspondent's order for a thousand bales of cotton, and that, if he had had the gold at that moment, he could have sold it at 150 and thus evaded the risk of all future fluctuations of the market. He did not have the gold then, but he knew that he would receive it in ten days or a fortnight. What was to prevent him from borrowing the gold, selling it at once at 150, and then returning it as soon as he had sold his bill on the Liverpool cotton merchant and obtained his own gold? There was nothing to prevent him, and, indeed, the bulk of the export business of the country has for years past been conducted upon this basis. The merchant who expects to receive gold to-morrow, next week, a month, six months, or a year hence for goods which he exports to-day, borrows the gold, and sells it immediately, in order to avoid all risk from the fluctuations of the premium. This is the reason why so many merchants are borrowers of gold, and why it was in the power of the gold clique, as we shall presently show, to inflict so much injury upon business. It is easy to see how even these legitimate business transactions, without including speculative ventures, swell the business in gold to enormous figures. The export trade of the country, which is all settled for in New York, amounts to about four hundred millions, or nearly a million and a half a day. In the transactions of the Board, each purchase and each sale is counted separately, so that actual sales of a million and a half make reported transactions of three millions. The bulk of the gold to settle foreign exports is borrowed. The lending and borrowing are likewise counted in the transactions, and, like the purchases and sales, are counted separately. In this way, the lending of a million and a half makes reported transactions of three millions, so that in order to complete one sale of a million and a half, transactions to the extent of six millions have to be recorded. Before the borrower is prepared to deliver his own gold, he may be compelled a dozen times to change his loan—all loans being made from day to day; he may borrow from A one day, and from B the next, and so on, and each fresh loan again counts double; so that the daily sale of one million and a half of real gold may easily cause recorded daily transactions of ten or fifteen millions.

This is the merchandise export trade only. The import trade causes similar transactions to similar amounts. To these must be added the enormous business growing out of European transactions in our bonds and other securities—out of a large West India, and South and Central American, and even Chinese trade that does its banking business here—out of the purchases for customs duties, and the sales of coin interest on United States bonds—out of the entire specie trade from our great mining States of the Pacific and elsewhere. It must be evident how rapidly these multiplying transactions swell the amount of recorded business in the Gold Room, how large a proportion of the whole is legitimate and unavoidable, and how entirely the occasional enormous transactions of speculators and speculative combinations deceive the public as to the extent of the legitimate and unavoidable business that is transacted daily. The average recorded transactions of the Gold Room are $60,000,000 daily, representing not more than from five to seven millions of real purchases and sales, of which probably fully two-thirds are legitimate business transactions. To talk of prohibiting commercial engagements of this magnitude, on which the whole of our foreign trade is as much dependent as it is upon the right to buy and sell bills of exchange, is, therefore, an absurdity.

THE GOLD BUBBLE.

We have shown the impossibility—with our existing currency—of transacting our business with foreign nations without daily dealings in gold, and that one of the essential features of these dealings is the necessity of merchants being frequent borrowers of gold. As already stated, it is upon this essential feature of the business that the great Erie robbers based the speculation which has convulsed Wall Street as it was never convulsed before, and has upset large branches of trade throughout the country for the last two or three weeks. The practice in relation to the borrowing of gold is this: the borrower of the gold gives the lender, as security for his loan, greenbacks to an amount equal to the market value of the gold. When gold is selling at 140, the borrower gives the lender $140,000 currency as security for the loan of each $100,000 gold. When the foreign trade is brisk, and there is consequently an active demand from borrowers of gold, the holders of gold have little difficulty in lending it, and in obtaining as security for the loan the full market value of the gold in currency. A banker or broker in good credit can thus buy a large amount of gold with a very small amount of currency, because the moment the gold is paid for he can lend it for almost as much currency as he paid for it. On this basis, then, the great clique began their operations. In the neighborhood of 131, and up to 135, they bought all the gold there was in the market. They lent the gold to our merchants in the foreign trade, who sold it in the manner and for the reasons above explained. Every time the merchants sold gold, the clique bought it of them, and lent it back again to other merchants, who again sold it; and every time they sold they found that it was always bought by the clique.

Gradually the position of affairs began to be understood. It was noised about that the clique not only held all the gold in the country, but that they had lent out their own gold two or three times over and bought it back again from the very persons they had loaned it to. They were, therefore, in the position to call upon merchants and bankers and brokers and speculators at any moment for the return of from sixty to one hundred millions of gold, which it would be physically impossible for the borrowers to obtain anywhere. As soon as it was evident to the conspirators that their position was understood, they began themselves to spread the rumors of their intentions. Prudent merchants, who had borrowed gold, hastened to buy it and return it, at the risk of severe loss on their commercial transactions. But, to the astonishment of even old and experienced brokers, it was found almost impossible to buy gold. The price advanced rapidly. The most determined bought promptly and suffered comparatively slight loss. Others held aloof. But delay was doubly dangerous; for not only did the timid, the weak, and the prudent rapidly advance the price by their purchases, but the clique themselves sent brokers into the market by the dozen to buy apparently, to bid the price up, and to frighten still more people into buying by the reports that to-morrow or next day all borrowers would be called on to return their loans, and that all those who could not comply would be declared bankrupt under the rules of the Exchange, and many ruined for life. The prospect was threatening. Even the boldest and wealthiest quailed before the insidious power that seemed to hold them helpless within its grasp. Many, determined to incur any loss rather than sacrifice their reputation, gave orders to buy back their gold and return it to the lenders. At every fresh purchase of importance, at every fresh evidence of their success, the emboldened clique still further advanced the price, until on Thursday night, the night before the memorable Friday, the market closed strong at 143, an advance of ten per cent. in a few weeks of peace and prosperity, and the whole mercantile community was hushed and half-stupefied by a presentiment of the coming storm.

On Friday, the brokers of the clique rapidly unfolded their plan of action. In the spacious Exchange Room of the Gold Board, crowded as it had never been crowded even in the wildest excitement of war times, amid the strangest variations of deathlike silence and tumultuous uproar, the pallid, half-conscience-stricken brokers of this gambling clique appeared, one after another, to do their dirty work. By the little fountain which plays in the centre of the floor, and around which the principal business is transacted, first one bid arose—145 for $100,000, and there was no response. Then another bid—146 for $100,000, and again no answer. 146, 147, 148, 149, for $100,000; with a pause between each, all amid deathlike silence. Then the hundreds gathered there, and the thousands who read the ominous words on all the telegraphic indicators in the principal business offices in the city, and the hundreds of thousands who watched the telegraph offices throughout the country, stood appalled. Each one per cent. advance involved losses of millions—the gain was all with the clique. Who could tell what would be the end? There was no resisting such power. They could advance the price to 200 if they chose. And the usually surging, bustling, shouting mass of humanity crowded there was held silent, almost motionless, as by a magic spell. 150 is now bid for $100,000, and despair suddenly gives back life to many. They rush eagerly to bid and buy. Orders come in by telegraph to buy at any price. Messengers from all parts of the city, the great bankers, the merchant princes from up-town and down-town, force their way in through the crush, and give back to the brokers the sense of reality which they seem to have lost amid the dream-like terror. The stillness is suddenly succeeded by frantic excitement. Transactions of enormous magnitude are made amid the wildest confusion and the most unearthly screaming of men, always excitable, now driven to the verge of temporary insanity by the consciousness of ruin or the delusive dream of immense wealth. But amid all the noise and confusion the penetrating voices of the leading brokers of the clique are still heard advancing the price at each bid, and increasing the amount of their bids at each advance, until at last, with voice overtopping the Bedlam below, the memorable bid burst forth—"160 for any part of five millions."

Again the noise was hushed. Terror became depicted on every countenance. Cool, sober men looked at one another and noted the ashy paleness that spread over all. Even those who had but little or no interest at stake were seized with the infection of fear, and were conscious of a great evil approaching. And from the silence again came forth that shrieking bid—"160 for five millions," and no answer; "161 for five millions;" "162 for five millions." Still no answer. "162 for any part of five millions." And a quiet voice said, "Sold one million at 162." That quiet voice broke the fascination. The bid of 162 was not renewed. But 161 was again bid for a million, and the same quiet voice said, "Sold;" and the bid of 161 was not renewed. But 160 was again bid for five millions. Then dimly it dawned upon the quicker-witted ones that for some reason or other the game was up. As if by magnetic sympathy, the same thought passed through the crowd at once. A dozen men leapt furiously at the bidder, and claimed to have sold the whole five millions. To their horror, the bidder stood his ground, and declared he would take all. But before the words had fairly passed his lips, before the terror at his action had had time to gain men's hearts, there was a rush amid the crowd. New men, wild with fresh excitement, crowded to the barriers. In an instant the rumor was abroad—the Treasury is selling. Quick as thought men realized that it was not safe to sell to the clique brokers. Scarcely any one now wanted to buy. All who had bought were mad to sell at any price, but there were no buyers. In less time than it takes to write it, the price fell from 162 to 135, and the great, gigantic gold bubble had burst, and half Wall Street was involved in ruin.

We have not left ourselves space to relate the sequel of this extraordinary affair, nor to point out what may or should be done to prevent its recurrence.

THE WORKINGMEN'S IDEAL SOCIETY.

As the labor agitation progresses, and covers a wider area, and calls forth from the working-classes a more general expression of opinion, we get a clearer view of what at least the leaders in the movement, and probably also the whole body, have in their minds as the goal of their striving. As we have on more than one occasion said, they have long passed the point of seeking merely for an increased share in the profits of industry, or increased facilities for self-improvement in the shape of education, either general or special, or a diminution in the hours of labor, or increased legal protection against unnecessary risks in hazardous or unhealthy employments. The extraordinary success they have achieved, during the last twenty years, in the work of organization for self-protection, and the steady growth of their ascendancy in the governments of nearly every European country, and the deference shown to their wishes by nearly all modern statesmen, either from motives of political expediency or humanity, have filled their heads with hopes which make the picture of the future which so long satisfied them seem pale and cold. For the political liberty for which Hampden and Washington fought they have, as we have more than once pointed out, ceased to care one straw. The régime which was established in England by the overthrow of the Stuarts, and in America by the Revolution of 1776, and in France by that of 1789, represents nothing to them but "middle class" or capitalist rule, and to this they ascribe all their woes. The feudal aristocrat, against whom the histories and school-books of our time thunder so much, the workingmen know and care nothing about. If they ever owed him a grudge, they have forgiven and forgotten him. Their bugbear is the commercial man of our day—whether manufacturer or distributor—and it is his nose they wish to keep to the grindstone rather than that of the great landowner, though this gentleman also has but little mercy to expect at their hands.

The workingman was never a strong free-trader anywhere, except in England, and there only because protection made bread dear. Everywhere else he has been more or less captivated by the cheap, ready method of raising the prices of particular commodities offered, or apparently offered, by protection. To free trade in land he at one time appeared to be favorable; but, as we endeavored to show last week, he has got over that, or is gradually getting over it. He now wants to have the distribution of land regulated, and in fact it becomes every day clearer and clearer, if we may judge from the proceedings of the various labor conventions—which may be said to formulate the workingman's discontent with things as they are, that what he now aims at is a total reorganization of society on a new plan, and that in this plan the existing "middle class," as it is called—that is, traders, bankers, capitalists, large landowners, philosophers, students, "men of leisure," and professional men, except, perhaps, school-teachers and doctors, will have no place. In the Good Estate for which the labor leagues seem to be working, the principle adopted by the trades unions, for the preservation of equality between workmen, by which workmen of unusual skill or capacity are forbidden to profit by it, will apparently be introduced and enforced. For instance, at the International Congress recently held at Basle (Switzerland), and which was attended by an American delegate, the expediency of abolishing private property in land was voted by 54 to 4, four being absent and thirteen abstaining. The same proposition was voted last year also, and this year the minority and the abstainers have greatly diminished, showing that the idea is securing a more general adhesion.

Private property in land being abolished, there would, of course, cease to be any such thing as inheritance of landed property; but it appeared that the congress was not satisfied with this. A committee appointed to report on the subject pronounced against the right of inheritance with regard to all species of property, on the ground that it is "a constant menace to social right," and "prevents the individual from having the same means of mental and physical development." When the question came to the vote, 32 voted for the abolition of the right, 23 against it, 13 abstained, and 9 were absent; but as an absolute majority of the delegates did not vote for it, the motion was lost. The debate on it, however, explained why it did not receive a larger number of votes, and it was very interesting. All the speakers seemed to be agreed that no man should be allowed to inherit anything, because all children ought to start in life on exactly equal terms—that is, with "equal means of mental and physical development;" but some delegates held that this would be secured most effectually by preventing accumulation; or, in other words, preventing everybody from having anything to bequeathe, and that, therefore, a law against inheritance was useless. If, as proposed, no man was allowed to acquire capital, or live off the interest on it, and no man was allowed to possess property in land and live off the rent of it, naturally nobody would have anything to leave his children, and it would, therefore, be a work of supererogation to forbid the children inheriting from him. This consideration affected the vote in some degree, no doubt, and it was doubtless also affected, as was the vote against landed property, by the fear entertained by many that it might excite the hostility of the peasant-proprietors, who have hitherto given the labor conventions scant countenance. One delegate, however, endeavored to mollify them by kindly proposing that the present peasant owners of the soil, actually engaged in the work of cultivation, should be permitted to occupy their farms during their lifetime. We may imagine the spirit and expression of face with which this concession would be received by the small French or Swiss or American farmer.

All landed property being owned by the community at large, and cultivated for its benefit, and all profits of industry being turned over to the state, which would play the part of capitalist, by lending to workingmen or supplying them with materials, and education being provided by the state, everybody would naturally have to live by the labor of his hands. It would be a violation of natural right even to select certain boys or girls in the schools, and educate them for certain professions—that is, give them a better education than others, because this would be introducing inequality in "the means of mental and physical development." So that society, on the workingmen's plan, would then present the appearance of a dead level, covered with a busy and comfortable multitude, each member of which would be prevented by law from in any way getting ahead of his neighbors. His children would be educated for him in a certain way, and he himself would be constantly provided with work, and taken care of in sickness or old age. But he would not be permitted to accumulate savings; or, at least, if he did accumulate, they would profit him nothing. He would not be suffered to invest them and draw interest from them; for this would be "enjoying the fruits of other men's labor," and, as we have seen, he would not, for other reasons, be permitted to leave them to his children after his death. In fact, in some of the Continental labor organizations, the members are already required to bind themselves not to rise out of their class; that is, not to become capitalists or employers of labor—the process so much admired among us of "rising in the world" being looked on by the agitators with great abhorrence; and that eminent citizen, "the self-made man," whose praises we have sung so much, being treated by them as a traitor to his order. Under this rule, for instance, Asa Packer, Peter Cooper, Ezra Cornell, and, we greatly fear, Horace Greeley himself, are simply despicable renegades.

Now this scheme for the regeneration of society may seem to many people to open up a very gloomy prospect for the human race, but then we must remember that, in the first place, for the working-classes the past is infinitely gloomy. Considering what their condition has been for ages, it is not wonderful that in all their attempts at reform they should think it necessary, as one speaker at the Congress said, "to uproot everything that exists;" and, considering the great advances in power they have made within a quarter of a century, it is not wonderful that they should fancy themselves capable of making all things new. Moreover, the distrust of human nature, displayed in their desire of regulating everything, and providing for everything, in their hostility to free trade—which in England is the natural result of the successful operation of the trades unions in restricting the labor market—is a not unnatural result of the spectacle of the small progress made by human nature towards an ideal society. Men start a co-operative association in order to help to abolish the wages system; it succeeds, and grows rich, and very soon the original co-operators are found hiring laborers themselves, and refusing to divide the profits with them. Men organize trades unions to keep up the rate of wages artificially, but all will not come in, and others secede, and the result is that capital comes out often victorious. You put two children at the same school, and give them exactly equal chances of mental and physical development, from infancy to manhood; in forty years one owns a mill, or has made a fortune at the bar, and lives with his children in luxury, while the other is barely able to keep a large family from starving by some kind of abundant and ill-paid labor. That these things should be—or, in other words, that Providence should permit the world to be as full of sorrow, disappointment, and seeming injustice as it is; that some should be born to misery, and some to prosperity; and that the best-laid schemes for the promotion of human happiness should so constantly fall short, and far short, of their aim, has been from the beginning the great puzzle of the universe. We know that one hundred generations have wept over it, and studied it, and tried to find the key to it, and have failed. We need hardly wonder, therefore, that the working-classes, now at their first accession to participation in the regulation of human affairs, should wish to try their hand at the solution of it—and that they will try their hand at the solution of it, we have no doubt; and no philosopher need smile at their plan of converting society into a vast trades union, as a complete remedy for human ills, who remembers how short a time it is since their superiors in culture and experience were trying to persuade the world that slavery was a beneficent institution, and that the first of virtues for the poor and unfortunate was content; and since even great thinkers looked for the regeneration of the world through the virtues and wisdom of "patriot kings."

THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.

The preparations for the Œcumenical Council are rapidly approaching completion. The carpenters and upholsterers have almost done their work in St. Peter's; the stenographers, who are men of divers tongues, and who have been under training for some months, are reported ready; and the programme of the proceedings, which has been for some time growing into shape, in the hands of a batch of commissions, each presided over by a cardinal, is nearly ready; and Padre Luigi da Trento, the Apostolic Preacher of the Vatican, is working hard at the inaugural sermon. On the 8th of December, the solemnities will open. To get at the real nature of the occasion, one has to go back a great many centuries; but it will be sufficient for our purpose to go back to December, 1864, when the Pope wrote an Encyclical (circular) Letter, giving his views on nearly all the peculiar tendencies and phenomena of modern society, such as religious liberty, freedom of the press, civil marriages, secular education, popular government, or at least the rights of peoples to choose their government, and the subordination of the ecclesiastical to the civil power. The Letter was, however, in the nature of a general treatise on these various errors, accompanied by much wailing and lamentation over the state of the world and the perversity of its inhabitants, and not a little cursing and vituperation. Accompanying it in the nature of a schedule, or "bill of particulars," was the now famous "Syllabus," in which the various errors to which the Encyclical referred were set forth in their order, under eighty heads or articles, each specifying a "damnable heresy;" but the eighty damnable heresies were distributed under ten general heads, or chapters, as follows: 1. Pantheism, Naturalism; 2. Moderate Rationalism; 3. Indifference, Latitudinarianism; 4. Socialism, Communism, Secret Societies, Bible Societies, Liberal Clerical Associations; 5. Errors concerning the Church and her rights; 6. Errors concerning civil society in itself, and in its relation to the Church; 7. Errors concerning natural and Christian ethics; 8. Errors concerning Christian marriage; 9. Errors concerning the temporal power of the Roman Pontiff; 10. Errors relating to modern Liberalism. Of this Encyclical and Syllabus, or the charges and specifications, to use the language of courts-martial, it is sufficient to say that they include and condemn the whole structure of modern society; they condemn as damnable the views held by all civilized states in our day as to the nature of marriage, the education of children, the objects and sanctions of legislation, the relations of governors and government, the source of political power, the relations of the church to the state, of the clergy to the laity, and the views held by nearly all educated men as to the functions and limits of human reason, the objects, powers, and results of scientific investigation. In other words, they pronounce the state of society which existed in the tenth century superior to that which exists in the nineteenth century. The submission to them of the modern world would involve the absolute repudiation, or indeed the blotting out, of nearly everything which has taken place, during the last six hundred years at least, included under the name "progress."

The Pope, who, from the "modern man's" point of view, is grossly ignorant, having little or no tincture of what the profane world calls culture, and who has seen nothing of society at large, having passed his life before his elevation to the episcopate in a monastery, appears to have really expected that these documents would produce a great sensation, and startle Europe from its religious lethargy. But they fell very flat. The French Government refused, under the Concordat, to allow the bishops to publish them; Germany was already laboring in the throes of the coming political revolution, and paid little heed to them; the Rationalists everywhere laughed over them. It was the disappointment thus caused which suggested to his Holiness the idea of summoning a General Council, for the purpose of giving the Syllabus the full weight of the authority of the whole Church; and the discussion and adoption of the Syllabus will, it is said, in conjunction with the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility, take up most of the time of the Council.

Since the issue of the Syllabus, the Church has had serious misfortunes. In Austria and Spain, the powers of evil have completely triumphed. Spain revolted against a legitimate monarch, and has conceded religious liberty, which is damnable under the sixth head; Austria has broken the Concordat, which is damnable under the fifth head; and has established civil marriage, which is damnable under the eighth head; and has subjected bishops to trial by civil courts, which is again damnable under the fifth head. In addition to this, other Catholic powers, finding that an attempt was going to be made to convert the Syllabus into something more authoritative than the dreams of an aged priest, have begun to show signs of extreme uneasiness. The Government of Bavaria, one of the most Catholic countries in Europe, issued a circular to the other Catholic powers, calling attention to the fact that the Syllabus, if adopted by the Council, might introduce serious complications into the politics of Catholic states, and suggesting concert of action for the purpose of keeping the growing pretensions of the Papacy within due limits. In addition to this, the prime minister, Prince Hohenlohe, submitted five questions as to the effect of the Syllabus, if adopted, on the doctrine of the relations of church and state, and on education, to the theological faculties of the universities of Munich and Würzburg. That of Munich has replied boldly that the Syllabus, if adopted as it stands, would introduce great confusion into all modern states, or else unsettle men's minds as to their civil and ecclesiastical duties; and they condemn as erroneous the position of the Jesuit Father Schroder, who has formulated the Syllabus in theses, and maintains, amongst other things, that the "state is excluded from the whole realm of moral matters;" they (the university theologians) affirming that the state is of divine institution as well as the church. Moreover, nineteen German bishops have met at Fulda; and, after enumerating the various "rumors" which are in circulation about the objects of the Council—rumors which the Syllabus fully warrants, and which are generally believed to be true—they go on to say, in a letter which they have just issued:

> "It is much feared lest the Council should proclaim dogmas not contained in the revelations of God or the traditions of the Church, and establish principles prejudicial to the interests of Christianity, incompatible with the rights of the state, civilization, and science, as well as with the just liberty and temporal happiness of nations. People go further still, and accuse the Holy Father of wishing, under party influence, to make use of the Council exclusively in order to augment more than is proper the power of the Apostolic See, to change the old and true constitution of the Church, and to erect, in fact, a spiritual sovereignty incompatible with Christian liberty. Men do not fear to apply the name of partisan to the head of the Church and the episcopacy, an outrage hitherto confined to the declared enemies of the Church; they go so far as to express the suspicion that the bishops will not enjoy full liberty of discussion at the Council, that they will not be furnished with the documents and freedom of speech necessary for the accomplishment of their duty; and, consequently, the validity of the Council and its decisions are called in question."

They significantly express the hope and belief that none of these apprehensions are well founded. The spirit of alarm and opposition of course grows, thus encouraged, as the meeting of the Council draws near. A "Society of Catholics" has been formed in Baden to "resist the aggressions of Rome," and is founding branches throughout Rhenish Prussia. Other signs of the growing anxiety are the defection of Father Hyacinthe, and M. de Montalembert's letter expressing sympathy with an address of remonstrance from the liberal Catholics of Trèves to their bishop, and regretting that French Catholics should not have taken the lead in opposition.

It would, of course, be difficult to believe that the clergy had remained unaffected by the influences acting so powerfully on the laity, even if it were not now well known that the French bishops are already split into three parties, each of which will be represented at the Council; that the German bishops out of Austria are also divided; that the Hungarian bishops are unanimous, or nearly so, in opposition; and that it is only Spain and Austria whose delegation will go to the Council to afford the Pope united support. The press of continental Europe teems with pamphlets and essays on the question, and the radicals both in politics and religion are rubbing their hands with delight over what they believe to be the approaching demonstration of the utter absurdity of the Church, and a vast number of the wiser heads amongst the faithful are becoming seriously alarmed at the possible effect of the follies of the Pope on religion itself. The adoption of the doctrine of his infallibility, for instance, would constantly expose the Christian faith to the chance of being made ridiculous by the sayings and doings of a man physically, at least, like his fellows, and who might any day evolve religious doctrine from the recesses of a brain disordered by disease. In the meantime, the Ultramontane press does not lose heart; and the Tablet in England, and the Civiltà Cattolica in Rome, lay the lash over the shoulders of the recalcitrant in the good old orthodox style; and the Freeman's Journal in this city, infusing a little Western vividness into the theologic gall of the older world, declares that Father Hyacinthe's defection will produce no more effect on the Council than a "sturdy Roman flea," settled on the calf of a cardinal's leg during his celebration of high mass, would produce on his eminence's ministrations at the altar.

THE CHURCH IN FRANCE.

PARIS, September 17.

ONE of the things that people do not study sufficiently when they visit or try to know France, is the action of the clergy in different parts of the country and in different classes of society. Some free-thinkers go away disgusted because, when they see millions subscribed for Peter's pence and sent to Rome, they are convinced that the most slavish form of servility to the Ultramontane priesthood exists here, and that superstition is rife as in Italy or Austria. On the other hand, the more narrow-minded and fanatic of the ultra Catholics, when they are told of similar facts, simply conclude that France is returning to the palmy days of St. Louis, and that Rome will shortly reign supreme and crush all the works of the "infamous Liberals"—Great Britain, in spite of all her "Bibles," being converted, and leading the van of the faithful. Both parties are equally wrong. There is a vast deal more honest, intelligent Christian faith in France than the free-thinkers conceive, and far less fanaticism than the ultra devout would like to feel sure of. Besides, as I began by remarking, you must take into account the various social strata and the geographical divisions if you want to have a clear idea of how religion works in this country. It is not quite exact to say that devotion finds its only stronghold in the exclusive Faubourg St. Germain, and that out of the so-called Royalist circles there are no priest-ridden dowagers. This is not true; but the class varies chiefly according to the locality.

In Paris, it is very nearly true to say that piety and pride go together, and that the father confessor rules principally in the homes where ancestors are regarded as a compensation for any want of personal desert, and where blood must be "blue" to mix with that of the owners. But even in Paris there has arisen a new and very curious class—the class of nouveaux riches, whose desire is to marry their daughters to penniless grands seigneurs. This class is within the last dozen years so numerous that it constitutes one of the fundamental elements of Paris society. Stock-brokers, wine merchants, iron-masters, cattle-breeders, sugar-refiners, soap-boilers—in short, all people having gained, or gaining, money by a trade (without literally having a shop), are one and all now possessed by the ambition to hear their daughters called "Mme. la Marquise" or "Mme. la Duchesse," and the parents have now an advantage in the bargain which they had not formerly, so they will consent to pay a higher price for it. Some twenty years ago, when marriages of this kind took place, it was customary (as under the days of Louis XV.) to ignore the bride's family altogether.

Mademoiselle was absorbed in her lord's tribe, and so utterly forgot her own that she often became the most bitterly exclusive of all her compeers. But this is altered now. When a young man of illustrious name and small means is married off to a retired cheesemonger's daughter, he espouses his wife's family also, to a certain degree; that is, he appears in public with father and mother in-law, never gives an entertainment without inviting them, and goes in turn to all those that they give.

The plebeian mother-in-law is especially gratified by this condition of things, and conscientiously performs the three duties expected of her, which are—to give perpetual presents to her daughter, to dress splendidly herself, and to be noted for her religious zeal. She discharges the last duty in a manner to make bishops and fine ladies declare that she ought to be canonized. She gives heavily to every charity (that is well lancé, i. e., aristocratically supported), obliges her husband to consent to his sons (if he has any) being brought up by Jesuits, and goes in for pilgrimages, and miracles to any amount. She resolutely refuses to know anything about the bases of the Christian faith, saying that it is enough to know what the Pope said last, and in fact puts to shame all the most orthodox ladies of the "best society." This class is, more or less, represented in all large cities, and its number and influence are, upon the whole, on the increase; but its capital is Paris.

If you go westward, towards Brittany, for instance, you find religion as gloomy and superstitious as it ever was in Spain, and only not as intolerant because the people have a less ferocious nature, and never had such sanguinary traditions. In Brittany, it is the peasantry that are most devout; as you ascend the social scale, you find less fanaticism. The tradesman is not pious at all, although his wife, if she be a Bretonne born, quarrels with him for his laxity of zeal—but the gentleman and his surroundings are what priests term "very consolatory." That is, they are very regular in all their practices, but not exactly priest-ridden, and not particularly inclined towards the Jesuits. There is a certain independence in a Breton gentleman which forbids him from surrendering himself wholly to any external power, even that of his confessor, and he is more of a Catholic and a Christian than of a mere Papist. In Normandy, and branching upwards past Paris towards the center, you meet with the smallest amount of religion, unless it may be in the east, where, on the borders of Switzerland and Germany, you can discover certainly no excess of piety whatever. Go towards the south, however, and here you may make by far the most interesting observations. In Languedoc, all classes are devout, and incline towards superstition—not quite the easy-going superstition of the Italian, nor the gloomy superstition of the Breton, but a mixture of the two.

If you go from Languedoc eastwards and to the Italian frontier, you find the priest-ridden bourgeois families as you will find them nowhere else, perhaps. They are starched, stiff, determined devotees, as were their grandfathers and grandmothers, and they are convinced that the Pope will one day return to the Comtat Venaissin, and reinhabit the Papal Palace at Avignon. You can't get at the bottom of these people's consciences, for their creed is a political one, like that of the English in the "Protestant Establishment." It has been said of them that they don't know anything about the articles of their faith, and don't care; that they may be atheists for aught they or you know, but that they are "Romans," and will remain so. "Nous sommes du Pape" is their own expression, and whatever may happen to Christian doctrine these people are "the Pope's own."

Now, on the contrary, if you go westwards from Languedoc, and near the Spanish frontier, you find religion quite differently practised. Probably the excess of gloomy and violent piety in the Spaniard has worked in a repulsive sense, but it is certain that the Pyrenean, the Bearnais, and the Basque, although really and practically devout, have no fanaticism, no intolerance, and no superstition. Along the roads of these countries you may go for a whole day and see, perhaps, one cross at the corner of a lane. And then it will be a perfectly plain one, with none of the offerings and ex-votos, none of the bleeding hearts and flames that you find loading the crucifixes of Brittany above all, and even so far up as into Touraine. Throughout the Pyrenean territory you find churches, even of the smallest villages, richly ornamented and kept in the most brilliant state of preservation and order. You find, too, in the humblest class of men and women—fishermen, shepherds, mountaineers—the most firm and loving faith and genuine reliance upon the Father of all, the most touching resignation in misfortune, but you find no small mummeries, no miserable outward superstitions and miracles, such as La Salette and others—no paganism, in short.

There can be no doubt of there being still in France a larger amount of religious feeling than in any other Catholic country, but it is very diversely spread over the land, according to the peculiar characteristics of the races, and it acts very differently in different classes. Those who fancy that France is Voltairian are as mistaken as those who think she is bigoted. Religion in France is a great element, but its influence requires to be studied.

A POLITICAL PHENOMENON.

THE seeker after truth is frequently surprised to find that he has, unawares, stumbled upon some important fact at a moment when he least expects it. The particular line of enquiry in which I am myself engaged is that of political study, and the fact on which I have lately stumbled is one which is likely to interest your readers.

Having occasion to visit, not long since, one of our prominent seaport towns (or perhaps I ought to say, as the conveyancers do, for the sake of greater accuracy, one of our now or formerly prominent seaport towns), I was much struck by the singular traits of a man whom I observed loafing about in all sorts of places—now in the principal streets, now on the principal street-corners, now in a book-store turning over the leaves of some recent publication, now in the bar-room of some hotel, now on the steps of some public building. He wore a dress which was singular from its uniformity, never appearing (so I was told by all those who had observed him) in any coat, vest, or pantaloons save those in which I saw him. In his face there was a curious mixture of duplicity, gentility, and inebriety, so that you could never feel confident whether a reformed drunkard, a "decayed gentleman," or simply a lobbyist was before you. The eccentricity of his appearance was considerably heightened by his always carrying a ponderous cane, much too large for his size, and which, from its very enormity, offset the general Bohemian effect of the man by a quaint touch of old-fashioned respectability. On enquiry, I found that he had never been seen without this cane—in a word, his tout ensemble was that of some one out of "Nicholas Nickleby" or "The Old Curiosity Shop." Naturally anxious to discover something as to the history of this singular phenomenon, I asked what was his occupation, and was informed by my friends that he made a living by distributing periodicals for a large publishing house. But it seemed incredible that this could be his only source of income, or that a man so individual in appearance should confine his probable originality in so narrow a channel. Some other livelihood, I was convinced, he must have. Chance soon threw in my way an opportunity of verifying this conviction, for, walking in the vicinity of the town not long afterwards, I suddenly found the gentleman in question very near me, and evidently determined to make my acquaintance. He made some remark or other about having seen me before, to which I assented, and, after some preliminary conversation about the weather, we soon found ourselves (by what means I hardly know) conversing on the subject of money and money-lending. It seemed that my acquaintance was familiar with the subject; he stated that he was in the habit of lending money "to his friends."

"Ah!" said I, "then you and I must be in the same kind of business. I have seen a great deal of lending on mortgage."

"No," he answered, with great suavity, "I don't take mortgages; what is the rate of interest on mortgages?"

"Seven per cent."

"Oh! I get a great deal more than that. When I lend money, I frequently take ten per cent. a month."

"Then you make your living by lending?"

"No, I don't need to do that; you see, the fact is that I used very foolishly to let people have my money without charging them anything for it; and some of my friends came to me and said: 'Why, my dear fellow, why do you do this? If you must lend, you positively ought to take interest.' So I concluded that it would be better to do as they advised."

"So you get ten per cent. a month now?"

"Yes; sometimes more. I have got as much as nine hundred and sixty per cent."

"You must run great risks, then?"

"Well, I have never lost anything. I always lend to young men. Young men, sir, are men of honor; but you can't trust an old man; that's one of my first principles. Youth is honorable."

The mystery was thickening. Who was this singular individual who used to lend money without taking any interest, but who, on the representation of his friends, had adopted the less thriftless course of charging nine hundred and sixty per cent.? There was something about the man's manner which indicated a life above that of the ordinary money-lender, while his choice of language was always so correct, and occasionally so superb, as to make the most romantic explanation a possible one. And there was about him a quiet, self-possessed, educated air, which contrasted curiously with the cunning look of his eyes and the unpleasing account which he gave of himself. He must, said I to myself, be in political life. I recollected that I had seen him in the Custom-House. I asked him whether he was an office-holder. No, he said, he was not. He had a good many young friends, however, in the Custom-House.

"They are a fine set of fellows, these young men," said he. "All honorable men. They never break their word."

"You lend money to them?"

"Oh! yes, they are often in want of money, and whenever they are, they come to me, and I let them have a little."

"At nine hundred and sixty per cent.?"

"No, no; I never received nine hundred and sixty per cent. but once."

I was only more puzzled than before. Why should the subordinates of the collector of the port be dependent upon the charity of their friends? Why should this philanthropist single out the Custom-House for his field of benevolence? Would not the banks or the railroads do just as well? I almost began to believe his story, and to look upon him as really an eccentric friend of humanity, who had chosen to benefit his race in this singular way. It is possible, of course, to suppose a man of independent means, who should be moved by the native kindness of his heart to advance money to the needy, who should begin by doing this without asking anything in return, and who should finally be persuaded by his friends into a more prudent as well as, on the whole, more humane course. For it is evident that it would be more really humane to require interest than not to do so, inasmuch as the necessity of paying the market value would strengthen the beneficiary's character, educate his endurance and power of resolution, and prevent the humiliation which might ensue upon his assuming the position of one in need of gratuities. This theory furnished a not absolutely impossible explanation, but then the Custom-House! There is the most mysterious corner of the mystery, and there, also, must be its key. We continued our conversation, but nothing further was elicited, except stories of my friend's various financial ventures—stories which always led to one invariable conclusion, that he never lost money, because he never lent except to young men, who were invariably honorable in their dealings.

But I have discovered the explanation. In a late number of the Times, in an account of the present condition of the Civil Service—the same account from which you have recently made a pertinent extract or two—is to be found the following paragraph:

"SHYLOCKS IN THE CAMP.

"The natural result of this state of things, among several thousand employees drawing monthly pay, is the encouragement to anticipate payments at a ruinous discount. Of course there are many among them who have laid up ready money, and while orders for salary were transferable, a safe and profitable business was done. But the custom increased so alarmingly that the pay department was burdened with extra business, and the thing was evidently promotive of ruinous practices. Orders were issued forbidding the whole thing. The result was to check it to a considerable degree among those who were simply careless, but among the really necessitous, who could not at once rise above it, the risk was increased, and they were compelled to submit to ten and twenty per cent. in lieu of five and ten per cent. per month! An occasional loss could very well be borne by the Shylocks, whose principal risk is the threatened dismissal in case of discovery, but as this class usually have 'influence' with their money, they do not hesitate to take the chances, as their income is very large while they do remain. A shrewd young man, from the Eastern States, was provided with a position through parties who furnish considerable sums to be used in this way. Indeed, outside political influence is a most important adjunct, for if the victim threatens to expose the cormorant who grinds him down, he may be quieted by the assurance of 'pressure' enough to ensure his dismissal if he does not keep quiet and make good his obligations. If the oppressor can claim special influence with the official heads, his vantage-ground is complete. Such facts are too well known to require special instances to be given in their support."

My friend was a Custom-House Jew, without the disadvantage, the nature of which the above paragraph indicates, of being an office-holder.

OUR DIPLOMATIC SERVICE IN THE LEVANT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: If there be a still lingering impression on the part of our public or any small portion of it that the present shameful condition of our diplomatic and consular service is due to an economic motive on the part of either legislative or executive authorities, a brief statement of the condition of affairs in the Levant will explode the fallacy.

The consulates in Turkey are particularly expensive, as the "expenses" amount, on an average, in the smaller consulates to about as much as the salary. The invariable custom of the country demands a dragoman and guard; the postage and incidental expenses and loss by exchange are always greater in a half-civilized country, so that the $1,000 which is supposed to be the sum of the bills to be paid for a consulate like that of Canea, for instance, is as far from it as an inexperienced voyager's estimate of expenses is from the footed bill.

The salary of Canea is $1,000; salary of dragoman and cavasses, $468; rent, $100 (ten per cent. of salary); postage and incidental expenses not much less if any than $200; total, $1,768. To this add loss by exchange on the whole (averaging for Levant ports 12 per cent.) $202, making the bill $1,970. I suppose that this represents with tolerable exactitude the cost of the consulates at Cyprus and Jerusalem (the latter having a salary, however, of $1,500). And, while on this subject, I may say that if the Government would only deposit the quarter's salary of each consulate at Baring's, subject to the consul's draft at sight, all loss by exchange would be avoided, as drafts on London are always at par or better, while drafts on the United States are in some places not negotiable, and any correction of accounts might be made on the subsequent quarter—the officer's bonds assuring the Government against all loss.

We may then take the united cost of the three consulates of Canea, Cyprus, and Jerusalem at $6,000 in gold, and neither consulate is or has been in ten years of the least earthly use to the United States. For the last three years, I have not ceased to urge the abolition of the consulate in Crete as soon as it could be done without any political significance.

Each consulate in Turkish territory is a possible source of misunderstanding with the Turkish Government—the pretensions of American protégés and the insolence of Turkish employees being pretty much on a par—and the cause of no end of official rows, any one of which may cause a collision between the two governments.

For two good reasons, every useless consulate in Turkish territory should be abolished; and if the excellent and deserving military officers who hold the three above-mentioned ones must be cared for by the public purse, by all means let them have a pension of $1,000 each and stay at home, where they may be of some use to themselves and the country.

At Constantinople, we have a minister, a consul-general, a secretary of legation, marshal, jail-keeper, consular dragoman, and élève-dragoman of the legation. (I have just returned from a three weeks' visit to Constantinople, where I have made it my business to book myself on our local civil service.) With regard to the minister, I do not believe that any reasonable man can find any fault. If his position during the Cretan war was anomalous, he had his justification for all he did in the orders of his chief of department and the resolutions of Congress, not to speak of public opinion in the United States, to which any man who intends to return to political life at home must defer his own ideas.* He is incorruptible, a gentleman, a scholar, and in all ways one of the most creditable representatives we have abroad, and not overpaid.

The secretary of legation, acting as dragoman, is an extravagance in the point of view of expenditure. There is no more need of a secretary of legation for this legation than for others of its class, and a better dragoman can be got on the spot for $1,500 a year, or even $1,000, for Mr. Brown by universal testimony is not a first-rate Turkish scholar, a very bad French one, and understands no other language except his own. The offices of secretary and dragoman should be separated if the former is to be maintained—the absence of the secretary at present leaving the minister without assistance, and the irresponsibility of the dragoman to the minister leaving the latter without resource against the misconduct or insubordination of his employee. The charges brought by the minister against his secretary would, in any other service in the world, have secured the latter's dismissal, but in ours are unnoticed. I will give two illustrations. The police having, one night, occasion to repress a row in a house of ill-fame, were silenced and turned out of the premises by the exhibition of a "protection" signed by J. P. Brown, secretary of legation of the United States of America. An Italian subject, named Trotta, an employee of the Porte, being unable to get his pay, the Hon. J. P. Brown drew up a demand in the name of the United States legation (Mr. Morris being in Constantinople at the time), declaring the said Trotta to be an American citizen, and demanding his arrearages as such, and sealed this with the official seal of the legation—which he had no right to use in any case as long as the minister was at hand—on which he recovered the wages, receiving a percentage. It does not seem to me that secretaries of legation of this class are likely to be economical.

* The responsibility to the people alluded to by the Congressman in your No. 212, was probably this sort. A man who is in the civil service for life or good behavior is in no necessity to contribute to election expenses, sign party tests, or sacrifice his ideas of right and wrong to the exigencies of a campaign—he is not responsible to the hacks.

The élève-dragoman is an adopted son of Mr. Brown, and receives $600 a year to enable him to fit himself for a dragoman, and has done nothing towards the education for which he is paid his salary. This is the concurrent testimony of many foreigners of diverse nationalities whom I have questioned with regard to the young gentleman's career. This particular appointment, then, is unwise, and any such appointment is unwise, as the dragoman should always be appointed by the minister and be dismissable by him.

The expediency of having a consulate-general, at $3,000 per annum, at the same place where we have a minister, I much question. We have a consulate-general at Beirut, and it seems to me that one in a country is sufficient. A consulate, at $2,000 a year, should be enough for Constantinople if our present scale of compensation is to be kept up, for that sum will keep a single man from debt or starvation.

The marshal, at $1,000 a year, has had but one act to perform in the term of the present consul-general, which was the serving of a notice on a debtor. The jailor has $800 a year, and the rent of the jail is $600—no imprisonment having taken place in modern times.

We have, then, items to the amount of $5,500 which might be retrenched without any loss to the service—viz., $1,500 on secretary of legation, $1,000 on consul, $1,000 on marshal, $1,400 on jail, and $600 on the aspirant to future diplomatic honors, which, with $600 loss by exchange, makes a total of $12,000 wasted in the Turkish empire. $3,000 of this added to the salary of the minister would enable him to maintain a respectable position without personal pecuniary loss, and leave $9,000 to be carried to the relief of under-paid and necessary officers in other countries; or, supposing no increase of any salary, a sum of about $16,000 greenbacks cut off from the taxes.

At Piræus we have a perfectly useless consulate at $1,000 a year and expenses; while the most efficient and valuable consular officer we have in Greece is M. Sapunzachi, unpaid consular agent at Syra, the only point in Greece where any consular officer is likely to be of use to us. Abolish the Piræus consulate, and establish an unpaid one at Syra, and we can have as good service as we now have.

All of these reductions—or nearly all—have been repeatedly advised by the persons competent, and that they have not been made proves the sheer hypocrisy of all talk of economy as a reason for not reforming the consular service. Yours truly, W. J. Stillman.

UNIVERSALISM.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your issue of September 9 contains a notice of a book soon to appear in England, in the course of which notice occurs the following:

"In Mr. Robert Baxter's 'God's Purpose in Judgment,' it is contended that the theory of the annihilation of the wicked, and the Universalist theory of final eternal happiness for all men, are both untrue. Odder, we dare say, than anything in Mr. Baxter's book is the fact that a citizen of the religious world should think that within that world either of these theories exists in sufficient strength to make it worth while to attack it. Among men who are not to be classed as religious, there is plenty of Universalism in a sense, and there is also plenty of Annihilationism; but as sectarian beliefs neither of these aberrations from orthodoxy is now of any importance at all."

I notice the words here quoted only so far as they concern Universalism. Of the strength of the other "sectarian belief" alluded to, I am not informed.

In a journal which does not promise neutrality but which asserts independence, the general statement in the above extract gives no occasion for complaint, except on the supposition that it is based on a misapprehension of the facts, and so "operates" as misrepresentation, in a sensitive point, of a not very small body of nominal Christians. It cannot take much space to show that the writer quoted is not accurately informed in regard to the present strength and prospects of Universalism. The statement that Universalism is not "now of any importance at all," sounds oddly in the ears of a people who feel very sure that, as a denomination, their strength (not their numbers) has doubled within the last ten years. Twenty years ago, the Universalist denomination did not have, all told, ten thousand dollars in school endowments, and it had neither a college nor a theological school. To-day, it has three colleges, two divinity schools, five academies endowed, and three more in rapid progress, with an aggregate endowment of not much less than two million dollars. Very near half a million was raised for other denominational purposes than the current expenses of Sunday worship and church building within the year ending with October, 1868. Other facts to the same general effect could be given. Possibly, at the very hour in which the paragraph I am noticing was written, one of America's ablest theologians and most accomplished scholars—the Rev. T. J. Sawyer, D.D.—was installed as the head of a new Universalist Divinity School, handsomely endowed, in connection with Tufts College, in Massachusetts. Is it just, therefore, to imply that, however it may have been, Universalism is not now "of any importance at all?"

It is conceded that the numerical progress of Universalism has not been very great. The hostility it at first awakened, and the heroism with which its first preachers defended it, very naturally won the sympathies of the coarser elements of the community—a misfortune which happens to every sect which has to "fight its way." The occasion no longer existing, this accidental adherence has ceased to annoy with well-meant co-operation. The visible effect in some communities is a numerical falling off; the intrinsic result is progress in quality.

Universalists have no wish to suppress the fact that in communities where the common-school has not prepared the way, and particularly in the States long under the blight of slavery, their faith gains no foothold. But in New England—particularly Maine, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island; in New York, save the southern half of the State; in Northern Illinois (certainly not in Egypt); in Wisconsin; and in other communities where the social and mental antecedents are similar, Universalism as a "sectarian belief" has great perceptible strength, and is now of more "importance" than at any former date.

As to the influence of Universalism as a "sectarian belief," just a word: Let a man live awhile in Gloucester or Salem, Mass.; in Woonsocket or Providence, R. I.; in Watertown, Rochester, or Auburn, N. Y.; in Galesburg, Ill., or in any community where Universalism has firmly established itself, and then live awhile in a town or city where Universalism has gained no position—let him do this, and I am confident he will not be long in doubt as to the agency which has taken the sting out of the Calvinistic pulpits, and made orthodoxy so "liberal" that if its friends buried twenty-five years ago could revisit earth, they would not know their own churches or the ones having the old names. G. H. E.

New York City, September 15, 1869.

[There was a time within the memory of men still young when the distinctive tenets of the Universalists were discussed in almost all Northern communities, and not only provoked a great deal of curiosity, and some able controversy, and very much controversy that was not able, but also were accepted by thousands who found in them a means of reconciliation with the Bible, from which they had been repelled by certain portions of the Calvinistic creed then almost everywhere asserted. Universalist doctrine was eagerly offered and accepted, and everywhere in the Northeast Universalist meeting-houses were built in considerable numbers. We suppose "G. H. E." would not deny that there are fewer such meeting-houses to-day than there were then—certainly fewer relatively to the number of other meeting-houses, and probably fewer even absolutely. Universalism, then, at the beginning possessed an importance, as criticism of Calvinism, which it cannot lay claim to possess now that it has crystallized and is merely the "religious views" of a certain comparatively small number of religious people—a certain one among a great many sects of small size. For good or for evil, the main battle between the church and the world is now joined on quite other points than the interpretation of certain texts of Scripture; and sects founded on such interpretations are now of very much less importance relatively than they were say thirty years ago.—Ed. RELIGION AMONG THE AMERICANIZED GERMANS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your issue of the 23d inst., in the article on the "State of Religion in Germany," contains the following: "By-the-by, we wish more was known of the religious condition of Americanized Germans. Who ever hears of religion amongst them at all?" As a single ray of light, in answer to this question, allow me to offer an outline of their relation to but one of the churches of America—the Methodist Episcopal.

Connected with the M. E. Church there are—organized into societies—27,664 Germans. They are further organized into "German Conferences," which are divided into "districts," each of which is under the care of an elder, called from his position "Presiding Elder." "The German work" of this Church, as now arranged, comprises 17 presiding elders' districts and 271 pastoral charges. These are under the care of 303 missionaries, who have the aid of 316 lay preachers. The number of church edifices owned by them is 423, valued at $2,203,061. They paid last year, for missionary purposes alone, $14,405. They have a Church paper and a Sunday-school paper, published at the M. E. Book Concern in Cincinnati, which also supplies them with an abundant literature—like the papers, in their own vernacular. Their Sunday-schools number 480, with 5,113 officers and teachers, and 23,196 scholars, with 608 "conversions" in the last year. While "religious statistics are," in some sense, "always untrustworthy or misleading," yet there is in statistics even that which, the faith being stated, shows how sincerely that faith is received and acted upon. The statistics of labor or sacrifice, or both, in behalf of one's faith, therefore, are generally relied on to show the status of religious life. Now, reaching back, aided by the Church, to the Fatherland, these Americanized Germans have planted in their old homes 37 missionaries, who, having raised up a few lay preachers, are filling 277 preaching-places, and at the close of '67 reported a membership of 5,883, in spite of a loss of 400 the same year by emigration to America. Their Sunday-schools contain 5,868 scholars. They own but 23 chapels, and, for the rest, they preach in the homes of the peasantry, or such halls as can be had. They have a "book concern" in Bremen, which supplies them with, and exports considerably to this country, books, tracts, etc. They also have a Mission Institute, at Frankfort-on-the-Main, for the education of men for the ministry. The number of students in '67 was ten.

So much for the "Americanized Germans" by this Church. Hoping to hear from others, I remain, etc., B.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE INCONVERTIBLE CURRENCY?

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your last week's paper is a sentence which I wish to recall to your readers, because it seems to me to come nearer the point than any other I have seen: "As regards these gold corners, there is absolutely no safeguard against them but a return to specie payments; and of this there is at present no hope, because the country will not submit to contraction, though probably the loss sustained by the corner is treble the cost of going back to the ancient ways."

It is true that there is no remedy but in specie payments, and that these can only be reached through contraction; but is it equally so that the country will not submit to it? I am inclined to believe that the country—excepting, perhaps, Wall Street and the banks—is ready for anything necessary to that end, but that the great want is of a leader. The defect seems to lie in our financial organization, which separates entirely the power and the responsibility. The financial plans are elaborated, and mostly in secret, by the Committee of Ways and Means. This body is composed of members of Congress, under obligations to those who have aided in electing them, and their plans are likely to be so arranged as to secure the support of other members—their work being much facilitated by the fact that they have no immediate responsibility for, and nothing whatever to do with, carrying out the schemes which they propose. Congress has little choice but to pass their measures, because there is no one in the House strong enough to stand alone against the committee.

The plan comes ready-made to the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and he must carry it out whether he likes it or not. He may make suggestions in his annual report, but they have no more necessary influence with the committee than a letter from an ordinary citizen. He may, if he pleases, "lobby" during the session, but that is not a pleasant business in the face of private interests. But even in carrying out the plan, he has not the benefit of a communication with Congress. When that body meets, they will discuss his action as they would an affair in the courts of Europe.

Will you allow me to ask for information whether there is any objection to the Secretary of the Treasury being ex officio a member of the Committee of Ways and Means? or to his being present in the House when that body makes its report, and supporting or opposing the latter as he may think best? or to his being present there subsequently once a week during the session to report progress, answer enquiries, or to ask for further powers? It may be replied that this is contrary to the usages of Congress. But if these usages stand in the way of the proper management of the finances, it seems to me they were "better honored in the breach than in the observance."

It may be said, again, that such an arrangement cannot be easily brought about. It is not to be expected that Congress or Mr. Boutwell will propose it. But if we ever have the fortune to get a secretary with a definite plan in his head, and a resolute will to carry it out, he can easily get some friends among the members to propose a resolution to the above effect which Congress could hardly reject. And then if he should propose a clear and practicable scheme, should demonstrate his ability and willingness to carry it out, and Congress should still reject it, we should then shortly find out whether or not the country refuses to submit to contraction. G. B.

Boston, October 2, 1869.

[The above hits the nail on the head; but even if the Secretary had a seat in the House, as he ought to have, the members would not heed him any more than they now heed the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—the nearest approach to a minister of finance, properly so-called, that we have—unless there were a stronger conviction in the public mind than there now is that there is such a thing as science in finance, and that men who have studied it are authorities in it and ought to be listened to. As matters stand, the committee may produce the most carefully elaborated tax-bill after three months' labor, and any ignoramus in the House who chooses to start up with an axe to grind, or some sensational, half-baked theory to ventilate, has a fair chance of upsetting it all in five minutes. This actually happened last session—General Schenck, the chairman, having been bowled over in a very short debate by some peculiar "views" from General Butler. What we want above all things is a deeper appreciation on the part of the people that study is of importance in politics, and that a man may mean well and yet be a very mischievous person.—Ed. Nation.]

MR. WAINWRIGHT'S PAMPHLET ON JULIUS CÆSAR.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Through the kindness of a friend, my attention has been directed to your criticism, published in the Nation of the 19th of August, 1869, on a small work bearing the title, "Julius Cæsar: Did he Cross the Channel? Reviewed by John Wainwright." The pamphlets reviewed were, as you are aware, written by the Rev. S. F. Surtees, and would seem to have been intended to correct the real or presumed errors of Napoleon III. in his "Life of Cæsar," and all others who hold, or may have held, that Cæsar, in his invasions of Britain, landed on the shore of Kent. The first pamphlet was published in 1866 by J. R. Smith, Soho Square. The second—a reprint from the Doncaster Gazette—appeared in 1868, in reply to the animadversions which were published in that paper. This reprint is entitled, "Julius Cæsar: Showing, beyond a Reasonable Doubt, that he never Crossed the Channel, but sailed from Zeeland and landed in Norfolk." In the last of these two pamphlets, the reverend gentleman endeavors to support his heresy by repeating the theory promulgated in the first, adding therein further evidence in aid of his blunders.

The "Review," as you gratuitously affirm, was not printed in England, but at the establishment of King & Baird, Philadelphia, which is reckoned a good and reliable concern, and is well patronized. The "proof-reading," in this instance, is not satisfactory. Afraid of this defect, I communicated with a house of the former place; but the work being small, together with the cost of postage, trouble, and delay, I was induced to put the MS. into the hands of King & Baird, who had previously done well for me in like capacity.

But there is yet a more extraordinary item demanding attention. To palliate your misconceptions, you charge me with not giving the ideas of Mr. Surtees in his own language: "for he"—the reviewer—"nowhere takes the pains to give it in the language of the writer whom he answers." Now, sir, what are the facts of the case?" In page 13 of the "Review," I remark: "But you, sir"—Mr. S.—"gravely assert that 'Cæsar never set foot at Boulogne or Calais, never crossed the Channel, or set eyes on Deal or Dover, but that he sailed from some place in front of the mouths of the Rhine or Schelde, most probably from a peninsula, formerly the fore-shore of Walcheren, and that he made the coast of Britain in his expedition off Cromer.' Again, p. 52, you"—Mr. S.—"write, 'It was here, at the mouths of the Rhine, on the shores of the ocean, that he, Caligula, gathered up shells as spoils of Britain; then Claudius, no doubt, followed the same course, and sailed from the same port as Plautius, his pioneer, and, as we have already noted, he sailed from east to west'" (Pamph., p. 9). These two citations, like most others, are marked as such by inverted commas, and on the last, and others, the page is also given. For instances, see pp. 14, 33, 47, 56, 65, 69, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, where the very words are, I believe, honestly given. Certainly, you cannot have read the "Review," or, if you have read it, your mental vision must be very obtuse, or some bewildering ignis fatuus has misled your judgment or diverted your attention from the subject under your consideration.

Yours, sir, respectfully, JOHN WAINWRIGHT.

[If Mr. Wainwright will look again at our remarks, he will see that the word language was used in a special connection, and is to be explained by the context. We said: "What real arguments Mr. Surtees advances it is hard to make out from Mr. Wainwright's rambling and many-worded refutation, for he nowhere takes pains to give us the language of the author whom he is reviewing." Supply "of the arguments" after "the language," and our meaning is clear, as we intended to state it; but we confess it was not stated as it should have been. So far as any arguments of Mr. Surtees are brought forward, we gave Mr. Wainwright the full credit, which he deserves, of reviewing them satisfactorily, if in too prolix and desultory a manner. We are sorry to learn from Mr. Wainwright's note that an American printing-office is responsible for the astonishingly bad proof-reading; we had hoped, from the book being published in London, that it was also printed there.—ED. "MANUAL LABOR."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the Nation of the 16th September, there is an article entitled "Manual Labor." In it you say, "It must be admitted there is nothing which everybody in the community—we do not believe this too sweeping an assertion—more carefully avoids, if he can, than manual labor."

Now, I believe and know that "this is too sweeping an assertion;" personally, I do not bear it out, and I know many others who do not. I believe that what you speak of as dislike to "manual labor" is not that, but a dislike to an excessive amount of ill-paid labor; and there is, I fancy, no shadow of doubt that the day "manual labor" shall be fairly proportioned to muscular strength—by this is meant, shall not be so improperly exhausting to the body as to "exercise a deadening influence on the mental perceptions," and shall be better paid than shop-keeping, etc.—we should see "nobody remaining one minute longer than he could help" in those pursuits (without a very strong "vocation" understood).

When I speak of labor properly proportioned to strength, I would say that therein is probably the solution of the "social problem," and that society will perhaps never be at rest or ever work harmoniously until that is done—and done it will be some day, at whatever cost, of "ten hours' pay for eight hours' work," or other thing dreadful to supply and demand and the science of political economy, as far as it has yet got.

Of the "sapient movement to have manual labor made compulsory in our colleges," there is this to be said. Taken as an idea, without entering into detail, has any man lived to maturity, even in this absorbent country, without having said to himself, as he contemplated young men unable to find those coveted "clerkships," and begging, borrowing, and sponging meanwhile, "What a pity this, that, or the other young man or men (the plural would frequently occur) never learned to do anything but keep accounts, spell indifferently, or smile imbecilely over a yard of calico!"

For my part, I do have sincere doubts, in common with "some of the English radicals," whoever they may be, whether there can be such a thing as real culture without manual labor—that is, if real culture be (as I take it) the last polish of a complete and balanced man. I hold none such who has not the sound body to contain the sound mind—indeed, the sound mind can no more exist in the unsound body than good wine can be kept in cracked bottles.

I would also challenge a part of another of your propositions. You say "it is preposterous to pretend that manual laborers are juster, truer, etc., than clerks, lawyers, and shop-keepers." Now, the experience of thirty years' mixing with most classes of my fellow-creatures has fixed the belief in my head that a large class of manual laborers—namely, the skilled mechanics—are actually and measurably "juster, truer, more humane and upright" than certainly clerks or shop-keepers as a class (the lawyers I won't swear to either way); and for this "sweeping assertion" I have this reason: the life of a mechanic (in the same, though a more elementary manner, as that of the man of exact sciences) brings him continually face to face with facts and realities, iron and wood, and to deal with these he has to find out a certain amount of truth and abide by it—little will it avail him, having measured a two-inch hole, to go and vaguely make an inch-and-a-half pin for it; nothing but two inches will do.

Of course, no one pretends that all mechanics are angels, or that there are no failings among the best, or consummate rascals among the worst; but the claim set up is simply that mechanics generally are superior in moral qualities to traders (which is of course a mere assertion), and that there is a reason why this should be so (which is a fact).

Those who speak of labor as a thing naturally repulsive to human nature only express (the commonest form of error) a half-truth. Turning a weighted crank or a tread-mill in a state prison, is undoubtedly (or at least probably) repulsive; but the labor of the mechanic constructing a machine, the carpenter or mason building a house, and many others, has an interest as great in its way (experto crede) as the higher labor of the painter at his easel or the sculptor at his model; and this, in degree, pervades almost all work.

Those who hold this idea of the purely repulsive nature of labor can know nothing of the pride, interest, and pleasure a good mechanic takes in his work—not in the strain on his muscles, but in the growth and completion of the thing he creates. They know nothing of what is meant by the "workman's conscience" (not the theologic article), the satisfaction of which is a recompense for and an inducement to his labor.

L. H.

BARABOO, Sauk Co., Wis.

[Those "who speak of labor as a thing naturally repulsive to human nature" undoubtedly do "only express a form of half-truth;" but this discussion is not about labor in general, but about "manual labor," and the pleasure a mechanic takes in constructing a machine, or a carpenter in building a house, as described by "L. H.," does not flow from the labor of the hands but of the head, and could be and is obtained in a far higher degree than mechanics ever know it by mathematicians, astronomers, and various other brain workers. In fact, manual labor loses its repulsiveness just in proportion to the degree to which it becomes a means of expressing thought.—ED. NATION.]

TWO BLUNDERS BY A. DIEZ.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have been waiting from week to week till your correspondent Carl Benson (whose hand is well able to keep his head) should defend himself from the criticism upon him in the Nation of September 16. As he has not thought it worth his while, will you spare me a corner of your journal that I may correct Mr. A. Diez, lest he in turn "do harm to the reading world at large, as well as grieve the soul of the sympathetic scholar?"

I do not know what Mr. A. Diez means when he talks of "que denoting the subjunctive," but if he means that que does not mean "that" (in the sense of "who"), he is abundantly wrong. Que has almost as great a variety of meanings in Spanish as the verb echar. It answers to the Latin quis, qui, quod, quum, cui, in quo, and quia, not to go further. Its use as a relative pronoun, however, alone concerns us here. Friedrich Diez (the highest authority) would be somewhat astonished at the sweeping assertion of his namesake. He says, "Eine Annäherung dieser Conjunction an die Bedeutung des Relativpronomens, aus dem sie hervorgegangen, ist oben berührt worden. Es giebt überdies verschiedene Fügungen worin sie so entschieden in den Wirkungskreis des Relativs eingreift dass sie überall mit demselben vertauscht werden dürfte" (Gramm. der Roman. Sprachen, B. iii., 362). In English, also, it is indifferent whether we say "he who" or "he that," and formerly "he which" was used—precisely as que is in Spanish. I open a volume of Cervantes at random and find "la desgracia que . . . me sucedió"—"the accident which happened to me." How would Mr. A. Diez translate

"Que el rey que esta casa abriere
A España tiene quemar?"

He is as badly off with his oyera. Everybody who knows anything of the Spanish language knows that this form of the verb was originally a pluperfect, but that it was commonly used as a simple perfect. For example, in another stanza of the same romance which Byron undertook to translate,

"Las cartas echó en el fuego, Y al mensajero matara."

Perhaps Mr. A. Diez will say that this means "should have slain," but he will hardly make a conditional of

"Allí hablara una doncella Que fortuna se decia."

I should say that Mr. Benson's critic knew as much Spanish as Byron, but not so much English, if I may judge by his rendering vierte by "turns." I give him his choice of two French proverbs, thereby showing myself twice as liberal as he was to Mr. Benson—Ne mets ton doigt en anneau trop étroit; or, Ne reprends ce que n'entends. FULANO.

HARVARD COLLEGE, October 1, 1869.

P. S.—I approach a more awful topic. The editor of the Nation is, of course, omniscient. Does he then really think it would make any difference in the asonante whether the word was hablava or hablara?

[It is to be observed Carl Benson reads matava, which agrees with the Spanish text before us. As to the question raised in the postscript, we can only reply, We do. The rule of assonance in Spanish poetry is, that the vowels correspond, while the consonants should be different. The poem observes this rule throughout, except in the asonantes to the proper name Granada.—ED. NATION.]

A MISEMENDATION BY MR. DIEZ.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is not que a relative—masculine nominative relative—as well as a conjunction? And if the conditional (or perfect subjunctive) never has an indicative force, why does Mr. Diez wish to read hablara for hablava? I ask these questions not for the purpose of defending my translation of que esto oyera, which I freely admit to have been wrong, but only to show that his correction of me is quite as slipshod as mine of Byron. Again, it is hardly a fair statement of the case to say that I correct one mistake of the poet and make two of my own. The whole stanza is misinterpreted by Byron. First, the subject of the first line changed; secondly, a full stop at the end of the first line where there is no stop at all; thirdly, the third line connected in sense with the second instead of with the fourth. Finally, in his proposed substitution of hablara it looks as if Mr. Diez was making the very same mistake which he detected in me. Hablara could only be a future or a conditional; and accent, metre, and sense all forbid its being the former.

Is his objection to hablava that it is an imperfect while the sense requires a preterite of some kind? The perfect use of the imperfect is not unusual in the Spanish ballads. In the second stanza of this very one we find:

"Las cartas echó en el fuego, Y al mensajero matava"—

the two stanzas having precisely the same force.

The phrase que lo oyera, que esto oyera, is common enough in the ballads, and sometimes appear in very deceptive positions—e. g.:

"Sayavedra que lo oyera Al moro volvió la cara."

"Sayavedra, on hearing this (such I take to be the exact idiomatic equivalent of the Spanish), looked round at the Moor."

CARL BENSON.

[The publication of the above has been delayed by an oversight. —ED. NATION.]

LITERARY.

MR. J. W. BOUTON, of this city, announces that, in connection with Messrs. Trübner & Co., of London, he will publish next month an octavo volume by Mr. Edward Edwards, entitled "Lives of the Founders, Augmentors, and other Benefactors of the British Museum—1570–1870." This work is said to be based on new researches at the Rolls House, the Department of MSS. of the Museum itself, and in many other places. It will be divided into three books and fifteen chapters, with a postscript on "Reconstructors and Projectors," with lithographic illustrations. Sir Robert Cotton; Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel; Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford; Lord Elgin; Richard Payne Knight; Dr. Charles Burney; Francis Hargrave; Sir Joseph Banks; Thomas Grenville; Mr. Layard, etc., are some of the personages who will figure in its pages. Sixty copies only of the "Lives" will be printed on large and thick paper.——A circular from Prof. F. J. Child, Harvard College, is designed to awaken fresh interest in the objects and achievements of the Chaucer Society of London. We would gladly, if space permitted, reprint this circular entire, but as Prof. Child, who is Honorary Secretary of the Society in this country, offers to furnish full information to whoever applies for it, we will content ourselves with a brief summary of his statements. The Society aims to furnish material "for the construction of a correct text" by publishing parallel texts on the one hand, and on the other "the originals of works which Chaucer translated or imitated, and literary, philological, and other essays pertaining to Chaucer." This divides its work into two branches. In the first, it has actually published Part I. of a six-text edition of the "Canterbury Tales," to wit: the Prologue and Knight's Tale (the six together and also separately); and in the second, a temporary preface to the Tales, by Mr. F. J. Furnivall, a couple of the essays referred to, and Parts I. and II. of "English Pronunciation, with Especial Reference to Shakespeare and Chaucer," by Mr. Alex. J. Ellis. The publication is going forward as rapidly as may be. For two guineas a year, from Jan., 1868, and three shillings for postage yearly, the books will be sent by mail to subscribers in this country. The six-text edition—a large quarto—will have to come in through the Custom-House, but Prof. Child will distribute all copies ordered to his address, charging subscribers merely the duty and cost of transmission. Drafts should be sent to the Society's publishers, Messrs. Trübner & Co., 60 Paternoster Row, or Mr. Furnivall, at 3 Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, London. "For additional security," says Prof. Child, "American members are invited to inform me of their having joined the Society. The attention of the directors of public libraries is especially called to this important enterprise. An immediate increase in the subscription list will greatly expedite the execution of the Society's projects, and equally lessen the expense."——Messrs. A. S. Hale & Co., Hartford, Conn., announce as in press a work by Mr. Augustus Maverick, of the Evening Post: "Henry J. Raymond, and the New York Press for Thirty Years." Mr. Maverick was formerly upon the staff of the Times, and should be able to communicate some interesting reminiscences in both branches of his subject. The volume will contain a portrait of Mr. Raymond, and will be sold by subscription only.

— Massachusetts is about to have a new sort of popular literature, and at the risk of increasing the envy with which she is already regarded, we shall proceed to state what it is. The last Legislature established a State Board of Health, with broad aims and ample powers, which the Governor has recently filled with the most praiseworthy appointments. Drs. Henry I. Bowditch and George Derby have been chosen chairman and secretary respectively, and from an address made by the former at the first meeting of the board we learn the specific duties imposed upon it. These are (we quote Dr. Bowditch): "To take cognizance of everything tending to public health," and, consequently, "to endeavor to eradicate everything tending to public disease and death;" secondly, "to diffuse among the people a knowledge of the means of obtaining individual and public health and of preventing disease;" lastly, "to investigate the effects of the use of intoxicating liquors upon the industry, prosperity, happiness, health, and lives of the people," and to suggest legislation on any or all of the subjects submitted for enquiry to the board. Dr. Bowditch proposes for the diffusion of knowledge the use of the lyceum, "the publication in a compact form and the wide circulation of the pith, so to speak, of our general knowledge on public hygiene," and by brief, business-like, unrhetorical reports annually to the Legislature, "so thoroughly indexed that even the busiest man on 'Change can in three minutes get at the essentials and be prepared to study the details of any part or parts he may wish further to examine." From the known character of the gentlemen composing this board, and the liberty of action accorded them, we venture to predict that their reports will be the most valuable documents which the State has produced since Horace Mann was made Secretary of the Board of Education.

—We have a fresh proof of woman's progress towards self-support and equality as a worker in the tasteful heading of a new German paper, published in this city—another of the New Eras (Die neue Zeit) of which we have already had several in the same language. Miss Alice Donlevy designed, and Miss Laura E. Bower engraved, the heading in a manner very creditable to them, and which ought to serve them as a good advertisement. This incident is the straw which shows which way the paper will set—in the direction of "Equal Rights for all;" and on reading the prospectus we find that the conductors agree with those Radicals who admit no shades in political opinion; that they are opposed to having a President, would make suffrage equal and based on intelligence, including women, that they have peculiar notions on the subject of labor, etc., etc. The first two numbers contain a fair variety of articles on social and political topics and on art, and the beginning of a translation of Ivan Turgeneff's "Assja."

—It is with good reason that, as we have remarked elsewhere, the novelists have begun to afflict their characters with cerebro-spinal disorders. The recent excitement in Wall Street has, we are informed, robbed so many brokers of sleep and thrown so many others off their nervous balance as to demand all the attention one of our most eminent practitioners, noted for his skill in the treatment of these derangements, can give them. We have always thought too little use was made of the medical deus ex machina. In these days of promiscuous travelling in close, unventilated cars and ferry-boats, the small-pox, for instance, is too seldom employed to thwart the crowning of the villain's schemes, or to add another to the true lover's obstacles. Paralysis, again, is an ill-appreciated instrument in the hands of retributive justice, being in fact one of the most dramatic of all, and too common now to excite the charge of improbability. One form of it, too—hemiplegia—affords scope for much subtlety in the management of the plot and for some very startling effects. Thus, we might have the hapless heroine dragged to the very altar and about to be sacrificed to the monster she abhors. Will the mercenary parents not relent? Will the python not relax his coils? Alas! are the gods deaf to the maiden's prayer? The old-fashioned novelist would have stood aghast and said yes! or would have lugged in a policeman in search of the forger; or the missing rival, whose temple was only grazed by the pistol-shot, and who, after being tumbled into the stream, had sense enough, etc., etc. Nowadays, we need merely make the brigand stoop to tie his shoe—apoplexy, paralysis—it is all one—ensues. But it is only partial. It was the right shoe that was loose; it is the right side that is affected. Now, though doctors disagree, it is enough that Broca holds that the organ of speech is located in the posterior part of the third frontal convolution of the left anterior lobe of the brain. Our villain recovers his erect position, but not the control of his tongue. The clergyman asks him if he will take this woman, etc., and he either answers nothing or stammers nonsense. A gleam of hope lights up the face of the despairing bride. They summon a physician: "the ceremony cannot go on." "Thank Heaven!" . . . . . .

— Mr. Dickens did well to allude, at the Oxford-Harvard dinner, to the "Harvard Memorial Biographies" and the test which rebellion applied to the manhood of our colleges—a test beside which the Thames trial was as nothing. Perhaps his appreciative remarks induced a correspondent of the Boston Advertiser to compile from the Harvard "Triennial" of 1869 the war statistics of twenty-five classes, or more properly twenty-one (1845–1865). The members of these numbered in all 1,722, and but two classes exceeded 100. Of these there had died, up to July, 1869, 251—90 having fallen in the service of the United States. Of 527 who had entered it (547, counting the classes 1866–'69), 1845 lost one man in the war to fifteen otherwise; 1848, three men in the war to fifteen otherwise, etc. The war loss creeps up to six in 1852, seven in 1858, and eight in 1859, and then jumps to twelve in 1860. But the percentage tells. 1859 sent 58 men into the service, 1860 sent 58, 1861 sent 54—or, 41.30, 54.20, 68.35 per cent. of their whole numbers; and there fell respectively 8, 12, and 10 men—or, 8.70, 11.21, 12.65 per cent. Let any one consider the character of those who thus sacrificed themselves, and then judge of the loss the country sustained in them. The correspondent adds the following estimates:

Percentage of whole number of graduates for 25 years (1845-69) in the U. S. service during the rebellion	21.22
Percentage of deaths to whole number in the service	16.45
Average number of each class in the service	21.88
Average percentage of each class in the service to the whole number in the class	25.97

The extremes have already been given. The date of the outbreak of the war accounts for the proportion of enlistments from the two classes 1860, 1861. The peace was threatened, if not already broken, before the graduates of 1860 had found their places in life, while the graduates of 1861 had Sumter and the Baltimore mob to fire them, with a still greater uncertainty as to future careers. They were free to choose, and more than two-thirds of the latter took up arms for the Union; and not a few, in both classes—indeed, in all the classes—fought on the other side.

—We have been struck, since the opening of the fall term, with the number and appearance of the college papers which come to us in exchange. Before us at this moment are lying copies of the Harvard Advocate, Trinity Tablet, (Michigan) Chronicle, and Cornell Era; together with the newly started College Review, and the College Courant, which are edited for the sake of all, rather than as organs of any one, of the colleges. The papers first-named may be said to refer to the Harvard Advocate as their ancestor, though the Tablet alone repeats its size. They may all be described as fairly printed on tinted paper, of sixteen pages each, and appearing weekly, fortnightly, or monthly, as the case may be. We believe we have found something worth reading in all of them—perhaps most in the Era and Chronicle, because they admit older contributors or copy articles from outside sources. But the Advocate seems to us the most pleasing reflection of student life and opinion, and in its poetry and jeux d'esprit shows a higher average culture than do the other papers. They all, however, mark a new epoch in college literature, and must eventually drive out of existence the unreal, inflated magazines that ten years ago were alone in vogue. The Review and Courant occupy nearly a common field, or may do so; for it is too early to predict what development the former will take on. As yet but one number has been issued, and that contains comparatively little of the news which probably makes the Courant quite as acceptable in other colleges as at Yale, and of which it gives a great deal from week to week. The September Review has one or two readable essays, more sound, however, than original, and in other respects bears the marks of an inchoate undertaking. Its paper and typography are considerably behind those of the local college papers, which may also be said of the Courant.

—Not only, as it appears, was Mrs. Stowe too hasty in seeking to turn ingenuous youth from the corrupting influence of Lord Byron's writings, and singularly unpractical in striving to do this by means of the most thorough advertising the poet ever got, but her self-appointed defender, Mr. Parton, was quite as much the victim of an à priori judgment. "W. G." (whom we take to be the veteran William Gowans) writes to the Tribune of the 28th that Mr. Parton erred most egregiously in declaring that, except Shakespeare, no poet not living sells per annum in this country so largely as Byron and Scott: "they are chief among the 'staples' of the book trade." In the first place, says "W. G.," there are two copies of Burns sold for every one of Byron; in proof of which he cites his own experience as a bookseller in New York for twenty-five years. He adds that as many as ten editions of Burns, published in America, are now in the market, to only six of Byron; while in importations from abroad Burns is vastly in excess. As for Scott, he sells worse than any modern poet except Wordsworth, and to one copy of his works there are forty sold of Burns's. It being notorious that in some points of character, and those not their best, Byron and Burns bore an unfortunate resemblance to each other, we ought presently to hear of a movement to deprive the latter also of his popularity. As it is, Mrs. Stowe has simply inaugurated a Byronic revival.

—The most interesting by far of English announcements by the last mail was that of a new monthly review, to be called the Academy, of which Mr. John Murray will be the publisher. The first number appears day after to-morrow (9th), the second Saturday in every month being fixed for the regular day of publication. According to the advertisement, the Academy may be defined "a monthly record of literature, learning, science, and art," the second department being introduced less because it really is a department co-ordinate with and not included in the others, than, we suppose, in order to vary the formula which the first-class weeklies have long since appropriated. The London Publishers' Circular says of it that it "promises to fill a gap in the literature of this country; for we hear that it is to be critical without personality, judicious yet not ill-natured, learned and still not pedantic." We italicize the for, inasmuch as we had supposed these conditions to be pretty well met in existing periodicals, as we are sure they were in the too short-lived Chronicle. How much the Academy will resemble or differ from the Fortnightly Review we cannot now determine.

—The memoirs of Mme. d'Épinay have been denied the epithet "historical," for the reason that "they satisfy none of the conditions required to establish the truth, and because they contain demonstrated falsehoods." The inedited works of this equally unprepossessing and unchaste personage have just been published, in two volumes, in Paris. Rousseau, whom she so much befriended before she joined his enemies, and to whom she gave the retreat of the Hermitage to which we owe both other important writings and especially the "Émile," speaks of her dabbling in literature, and of her boring him with recitations of what she had written—"novels, letters, comedies, narratives, and other fiddle-faddle of that sort." Very likely he heard more or less of the contents of volume one, and indirectly inspired them, as they consist of writings composed in a highly moral vein for the education of her son, the young scapegrace who at fifteen would have poisoned his father. This crime has been absurdly laid at the door of Rousseau as if a legitimate result of his tutorship, whereas he had no part whatever in educating the boy, further than by chance to have been present at one of his examinations. Volume two contains Mme. d'Épinay's correspondence, and a series of philosophical reflections, styled "Mes moments heureux," and probably forming part of the "d'autres fadaises comme cela" with which she annoyed Jean Jacques.

—Some person who, perhaps, could not sleep because of the 20,000 francs with which M. Henri Martin has just been decked by the French Academy, has pointed out three errors committed by the historian in two lines of the second volume of his "Histoire de France." It is stated in the passage in question that "Raymond III., Count of Toulouse, received also the oath of Loup Asinaire (Lope Aznar), Duke of Gascony, an aged chieftain, more than a hundred years old, as Richer relates." It was not, however, to Raymond but to King Robert that Loup took the oath, and he is styled by Richer Lupus acinarius, or, as his editor has translated it, Loup Acinaire. M. Martin, not content with his being a wolf, has also, with the aid of a single letter, made an ass of him. And finally, it was the horse of Lupus that was a centenarian: "qui equum ferebatur habere annorum plus quam centum et adhuc toto corpore validissimum." This last is an odd if pardonable mistake, and recalls a similar one committed by Carlyle in his "French Revolution." It will be remembered how frequently he banters Marat with having been the horse-leech of Prince d'Artois, whereas he was merely doctor of the Artois stables, as some other was the doctor of the household. Thiers expressly says of him that "his studies and experiments upon men must have accustomed him to resist the spectacle of suffering." In the next fifty pages, Carlyle also represents the last mistress of Philippe-Égalité to have been "Madame de Buffon—light wife of a great Naturalist much too old for her," whereas she was Buffon's daughter-in law, a young lady of some seventeen summers.

—Something more than a year ago (Vol. VI., p. 287, of the Nation), in a letter on Italian libraries, mention was made of their number and enormous collections of books and manuscripts, and also of the fact, not creditable to the regenerate kingdom, that their resources had fallen off lamentably since the grand-ducal supremacy, and their increase been correspondingly crippled. The feeling to which this state of things naturally gave rise resulted in the appointment of a commission, with Count Cibrario at its head, to devise a scientific reorganization and regulation of the various libraries throughout the peninsula. This commission has just made its report to the Government, and some of its conclusions are as follows:—That the time for a grand universal library such as is maintained in other European countries has not yet come, but that of existing libraries the more important ones should increase their stock from every branch of knowledge, while the minor ones, and especially those in university towns, should expand with special reference to the use of students. In Florence, for example, the Commission recommends that to the National Library (formed in 1862 by the junction of the Magliabechiana and Palatina) be sent the third copy of every publication in the kingdom, instead of being deposited in the general archives, as the law now directs (another copy being due to the royal procurator, and a second to the local library). This already magnificent library the Commission would have still further enriched—but here in common with all other libraries—with copies of all official documents, legislative and statistical. It would unite, while still keeping them distinct, the Riccardiana and Laurenziana, in the same city, and would develop the Marucelliana in the interest of students in the secondary classical and technical schools. All libraries must prepare three catalogues—one alphabetical, one of subjects, and one of current acquisitions. Books may be taken home, with sufficient guaranties for their return, and by order of the minister even manuscripts may be removed, but with extraordinary precautions. When sent abroad, they will pass through the diplomatic channels. Employees are to be selected by competitive examinations, and librarians of the first class will give lectures for practical instruction in the duties of their place, so that persons can more easily train for assistants. Promotion is to be by merit alone, and the pay of librarians increased to what it should be. Such, in general, is the Committee's scheme; but if the Government is to carry it out by compulsion, it will assume a responsibility for the support of the libraries which now rests with the municipal authorities. We cannot undertake to say whether this is a result to be desired or not. No objection, we presume, would be made to an authoritative solution of the difficulties which will beset the making of the catalogues proposed, and which the Commission wisely declined to meddle with.

If there is a historian whom a perfect familiarity with the entire field covered by the struggles of Protestantism with Rome, a most thorough-going study of the diplomatic endeavors and secrets of the houses of Austria and France and of the Holy See in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and an unbiassed judgment combined with critical acumen, have specially qualified to write on the career of Wallenstein, it is undoubtedly Ranke, the author of so many masterpieces on the history, in those ages, of North and South Germany, Southern Europe, France, and the Popes. His new work, though issued in the seventy-fourth year of its author's life, betrays no diminution of the powers which have placed him in the very foremost rank of German historians. In reading it, we admire the depth of research, the wide grasp, the sharp delineation, the classical chasteness of diction, and, above all, the perfect objectiveness which mark the best of his former productions. We find in it, also, his wonted indifference towards minor details, and rigid exclusion of everything sensational. As in his other writings, he addresses himself exclusively to our historical understanding, desirous to augment our stock of knowledge, but not at all to strike our imagination, to move our feelings, or to win our sympathies—be it for a cause or a man—though there is, in the theme before us, a grand cause on one side and a tragic fate on the other. And, indeed, many a reader who expects to find in this history striking sketches of battles and sieges, or elaborate tableaux of generals and statesmen, will be disappointed. Everything not closely belonging to the main task is either excluded or just hinted at; and the task, as the author understands it, is neither a history of that portion of the Thirty Years' War in which Wallenstein acts so prominent a part, nor a psychological biography of that hero. His subject is Wallenstein, as he rises, acts, leads, schemes, diplomatizes, conspires, and falls, in the midst of the grand political and religious complications and conflicts of Europe in the early part of the seventeenth century—an extraordinary man and a most extraordinary historical situation in their action upon each other. This scheme, though thus narrowly limited, is grandly conceived, however, and as powerfully worked up. The situation embraces a continent; the hero mightily grapples with it, and succumbs only to destiny—the historian, almost entirely lifting the curtain that veils the past, shows us both the field and the conflict in their full grandeur.

That great master of the heavenly sciences, Kepler, who, in 1609, calculated the nativity of Wallenstein—then twenty-six years of age—well deciphered the meaning of destiny when he found the stars of September 14, 1583, and traits of character already developed, to indicate gloomy, fermenting thoughts; disregard of laws human and divine; want of love; pitilessness; an impetuous, warlike, and undaunted spirit; a thirst for honor and power; stubbornness and daring, such as form leaders of malcontents; a disposition to make enemies, and aptness to conquer them. Waywardness and military inclinations had characterized his earlier years—a number of which were spent alternately in Protestant and Catholic high schools. Jesuitical influences and the blandishments of Italian culture had divested him—an early orphan—of the Protestant principles and Cechic national spirit which then animated the nobility of Bohemia, to which his parents belonged. Devoid of attachment alike to the faith he now professed and the faith he had abandoned, he fought, under Rudolf, against the Protestants of Hungary, then joined their protector Matthias—the brother of that emperor—and finally followed Ferdinand of Styria, in whom the Jesuits moulded the future extirpator of all anti-Popish heresies. Ambitious, able, and discreet, he everywhere evinced ardor and activity, but, while following others, served only himself. Having inherited the rich Moravian estates of his first wife, he displayed at court the pomp and pride of a magnate, without neglecting, however, carefully to augment his wealth. His services at the rescue of Gradisca, in 1617, placed him in high favor; his star—in which he believed—was rising when, in the following year, the great religious war was opened by the Protestant outbreak in Prague.

The conflagration had spread over Bohemia, Moravia, and Austria when Ferdinand succeeded Matthias on the Imperial throne. Wallenstein hastened to the rescue of his protector, carrying with him the military chest of the Moravian Estates. Abandoned by his warriors, he enlisted fresh troops at his own expense. His Flemish cuirassiers routed Mansfeld's renowned Bohemian cavalry. His own bravery shone bright in the fight, at the Vienna bridge, with Bethlen of Transylvania. He was not personally present, but his regiment did excellent service, in the battle of Prague, which cost Frederic of the Palatinate his electoral as well as his new royal crown, and Bohemia both her liberties and her Protestantism. Gorged with rewards, the fruits of merciless confiscation, he became Duke of Friedland and the richest proprietor in his native country. The principal glory of these first victories over the insurgents and the Protestant Union, however, belonged to Maximilian of Bavaria, the head of the Catholic League, and to his general, Tilly. It was chiefly with the object of counterbalancing their growing prestige that Wallenstein offered and received full powers to raise an army with means advanced by himself. The army sprang up as if by magic, and, after a short co-operation with Tilly in the campaign of 1625 against Christian IV. of Denmark, he defeated Mansfeld on the Elbe, pursued him into Hungary, where he lost a part of his army, however, and soon reappeared in North Germany, carrying the banners of his emperor to the shores of the Baltic and the North Sea, enriching his soldiers and his friends with spoils, eclipsing the fame of his rival, Tilly, driving the King of Denmark to his islands, and occupying Mecklenburg for himself. Stralsund alone resisted heroically. His magnificence was at its zenith; but political intrigues were already working at his overthrow. He was too much hated and feared. His overbearing was revolting, his power and schemes seemed threatening.

The outcry against his way of making war support war was general. Both ally and foe, Catholic and Protestant, called it atrocious. Neither had the purely Catholic element any reason to be satisfied with his successes. He achieved them all in the dynastic, not in the religious interest. His army consisted of a motley crowd of men of all nations and creeds. Protestants served in its highest ranks. The proud generalissimo did not conceal his anti-Popish and anti-Jesuitical feelings. He believed neither in the Virgin—the "Generalissima" of his emperor—nor in her Son, nor in his Vicar; only in the stars, and even this was doubted. He was believed to have said it was time Rome should be sacked once more. He negotiated with Protestant Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and was as ready to negotiate with the neutral Protestant electors of Saxony and Brandenburg. More than that, he hated the Catholic electors, and, most of all, their leader, Maximilian. He had, though in vain, opposed the issue, so much urged by them, of the Edict of Restitution, by which the Protestants were finally to be crushed. He planned the reconciliation of the Emperor with his religious opponents, the extension of his power to almost absolute sway, the restitution of the banished princes, and the exchange of Mecklenburg for the Palatinate, the electoral crown of which had been given to Maximilian. He had made his cousin heir to possessions not rightly belonging to himself. He urged the continuation of the war in Italy against France, in the interests of the all-overshadowing power of the double House of Austria. He also meditated, for it or for himself, the conquest of Constantinople by an adventurous war by sea and land. He diplomatized, negotiated, rewarded, and punished, as if he were an independent prince. All this—and there was hardly an exaggeration in all of it—was urged against Wallenstein by the Catholic electors and the agents of the Pope with persistency, and not without worldly and clerical threats. The former even began intriguing with Richelieu—who had just taken La Rochelle and made peace with England—and, what is stranger, with the Protestant electors, against the Catholic head of the Empire. Ferdinand yielded reluctantly, and against the advice of Spain. The aspect of affairs seemed reassuring. Denmark had been compelled to make peace, the Protestant Union was broken, the mighty Prince of Transylvania was dead. Wallenstein was then deprived of his command, which was given to Tilly. Sullenly he retired to his estates in Bohemia, where he lived in regal, almost fabulous splendor, brooding over schemes of revenge.

Revenge came sooner than he expected. Gustavus Adolphus had just landed—it was in the summer of 1630—on the German shores of the Baltic. Richelieu was his ally. As Wallenstein anticipated, the whole North of Germany, inflamed by the Edict of Restitution, was soon in full blaze of revolt. The Swedish banners seemed to wave everywhere. Tilly was unable to check their advance, but he wreaked his revenge on Magdeburg, which fell before Gustavus approached. But now Saxony, too, joined the liberator; and at Breitenfeld the new generalissimo of the empire suffered his first defeat—a crushing one. The South of Germany lay open to the Swedes, and thither they advanced. Wallenstein alone could save. He alone could stamp a new army out of the ground. But Wallenstein—there is "no doubt about it"—was then hatching treason, and treason on a grand scale. His Bohemian negotiators were in the enemy's camps. He offered to join Gustavus, and with him to settle all the great issues, ignoring both France and the emperor. The task was to drive Ferdinand to Italy, totally to ruin the house of Spain-and-Austria, to uproot "the foes" in Germany, and make Maximilian feel the worst of it. As Mecklenburg was to be restored to its dukes, Wallenstein demanded Bohemia for himself and as his base of operations, in which twelve thousand Swedes were to join him. The scheme was vast, as all of Wallenstein's schemes were—for his boldness and ambition were as boundless as his selfishness and unscrupulousness. But Gustavus hesitated, proposed half-measures, and by so doing repelled the haughty traitor.

To go over at once to the other side was to Wallenstein an equally easy step. He was still in favor with Ferdinand. Spain saw in his removal the frustration of her plans in Italy against France and against the Dutch. Bavaria was under the heel of the Swede. Tilly's sword was broken. Wallenstein could dictate his terms, and he meant to do so. The hand he offered was that of a savior. He meant to command for the emperor and for himself, but no longer to serve. He was determined to make himself master of the situation. And, indeed, Ferdinand easily acceded to all his stipulations. The duke was reappointed Capo d'Armada, with almost dictatorial powers. The emperor vanished behind the general. And with wonderful energy Wallenstein resumed his activity in spite of the gout, which had tormented him for years. With the ready aid of his former officers, he created an army. He opened negotiations all around. Richelieu was to be neutralized by a civil war in France and by the Spaniards on the Rhine. Saxony was to be won over, and all Protestant Germany conciliated by a liberal policy. But the Saxons were first to be driven from Bohemia, which they had invaded, not without secret aid from Wallenstein himself. This was brilliantly achieved, and by it the old prestige regained. Gustavus, however, was long left unmolested, while Tilly vainly perished in Maximilian's defense. The first encounter of Wallenstein with Gustavus before Nuremberg was indecisive. They met again, September 6, 1632, at Lützen, near the field where Tilly had succumbed to the Swede a year before. The shock was terrific, though the armies were small. Gustavus fell, but Wallenstein declared himself vanquished by retreating into Bohemia.

All his thoughts and intrigues were now directed towards the bringing about of a peace, in which he would still play the arbiter, and which would leave him in possession of an almost independent state. To conclude such a peace, the emperor and his Jesuits, whom Wallenstein detested, were to be forced. Secret overtures were made to Oxenstiern and others. Negotiators were not wanting; but Wallenstein was distrusted by both foes and friends. Oxenstiern demanded more decided advances, an overt act, which would serve him as a guaranty. In the meanwhile, the plottings remained no secret. The agents of Spain and Rome were mainly active in tracing and unveiling them. Wallenstein felt the ground to tremble under him. He was gradually pushed down the declivity which led to open treason, and hardly a retreat was left. Nor was there much time to be lost. He was too well watched, snares were laid, and but a signal from Vienna was wanting to destroy him. The spirit of the army was doubtful. After all, it was the emperor's army. He sounded his officers; represented to them that his deposition was again plotted by their enemies, which would ruin the army, the prospects of peace, and the best hopes of the country; and adroitly made them sign a declaration by which they bound themselves to stand by him against all his enemies. This promise, however, did not explicitly imply defection, in case of emergency, from the emperor himself; nor was it given by all in good faith. It was too little for safety, yet too threatening not to provoke the court to extreme measures. Secret orders for Wallenstein's arrest by all possible means were issued. He was to be tried. He learned too late that he had miscalculated his hold on the army. When resorting to open defection, he met with the same. He fled to Eger to surrender that fortress and himself to the Swedes. The fidelity to the emperor of a few Scotch Protestant and Irish Catholic officers, however, prevented this consummation. Acting for themselves, they had him assassinated in the night after his arrival (February 25, 1634). Standing, with outstretched arms, and silent, he received the deadly thrust. The heroic part of the Thirty Years' War was over.

A CLERGYMAN ON PLANCHETTE.*

This book is an attempt to explain spiritualistic phenomena by a supposed peculiar mode of action of nervous force. Dr. Samson brings to the subject the learning of a doctor of divinity, but not the mental discipline which is requisite in scientific research. But the great public do not much respect the opinion of scientific men concerning spiritualism, mesmerism, and other questionable matters. The great public believe that special education so much increases the force of prejudices as more than to outweigh all its advantages. They respect the judgment of a mind which comes fresh to the subject. They desire to see politicians in the place of generals, merchants in the place of statesmen, flatboatmen in the pulpit, and prosperous butchers as chairmen of school committees. Upon a question of international law they attach great value to the views of a clergyman; but a physiologist's ideas of medicine they regard with contempt. Of scientific men, they hold that "repudiating every new suggestion not in consonance with the arbitrary theory in which they have been educated, they superciliously reject all new truths until demonstrated without their assistance by the rough common-sense of the, to them, uneducated world." In point of fact, this is not a truthful epitome of the history of science. The great discoveries of modern physics—the theories of gravitation, combustion, polarization, electricity, and the correlation of forces—belong, without exception, to professional scientists, and their acceptance, if delayed by severe scrutiny, was in no way due to public opinion. Galileo, the last discoverer who was persecuted, was persecuted not by the scientific men, but by that same "rough" common-sense and by the religious timidity of those whose business lay with books and not with nature. It is a mistaken opinion that a special education fosters prejudice concerning the objects to which the education specially relates. It has been said that the clergy have appeared in history as prejudiced upon matters of religion. If this is true, it should be attributed rather to the fact that the faith with which they set out is of the nature of a prejudice—as the theological phrase is, un préjugé légitime—than to their having pursued their studies so far. On the contrary, the frequent occurrence of new and heretical doctrines among theologians shows that this study, like all others, tends to free the mind from the rule of passion. Of course we do not say that heresies are the ultimate result of theological enquiries. If all investigation did not tend to produce at last a settled conclusion and a catholic consent, the human mind would be a worthless instrument. This final conclusion, when it is reached, is mistaken by the unlearned for a prejudice, because they have themselves no fixed opinions of which they can give any rational account. There is some excuse for such a feeling on the part of mere idlers, but there is none for those who really have a special training in one department and who overlook its necessity in another. With what reason can a banker, for example, who would think a man of science excessively rash who should invest his money upon the strength of such observations and inferences as he could make for himself,—with what reason can he think himself more competent to enquire into the causes of a natural phenomenon than those who devote their whole lives to fitting themselves for such investigations?

In order to illustrate the folly of the attitude which ignorance assumes towards science, it will be useful to repeat the history of Hedgcock's quadrant. This instrument is not now in use, but in 1857 it made much noise in Boston. The peculiar merit claimed for the invention was that the navigator could sit comfortably in his cabin, and, by simply observing with it upon a candle instead of a heavenly body, could at once read off from one arm the sum of his latitude and longitude, and from another his latitude, which, subtracted from that sum, would give his longitude. It would not be easy to invent a pretension quite parallel to this, in respect to the immense mass of exact observation already in our possession which goes directly to refute it. It would, for example, be less absurd to maintain that lead is ten per cent. heavier in winter than in summer. However, the instrument was exhibited to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and a committee was appointed by them to report upon its merits. This committee examined it, and reported that it was directly contrary to a vast experience; but they declined to travel with the instrument in order to test it. This declination at once raised a storm in the newspapers, which forgot that if scientific men are to be regarded as competent to conduct an investigation into a quadrant at all, they must be allowed to be the judges of what should and what should not form a part of such investigation. But for some weeks the papers were filled with denunciations of scientific obstinacy, and several high naval officers and other gentlemen well known in the community came out in support of the quadrant with letters over their own proper signatures, which do not read very wise twelve years after. For example, the scientific committee having said that the changes of direction of a ray of light by refraction and reflection were the same for polarized as for unpolarized light, Commander John A. Winslow, in the Boston Courier of April 20, 1857, said, "Let me tell them that Fresnel would blush to hear a committee termed scientific make such assertions, which a few experiments by him would falsify." Another writer announced that "the practicability of this new quadrant has been established beyond a cavil." Another: "We do not doubt that the whole Academy will get a lesson from this quadrant worth remembering." The scientific men did not retort. It was curious how committees not scientific reported in favor of the new invention. Commander French and Mr. Spear obtained the differences of latitude and longitude between Boston, Albany, New York, and Springfield "with a remarkable degree of exactness," according to one gentleman; "to a very nice degree of accuracy," according to the other. A committee of shipmasters obtained the sum of the differences of latitude and longitude between Boston and Salem as 21′, which is very nearly correct. Messrs. R. B. Forbes, French, and Hedgcock, with two instruments, got the sum of the differences of latitude and longitude between Annapolis and Boston as 9° 10′ and 8° 55′, the truth being 8° 47′, according to Mr. Forbes. Other instances were reported, but not so well attested. A little over a month from the beginning of the great excitement on the subject it suddenly died out, and this great invention, which was to be one more illustration of the opposition of scientific men to all new discoveries, was lost sight of for ever.

Spiritualists and men of science are fully agreed upon one point in opposition to Dr. Samson—namely, that spiritualistic experiments betoken an intelligence which must be attributed to some mind, and that they differ toto cœlo from every effect of a purely physical or nervous force.* This mind belongs either to the persons in the room or to disembodied spirits. The latter hypothesis is consonant with the religious belief of some persons; but it is out of harmony with all the most accurate experience of nature. The former hypothesis requires the supposition of such errors of observation as few persons can believe possible except those whose profession has required them to make a thorough study of such errors. This hypothesis also requires the supposition of cheating. In the case of professional mediums, this is not a violent supposition; especially as the jugglers tell us how these persons perform their experiments, and the electricians have for sale the apparatus which they say they supply them with, and as they have been repeatedly exposed. But it is a harsh supposition when it comes to be applied, as it must be, to ladies of the highest respectability, who are warmly esteemed by their friends, and who have great tenderness of feeling. A considerable degree of success upon the planchette can no doubt be explained upon physiological principles, without the necessity of supposing lies. But not all. And there is reason to fear that many girls are insensibly betrayed, by the planchette and "responding tables," into a crime whose magnitude their slight intellectual development does not enable them to estimate rightly.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR.†

"My Daughter Elinor" deserves the credit of being an ambitious, and in some measure successful, effort to delineate a kind of social life which American novelists have seldom undertaken, and in which they have still seldomer achieved any appreciable successes. The American novel has generally wrecked itself—we are speaking of it now simply

The Phenomena of Responding Tables and the Planchette, and their Physical Cause in the Nervous Organism, illustrated from Ancient and Modern Testimonies. By G. W. Samson, D.D., President of Columbian College, Washington, D.C." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.

* We have known a young lady to be so impressed with a planchette's divulging her secrets that she thought it must be—electricity. What was needed for such a mind was not an argument, but an education.

from the artistic point of view—on the rock of great moral ideas, and subordinated the study of character and the delineation of life as it lies before one's eyes to the expression of "views" on this, that, or the other religious or humanitarian theory of life; or else, having no views to advance and few ideas to express, it became a thin, vapid, colorless rehash of the ordinary English novel of society. With the exception of Mr. Henry James, jr.'s half-dozen social sketches, we do not recollect until now any very successful effort to study American life simply for its own sake. We do not, of course, intend to place "My Daughter Elinor" on a level with Mr. James's work—which, slight as it is, always shows a command of materials, a conscientious workmanship, and a subtle perception of character and motives which this novel, although elaborated with a rather too perceptible effort, never exhibits. Still, it is an attempt in the right direction—the direction, we suppose, in which the "great American novel," when it comes, will also have to follow. That is to say, the telling of its story for its own sake, and the development—or, rather, in this case, the display—of its characters, form its only and sufficient motive. Then, too, it has eschewed, though not with too evident an omission, the particular types of American life which have been most often insisted upon by our own and foreign novelists and playwrights. The Yankee is not brought into prominence—neither the mean, close-fisted Yankee, nor that other, whom we all know so well, who landed on Plymouth Rock, built Boston, and civilized the Great West. It has no place, either, for the Southerner of the chivalrous or unchivalrous description; nor for the Bostonian, metaphysical, philosophical, and also a trifle provincial. It does not touch the Woman Question, either to praise or blame; it spends no time in speculating on the influence of race on moral and mental peculiarities; and is only slightly troubled by Calvinism. Its rather strongly High-Church tendency is merely the right thing in the right place, as far as the object of the book is concerned, and gives, we suppose, another touch of verisimilitude to the picture.

These are all negative merits, it is true; but then one had begun to believe either that the American mind was so subtle and far-reaching that, like "Sordello," it could not touch one thing without stirring everything that had even the remotest connection with it; or else that, having seen a certain method tried with some success, it was never likely to occur to it that there could be any other productive of good results. It is something to have perceived that, for the purposes of a society novel, the life of the wealthier classes of New York and Washington, as being less provincial and less given to notions and "isms" than New England life, either in city or village, offered some promising material, and that political and financial crises afforded a newer and more suggestive field for lively writing than theological dogmas, the burden of which is no longer very severely felt, or than social questions which are rapidly settling themselves without attracting overmuch attention from "society."

Passing, however, from the negative to the positive merits of the novel, the author seems to have a better than ordinary knowledge (we are still comparing him with native workmen) of what one may call the mechanical part of his craft. He makes the necessary changes of scenes and characters without awkwardness, his puppets do not creak audibly, and he knows how to make small-talk which is often lively and effective. One or two of his characters, also—notably the heroine—are well conceived and well sustained, the story is well enough contrived for his purpose, and the moral tone of the book is not open to objections. It suffers, however, in some degree from its excessive length, and to a much greater one from the author's desire to be always lively, effective, and brilliant in his style. Brilliant, however, he never is, but, on the contrary, often slipshod, always self-conscious, and sometimes even boisterously loud. His funny characters have, too, the great disadvantage of suggesting Dickens, to their own loss, and of depending for their amusing qualities upon exaggerations and mistakes, and not at all upon wit. They are, in fact—Mrs. Piffitt, the Idol, Tad, and all—only somewhat course caricatures which seldom have the merit of suggesting actual types. Some of Mrs. Hackett's earlier blunders are nevertheless to be called amusing; they grow too frequent and too much alike as the book goes on. The author has, too, a bad habit of emphasizing his jokes and bright sayings by putting them in capital letters and by harping on them. The worst of it is that the jokes are not really very good ones in the first place, being apter than not to consist in rather obvious nicknames—thus, for instance, he has a trick of calling his pair of married lovers "the Doves;" his broker is always "the Bull," and when at home "goes lowing about the home pasture;" and Mrs. Hackett, having once been compared, on account of her gorgeous dress, to an Indian idol in good repute among its worshippers, is ever after "the Idol." But these, after all, are minor matters; and, on the whole, we are disposed to be grateful for an honest and painstaking, even if not altogether successful, attempt to delineate American society.

By the way, what the doctors are telling us about the changes which are occurring in the types of disease at the present day, and the increasing prevalence of nervous and brain diseases, seems to have been seized upon by the novelists as affording some fresh material. This is the third novel of the season—the other two were foreign; the one German, the other English—in which we have found the gradual approach of paralysis and the notation of its symptoms to be rather effectively used. The hectic cheek and the hacking cough which used to heighten a heroine's beauty and deepen a reader's sympathy begin to give place in interest to a numbness in the cerebellar region, a stinging pain along the spine, and certain accompanying mental aberrations. The average novel-reader, who must in his time have wept over more interesting consumptives than he will care to remember, will probably rejoice in the change. The medical journals do the thing with a more scientific accuracy, no doubt, but they can seldom lay claim to much dramatic interest, and are not apt to concern themselves about scenic effects.

The Week.

ON a comparatively light vote, but, so far as now appears, by majorities not proportionally light, the Republicans seem to have carried both Ohio and Pennsylvania. This removes Pendleton and Packer from the field of possible candidates for the Presidency, and is good for Hoffman—a politician worse and more dangerous, as we believe, than either. Also, it finally disposes of repudiation, and, doubtless, ensures Ohio's renewed ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment.

Mr. G. W. Curtis, General Robinson, and another, having declined to hold their places on the Republican ticket in this State, it had to be remodelled. General Sigel now appears on it for Secretary of State, and Mr. Horace Greeley as Comptroller. Both have accepted. Mr. Greeley, in a leading article in the Tribune, in which he testifies to his own devotion to the cause of equal rights, points out that as long as the Fifteenth Amendment is not adopted, the struggle is not over; and expresses his fears that, this being an "off-year" in politics, the Republican vote in the State may not be as strong as it ought to be. Whatever want of zeal there may be amongst the Republicans, however—and it must be confessed they do not seem particularly zealous—is due partly to the feeling of doubt which prevails whether any successful head can be made hereafter against the Democratic frauds in this city. The plan the leaders hit on last year of having the number of votes required telegraphed from the country districts to the city before the canvass was over, worked to perfection. The necessary majority was produced to order; and now as large a one of course could, and probably will be, manufactured again if necessary. The men and machinery for the job still exist, and are now more audacious and dexterous than they were last year. Moreover, the danger of any legal punishment diminishes every year, as the bench passes more and more under the control of Tammany. The Union League appointed a committee to investigate the frauds, and it was composed of very respectable gentlemen; but putting them in pursuit of Tweed, Sweeny, and Co. was very like sending a mastiff to catch hares. Of course nothing came of the enquiry; and the question what is to be done remains for discussion the same as ever.

In Tennessee, just now, the Radical Republicans are affording us a spectacle that has been on the bills for a long time—the reaping of the whirlwind after the sowing of the wind. The Legislature which Governor Senter said he believed would meet at once and ratify the Fifteenth Amendment, has met, and shows just as much intention to do that, or anything like it, as the Governor probably expected it to show. It has behaved with rather less than the degree of dignity and sense that Tennessee legislators and statesmen have been in the habit of displaying to us. On the first day, a bill was introduced abolishing all the courts. This was to get out of office an obnoxious Radical judge. Other bills were for the repeal of every act passed during the last four years, for the repeal of the statutes concerning education, for the convening of a new constitutional convention, and, generally, for a thorough sweeping and garnishing of the political house, and apparently for its repossession.

Meantime, outside of the Houses, the members are even busier than inside, Mr. Andrew Johnson being in a state of high activity, canvassing with great ardor, and with all the skill of a veteran honey-fugler and inveigler. It would be a great pleasure to observe him closely between now and next Tuesday. He reports himself confident of success, and the most that his antagonist, Etheridge, can say to the contrary, is that he thinks he can make the fight so hot for the venerable Ex-President that that gentleman's friends will have to drop him and take up a third man. So we may see Senter slipping in after all, and getting the reward of his treachery—a worse thing than having Johnson. Further South, the only political activity is in Mississippi, where Judge Dent and General Alcorn are "stumping" in company, which looks a hazardous thing for Dent to do, as Alcorn is understood to be a good speaker of the stentorian and fluent Southern type, while the judge is not an impressive person in manner or appearance. The latter declares, however, that he is certain to be elected. In this opinion, however, he is probably mistaken. The regular Republican platform is as liberal as his, and his success would be a Democratic success obtained under false pretences, or else it would be merely the success of the President's relative.

It is, by the way, not a little curious that the Southern gentry, who used to vaunt their independence and pride, are so ready to truckle to men in authority. It was very noticeable in 1865, and later, when what "the President" said and did had more weight with the Southern leaders of opinion than the action of Congress, and when their blind obedience to Mr. Johnson led them to take without flinching the bitterest and strongest pills, such as the repudiation of the rebel war debts, and also to indulge in futile opposition to such comparatively mild medicines as Congress proposed. So, too, every military officer in authority in the Southern country could tell dozens of stories in illustration of this rather unexpected trait. The selection of Dent by the Mississippians was an illustration of it. And in Virginia it has been very plainly exhibited during the last political campaign. Indeed, the sullenness of the Virginians since Appomattox, as well as that of Southerners generally, is, as we have said, not to be attributed so much to their traditional pride as to the fact that they took Mr. Johnson's orders with regard to what they were to do. It was a pride that did not ape humility, but was humility, or servility. The Wells men in Virginia are not to be called conservatives or aristocrats, to be sure, but they also, just recently, have been displaying their respect for rulers. General White, who is one of their favorite candidates for the Senate, is to be dropped, it is said, because if he should be sent up to Washington Butler would be offended, the latter general having once been challenged by the former and having declined to fight, but probably not therefore meaning to say that he had the best of good-will towards his challenger. The Virginian Legislature has without delay ratified the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, and talks of pledging itself to ratify them over again after all doubts of its right to do so shall have been removed by the Congressional admission that Virginia is once more a State in the Union. The Wells men have petitioned General Canby, but he will not exact the iron-clad oath; and they make various threats, as of appealing to Congress; but they act with the Walker men, and the latter feel perfectly secure, as no doubt they may, the "Southern Radical" and the "Impeachment Radical" being practically things of the past.

Ex-President Pierce died last Friday at his home in Concord, New Hampshire, at almost the end of his sixty-fifth year. His death is not a public calamity or loss, nor will it much touch the popular heart, for of late years more than the usual obscurity that is the lot of Presidents out of place had fallen on him, and he was never widely beloved outside of New Hampshire, nor there so much beloved of late years as formerly. There has, however, been very little of the harshness shown in judging him which would certainly have been dealt out in heaped measure had he died ten or twelve years ago. He was then thoroughly hated or despised in the North; and the South, without hating him, despised him as a worn-out tool. No one now would say that either the hatred or the contempt was wholly deserved. An unlucky President he certainly was; but neither so ill-meaning nor so weak as he seemed when Cushing, Davis, Marcy, Guthrie, and Douglas were around him, and he was doing not so much what any of these prompted as what his father Benjamin—a worshipper of "the Union," "first, last, and all the time"—had taught him on the Hillsborough farm. Personally, the Ex-President was very kind-hearted and possessed of much tact. All New Hampshire, it is said, used to call him "Frank," and it is averred that nearly every able-bodied male of that State went on to Washington when he became President, assured that so good a fellow would not refuse any of them an office. His personal popularity rather declined afterwards, but he still was well liked, as he deserved to be. Perhaps to this quality he will owe his longest remembrance, and, as the roll of Presidents increases in length and surpasses the powers of human memory, the "most available" of them all may be recollected only as the one of them who attached Hawthorne to himself as a warm and life-long friend.

Mr. Greeley and Professor Perry have had an oral discussion on free trade and protection before a "fair audience" in Boston, Professor Perry opening. The antagonists were very courteous, not to say complimentary, to each other, and appear to have said many good things; but, in the absence of a full report, general criticism is, of course, out of the question. It may be observed, however, that, useful as such debates may be in exciting interest in a subject, they are not, we think, on the whole of much value in the formation of public opinion, because—and in saying this we make no reflection on the powers of either Mr. Greeley or Mr. Perry—the cause, on one side or other, is sure to suffer from the want of rhetorical skill or readiness of its advocate. A man can make up for his natural defects by careful preparation, if he has only to make a statement or general argument, but if he has to reply to an opponent on the spur of the moment, he may have the better case, and yet make the worse figure. In the present instance, some of Mr. Greeley's positions, if he is at all correctly reported, would surely be revised if taken up in his closet. When he says that "an advocate of the slave-trade was never known who was not a free-trader at heart," he must mean, in order to make the observation of any value, that there is something in free-trade views which disposes the men who hold them to look favorably on slave-trading, which, if true, is literally a horrible revelation, for some of the most eminent philanthropists and reformers of all civilized countries are free-traders. If they really secretly favor the "man traffic," it is safe to say there is no hope for mankind, and the wholesale appropriation of the species by that arch-free-trader, Satan, is but a question of time. Nothing is more certain than that, if he is obliged to carry off economists of his own school, like John Bright, for instance, or Michel Chevalier, he will be so irritated that he will not be very particular about picking up protectionists also on his way home, and, once in his clutches, there will be very little use in any one's citing Henry Clay or Henry C. Carey to him.

The discussion about the connection of the President with the Gold Corner has made no progress of any interest. The Sun is still, as far as our knowledge goes, the only paper which has made the charge, or given any countenance to it, and that paper makes it in a style which deprives it of all weight, and the controversy has now, in its hands, sunk into a discharge of rather silly billingsgate at the city papers, Democratic as well as Republican. It has, however, succeeded in fastening some very damaging imputations on Mr. Corbin, both with regard to his career as Clerk of a Congressional Committee, and to his connection with the Gold Ring, to which as yet Mr. Corbin, being, we believe, ill, has made no reply. There were, as we have said, some features in the gold crisis which pointed to the connection with it of some Government official. These ought to have been investigated, but the affair having been converted into a wild, rancorous, personal attack on Grant, all decent men are by this time so disgusted with it, that it will probably die out in a few days, to everybody's joy, without leaving anything behind but a few worn-out epithets, a few handsful of editorial hair, and a bad smell.

It may be said without exaggeration that any large employer of labor who makes an honest attempt to give his workpeople an interest in the results of their labor contingent on the success of the business, or, in other words, admits them to modified partnership, does more for the elevation of the working-classes, and the settlement of the labor problem, than all the talkers and writers on the subject put together. Professor Beesly and other Comtists hold, we know, that the army is the type on which labor must be organized; but to organize an army you have to have a power outside to enforce discipline. Labor is at present organized on this model, but for want of a "mutiny act" the result is simply a body of disorderly and mutinous militia. We have more than once spoken of the great success which has attended the experiment made by the Messrs. Briggs at their colliery in Yorkshire. Other firms have tried it, but it has been found in practice that it works well or ill according as the value of the labor in the enterprise bears a small or a large proportion to machinery and raw material. It is now about to be tried by the Messrs. Brewster, the carriage manufacturers, in this city; and if in a business of this kind it can be made to work, it is hard to see why it may not be indefinitely extended. One of the great advantages which these "industrial partnerships" possess over ordinary co-operative associations is that they secure the services of a skilled and interested capitalist as superintendent; and they at the same time supply—what is one of the most valuable features of the co-operative associations—the admission of the workmen to a knowledge of the relations of labor and capital to profits, and of the various conditions on which the success of industrial enterprises depends.

The news from Spain seems to be about as bad as possible. There are partial risings of the Republicans in every direction, and these are suppressed by the Government with sanguinary energy, but apparently without restoring order. The constitution is suspended, and there are now fears of an outbreak at Madrid, where the great body of the volunteers, who secured arms from the arsenals in the first days of the rising against the Queen, are either hostile to the Government or suspicious of it, and could, if fairly roused, precipitate a bloody struggle in the capital, which would, however it might end, leave behind few traces of the constitutional régime. The one chance for the establishment of a popular government in Spain on a truly liberal basis lay in breaking up the association of violence and bloodshed with political changes which has for so long been the curse of Spain. The accomplishment of measures of reform without fighting or rioting would probably have enabled Spanish liberty to reach the dry land, but the Republicans seem to be determined to render this impossible by resorting to fighting on every possible opportunity. Even if they triumph in this way, which is not likely, their rule will last just long enough to enable some "chief of their choice" to get hold of the army, and cut the throats of his colleagues, or send them to the Canary Islands. If they do not triumph, they will probably be treated to martial law for an indefinite period, and then good-by to the republic and even constitutional monarchy.

The Spanish Government, it is said, seriously talk of the Duke of Genoa, a nephew of Victor Emanuel, who is now at school at Harrow (England), and lives in Matthew Arnold's house and under his care, for the vacant throne, and as nobody else offers, his chances may be said to be as good as anybody's, and better. The English papers make the mention of his name an occasion for pointing out that we may soon have a chance of witnessing the effect of "sweetness and light" on a reigning monarch. If the young man obtains the crown, however, he will probably display the effects of the training of an English public school more prominently than anything else, and whatever its faults may be for ordinary people, better training for a prince could hardly be imagined.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune describes the malady with which the French Emperor is afflicted, as well as the expedient, resorted to by the Emperor to conceal the knowledge of it even from his medical attendants and servants in its earlier stages, with a minuteness which suggests the supposition either that the writer has "interviewed" him on the subject of his bodily infirmities, or, what is far more probable, was under the bed when the deluded monarch was, as he foolishly imagined, privately doctoring himself. But then a good deal of the Tribune's foreign intelligence is startling. It has had, within the last two years, private, exclusive, and early information of the near outbreak of one great war between Russia and Turkey, which it assured us would end in a general European conflagration; and also still more private, more exclusive, and excruciatingly early intelligence of a "triple alliance" against the United States on the part of France, England, and Spain. It now informs us "authoritatively" that the Emperor is afflicted with a painful disease of the bladder, and describes with great power the effect of such diseases on the nervous system. This, however, has been for some time no secret; what was a secret, however, but which the Tribune has revealed, is that in the earlier stages of the malady the Emperor burnt his back along the line of the spine with a lighted candle, by way of counter-irritation. As this, as we have said, was done for the express purpose of concealing his symptoms even from trusted friends, it shows the power of the press in these days that even a mighty monarch cannot cauterize his own back without the reporters knowing it.

Still, it is certain that Napoleon's symptoms are grave, that his complete recovery is out of the question, that his death may occur at any moment, and that it is more and more evident that he has not succeeded in rooting his dynasty in French soil. The knowledge of this, which must become clearer to him every day, of course not only aggravates his disease, but probably unsettles his counsels and infuses into his policy toward the Liberals that vacillation and irresolution which have for some months back been both encouraging and irritating them. The abuse heaped on him and his surroundings by the newspapers is perfectly ferocious, and something the like of which has not been witnessed in France since the Restoration, their long repression and the splendid success of Rochefort having apparently either relieved the journalists of all scruples, or else destroyed such traditions of decency and self-restraint as they were once ruled by. The Liberal members of the Corps Législatif are in the meantime growing restless and defiant under the failure of the Government to convene the Lower Chamber; and M. de Kératry, who is not a Red by any means, declares that if the Emperor delays calling the Corps Législatif together longer than October 25, he will violate the constitution and relieve the members from their allegiance. Others talk in the same way, but there is a division of sentiment amongst them as to the policy to be pursued. Some are willing to wait for the Emperor's death to put an end to the empire; but others, and amongst these are many of the ablest and wisest men, believe that to have him die on the throne would be a terrible misfortune for France, as it would, to all intents and purposes, put the seal of success on his usurpation, and thus afford an example to other traitors and pretenders which, as long as the standing army lasts, and the political education of the people is as backward as it is now, would keep any government that might succeed him in constant peril.

It having been frequently made a reproach to the Empire that it drove the literary class into hostility to it, the Pall Mall Gazette calls attention to the fact that the literary class has been opposed to every government which has existed in France since the days of the Encyclopœdists. Louis Philippe disarmed them for a while by putting their chiefs in office, but they went at him again as vigorously as ever towards the close of his reign, when the novelty had worn off; but no government has encountered fiercer hostility from it than the present one. The literary men have for some weeks past made a feint of fearing another coup d'état; and some of the papers profess to be greatly relieved by the despatch of General Fleury to St. Petersburg as ambassador. This incident admits of two constructions, both favorable to the Emperor. Fleury was a soldier of fortune, of bad reputation, as all readers of Kinglake know, and figured largely in the coup d'état, doing some of its most desperate work—having, according to one report, held a pistol to Marshal (General) Magnan's head—and has since been the Emperor's confidential man; therefore he would not have been sent away if anything audacious or dreadful were in contemplation. On the other hand, Fleury is said also to have been a warm supporter of the concessions of January 19 and July 11; and, therefore, his elevation to a first-class foreign mission from the comparatively humble one of superintendent of the government haras, may be taken to indicate imperial approval of his recent political position. The fact seems to be that the rapidity and magnitude of the recent reforms is due in great part to the desire of the old adherents of the Empire to provide for their future while it is yet time. It is evident the Emperor cannot last long, and that his system will not survive him; and, accordingly, the swarm of his creatures who now fill fat offices are beginning to look after their own safety by making peace with the democracy.

Probably the happiest man in Europe to-day is the Pope. He believes in himself with a fervor and confidence which the rest of the higher clergy can hardly be supposed to feel; and this, and his ignorance of the world and its ways—or, in other words, of the condition of European society—prevent him from seeing any of the difficulties and dangers to the Church by which other minds are troubled. The pantheists, and materialists, and rationalists, who are alarming ecclesiastics of less simplicity, are to him so many corpora vilia on which the Church is to exhibit its power; and with them, as with the renegade governments, he is said to believe the Council completely sufficient to deal. He has, in the plenitude of his good humor, even replied to Dr. Cumming, the great Protestant bore, and graciously informs him that the heretics will be allowed to come in and submit themselves at the Council, but not to argue; and the Doctor is apparently nearly as much pleased by being answered at all as if he were in the fourth hour of his refutation of Popish doctrine before the Council itself. In the meantime, the heavens look dark everywhere out of Rome. The address of the German Bishops at Fulda, Montalembert's letter, and Father Hyacinthe's revolt, are evidently producing a profound impression all over the Continent. The Bishop of Orleans has tried on Father Hyacinthe a loving letter of rebuke, but has received a haughty reply; and the Father is said to be on his way to this country—possibly to study the working of "a free church in a free state," now the ideal arrangement of the religious democrats of Europe. What is deceiving the Ultramontane party and lulling them into a false security, is the non-appearance of any tendency to formal secession from the Church. But we shall probably, no matter what changes occur in religious opinion in our time, never witness anything of this kind on a great scale again. Men do not now give up a religious belief and go out of their church to the sound of the drum, and slam the door behind them with a bang, and set to work to found another, as they did in Luther's day. They simply go home disgusted, and quietly stay there.

"THE MAIN QUESTION."

Over three hundred citizens of Philadelphia, probably as good a representation of the intelligence, virtue, and patriotism of the city as could be produced, the venerable Horace Binney heading the list, have signed an address to the members of Congress for the city, calling their attention to the Jenckes bill for the reform of the Civil Service, and asking for it, or something similar, their zealous support. We have not yet seen a more powerful summing of arguments in favor of this reform, and shall therefore depart from our usual custom, and quote it nearly entire:

"It will be seen that the effect of this measure would be to assimilate the civil service of the country to its military service, requiring evidence of competency before appointment, assuring continuance of office during good behavior, and stimulating efficiency with the prospect of promotion. Its result would speedily be to create an esprit de corps and a sentiment of honor, which experience has shown to be among the strongest securities for fidelity; while liability to dismissal for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or dishonesty would ensure the best exertions of every officer.

"We do not say that this particular bill is the best that could be devised for the purpose. Possibly the wisdom of Congress may improve it in many particulars, but we believe that we speak the sentiment of the community at large when we declare that some such measure is the imperative necessity of the time. It is now more than thirty years since the demoralizing doctrine was promulgated that the public offices were spoils to be divided among the victors of a political contest, and so thoroughly have our political soldiers of fortune adopted the idea that they have had the boldness to declare rotation in office to be one of the essentials of a democratic republic. It should seem that the mere statement of such a principle ought to be sufficient refutation of its wasteful and criminal absurdity, and yet the public has tamely submitted while the evil has yearly grown greater, until its gigantic proportions now threaten to reduce our public service to chaos and to subvert our institutions at no distant period.

"It may safely be affirmed that no civilized community has a public service so costly and so incompetent as our own. Appointments, made solely with a view to political advantage, place in office men notoriously unfit for their positions or unworthy of trust; and these men, knowing that their retention of place is in nowise dependent upon the faithful discharge of duty, devote themselves to electioneering and wire-pulling, to the neglect of their proper functions. In many cases, knowing the uncertainty of tenure, they eagerly abuse their positions to plunder the public and the Government. Thence arises not only the multiplication of offices beyond all proportion to the work to be done, but the abuse of those offices to illicit gain, until the fearful aggregate of unnecessary salaries is the smallest part of the pecuniary loss to the taxpayer. There may be exaggeration in the statement that from one-fourth to one-third of all the revenues paid by the community fails to reach the treasury; but the mere fact that such a statement can be made, with even an appearance of truth, reveals the demoralization of the service.

"Yet the country is prosperous and thriving, and can afford to support a host of wasteful and dishonest officials, if it could thereby get its work efficiently and satisfactorily accomplished. It is, however, notorious that almost all branches of the civil service are managed incompetently, and however energetic and faithful a portion of the public servants may be, their efforts are neutralized by the inattention and negligence natural to others who regard their positions as simply political preferment, and who know that no zeal in the discharge of duty will enable them to retain their offices after an adverse election. Under such circumstances, slovenly management must be the rule and not the exception.

"This costly, cumbrous, and inefficient machinery necessarily entails another evil of equal magnitude, in that it renders economy in the public expenditure almost impossible. With political intrigue interpenetrating almost every fibre of the Government, retrenchment may be promised but can never be performed. Too many influences are at work to stimulate extravagance, and the more wasteful a scheme, the more numerous and powerful are its advocates. A thorough and efficient reform in our civil service means the diminution of our current expenditures, the increase of our revenues, the payment of our debt, the reduction of taxation, and the transaction of our business with promptitude and accuracy.

"All these, however, are but material and economical reasons in favor of the measure, and, powerful as they are, yet are they the least important. A young and vigorous community can afford to waste its strength and to indulge in extravagance, but it cannot afford to debase its morality and to stimulate corruption, or to make its political life a mere degrading scramble for place. It is notorious that almost all political movements are controlled by aspirants for office, that nominations are secured by corruption and elections are carried by fraud, and that which should be the dignified spectacle of a great free community exercising its highest right, becomes a matter of bargain and sale, in which the people are treated as the property of a small class who devote their lives to the trickery and knavishness which rule. Politics are no longer a science, and statesmanship is lost sight of, when 'claims' for office depend not on experience, intelligence, and honesty, but on the cunning management of local conventions and skill in manipulating the ballot-box. Our present system tends inevitably to reward corruption and to depress merit. Not only are the public interests confided to incompetent or unfaithful hands, but the public sense of morality is rapidly dulled, the standard of political virtue is constantly lowered, and the reverence of the people for their institutions is correspondingly weakened. Nor is this all, for the present system exercises a most unfortunate influence on a large proportion of citizens as they reach manhood. Enticed from ordinary avocations by the allurements of the race for office, they deliberately embrace a political career as a means of living without labor, and are not only lost to the community as useful and respectable citizens, but are depraved by vile and corrupting associations. Thus the ranks of dangerous and unscrupulous men are constantly swelled by new recruits, who become as dead to the appeal of industry and honor as if they had abandoned themselves to the temptations of the gaming-table.

"No institutions less strong than our own could have endured so long this systematic maladministration and pervading corruption, and even our institutions cannot resist for ever the disintegrating forces thus at work. If democratic republicanism be not a mistake, the people must show themselves as competent to enforce the performance of the routine functions of government as a despotism can be. It is not in great crises that public virtue is most severely tested, but in resisting the insidious corruption of prosperity. The one we have shown ourselves able to meet in the noblest spirit; to the other we are succumbing; and unless our fatal progress can be checked, the hopes of rational liberty for mankind will be arrested for centuries."

There are one or two considerations, not touched on in this paper, which we may be permitted to add to it. If we ask any man (not a regular politician) engaged in the work of reform in any part of the country what he finds to be the greatest obstacle in his path, he will tell you unhesitatingly it is the apathy of the public. Say what he will about the condition of the prisons and of the administration of criminal justice, about the frauds in the collection of the revenue, about the corruption in the legislatures, or about the growing power of great moneyed corporations, he finds his warnings and exposures fall on leaden ears. Even if people listen, they shrug their shoulders and go their way. Occasionally, enough excitement is created to get up an "independent" or "people's ticket" of some kind, but it is badly beaten and its supporters dissolve.

Now, what is the cause of this apathy? It certainly is not that the virtue of the community is declining. The community is made up of individuals, and each of us has only to look over his list of friends and acquaintances to satisfy himself that men's patriotism was never stronger than it is now; that promises are as faithfully kept, the various social and domestic duties as faithfully fulfilled, as ever. Neighbors are as neighborly, fathers as fatherly, as ever. There never was so much active humanity; never so much sympathy for the poor and weak; debtors were never more loyal; creditors never more forbearing and generous. What causes the apathy, therefore, about all reforms which are dependent on legislation—for it is only about these that there is apathy—is the widespread and deep-seated feeling that as long as the class engaged in the actual work of politics is not changed, there is not the slightest use in agitating about existing evils, or in getting the laws changed on paper. The public has had sorrowful experience that no matter to what party the politician belongs, his character remains the same, and that no matter how eager he may be to satisfy popular demands by the speeches he makes or the resolutions he passes, in the actual working of the machinery of the government he is sure to play them false; and he cannot help it. He is driven into it by the very conditions of his career; for even if he be not a knave himself, he has to owe his election to knaves, and has to reward them with places in the public service. The necessity is a horrible one, but the best men succumb to it. The number of men in the House or Senate who do not do dirty work is every year diminishing. They are being steadily driven out of public life by the clamors of those whom they will not satisfy—clamors, too—and this is the worst of it—whose real nature is disguised by a disgusting pretence of zeal for some "cause" which happens to stand high in popular esteem.

If, therefore, we wish to rouse the people to active and hopeful participation in the work of refitting the republic, we must offer them a reasonable expectation of new agents as well as new measures. Way must be made in politics for decent and intelligent men, and this can only be done by depriving politics of all the attractions it now offers as a trade to the lewd fellows of the baser sort who live by it.

MORE LIGHT ON THE CHINESE QUESTION.

We have been hoping for the last fortnight to see Mr. Robert Hart's notes on the Chinese question, which have recently been made public, make their appearance in some of the papers in this part of the country which inflicted such awful chastisement a few weeks ago on Mr. Ross Browne and the degraded American and British merchants who "drew him out" on the China question. The New York Tribune prudently selected one short extract from it which seemed to favor, though in an infinitesimally small degree, the lucid conclusions about the Burlingame treaty propounded in its columns by that distinguished publicist, "Mark Twain." But then the whole document is undoubtedly due to the public. It is the most important contribution to the controversy yet made, and we regret greatly that we ourselves cannot give it to our readers entire. Mr. Hart is an Irishman, Inspector-General of Imperial Maritime Customs—a man universally acknowledged to possess extraordinary ability. He has made the Chinese customs service, as a distinguished American traveller assured us the other day, "the most perfect in the world." He is in constant communication with the Chinese court; is confidentially consulted by them on all matters relating to intercourse with foreigners; speaks the language fluently; and was mainly instrumental both in originating the idea of an embassy to foreign powers and in having that idea embodied in the Burlingame mission. No foreigner, it is safe to say, is so competent as he to speak with authority about Chinese policy and aims. He has drawn up a series of "notes" on Chinese affairs, apropos of the meaning of the Burlingame embassy, which are of the utmost importance, but which, as we have said, the papers which were so ready to heap abuse on Mr. Ross Browne have shown no signs of publishing.

Now, what does Mr. Hart say as to the object of the mission? Does he say that it was to announce to the Western world that China was ready and willing to enter at once into the family of civilized nations; to accept "progress" in the sense in which we understand it; to throw the country open to Christian missionaries; and, in short, to become in all respects, and as rapidly as possible, such as we are? Nothing of the kind. He says its object was, "as he understood it at the time, to cultivate and conserve friendly relations by explaining to each of the treaty powers the many difficulties that China cannot fail to experience in attempting to change existing conditions and to introduce novelties; to bespeak forbearance, and prevent, in so far as possible, any resort to hostile pressure to wring from China concessions for which the Government did not as yet feel itself ready." He then declares that the objects of the mission have been misinterpreted by the press, "inasmuch as they gave out that it promised on the part of China the immediate performance of the very things which China sent the mission to explain to the West are so difficult of performance;" and adds that "nothing but complete ignorance of China" could have led the public to delude itself by assuming "that the vast changes now looked for are regarded as necessary and longed for by China herself." Mr. Burlingame's speeches, and in particular the one delivered at the New York dinner, appear to have excited great astonishment in China. This speech Mr. Hart deals with by claiming for it the latitude due to after-dinner speeches in general; and while allowing that "its language sounded strangely when read alongside of contemporaneous occurrences in China," or when various passages in it are examined separately, he yet holds that "it was in the main defensible," as the burden of it, addressed to a sympathetic audience, was: "Leave China alone, and all that you wish for will in its own good time follow."

As regards the actual state of feeling in China about progress, Mr. Hart says that "to the mass of Chinese officials the word improvement would convey no idea corresponding to that which it has in the Western mind," and that "some forty officials in the provinces, and perhaps ten in Peking, have a glimmering notion of what it is that the foreigner means when he speaks in general terms of progress;" but of these fifty, "not one is prepared to enter boldly on a career of progress, and take the consequence of even a feeble initiative." In other words, of the whole official class in China, not one man has the least notion of doing what people here have been believing, since the arrival of the Burlingame mission, they were prepared to do at once.

Of the treaty itself, Mr. Hart speaks somewhat slightingly. He says the new articles may be of use to the Chinese in California; but suggests whether they may not hinder, rather than further, "progress," by letting the Chinese at home know that citizens of the United States do not treat the Chinese in America fairly. He adds that it is altogether a mistake to suppose that "China feels more kindly to the United States than to other powers;" and he asserts that, as we pointed out in the Nation some weeks ago, the treaty has "nothing in it that did not exist before in the shape of generally acknowledged principles of international intercourse." He says, too, that he had heard it remarked that the treaty by implication put China in a position of inferiority to the United States, inasmuch as the latter solemnly covenants and agrees to let the former manage her affairs as she pleases, and even engages not to force her to make telegraphs and railroads against her will. This is not the kind of compact into which two equal powers voluntarily enter. In fact, it sounds a little like a formal agreement on the part of A not to kick B every time he meets him in the street—from which it would be deduced either that A had been in the habit of doing so, or believed that he was entitled to do so if he pleased; and either inference might fairly be considered humiliating by the friends of B.

With regard to the future, all Mr. Hart finds himself able to say is that China "has made a start" in the march of improvement, inasmuch as she has begun to feel her material weakness; and this feeling, he thinks, will undoubtedly stimulate her in the end into availing herself of the results of Western science, but how soon he is unable to say, and evidently thinks it will not be for a long while. But he confesses that even this hopeful feeling, as well as all other concessions she has as yet made to Western diplomacy, has been due to outside pressure and he condemns any agreement or promise of complete abstinence from pressure or interference on the part of the West, as this would, he believes, cause a return to the old stagnation, and would indefinitely postpone all improvement whatever.

Now, if this be a correct account of the state of things—and one more likely to be correct we are never likely to get—it is quite plain that the public here has been laboring under a great delusion, and that the sooner it gets rid of it the better. In the paroxysm of enthusiasm inspired by the Burlingame mission, a great many people went as far in overrating Chinese civilization as they had previously gone in underrating it. Some papers, indeed, talked of China as if it were a place to which we outside barbarians would do well to send our children to be educated. The truth seems to be that it is in many ways both a wonderful and admirable civilization; that it has performed one of the greatest of exploits, inasmuch as it has raised a people out of barbarism without outside help; but it was arrested by some cause, which has never been explained, a couple of thousand years ago, and the usual consequence of a long continuance in a simply conservative position has followed—a consequence witnessed both in Rome and Constantinople—in that the soul has left it. That mysterious something without which the greatest armies are weak, the greatest navies despicable, the largest population little better than a prey for the spoiler, which gives nationality its vigor, its self-reliance, and without which the finest body of philosophy in existence has but little more influence on national life than the sighing of the idle wind, China appears to have lost. The best way of bringing it back without killing the patient is now the problem which occupies the doctors who surround her bed. It is useless to say we must not exercise any pressure on her. We do exercise pressure on her every day. The presence of our merchants and vessels in her ports, of our ambassador at Peking, the exemption of American citizens from the jurisdiction of her judges, are all the results of pressure. If we really allowed her to do as she pleased, not a foreigner would be found on her soil within three months. So that of pressure we must be guilty. But how much should we hereafter exercise, and in what manner should it be exercised, are the questions now to be answered. To the first it is safe to reply: as little as is consistent with the exact and faithful fulfilment of obligations already entered into by the Chinese Government; to the second: by the constant exhibition in all our intercourse, but with every possible regard for the susceptibilities of a susceptible people, of our firm and undoubted faith that our civilization is a better one and our morality a higher one than theirs, and that the preservation of the empire depends on their adoption of it. To pretend or appear to believe anything else would be a lie, and no good comes of lying.

But we cannot be too careful in all our intercourse with them of doing anything to weaken their political framework, or to lessen the dignity or authority of their Government in the eyes of the people. It would be easy enough for the Western powers to overthrow the Chinese Government; but the whole of them put together could not substitute in a hundred years one that would answer the needs of the people of China one-tenth part as well. In fact, the inevitable result of violent outside interference in Chinese affairs must be anarchy; and established governments are bound by the laws of political morality, just as firmly as revolutionists are, not to do anything to overthrow an established political system unless they are sure they put something better in its place.

NICHOLS VS. NICHOLS.

On the 8th of May, in the year 1866, at Newtown, Connecticut, Alexander R. T. Nichols was married to Charlotte Beers. In the spring of this year, Mrs. Nichols obtained a divorce for her husband's adultery, and a decree was granted making it lawful for her to marry again. She did marry again, her second husband being John D. Gebhard, of Schoharie. Notwithstanding the apparent regularity of these proceedings, the following order has recently been entered by Judge Clerke: "That the judgment in this action, made on the 12th day of July, 1869, be and the same is hereby set aside and vacated; and it is further ordered that all the proceedings in this action, as the same are contained in said judgment-roll, be and the same are hereby set aside and vacated, with costs, for fraud and imposition upon the court." The facts connected with the fraud and imposition referred to in this second decree furnish materials for an interesting chapter in the history of the administration of justice in this city.

Without going into every repulsive detail afforded by the case, it is enough, to begin with, to say that, if adultery was committed, the party guilty of it was certainly not the husband; that, most probably, Gebhard was the wife's paramour, though this she strenuously denies; and that the decree of divorce was obtained as a convenient screen for their criminality. Shortly after her marriage, Mrs. Nichols became acquainted with Gebhard, and the acquaintance ripened into an intimacy which subsequently resulted in a departure of the pair to Europe. Returning to this country last winter, Mrs. Nichols, now Mrs. Gebhard, set about procuring a divorce in the following manner: The first step is for one Northrop, the plaintiff's attorney—who only appears in the case, it seems, out of good nature, that his name may be used by Orson A. House, Gebhard's lawyer—to make complaint charging Nichols with adultery; and Mrs. Nichols, who, like a more celebrated character, never moves "without tacking on five or six affidavits," makes oath that she believes the charge to be true. Now, as most of our readers probably know, when a complaint is made against any one, the first thing done is to summon the defendant to appear and answer. The officials charged with the duty of summoning defendants are sheriffs, deputy-sheriffs, and constables. When, however, it is made to appear to the court that the defendant is out of the jurisdiction, he is summoned by advertisement. Two new affidavits accordingly make their appearance; one by Mrs. Nichols, and the other by Oscar W. Smith—another good-natured man who "allowed his name to be used" in the case—who both depose that the defendant is not to be found in New York—not alleging the reason, however, which was that they had not looked for him. Not being found, he must be advertised for; and to obtain the necessary order application must be made to some judge. Does the reader feel any doubt as to what magistrate the plaintiff will enlist in her service? Having the advice of counsel learned in the law, she actually appears before Mr. Justice Cardozo, who immediately makes an order that summons shall be served on the defendant by publication in the Weekly News and the Jewish Messenger, and that a copy of the summons and complaint be forthwith directed to him at Greenfield in the State of Connecticut. Mr. Nichols, not being a reader of the Weekly News or the Jewish Messenger, and probably, like most other people, having never heard of them, does not see the advertisement, nor does the letter addressed to Greenfield reach him. The reason of this is probably that it was never deposited in the post-office.

And now everything goes smoothly. Mr. Nichols fails to appear, and the case is handed over by Judge Barnard to William H. Tracy as referee. Mr. Tracy is satisfied with the affidavit of Henry B. Harrison as to the fact of the adultery, and recommends a decree of divorce, which Judge Barnard—why is it always either Barnard or Cardozo?—at once grants. But it now turns out that no such person as Henry B. Harrison exists. And it further appears that the complaint, the affidavit of Charlotte B. Nichols, the affidavit of Oscar W. Smith, and the testimony of Henry B. Harrison are all in the handwriting of Orson A. House, Gebhard's lawyer; that House was in the habit of using at his office, in the preparation of papers and signatures, three different shades of ink, and that three different shades appear in the judgment-roll in the case of Nichols vs. Nichols. The latest affidavit in the suit runs as follows:

City and County of New York, ss.: Charles Conkling being sworn, says that he does not know Alexander R. T. Nichols, the defendant in this action, or any one of that name, and never saw him to his knowledge; that on the 6th day of July, 1869, he signed the name of Henry B. Harrison to an affidavit in this action, and went before William H. Tracy, the referee in this action, and swore to the same; that deponent did not know the contents of said deposition; that the same was not read to him, nor was he informed of what it contained; that he was employed by Orson A. House, Esq.; that said House requested deponent to sign the name of Harrison to said deposition, and went with deponent to the office of said Tracy, and was present when he made oath to said deposition; deponent does not know any one named Henry B. Harrison; said name was given to him by said House; and deponent further saith he does not know the plaintiff above-named, or any one in the transaction except House.

Sworn to, etc., September 28, 1869. CHARLES CONKLING.

In short, the whole affair was an enormous fraud from beginning to end. But it is not on this account that we mention it. Fraud is a common enough thing all over the world, and the case of Nichols vs. Nichols is not the first in which imposition has been practised upon a court of justice. The significance of the case lies in the ease and rapidity with which the fraud was perpetrated, and the amazing negligence of the officials concerned. Of course, in all legal proceedings, courts must rely greatly on the honor of the members of the bar. It being impossible for judges to examine into every fact in a case, matters peculiarly within the knowledge of attorneys are taken to be true on the attorney's word. In such matters, for instance, as that of a summons, the statement of the plaintiff's lawyer that the defendant was not within the sheriff's reach would generally be received as reliable, and summons by advertisement would be ordered. And in such a case, the court would most likely enquire of the plaintiff's attorney what journals would be most likely to find the defendant. For it is in the nature of things impossible for a court to inform itself upon such points judicially, and so it has to resort to informal means. And where an upright bar exists, the practice works well. But cases of application for divorce furnish an exception to these rules, for many reasons. In the first place, the law does not, in theory, favor divorce, and is said to look with a suspicious eye on all such suits; in the second place, every one knows, as a matter of fact, that they are a kind of suit in which collusion is eminently likely; and, in the third place, the divorce lawyer is proverbially one of the most rascally scoundrels in existence. There are, of course, some lawyers who take charge of divorce cases who are an honor to their profession, but the rule is the other way. A graphic description has been recently given of this sort of practitioner in the World:

"The lawyers of the 'ring' are the pariahs of their profession; men who have been disbarred in other States (sometimes in other countries) for detected malpractice; men who began life fairly, but sank to ignominy through dissipation, political failure, or natural vicious tendencies; men, even, who never opened a law-book before entering upon their present avocation, but gleaned a practical knowledge of the legal alternative of 'wedded woe' by a course of training in the private detective's trade. These latter worthies often hire the use of practising lawyers' names. Occasionally they hire the said lawyers themselves to go through the mummeries of the courts for them; and we could name one of our most eloquent and respectable criminal pleaders who, on a certain occasion at least, permitted himself to be nominally associated with one of the boldest operators of the 'ring.' These sinister traders in domestic infamy, secret libel, and suborned perjury announce their business and addresses by means of advertisements which, on their faces, give proof of deliberate fraud. In public print they inform their would-be patrons that 'success is guaranteed;' that 'no fee is required until the decree of divorce is secured;' that intemperance, desertion, etc., 'is a sufficient cause;' that there shall be 'no publicity;' and that the decree procured shall be 'good in every State.' No particular knowledge of any law is requisite to teach that a practice thus announced is rife with iniquity; nor do those who answer the bait believe that any honest or legitimate process is intended."

It is easy to see that under these circumstances a court cannot, in divorce cases, rely with implicit confidence on the attorneys practising before it. And in the Nichols case everything wore a suspicious look. The non-appearance of the husband and the suggestion to the court of newspapers whose only recommendation could have been their obscurity—these things alone were sufficient to arouse the suspicions of any but an exceptionally confiding nature, and we have never heard this trait attributed to either Barnard or Cardozo, while the facts already stated, in addition to that of the extremely sparse attendance of witnesses at the final hearing before the referee, might fairly have raised a doubt in the mind of that officer. But Mr. Tracy is as child-like as his superiors. We should like to know something more about this reference. We should like to know how long the hearing occupied; why Charles Conkling, who personated Henry B. Harrison, was allowed to swear to written statements prepared for him by some one else, and the contents of which he now says he did not at the time know, and why he was not examined by the referee; where the referee sat during the hearing; whether he went out to take lunch during the proceedings, and how long he staid, and how the case was managed in his absence; whether he heard the case separately or at the same time with two or three others. Our readers may not be aware that this last method is a possible one; but we assure them that an enterprising referee will hear three cases at once just as easily as an ordinary judge will hear one. The persons interested in the various suits are placed in various positions about the room, while the referee goes on quietly with his own business. If any question arises in any of the suits which the attorneys cannot arrange, he is called in, settles it, and goes back to his work. Of course, if there is but one side present, as in the Nichols case, there seems no reason why the referee should appear on the scene at all. He may as well go home to his wife and children and sign the papers next morning when they have been made ready by the plaintiff's attorney.

It is said that House and Northrop and Edward Gebhard are to be disbarred. But who shall disbar Tracy, and who shall eject Barnard and Cardozo? Disbarring is a very good thing when you have a respectable judiciary, but when you see a judge turning a lawyer out of court for the same practices which won the former his seat on the bench, the spectacle is neither edifying nor useful. So, also, theoretically, a reform in the referee system, an exposure of its abuses, would be no bad thing, but most of the referees are blood-relations of the judges who refer cases to them. The system is rotten to the core, and the core is the judiciary. For our own part, we do not believe that either House or Northrop or Gebhard will be disbarred. And if they are, our readers may rely upon it that they will continue to carry on an extensive divorce business through the kindness of friendly members of the bar who will allow them the "use of their names."

EDUCATION FOR JOURNALISTS.

M. Gaston Boissier closes an elaborate article on the higher education in the Revue des Deux Mondes for August 15, by an argument in favor of the study of science which will probably impress forcibly the great body of thoughtful readers in all countries, and that is, that the increasing influence of journalism on the thought and life of the age needs to be met, or counterbalanced, by some training for youth which will implant in them "a love of serious knowledge, a taste for minute exactness, a hatred of sounding generalities, which will make them feel the need of going to the bottom of things, and of holding their tongues about what they do not understand." He says that "incurable levity" is one of the conditions of journalistic literature, and he moralizes sadly on the tendency of even the best journalists "to discuss things they do not understand, to affirm stoutly what is very doubtful and will probably be denied the day after, to get out of bad scrapes under cover of a witticism, and to cover up ignorance under a cloud of rhetoric."

Every word he says on the subject is true, and he might have said more, for he might have said that not only have journalists these defects, but that there are signs that they are ceasing to be ashamed of them, and have begun even to glory in them. There is growing amongst them an ideal of their profession, in which all the more ignorant, unscrupulous, slapdash, "lively" members figure as leaders, in which pop and fizz pass under the name of "sparkle," and in which a man's indifference to the literal facts of a matter in discussing it or describing it is looked on as one of the signs of peculiar fitness for his calling. In this ideal, too, professional "training" consists simply in acquiring readiness with the pen, first by paragraphing "items," then by reporting, and then by dashing off "reflections" on all sorts of subjects that happen to present themselves, combined with familiarity with the work of the composing-room. There is in fact no class of the community from which the notion that a journalist needs a thorough education receives at this moment less encouragement than from journalists themselves. The young man who thinks of choosing it for a profession hears of nothing so much praised by his confrères as the capacity for tickling the public, nothing so much belittled and laughed at as a desire to instruct it, nothing held up to him so constantly as the goal of his striving as the extension of "sales;" and judged by "sales," of course the really great journalist is he who can best adapt his wares, not to the intellectual or moral needs, but to the tastes of the greatest number—that is, to the least instructed portion of every community, and their strongest tastes are apt to be their lowest. In short, it may be considered the only intellectual calling, at the present day, in which professional pride can be hardly said to exist, in which the members, as a body, make no pretence to anything better than the supply of a certain commercial demand on the part of the public. There is hardly a lawyer who would not blush to own that he cared for nothing but rolling up his bank-account; no clergyman would avow that the filling of his pews was the one object of his concern; and a doctor would think it foul scorn to be told that in his practice the interests of science were nothing to him. There is a demand, nevertheless, and an enormous and insatiable demand, for thoroughly unscrupulous advocates, for charlatanic ministers, and for medical quacks, which, to the honor of the race, these three professions have in all countries and all ages steadily refused to supply, feeling amply compensated for the loss in money their self-abnegation might cause them by the addition it made to their self-respect and to "the honor of their cloth"—a phrase in which there is more glory for human nature than appears on the surface. When a similar spirit shall have been infused into journalism, it is no exaggeration to say, considering the influence which journalism is acquiring over men and manners, that true civilization will have made one of the greatest gains it has ever made, or is likely to make.

There is nothing particularly novel in this view of the matter. It does not appear in newspapers, naturally enough, but it is what people are constantly thinking or saying in private; and the possibility of making a change for the better, of infusing into journalists a higher sense of moral and intellectual responsibility, and rooting out the idea that the possession of a ready pen and familiarity with the mode of "making up" a paper are the principal or only requisites for the successful practice of the profession, are just now occupying a great number of good minds. In most addresses to colleges and other learned bodies, and in most of the treatises on higher education, one finds more or less extended mention of it, as one of the gravest subjects of the day, and we see that there is talk of an attempt to deal with it directly at General Lee's college in Virginia by the establishment of a chair, or other machinery, for the special cultivation of the journalist's art. But the idea that a man needs to be specially prepared for it at college we hold to be nearly as erroneous as the idea that he can be prepared for it in a newspaper office, though the first is a much more excusable error than the last, if, indeed, it needs any excuse at all. The purely mechanical work of a newspaper—the arrangement of the contents—is something for which, of course, more or less practice is necessary, but it is something to which the feeblest powers are equal. It bears about the same relation to the work of editing that battalion drill bears to strategy, and the proportion of really good editors it would produce to the number of those engaged in it would be about that borne by great generals to drill-sergeants. Yet this is the only approach to special education that journalists need or can receive. Special education is required by men whose calling forces them to deal with a certain class of facts; a journalist's business is to reason on all the facts of life, of every class, or at least, if he does not reason on them all himself, to know whether other persons can reason on them or not. There is no recipe that will enable a man to do this. Good natural powers, strengthened by general cultivation, will, but nothing else. The more a man knows of everything, and the better he can make deductions from what he knows, the better journalist he will be, if he possesses also the art of expressing himself in a taking way, and possesses the orator's power of perceiving when he has said as much on any one theme as his audience will stand. The art of journalism lies in the expression; the science of it may be said to include all sciences, inasmuch as what it now undertakes to do is to help the public at large to think correctly on every subject of human interest. When we say this, we say enough to show the absurdity of establishing a special chair or opening a special class of journalism in colleges. As regards the expression or rhetoric of journalism, it is, or ought to be, taught to everybody. It is neither more nor less than the art of saying clearly and attractively whatever you have to say in as few words as possible—in other words, the art of being perspicuous and concise. There are certain rules which will help a man to do this, but they are taught in all the colleges. The teaching of them will enable anybody to speak and write better than he would without them, but can never teach a man to speak and write well in default of natural ability. In natural qualifications for journalism, as for other callings, men vary infinitely.

There are three fields of study, certainly, which are perhaps more likely to be useful to a journalist, as such, than to a man of other callings: history, legislative science—meaning by that the knowledge of the limits and powers of legislation—and political economy, or the knowledge of the working of the laws of human nature which regulate the production and distribution of weath; but then these are fields which every man pretending to be educated ought to cultivate, no matter to what special pursuit he intends to devote himself. There is, however, nothing on which journals comment so much, or which they influence so much, as politics, and nobody can discuss politics properly who is not familiar with what has been done in that department of activity—who does not know what can be done in it and what had better be let alone, and who does not passably understand the nature of the vast and complicated machinery of trade, now so large a part of the world's work. In short, no man can say he is qualified to be an editor, in default of actual trial of his powers, who has not received as good a general education as can be obtained. If indeed intellectual training be of any value whatever, it is of more value to the journalist than to men of any other calling, for various reasons. One is, that his work is one which is not, like the lawyer's or doctor's or scientific man's, submitted to any test by which its soundness or accuracy can be ascertained; his own judgment has, after all, in most cases to decide finally on the value of what he has done. "Sales" gauge the popular demand for his wares; but they tell nothing about the quality of his wares—the greatest ass often having the greatest number of readers. Another is, that his temptations to disregard intellectual standards and discard high ideals are greater than those of most men. He practises his profession in the market-place, and is exposed alternately to the hootings or applause of a great and ill-informed multitude, and his judgment needs to be extraordinarily strong to resist influences of this nature. Lastly, deliberation and revision are almost completely forbidden to him by the very nature of his calling. Like the Irish witness who inadvertently swore the horse was fifteen feet high, and afterwards refused to substitute "hands" for "feet," whatever he has once said he has to stick to, and the importance to him, therefore, of his saying the right thing the first time is enormous.

A good illustration of the way in which people are led astray in our day by the growing demand for "special education"—or, in other words, for short-cuts to all the trades and professions—is afforded by those eminently deluding institutions, "business colleges." They have been called into existence by the growing desire on the part of young men to dispense with the long apprenticeship without which it was difficult in old times to obtain a recognized and respected place in the commercial world. So a crowd of raw boys are collected in a large room, and employed in playing at the mechanical operations of trade, running from one end of it to the other, making sham deposits in imaginary banks, drawing sham checks, and making sham purchases—or, in other words, familiarizing themselves laboriously with the forms of business. Now there would be little objection to this in itself if they were not at the same time kept under the hallucination that they were learning to be "business men." It would be just as sensible to tell them that, in learning the manual of arms, they were qualifying themselves to command armies. To become a good business man requires a certain training of the judgment and character—the acquisition of certain habits of mind which can only be acquired by long exposure to certain powerful influences, such as those to which a boy is exposed who is taken young into a real mercantile house, and employed in real transactions involving real responsibility, and familiarized day by day with the spectacle of men whom he looks up to, and who are masters of their work, engaged in the solution of the various problems of trade. His whole moral and mental constitution is in this way moulded to suit the exigencies of his calling. He learns when to be bold and when to be cautious, and he learns above all things the enormous difference between facts and fancies. This training is no longer very common, we admit; but neither is the type of merchants which this training created. The modern type approaches more nearly to the gambler than the trader. The "graduate" of the business college rushes into the market with his check-book and his invoices and his accounts-current, and feeling himself utterly incapable of working for distant results, or following the thread of complicated combinations, tries to make his fortune and "go to Europe" by a happy throw or two in some speculative commodity, and furnishes, after a few years, one of the innumerable wrecks which now warn men away from "business," and give the great money markets of the world such a close resemblance to Baden-Baden and Homburg.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, September 14, 1869.

LONDON is at its deadest and dreariest. Mile after mile of houses in the more comfortable quarters of the town exhibit nothing but closed shutters. Shop-keepers yawn over their counters; clubs are abandoned by all but the inevitable bore; and newspaper editors pray, I fear, for terrible accidents, grievous scandals, or any relief to the monotony of the season. Two or three topics have been started with very fair success. The boat-race was a useful bit of excitement; the Byron scandal has been discussed till it is a trifle threadbare; and the illness of the Emperor has been a perfect godsend. Your correspondent must humbly confess that he has been taking a holiday, and has avoided as much as might be the very sight of an English newspaper. He must therefore beg for pardon if he diverges for once into a topic of not strictly domestic interest The British tourist abroad would furnish matter for a longer essay than can find space in your columns. There is something at once melancholy and ludicrous in the increasing crowd which struggles and jostles along all the main lines of Continental travel. The intelligent traveller, who enjoys what he sees, is almost lost in a crowd of utterly ignorant sight-seers. I do not know whether the name of Cook's tourist is yet familiar to you. Mr. Cook is a man of mark in his way. He knows, as I have been informed, not a single word of any language but his own. He does not affect to be a philosophical or scientific or artistic traveller, but he has a talent for organization of which he has made the most. The utterly ignorant and helpless tourist, whose knowledge of foreigners is confined to a passing glimpse of uncouth refugees in Leicester Square, saves himself all trouble in devising a route by buying a ticket from Mr. Cook. This ticket takes him along a certain indicated list of places, allowing him to stop at certain points, and points out the hotels he is to visit. He may go alone; but if mistrustful of his powers, he may join a party headed by the great Mr. Cook, or some of his assistants, in person. Such parties form barbarian hordes, which are to be encountered in all show places on the Continent. In the better-known parts of the Alps, along the Rhine, in Paris or Florence, and even so far as the Nile and Jerusalem, they come down like the wolf on the fold, although it cannot precisely be said that their cohorts are gleaming in purple and gold. On the contrary, they carry with them that unmistakable air of Oxford Street or the Strand which points out the genuine Cockney all over the world. Strange stories are told of them; how they astonish the wor shippers in Eastern shrines and Continental churches; how sublimely ignorant they show themselves of the manners and customs of every country but their own; and how they bore the unfortunate compatriot who falls into their clutches. Not long ago, a friend of mine was in a steamboat on the Lake of Geneva. He saw a tourist walk up to a gentleman standing innocently on the deck and ask him, "Are you Lord so-and-so?" mentioning the name of an English minister. The gentleman confessed his identity, whereupon the tourist returned to his companions with the information, and each of them came up in turn to gaze critically at an English peer on his travels. They apparently considered him to be one of the sights provided by the energy of their great master. And now, I will venture to add that, conversing with a foreign gentleman whom I lately met in a railway abroad, he told me that he was unable to distinguish between Englishmen and Americans. Neither people would,

I fear, take the remark as a compliment; but in spite of the wide differences of national character, I must confess that there is one strong point of resemblance. Between us, we furnish by far the largest proportion of that noisy, pushing, and ignorant class of tourists which is really an offence to persons of any refinement. I will not attempt to compare the merits of the Cockney of London and his cousin from New York. They have many qualities in common; the same sublime ignorance of foreign languages and contempt for foreigners; the same facility of doing a picture-gallery at the rate of one thousand pictures in an hour; and the same faculty for treading, literally and metaphorically, on the toes of all less pushing and audacious persons. Perhaps there is more excuse for the American—who, it may be, has only three months in his life to see the whole of Europe—than for the Briton, who always has the Continent at his doors. But for whatever reason, it is my candid opinion that, if united, we might beat the world in a show of the most offensive variety of tourists.

Perhaps these sentiments are not precisely democratic; I ought not, it may be, to grudge ignorant and vulgar people the opportunity of rubbing off a little of their vulgarity and ignorance in a visit to the most remarkable parts of the Old World. And, to say the truth, I believe that even Cook's tourists profit to some extent by their travel; they learn the truth, still so little appreciated, that there are some other habitable regions in the world outside the postal district of London. Yet it is impossible not to wish that they would take the trouble to qualify themselves a little better for their travelling, and, further, that till they have done so they could be kept confined within certain districts. This last condition, indeed (and this is a practical moral of my remarks), is tolerably fulfilled by a spontaneous process. Tourists of the class described are not an adventurous race; they follow each other's steps like a flock of sheep; and a knowledge of their instincts will enable a judicious traveller to keep pretty clear of their intrusion. They swarm at the big hotels in Paris; they crowd such places as Homburg and Baden, and Americans especially astonish the customary visitors by the boldness of their play; on the Righi they are multitudinous; and at Interlaken or Chamouni, like the sands of the sea for number. I visited St. Moritz, on the Engadine, this summer, which till lately was one of the least-known districts in the Alps. Unluckily, fashionable doctors in London and elsewhere have taken it up, and now every hotel is crammed from roof to cellar with crowds of English and Americans, and more hotels are springing up like mushrooms. Yet nothing is easier than to get outside of the current. Courmayeur is at least as beautiful as Chamouni—to my mind far finer, and it is perfectly easy of access; yet Courmayeur is as primitive as Chamouni is sophisticated. In every part of the Alps, it is only necessary to cross a single ridge to be out of the way of the crowd; and I was more than a month this summer in one of the loveliest of Alpine districts (that which borders on Venetia) without hearing a word of English spoken from any but our own party. Of course, the hackneyed points of view are probably the most beautiful, and there one must be content to suffer; but I think people hardly know how easy it is by a very slight detour to enjoy the primitive country, where hotels are still moderate and the people still civil. A bill for three people for a day, in very comfortable quarters, often cost us less than twenty francs; and cheapness is generally in proportion to friendliness. The same truth applies, with the necessary modifications, even to such places as Paris or the Rhine. The vulgar tourist has to pay for his ignorance both in hard cash and discomfort, and a wiser man may easily make good use of his knowledge. The mountain enthusiasm has perhaps a little declined, owing to the successful ascents of all the highest peaks. A fatal accident took place on the Shreckhorn, owing to the neglect of one of the most essential precautions. Yet to men who rate themselves as good average walkers, I would say that if they take proper precautions, the real way to enjoy the Alps is to take a knapsack and a really good guide, and to penetrate for a few weeks into the remoter valleys and over some of the high peaks and glaciers. There is no other mode in which so much may be seen of the unsophisticated part of the population as well as of the grandest scenery, and the ordinary tourist be so completely avoided.

Here I am reminded of an article, which I have just read in the Nation, apropos of the boat-race. I am recommending a practice which savors of muscular Christianity, and I observe that you look, and not unreasonably, with very doubtful approval upon that popular sect. The modern English love of athletic exercises is undoubtedly excessive, and both at schools and universities excellence in such pursuits is esteemed quite out of proportion to the value set upon intellectual merit. It is also, I believe, true that this mania is closely connected with the predominance in the English ideal of character of those qualities which go to make up the model aristocrat, the manly and truth-telling but rather arrogant and full-blooded, and decidedly ignorant and narrow-minded, type of human being. Yet, if you will permit me to say so, I think that the tendency has something more in it than this. As one who has taken very great interest in sundry athletic pursuits, I cannot quite give up my admiration for our oarsmen and cricketers. They supply a real want of modern times, and that is why their pursuits flourish. We are living more and more in towns, and constantly making greater calls upon our nervous energies. Field sports in England are every day becoming more artificial; partridge-shooting resembles the slaughter in a poulterer's yard; and even fox-hunting—the manliest of our sports—has many difficulties to struggle against as cultivation improves. Under such circumstances, the middle classes, who are the great supporters of athletic exercise, really value any pursuit which enables them to forget for a little the counting-house or the office, and to brace their muscles and give tone to their digestions. They are glad to see their boys acquire athletic tastes, and encourage as much as possible such amusements as cricket, rowing, gymnastics, or mountaineering, which provide a thorough relaxation and a good physical exercise for the body. In America, I should fancy, the same need must be felt as strongly. My own feeling is that we require in England not the discouragement of such pursuits so much as the encouragement of others which they have too much ousted from their place. I don't wish to see our lads less fond of boating, though I do most earnestly desire to see them with a higher standard of intellectual excellence. The cultivation of athletic exercise may safely be left to the spontaneous energy of schoolboys and young men; but it requires not to be put down, but to be kept under certain prudential restraints.

One word as to the boat-race. It resembled exactly the recent races between Oxford and our English Cambridge; and the defeat of the Americans was due, I should fancy, to the same cause which has injured the rowing of the mother university. Their style was suited to a short burst rather than a four-mile course. I do not see how the hostile sympathies of their spectators could have had any adverse influence; for certainly they had fair play, and even a very large amount of popular enthusiasm. Every one admired their pluck, and wished for a close contest. But at the next race, they must try to improve their style if they wish to give Oxford crews a satisfactory lesson. Perhaps, however, I am diverging too far towards the language of sporting newspapers. I will only conclude by expressing a wish for more contests carried on with equally good feeling and equal determination on both sides.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF PEACE AND LIBERTY.

VEVAY, September 17, 1869.

DURING the present week, the so-called "Congress of Peace and Liberty" has been holding its third annual session at Lausanne. The proclaimed objects of the Congress are such that Switzerland is the only country in Europe in which it can be allowed to hold its meetings. Two years ago it met at Geneva, last year at Berne, and next year it will probably meet at Bâle or Neuchatel. The Congress this year had a special interest from the fact that Victor Hugo had been chosen for its honorary president, and had promised to be present at its deliberations. But even without this personal attraction, it would have had interest as bringing together a number of the leading democrats and enthusiastic liberals of France and Germany, eager to give expression to their doctrines, and whose discussions consequently could not fail to indicate the direction and force of some of the currents of revolutionary opinion. The object of the Congress, or rather of the league of which it is the voice, is, as the circular of its central committee declares, the formation of a republican federation of the peoples of Europe. Its means of action are the press, speech, public meetings, popular assemblies. It aims at the substitution for standing armies of national militias, the separation of church and state, the establishment of the rights of women, the solution of social questions by the development of the principle of property resting upon individual or co-operative labor, by the diffusion of instruction and education, by liberty of association, and, "in a word, by whatever can with justice promote a constantly increasing equality among citizens."

The programme is intentionally broad enough, and in parts vague enough, to cover many differences of opinion as to methods of action, and to conciliate to its support republicans of every color and temper. The chance is so small at present of carrying the flag of European republicanism from the field of discussion to that of action, that it is doubtless well enough to leave the former open on all sides, and, if possible, to prevent the erection of any dividing walls of opinion on matters of detail.

The central committee, composed of six members from different countries, presented for discussion at the present meeting the following questions:

1. The determination of the basis of a federal organization of Europe.
2. The solution of the Eastern question, including that of Poland.
3. The means of removing all economical and social antagonisms among citizens. These questions were to be discussed in the given order.

The first session was held on Tuesday afternoon. Lausanne has no large public hall, and the Congress had to content itself with a sort of concert-hall, in the building known as the Casino—a little Doric edifice, of no merit or beauty, which stands just at the entrance of the old town, as you go up the hill from the railroad station. The hall will not hold, at the utmost, more than 500 or 600 persons, and, in order to prevent its being overcrowded, numbered tickets were issued for the floor to all persons willing to enroll themselves as "adherents" to the programme, and to pay a franc and a half; while cheaper tickets admitted, for a single session, non-adherents to a place in a temporary gallery which had been erected across the end of the room, opposite the platform.

The most interesting incident of the opening session was a brief and characteristic speech by Victor Hugo, whose entrance upon the platform was greeted with prolonged and tumultuous applause. Ten days earlier, he had addressed a letter from Brussels to the members of the Congress, which had been printed and distributed. It was in his most ecstatic vein of rhapsody. He had said, "The first need of man, his first right, his first duty is liberty. . . . The first of servitudes is the frontier. Who says frontier says ligature. Cut the ligature, efface the frontier, away with the custom-house officer, away with the soldier; in other terms, be free: peace follows. Peace henceforward profound. Peace made once for all. Peace inviolable. . . . For whose interest do frontiers exist? For kings. Divide to reign. A frontier implies a sentry-box; a sentry-box implies a soldier. No passing. Word of all privileges, of all prohibitions, of all censures, of all tyrannies. From this frontier, from this sentry-box, from this soldier, proceeds every human calamity. The king, being the exception, needs the soldier for his defence, who in his turn must murder in order to live. . . . Wars have all sorts of pretexts, but only one cause, the army. How suppress the army? By the suppression of despotism."

There is a good deal more of this sort in the letter. The speech had no such lyric flights, and the audience was a little disappointed not only by its brevity, but by the comparative tameness of its rhetoric, if not also by its emptiness.

"Citizens," said he, "you were right to choose for the place of your deliberations this noble country of the Alps. First, it is free; then, it is sublime. Yes, it is here; yes, it is in presence of this magnificent nature that it is becoming to make the great declarations of humanity, among others this: no more wars. You make it; be felicitated. One question dominates this Congress. We—all who are here—what is it that we desire? Peace. We desire peace; we desire it ardently; we desire it absolutely; we desire it between man and man, between people and people, between race and race, between brother and brother, between Abel and Cain; we desire the immense appeasing of hate. But this peace, how do we desire it? Do we desire it at any cost; do we desire it on every condition? No. We desire not peace with back bowed and forehead lowered. We desire not peace under despotism; we desire not peace under the truncheon; we desire not peace under the sceptre. The first condition of peace is deliverance. For this deliverance there must surely be a revolution, which shall be the supreme one, and, perhaps, alas! a war, which shall be the last. Then all will be accomplished. Peace being inviolable, will be eternal. Then, no more armies, no more kings. Vanishing away of the past! This is what we desire. We desire that the people should live, labor, buy, sell, work, speak, love, and think freely; that there should be schools making citizens, and that there should no longer be princes making cannoneers. We desire the great continental republic; we desire the United States of Europe: and I close with this word: liberty is the aim, peace is the result."

The next revolution will not be the supreme one unless it does away with such talk as this.

It was not till the third day of meeting that I was able to be present at a session of the Congress. Entering an antechamber which gave admittance to the platform, I found myself at once among familiars. Had I not been acquainted with these faces from the days of the old Abolition conventions? Had I not seen them at the later Women's Rights meetings? There were slight individual differences, to be sure, but the type was the same, and one classification would answer for the specimens. Genus: Enthusiasts. Species: Political Radical. Characteristics: Long hair; much beard; ill-fitting clothes; eager manner; hollow cheeks; gleaming eyes; sallow complexion; a look of mildness which might cover cruelty. These were the men selling the tickets and ordering the general arrangements, but on the platform this sort of character was less conspicuous than in American conventions. Here were more of the worldly sort of men, and yet very few of the highest social type. They looked the advocates, journalists, and the like that, for the most part, they were. The hall itself was American, like a hall in some country town that has not yet built its lyceum. A little more ornamented, to be sure, with stucco adornments than our native hall would be, but as cheaply finished on the whole, and the general bareness of its effect relieved in the same way that we should adopt, namely, by pine boughs employed to cover the front and the supports of the gallery, and to decorate the desk or tribune on the front of the platform from which the speeches were made. Behind the desk the wall was tapestried with two breadths of a striped window-curtain stuff, relieved on either side by old and rather dirty flags. On the front of the tribune, on the pine boughs, was hung a cheap placard, bearing in big letters the words Paix et Liberté. The look of the room, the smell of the pine, were enough to touch the heart of a New Englander. The audience was not on its part less fitted to awaken emotions of sympathy in his bosom. It was composed in good part of women—young women who had come to see the author of "Notre Dame de Paris" and "Les Misérables," and other women who had come as genuine "adherents" to the league. The men were also of many sorts; but men and women alike bore a greater resemblance to a New England audience than such an assembly elsewhere in Europe would be likely to present. It was not an elegant assembly, but it looked thoroughly respectable. It was a highly intelligent audience, if its air was a little provincial.

On the platform sat two women, and one of them I was told was an American, who had arrived at Lausanne that day, and had at once made her way to the President of the Congress and claimed the right to speak. The session had scarcely opened before the acting President, M. Eytel, with the utmost politeness led the lady forward and presented her to the audience as "Madame Raws, de l'Amérique." It was indeed the Mrs. Rose who has figured in American conventions for the last twenty years. I confess to wishing she had confined her reformatory energies to a single continent when she began, in a language of which she was but partially mistress: "Je suis contre le guerre, le guerre c'est le mort; le paix c'est le vie; aussi l'oppression c'est le mort, et le liberté c'est le vie." The polite audience smiled, and applauded when she went on in English to assert, according to the Compte Rendu Analytique, "que la condition première du succès de l'œuvre poursuivie par la Ligue repose sur le concours éclairé de la femme." In the course of her speech, Mrs. Rose informed us that she was "a Pole by birth, an American by residence, a cosmopolite by heart."

For the rest, there was nothing American about the Congress. The most striking figure in the hall was that of Victor Hugo, as he sat at the right hand of the acting President, just behind the tribune. His face is well represented by the common photograph. He is a man of sixty-seven, in perfect vigor, and looks as if he might well live and write for twenty or thirty years longer. There is nothing in his aspect that suggests the poet, nothing that indicates any peculiar sensibility or sensitiveness, any profound experience or emotion. The correspondent of the Journal de Genève goes so far as to call him "simple, bon enfant," and this is true so far that he is much less of a "poseur," and has much less affectation in manner, than one who knew him only through his writings might expect. His hair and beard are gray and short, his forehead high and ample, his eyes small, sharp, and ineffective, his nose heavy and masculine, his mouth thin and hidden under his moustache, his chin strong and deep, and his head vigorously set on a thick neck on broad shoulders. He looks like a solid banker or politician rather than a poet. He was in a full-dress suit of black, with a loose white cravat. His dress set loosely on his thickset figure, and he gave one altogether the impression of a prosperous and comfortable man of the world, and not at all that of a lean, hungry, dangerous exile. The contrast between his looks and his works is greater than one often sees in an author of such standing. It is only his forehead, and the general build of his head, which represent his special power. He has the air of being master of his own genius; as if he did not let it wear him out in its service, as if he could turn on his emotion, could become hysterical at will, and recover himself as he chose. His looks are not fitted to convert one who may have doubted the sincerity of his passions as expressed in his later books. I was reminded in seeing him of Sainte-Beuve's comparison of him and Lamartine—"Mais, charlatan pour charlatan, je préfère Lamartine."

His manner off the platform has all the politeness which is becoming in so conspicuous a man, and there was something touching in the ardor with which certain French exiles pressed around him, each eager to express gratitude and devotion to him, and in the genial, responsive way in which he received their emotional salutations and confidences.

The debate, which was still engaged on the first question, was full of animation and of talent. The ardor, the fluency, the natural eager gesticulation of the various speakers were quite beyond the range of English or American oratory. The temper of speakers and of audience was warm, the manner of the speakers often vehement and unparliamentary in personalities. It was not the manner of men accustomed to free speech. The talk was that of republicans who had not yet learned republican ways. I leave the substance of the debate for another time.

The next day, Friday the 17th, there was a morning session for the discussion of the second question, that of the East. I was not present, but I happened to be in the ante-chamber just as the debate ended and the session broke up. Almost all the members of the Congress had passed out, when loud words began between M. Eytel, the acting President, and one or two of the French members, which very soon passed into a hot dispute between M. Eytel and M. Longuet, a young French disciple of Proudhon, with whom the President had had a sharp passage during the preceding debate. In a moment the altercation grew extreme, face was thrust up to face. "Imbécile!" said one; "Insolent!" retorted the other. "Si vous étiez à Paris," shouted M. Longuet, with a flood of insulting words; "Je vous apprendrai ici," was all one could catch of M. Eytel's reply, and the two disputants seemed about to close with each other, when the bystanders interfered and put an end to the discreditable scene,—the first scene in that "immense apaisement des haines" which, according to M. Victor Hugo, was the object of the Congress.

THE SPANISH ASONANTE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Agreeing with you so cordially as I do on most points, I am sorry we cannot be at one about the asonante. As my only wish is to be set right if I am wrong, we may manage at least an assonance, if not quite a rhyme between us. Perhaps I did not make myself clear enough. What I meant was that the Spanish poets so often allow rhyme to impinge upon the asonante (I mean, of course, accidental rhyme) that your argument against hablara would not hold water. This is especially true of the Romances. But I prefer later (because stronger) authority. I open at random two volumes—one of Calderon, the other of Tirso de Molina—both of them, you will allow, pretty good witnesses. In the former I hit upon:

"Corrì la campaña
Por ver si hallaba en el campo
Al hombre que le esperaba,
Y solo junto á la puente
Fabio su criado estaba." (El Secreto á Voces, jorn. iii.)

And in the latter:

"Que á interceder ha venido
Por no sé quién con Iusepa;
Y segun lo precedido."
(Por el Sutano y el Torno, acto ii., esc. 17.)

But perhaps you will say these are rhymes, not asonantes? Very well; I will try my sortes again. Tirso on a single page gives me:

"Obligaron los cohechos
Del oro, que con dos caras,
Tantas traiciones ha hecho"

(a pretty fancy, by the way); and a little further on:

"Que dado que los barberos
No la usen en su ejercicio,
Soy sangrador caballero." (Ubi supra, acto i., esc. 15).

In Calderon's "Dicha y Desdicha del Nombre" (jorn. iii., esc. 1-2), I find ama and damas, adquiere and eres, fácilmente and inconvenientes, tiene and desdenes—enough to show, I think, that "the rule of assonance in Spanish poetry" has exceptions enough for my purpose. I am glad to find that my memory, in which I trusted when writing my postscript, has not played me false. In the romances it is often hard to say whether the author is making rhymes or asonantes, or a kind of hybrid of the two, but in an unrhymed one I at once find ama and damas ("Wolf y Hofmann," i. 80).

Meanwhile, my opinion of your omniscience is not in the least shaken; and I dare say you will make me out to be wrong after all. I have no doubt that we shall both agree with Duchesse de la Ferté: "Tiens, mon enfant, je ne vois que moi qui aie toujours raison!"

Fulano.

Harvard College, Oct. 9, 1869.

[What we said (Nation, Sept. 16) was that hablara would "not so well conform" as hablava "to the principle of versification observed in the poem." "Fulano" then asked us whether we "really thought it would make any difference in the asonante whether the word was hablava or hablara;" to which we replied that we did, "the rule of assonance in Spanish poetry being that the vowels correspond, while the consonants should be different. "Fulano" now shows that there are many infringements of this rule, which is no doubt true, but does not, it seems to us, weaken our position—in fact, may be said to strengthen it. His light way of speaking of our "omniscience" led us to fear not only that he doubted it himself, but was disposed to lessen the popular confidence in it, and thus diminish the popular reverence for our office. We therefore receive his disavowal with pleasure; and hope all parents, teachers, and pastors will take note of it. Few persistent attempts have been made to dispute our authority the perpetrators of which have not come to a bad end.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers, alleging that they were the first to publish George Eliot's novels in this country, and that for the early sheets of them they have from time to time paid five thousand dollars in gold, state that the edition which they are now publishing to compete with that of Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co.—similar in style, but cheaper in price—is from their old plates, and calls for no particular sympathy on behalf of the Boston publishers. The question, we need not remind our readers, is the same which two or three years ago entered into the Dickens controversy between the Harpers and the Petersons on one side and Messrs. Ticknor & Fields on the other, and consists in the extent to which property vests in works of which the advance sheets have been purchased.——Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. are to reprint in pamphlet form the luminous paper, "A Chapter on Erie," by Mr. Chas. Francis Adams, jr., which appeared in the July North American Review. The demand for it was so great as speedily to sell out the edition of the quarterly; and there are still better reasons why the article should be issued by itself. If ever public opinion is to help repress the Fisks, and Goulds, and Barnards, it must be thoroughly alive to what may be expected from these men in case they go unrestrained. Now, the original Erie war, though quite eclipsed by later operations, exhibits all the resources and possibilities of these adventurers, and can leave no reasonable person in doubt as to their character and their influence on the public morals.——Messrs. Wood & Holbrook have in press a work entitled "Physical, Intellectual, and Moral Culture; or, The True Art of Living," by Prof. F. G. Welch, Superintendent of Physical Culture in Yale College. The contents will range from heavy and musical gymnastics to essays on marriage, religion, culture, etc., and "a very large collection of the wisest sayings of great and good men of all ages and times." The same house announces "A Winter in Florida," by Ledyard Bill, with illustrations, making the third book relating to Florida that has appeared this year. The Herald of Health for 1870 will be enlivened by "an appropriate and charming story" by Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith.——Back in the country districts, among the farm-houses and the small villages, there is still flourishing a sort of literature the existence of which is almost forgotten by the average urban reader. Such are the works of Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, Mrs. Southworth, and several others, women, most of them, whose novels, sold by thousands and tens of thousands, have undoubtedly done much harm, and perhaps have done some good. Probably the best of all these writers was the author of "Queechy," who was a wonder of "unexceptionable moral tone;" and one of the worst of this better sort of them—the sort that produces moral and sentimental twaddle of various degrees of milk-and-wateriness—was Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz. Her books—twelve in all—after having been out of print for years—are going to be published again by Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers. The first volume of the series, "Linda, or the Young Pilot of the Belle Creole"—who eventually married the proud planter's daughter, if we remember—is to contain a biography of the author.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce as in press "A Metrical Pocket-book," which is a book of reference for the use of all kinds of people who need to know weights, measures, coins, etc. Clerks, jewellers, and other merchants, physicians, chemists, mechanics, and others, are promised a valuable manual. "The Great Empress; a Portrait," by Professor Schele De Vere, is another work announced by Lippincott; and still others, which we have not previously mentioned, are: "The Trial of Job," by Silas H. Durand, of which we cannot give any description; "Vital Philosophy," by J. S. McDonald, which is "a survey of substance and an exposition of natural religion;" and an "Analysis of American Law," by T. W. Powell.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt say that additional matter for Professor Whitney's German text-books—the "Reader" and the "Grammar"—will be supplied at a low price to purchasers who have already bought copies of the early issue, which was not quite complete. The same firm inform the large public that has bought the Tauchnitz "Thackeray" that they have received three volumes which perfect that edition—namely, one containing "Denis Duval," and two containing "The Roundabout Papers." But the Tauchnitz edition is not, strictly speaking, perfect, in the sense of including all the author's works. The Fields & Osgood edition is better for that; or, rather, is to be better. But the public that bought the pretty little Tauchnitz "Thackeray" is a large one, and will be glad to add to the number of its volumes.——"Hymns, Ancient and Modern," is announced by Messrs. Pott & Amery, who state that they will sell the volume with or without the appendix, and with or without tunes, or will sell the appendix only, and that also with or without tunes, in various bindings, and at various prices. This is the book of which more than four millions of copies have already been sold in England, besides parts of English editions and the American editions which have been sold in this country. Messrs. Pott & Amery speak of the sanctioning of the collection by the last General Convention of the Episcopal Church. The Convention, which, no doubt, might have "authorized" it, did, we believe, say that any bishop might, if he liked, authorize its use in his own diocese. Some Church reading-books, in series, some secular, some scriptural, and a book by the late Dr. Hawks—"Elementary Instruction in the English Language"—are also announced by the same firm.

—We cheerfully reproduce the following card from the Hartford Courant. No one, we presume, has imagined that Mrs. Stowe told all she knew in her Atlantic article, or that she would consent to let her case rest where public criticism has left it:

"Mrs. Stowe desires the friends of justice and fair dealing to publish for her this announcement:

"That she has kept silence hitherto in regard to the criticisms on her article on Lady Byron for two reasons. First, because she regarded the public mind as in too excited a state to consider the matter dispassionately; and, secondly, because she has expected the developments of additional proofs in England, some of which of great importance have already come to hand. Mrs. Stowe is preparing a review of the whole matter, with further facts and more documents, including several letters of Lady Byron to her, attesting the vigor and soundness of her mind at the period referred to, and also Mrs. Stowe's own letters to Lady Byron at the same time, which were returned to her by the executors soon after that lady's death. She will also give the public a full account of the circumstances and reasons which led her to feel it to be her duty to make this disclosure as an obligation alike of justice, gratitude, and personal friendship."

—We have received from Mr. H. Gaidoz, the editor of the Revue Celtique announced in our issue of September 16, a copy of the circular in which he invites support to his undertaking, and which enables us to add to what we have already said on this subject. The first thing to be noticed is that the contributions to this quarterly will be printed in the vernacular in which they are written, if this be English, French, or German; or in Latin; but should a certain number of subscribers desire it the German papers will be translated into French. The field contemplated by the Revue embraces Celtic studies in the widest sense—"mythology, history, literary history, and archæology, as far as archæology immediately illustrates history and mythology." What we may call the editorial purpose is to publish "inedited Irish, Scotch-Gaelic, Manx, Welsh, Cornish, and Breton texts, with translations," these being selected for their bearing on philology, literary history, or mythology; "philological essays on the Celtic languages, and on their relationship with the other Indo-European languages; researches on the religion of the ancient Celts and on Celtic folklore;" a bibliography of all the works published in Europe concerning Celtic studies in the course of the year, etc., etc. A part of the scheme consists also in reprinting "interesting and scarce texts or tracts, such as O'Clerigh's "Irish Glossary," Griffith Roberts's "Welsh Grammar," and the like. The first number of the Revue is already provided for, and reckons amongst its contributors French, German, and English scholars, who touch on nearly all the topics enumerated above. Max Müller and Ernest Renan have written in hearty approval of the project, and the Revue is certain not only to fill a gap in the literature of learning, but also, we trust, to be liberally sustained. In this country subscriptions will be received by Messrs. E. Steiger, John Wiley & Son, and E. P. Dutton & Co., of this city, or by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia. According to the style of issue, the price will be one pound or (on laid paper with the names of subscribers) two pounds per annum, postage included. Single numbers will not be sold. The editor's address is care of Mr. F. Vieweg, 67 rue Richelieu, Paris.

—A writer in the September Blackwood discourses in a pleasant and instructive way of some lost preterites in our English speech, and of others, like ate, bade bidden, durst, which are in process of perishing. The article will be found good reading for its incidental comments on passages in Milton and Shakspeare, and for several fresh and unexpected derivations. Of the former we may cite (Macbeth, act iii., scene ii.) the passage—

> "Light thickens, and the crow > Makes wing to the rooky wood."

The word italicized seems to fit the context so well as almost to pass unchallenged; but it should read roaky—from the preterite roke, or roak, of reek, to emit smoke or vapor—and be interpreted "dark" or "obscure." Doughty the writer derives immediately from dow, to be able, to thrive; dought, was able. "This verb," he continues, "is utterly lost from English literature, but, like many others of its sturdy class, exists in the speech of the English peasantry, and in the speech as well as the literature of Scotland . . . . . 'I do as well as I dow'—i. e., 'I do as well as I can'—is a common phrase in the North," and "How do you do?" is only "How do you dow?" in ungrammatical disguise. The writer is particularly strong in his acquaintance with the Scotch; and that this is not the erudition of a stranger to the heather is shown by his misuse of will in these sentences: "An Englishman," he says, "must resort to the periphrase of 'I will be able' to express power in futurity;" and "'I will be obliged to do such and such a thing hereafter." To stay the abandonment of the old forms—many of which would render good service in the rhymester's vocabulary—the writer invokes the aid of the poets especially. These have to some extent made the endeavor—Tennyson for one—and have sought at least to save the monosyllabic form for the monosyllabic participle—as spilt in place of spilled, burnt for burned, slipt for slipped, etc. But the proof-readers are too strong for the influence of any single author to make head against them, and besides, the poets must have their license too. Emerson needed the two syllables when he wrote:

> "He builded better than he knew;"

and indeed we may say that it was not as mere metrical syllables that he needed them, but that the slow progress of the action to which the verse refers is more forcibly presented by the word chosen than by the monosyllabic preterite. We do not know, however, that we do not condemn him for passing by "shone" in his lines where he says:

> "Thine eyes still shined for me though far
> I lonely roved the land or sea."

What more of force is got from the oddness of the verb does not, we should say, pay for the slight disagreeableness of the identity of the vowel sound in the word we complain of and the first word of the line.

—The Gaiety Journal is a periodical which is soon to be started in London, and which will be devoted, its conductors say, to literature, science, and art. Judging from the contributors, however, we should say that the literature, science, and art will not be of the higher kind. Mr. John Oxenford, a well-known dramatic critic, is one of them; so is Mr. G. A. Sala; Mr. Dutton Cook, Mr. John Hollingshead, and Mr. Dion Boucicault are others; and the theatrical world will be more interested in the literary matter of the new journal than the general public is likely to be. But the general public may very likely take an interest in seeing the paper for the sake of a series of satirical caricatures which it is to contain, and which it will be worth while to have if they shall really be as good as those in Vanity Fair—which promise is made. These latter, by the way, now have for their subjects the European crowned heads—crowned and discrowned. The first is of Napoleon III. in his uncle's great-coat and cocked hat, walking with a cane over which he stoops, while with his right hand he leans heavily on a blooming French girl, with rather a British-American look than a typical French one, who does duty as an allegorical Constitutional France. It can hardly be said, however, that Napoleon is caricatured. On the contrary, this picture is flattery in comparison with some of the unfortunate photographs he has had taken, which vulgarize him very much. In the work of the satirist "the situation" may be said to be slightly caricatured, but Napoleon has a face which corresponds with the good character his friends give him rather than with what Louis Blanc would say, or Mr. Kinglake has written; and the Emperor's prostration, which is successfully represented by the artist, gives quite a pathetic interest to the picture. Queen Isabella, who is the subject of the second of the new series of cartoons, is not dealt with very severely either, severely enough, however, to make her appear as incapable and sensual as it is necessary to believe her. On the whole, the readers of Vanity Fair will be glad, we think, that the "Statesmen" series is not to be abandoned wholly; and it is hard to see why the managers of the paper have not before this pre-empted, as we over here say, the field in which they will now most likely have to meet the Gaiety Journal—the field, namely, which the authors, actors, and social celebrities of Britain offer to a satirist.

— Much has been said and written about the credulity—the almost more than human incapacity of weighing evidence—which is charged upon mathematicians; but M. Michel Chasles, probably the greatest living mathematician of the continent of Europe, will go down to posterity in volumes of anecdotes of the learned with as high a reputation for simplicity as any mathematical poor body has earned since Sir Isaac Newton cut a little hole in the door for the kitten to use, although already there was in the same door a larger hole which our famous reasoner had made for the use of the cat. Sir William Hamilton was, perhaps, not so far wrong in his belief that the pursuit of high mathematical studies was not only no good means of cultivating the reasoning powers, but was even, as he boldly used to say, prejudicial to the intellect generally. Certainly, a man may be a skilful reasoner when his premises are given him and a mathematical truth is to be demonstrated, while he may in the region of the contingent, when premises are to be found by himself and probabilities are to be weighed, be no better than a child. M. Chasles, as our readers know, has on more than one occasion recently come before the French Academy of Sciences, of which he is so great a pillar and ornament, and offered for inspection letters purporting to have been written by Pascal, by Milton, by Newton, Newton's mother, and dozens of other distinguished people, and which were so palpably forgeries of a very impudent and clumsy kind, that they were only inspected to be at once condemned. The Pascal letters made some little stir, to be sure, for they engaged Englishmen in a discussion as to whether Newton had or had not pilfered from the great Frenchman his discovery of the law of gravitation. But the discussion went all one way, for each new contribution to it brought from some new quarter pieces of evidence which alone were enough to make the forger's position ridiculously untenable. When, for a second and a third time, M. Chasles came forward with new treasures-trove, he had only himself for a believer, though the civility of examining his stores was done him. He, however, did persist in his belief till very recently. "How," he said to the Academy, "could I believe the manuscripts to be ungenuine when they included numerous letters from Julius Cæsar himself?" And if Julius Cæsar was not of himself sufficient, were there not the Apostles also, who wrote some of the letters—for which unfortunate M. Chasles paid out six thousand pounds sterling—and several of "the Roman Emperors and the Fathers of the Church?" Now, however, in spite of this weight of evidence, he is convinced that he went wrong—though not so very wrong either, for, as he still vehemently insists, there, after all, was Julius Cæsar, with the Apostles themselves at his back. No one now doubts the poor gentleman's perfect honesty, though we confess to having been a little suspicious for a little while. It is better, however, as the case has turned out, to adopt the opinion of Dugald Stewart. He says: "In the course of my experience, I have never met with a mere mathematician who was not credulous to a fault; credulous not only with respect to human testimony, but credulous also in matters of opinion, and prone on all subjects which he had not carefully studied to repose too much faith in illustrious and consecrated names."

WALLACE'S MALAY ARCHIPELAGO.*

Though nominally a book of travel, Mr. Wallace's crowded chapters are arranged with reference to a scientific thesis, viz., that in the East Indian Archipelago there meet, and have only recently begun to mingle, two quite distinct races of men—the Malays and the Papuans—and that these islands are really the fragments of two continental systems, between which it is possible to draw accurately the dividing line. The author's observations, therefore, on the fauna and inhabitants of each island which he visited are directly used as an argument in establishing first its relation to the mainland, and then to its sister islands; the probable order of its dismemberment, through volcanic activity producing subsidence of the adjoining parts; and some of the vicissitudes of elevation it may have undergone in reaching its present state. He attempts, as he says, to bring zoölogy to the rescue of the geologists, who are thrown off the scent when they come to water; and, by means of "an accurate knowledge of the distribution of birds and insects, to map out lands and continents which disappeared beneath the ocean long before the earliest traditions of the human race." For this purpose, his plan is probably the best that could have been adopted. He disregards chronological sequence, and skips now backwards now forwards in the eight years of his tropical wanderings, but observes a geographical succession, and finishes as he goes along, although he may have visited a given island a number of times. Each of the five groups which he distinguishes has a separate chapter discussing its natural history, and the support it lends to the thesis first-mentioned. The reader, thus escaping the fatigue of unbroken narration, readily consents to do at intervals a little necessary thinking, and is more easily persuaded by the argument taken in detail.

This method is different from Prof. Bickmore's, who has chosen the commoner form of the diary, and who had no theory to maintain. We have re-read his work in comparison with Mr. Wallace's, and have been gratified to find them complementary of each other in an eminent degree. For instance, the latter is chiefly a zoölogist, the former a geologist and conchologist. Hence the general outline and prominent physical characteristics of each island, as seen on approach to it, are carefully noted by Bickmore; while, with one or two exceptions, Wallace makes no account of his voyages, but begins his descriptions on terra-firma. Then, their explorations were not coextensive, and when they coincided the one has much to tell which the other overlooks, and generally they do not seem to have been entertained by the same persons. Thus they often saw nature and society very differently, as was remarkably the case with the island of Bouru, which formed the subject of one of Bickmore's pleasantest chapters—he visiting it in the dry season—and one of Wallace's least agreeable, since he found everything wet and miserable. There is, however, too much of the guide-book in Bickmore, and he may without shame yield in attractiveness of style and in extent of knowledge to his senior. The search after shells, too, competes at a disadvantage with the hunting and taming of orang-utans and the discovery of birds of paradise—two specialties which alone would render the English naturalist's work more interesting; and that Mr. Wallace can tell a story very well merely for the sake of telling it is evident from Chapter XII.—a delightful episode, in which the Rajah of Lombock figures as a census-taker.

It is difficult to choose from the wealth of observations collected by Mr. Wallace such as shall best represent him. As a disciple of Darwin, to whom he dedicates his book, he offers fresh evidence to confirm his views of the origin of species. Sharing the scepticism as to final causes which distinguishes modern science, he writes thus of the durion, which he calls the king of fruit, and which is "about the size of a large cocoa-nut, and covered all over with short, stout spines:"

"Poets and moralists, judging from our English trees and fruits, have thought that small fruits always grew on lofty trees, so that their fall should be harmless to man, while the large ones trailed on the ground. Two of the largest and heaviest fruits known, however, the Brazil-nut fruit and durion, grow on lofty forest trees, from which they fall as soon as they are ripe, and often wound or kill the native inhabitants. From this we may learn two things: first, not to draw general conclusions from a very partial view of nature; and secondly, that trees and fruits, no less than the varied productions of the animal kingdom, do not appear to be organized with exclusive reference to the use and convenience of man."

In the same spirit, he remarks of the birds of paradise:

"It seems sad that on the one hand such exquisite creatures should live out their lives and exhibit their charms only in these wild inhospitable regions, doomed for ages yet to come to hopeless barbarism; while, on the other hand, should civilized man ever reach these distant lands, and bring moral, intellectual, and physical light into the recesses of these virgin forests, we may be sure that he will so disturb the nicely balanced relations of organic and inorganic nature as to cause the disappearance, and finally the extinction, of these very beings whose wonderful structure and beauty he alone is fitted to appreciate and enjoy. This consideration must surely tell us that all living things were not made for man. Many of them have no relation to him. The cycle of their existence has gone on independently of his, and is disturbed or broken by every advance in man's intellectual development; and their happiness and enjoyments, their loves and hates, their struggles for existence, their vigorous life and early death, would seem to be immediately related to their own well-being and perpetuation alone, limited only by the equal well-being and perpetuation of the numberless other organisms with which each is more or less intimately connected."

There is still, of course, a sense in which every created thing visible to man, and capable of stimulating his curiosity or satisfying his intelligence, may be said to have been made for him; and this has been abused by the theologians to exaggerate man's importance in the universe, whereas it is not his order or end in creation, but his perfectibility, that is in question, and which might subordinate to itself even higher organizations than man's own. In this sense, races and generations of men exist and have existed for the benefit of mankind—the inhabitant of the "lake-dwellings" lately revealed in Switzerland not more than the Papuan pile-dweller whom Mr. Wallace encountered in New Guinea, alive and actually accumulating his "kitchen-midden." The study, indeed, of savage and barbarous tribes in the Archipelago lends half its worth to Mr. Wallace's narrative, and he derives from the native society of the islands valuable lessons for all civilized communities.

His narrative closes with a contrast, by no means favorable to his country, between English civilization and the natural state of the savage peoples whom he had visited in the East and previously in South America, and among whom, though without laws or courts, individual rights were scrupulously regarded and seldom infringed, a nearly perfect equality prevailed, and, the incitement to great crimes being wanting, petty crimes were "repressed partly by the influence of public opinion, but chiefly by that natural sense of justice and of his neighbor's right which seems to be, in some degree, inherent in every race of man." We get the other side of this picture when we examine, not the harmony of any given tribe or population within itself, but inter-tribal relations, and find in the "head-hunters" and pirates of the Archipelago the analogue of our Indian scalpers and something worse; and when we learn of the abrogation of many of these savage practices since the advent of Europeans. We are still further enlightened when pointed to the increase of the native population in Java as the best evidence of good government—at least, of a much better government than the Dutch supplanted: the grinding tyranny of the native princes. Java Mr. Wallace calls the best-governed tropical island in the world, and it doubles its population in about twenty-six years. In Celebes, however, or at least in the region called Minahasa, where the Dutch system has produced even more striking results in the manners, peaceableness, and industry of the natives, the increased population is not, according to our author, what it should be, and he adds: "I can only impute this to one cause—infant mortality, produced by neglect while the mothers are working in the plantations, and by general ignorance of the conditions of health in infants." On the other hand, in accounting for the stationary population of the Hill Dyaks of Borneo under Sir James Brooke's régime, he attributes it to the infertility of the women, and this in turn to their "hard labor and the heavy weights they constantly carry." Mr. Wallace's remedy in both instances is to withdraw the women from the field to the house, and to confine them to domestic occupations—"a change which has already to a great extent taken place in the allied Malay, Javanese, and Bugis tribes." This appears to be sound advice in a tropical country, but in our sub-tropical South we are witnessing such a withdrawal of female laborers from agriculture without notable increase in the population, owing, it is said, to the nefarious practice of fœticide.

Scattered through many pages of Mr. Wallace's work, we find rather an elaborate defence of the Dutch colonial system in the Archipelago, partly as an offset to the representations contained in the story of "Max Havelaar." So far as the actual rule is concerned, and the general welfare of the governed populations, we allow great weight to Mr. Wallace's testimony. Had he stopped there, it seems to us, he would have furnished the best of arguments—"by their fruits." But he must go on and maintain not only that the Dutch policy has been a prudent one in all respects—elevating the natives while strengthening the European dominion, and earning vast revenues for the mother country—but also peculiarly a moral one. In taking this extreme and uncalled-for position, he has neglected to set clearly before his readers the historical progress of the Dutch rule in Malaysia, without a knowledge of which the discussion is calculated rather to deceive than to enlighten. For instance, because the Dutch East India Company supplanted with a milder sway the Portuguese, while still intent on exploiting the natives for its own benefit, Mr. Wallace allows himself to speak of these traders as "repaying themselves" by getting a monopoly of the spice traffic, as if what they had done were a laborious act of Christian charity and not the product of the purest selfishness. We are not told that this Company governed in the East for two centuries, and that the present system owes nothing to it but the extent of territory in which it is applied: an expansion fatal to the Company, to which it was led by the spirit of commercial greed in as naked and unscrupulous a form as was ever witnessed, and which involved the wholesale destruction of spice-trees in all but one or two islands so small as to be easily guarded by the Company. It is this "abolition of the spice trade in the Moluccas" which Mr. Wallace calls "actually beneficial to the inhabitants," and "an act both wise in itself and morally and politically justifiable." And his language will not appear as strong as it is unless we consider the immense amount of bloodshed which was the price of this policy before it could be established, or when we compare it with the following passage from Bickmore, in his account of the Banda isles:

"During this long contest the natives are said to have lost three thousand killed and a thousand prisoners, or more than a fourth part of what has been stated as their whole number when the Dutch arrived. All who were left alive fled to the neighboring islands, and not a vestige of their language or peculiar customs is known to exist at the present time. The Dutch were thus left sole possessors of the coveted prize, but there were no natives to cultivate the nutmeg trees, and they were therefore obliged to import slaves to do their labor. When slavery was abolished [1859] in the Dutch possessions, convicts were sent from Java to make up the deficiency, and at this time there are about three thousand of them in all these islands. They are a most villanous-looking set, and have nearly all been guilty of the bloodiest crimes. They are obliged to wear around the neck a large iron ring, weighing a pound or a pound and a half."

Mr. Wallace, however, regrets to have learned that "since leaving the country, this monopoly [of the nutmeg trade] has been partially or wholly discontinued, a proceeding which appears exceedingly injudicious and quite unnecessary." He rather naïvely remarks, as a reason, that "a small country like Holland cannot afford to keep distant and expensive colonies at a loss"—and he seems actually to suppose that the monopoly might have been abandoned while it still paid, and because of a mistaken sentiment against it! It is notorious that the monopoly had practically ceased to exist, and that the revenues of the Spice Islands had long been falling short of their expenses, owing to competition that could not be overcome, when the Government decided to abolish the monopoly inherited from the East India Company.

While we fail to share our author's views of a monopoly begun in violence and confirmed by despotism, and ending appropriately in bankruptcy, neither can we wholly accept his reasoning in favor of the Dutch corvée, however admirable its workings and however adapted to the genius of the Malays. He says that the latter are merely undergoing one of the stages which every civilized people has passed through, though not always under such favorable auspices. Ten years ago, however, the same thing could have been said as truly in defence of slavery, not only the mild sort tolerated in the Archipelago, but the infinitely brutal and cruel slavery (of a less vindictive race) of the Trans-Vaal and Guiana. We think, therefore, that Mr. Wallace would have done better to put aside à priori arguments, in favor of those drawn from experience of the latter days of the Dutch rule—such, for example, as those already referred to, furnished by the astonishing improvements in Java and the Minahasa. These he should have sought in the history of the Dutch Colonies during the past fifty years—the period of such great administrators as Van der Capellen, Van den Bosch, and Rochussen, who respectively invented the existing official subordination, substituted the corvée for direct taxes, and firmly settled the hold of Holland upon the smaller islands in her East Indian domain. Over the period occupied by the East India Company it is most convenient to draw a veil, and worse than useless to make it seem respectable by proving England's Indian history even more disreputable and tyrannical. Let the dead past bury its dead, and let us start afresh with only one datum: The Dutch are here. The superior is in contact, as master, with the inferior. For such a state of things is liberty or a modified despotism, is protection or free trade, the wiser and humaner policy? Is political economy the science of mixed, or only of co-ordinate, civilizations? Here the author is upon solid ground, and his conclusions we believe to be in the main correct. We shall not dwell upon this topic, but shall simply remark that it is worth all the attention which his readers can give it.

ANOTHER POPULAR ROMAN HISTORY.*

Dr. Wilhelm Ihne, already distinguished for his researches in the field of Roman antiquities, has published the first volume of a Roman History, designed, like Mommsen's, "not for scholars and investigators, but for the entire educated public;" but differing from Mommsen's in giving arguments and authorities, and thus aiming "to place the reader in a position to take part himself in the investigation." To a certain extent this is practicable and desirable, and is a valuable feature of the book; but when it comes to the great disputed questions of early Roman history, it is out of the question to present the arguments satisfactorily in the space which can be given to this; or, indeed, to present them at all, to those who are not already familiar with the points at issue. He continually finds it necessary to refer to Schwegler's great work, or to his own "Forschungen," for the detailed proofs of propositions advanced; and the brief answers that he gives to Mommsen's new views are in the highest degree unsatisfactory. So that, after all, his readers, no less than Mommsen's, have to take for granted his reasons, and accept his views on faith.

But even the limited space which can be given to special discussions is not always used to the best advantage. For instance, far too much space is given to the work of demonstrating the incredibility of the old traditions. Surely this is a thing that we have a right to take for granted, as nobody nowadays holds to the old traditions except Mr. Dyer and Gerlach and Bachofen. It is very well to point out a few of the inconsistencies and improbabilities of these traditions, but, after all, they are rejected rather on the ground of general principles of historical evidence than by reason of the incredibility of individual statements; for most of these it is easy to explain away, as Mr. Dyer does. For instance, it is usually declared impossible that the seven kings of Rome should have reigned an average of thirty-four years each. But the seven first Kings of France, of the Capetian House (commencing with the accession of Hugh Capét to the ducal throne), averaged thirty-eight years. So that it is not wise to push the argument ab incredibili too far.

We must say, moreover, that Dr. Ihne manifests an excessive degree of scepticism in regard to these traditions, even surpassing Schwegler in this. For Schwegler admits the historical character of some of the kings, while Ihne rejects them all indiscriminately; and of the treaty of Servius Tullius with the Latins, which Schwegler says "no judicious investigator will question," our author says that the evidence is "throughout untrustworthy." So in numerous other cases. The insufficiency of method in his treatment of these old legends is illustrated in the story of Coriolanus, to which he will not admit even a nucleus of historical fact, while Mommsen, with genuine historical insight, adds after relating the story: "How much in this is true cannot now be determined; but the narration opens to us a view into the deep moral and political infamy of these contests of the orders." This excessive scepticism is indeed only the exaggeration of a correct sentiment as to the uselessness of trying to reconcile much of the testimony in regard to the early period; only we regret that he spends so much time in proving this. A good illustration of this sound reasoning is found on page 57, in regard to the utter untrustworthiness of the numbers in the organization of centuries ascribed to Servius Tullius. These numbers he shows (from Schwegler) must have been derived from a much later period. Another point of cardinal importance is made on page 93: "For us the entire period of the monarchy is only the assumed point of departure for the development of the republic." We should be glad to see these fabulous times wholly relegated to the domains of fable, except in so far as we can draw from them solid facts as a basis for later and authentic history.

So far as Dr. Ihne advances peculiar theories of his own, they have been already promulgated in every case, if we are not mistaken, in his "Forschungen," published in 1847. These views are: that the relation of clientship was derived from conquest; that the Sabines formed a much larger element in Latium than is usually assumed (including, for instance, the Albans); that the Tarquinian period was one of Etruscan supremacy; that the overthrow of the monarchy was followed by a transition period of dictators before the definite establishment of the consular government; that the right of provocatio did not belong to the plebeians until the time of the decemvirs. The second of these is unimportant; the last rests upon very weak arguments, and has found, we believe, no supporters. The first, on the other hand, has probably a considerable degree of truth; a part of the clients, at least, may well have belonged to a conquered people, although undoubtedly one of cognate race. The relation in which they stood to their patrons was almost precisely what it might be expected to be after a conquest in which the vanquished were not reduced to slavery, if any such there was.

The Etruscan theory advanced by our author is not the utterly groundless one of an Etruscan element in the Roman state (the tribe of the Luceres), but of a conquest and dynastic rule directly connected with a general extension of Etruscan power toward the south at this epoch. This hypothesis we do not consider by any means an improbable one. We know that in the sixth century before Christ the Etruscans were at the height of their power and activity, having even got a foothold in Campania. The strange traditions of Cælius Vibenna and Mastarna, the conquest of Porsena, and the unanimous testimony of the ancients that the royal insignia were of Etruscan origin, all point in this direction. But, granting this, it cannot have been anything but a dynastic rule. The Etruscans hardly left their impress upon the Roman institutions and nationality in any perceptible degree. If they ruled Latium at all, it was as the Hyksos ruled Egypt—a mere interruption of the national continuity. And, however this may be, we think our author, in his eagerness to sustain his Etruscan theory, very much underrates the influence of Greece upon Rome, which he thinks hardly existed at all until about the time of Pyrrhus.

Our author's most original and ingenious theory is "that after the overthrow of the monarchy a period of the government of dictators followed, which we find last in the hands of Valerius [Publicola]" (p. 107). This is only a doubtful inference from a variety of independent facts and allusions, and our author does well to do no more than hint at it in the present volume: in the "Forschungen" he develops it in some detail, and makes indeed a very interesting bit of constructive history out of it. What is certain is that this period just after the overthrow of Tarquin is one of great confusion and uncertainty, and that it would appear certain that the events of a number of years are here crowded into two or three; so that this theory may serve as well as any to fill up the gap. And, at any rate, one is thankful in these dry chronicles for the vivid portraiture he gives us of so great a man as he makes out Valerius Publicola to have been—the real founder of the Roman Republic.

We cannot quite make out Dr. Ihne's meaning where he denies that the causes usually assigned for the secession of the Plebs—the harsh laws of debt, the iniquitous occupation of the public lands, etc.—were adequate ones, and says that we must seek its occasion rather "in the general political situation of the Plebs" than in special grievances. Surely all history teaches us that it is not a general condition of despotism, but specific acts of tyranny that cause the insurrection of a community; although, of course, it was those general evils that gave rise to the special abuses.

Dr. Ihne, who has resided in England, gives us another illustration—like Niebuhr and Mommsen—how a German student must constantly turn to English institutions when he wishes to find analogies for the free constitutions of the ancient world. An interesting example of this is in a note on p. 70, in speaking of the uniform tradition, referred to above, that the royal insignia were of Etruscan origin: "This can be explained," he goes on, "only on the assumption that Etruscan princes ruled in Rome; somewhat as the employment of French formularies in the Parliamentary language in England points to the Norman Conquest."

When the perilous ground of the early ages is passed, in discussing the constitutional changes and the external history after the time of the Decemvirs, we have little but praise for the book before us, except where a paragraph is occasionally vitiated by a false theory; as, for instance, that concerning the right of appeal for plebeians. So, in a note to p. 173, he takes exception to Mommsen's proposition "that there were two quite distinct kinds of tribe-assemblies—to wit, pure plebeian, in which only plebeians had the right to vote, under the presidency of tribunes of the people, or ædiles; and patrician-plebeian, which embraced the whole body of citizens." But this distinction, which Rubino called attention to in 1839, we consider not only as fully proved, but as solving some of the most difficult problems in Roman antiquities. Our author himself admits that patrician magistrates presided at the comitia tributa, and it is hard to see how this fact can be reconciled with the assumed exclusion of patricians from these comitia.

* "Römische Geschichte von Wilhelm Ihne. Erster Band. Von der Gründung Roms bis zum ersten punischen Kriege." Leipzig: Verlag von Wilhelm Engelmann. 1868. 8vo, pp. 483.

We are glad to see that an English edition of this work, prepared by the author himself, is about to appear in London.

Her Majesty's Tower. By William Hepworth Dixon, editor of the Athenæum, and author of "New America," "Spiritual Wives," etc.—(Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.: New York; Harper & Brothers. 1869.)—Mr. Hepworth Dixon certainly has a genius for title-pages. He believes as firmly as did Mr. Shandy in the virtue of names. And whether or not as much of the success in life of young Christians depends upon a good selection as the sage of Shandy Hall maintained, there can be no doubt that it has much to do with the success of new books. A taking title is as much of a letter of recommendation to a book as Lord Chesterfield said a handsome face is to a man. Mr. Dixon, being a born book-maker, knew this by instinct, and has accordingly baptized his bantlings with appellations that at once attracted attention to them, and then sent them into the world to make their way with less regard to their moral character than to their pecuniary success. "Rem, quocunque modo, rem," has been the maxim he impressed upon them, and we have reason to believe that they have performed their mission and brought back to their author a good store of coined money. Mr. Dixon is emphatically one of those who have their good things in this life, which probably suits him entirely. The character of his works is not such as will secure for him much credit in the next age or in the next world. Like the razors of Peter Pindar's "Razor-Seller," they are "made to sell," and as long as they do sell, what does the maker care?

Mr. Dixon's books on this country were good specimens of his wares. Good, we mean, as showing the methods of his manufacture. In making up his "New America" and "Spiritual Wives," he was happily able to dispense with authenticity in collecting his materials, and with honesty in putting them together, while he had hit upon excellent names, sure of attracting the attention of the curious public. A less ingenious man, with such a field before him, with an imagination to draw upon for his facts, or to distort and color such as were really existent, might well make a book that would sell in a market that was greedy of such merchandise. In "Spiritual Wives," however, he overdid his market, which was not ready for such strong meat so highly spiced. It put money in his purse, but it damaged his literary and, we believe, his social status, by the mingled disgust, disbelief, and ridicule which it excited in the best quarters. We were a little surprised, therefore, to see that he had received "express permission" to dedicate his last work, "Her Majesty's Tower," to the Queen, as we believe that the royal permission is not granted in such cases as a matter of course.

Not that there is anything to object to in the book itself, excepting that it has no particular raison d'être. It is made up according to Mr. Dixon's infallible receipt. "The Tower of London" was too common a name for a book about it, and so he adopted the old-fashioned style which was in use when the public property of the nation was more specifically that of the sovereign than it is now. In a sense, the Tower is her Majesty's, as the courts of justice, the army and navy, and her loyal Commons are hers. Having the name, he was in no lack of materials for the making of the book. Indeed, they are abundant for a dozen such. There would, indeed, be no end of making books if state prisons may be made the text for the history of all the prisoners confined in them. Mr. Dixon certainly has the literary knack of putting his materials in a readable shape. There is little, if anything, that is new about them; but they are managed in a workmanlike manner, worthy of so experienced a book-maker. And, separately, they are of course deeply and enduringly interesting; but there is something that borders on the revolting in the collecting together of so many of the bloody businesses of which the Tower was the scene. It is supping too full of horrors. One rises from the book sickened with blood. On the whole, it is not a dainty dish to set before a Queen. Her Tower has been, indeed, "with many a foul and midnight murder fed," as well as with the many more committed in the face of the sun. Gray was not far wrong when he branded it as "London's Lasting Shame!"

If we might be allowed to suggest a topic to Mr. Dixon for his next book, we would propose his taking one of her Majesty's palaces as his text—say St. James's or Windsor Castle. Great numbers of interesting people have passed through them, and they have been the scene of much history, public and secret, which it will not be hard to hunt up, and easy to serve up. And it will have the advantage of affording a variety of savory dishes of various flavors, substantial history and light biography, not unspiced with the sauce piquante of scandal. This will make an agreeable change after the feast of blood with which he has surfeited us, and there is quite as much reason for providing the one as the other.

Essays on Political Economy of the late Frederic Bastiat. Translated from the Paris edition of 1863. (Chicago: Western News Co. 1869.)—Mr. Horace White, of the Chicago Tribune, has here presented the American public with a selection from the essays of M. Bastiat, including the first and second series of the "Sophisms of Protection," and the essays entitled "Spoliation and Law" and "Capital and Interest." In the first series of the "Sophisms," Mr. White has followed the translation of Mrs. McCord, published in New York in 1848, by Mr. Putnam. The rest is, we believe, his own. It is worth mention that another very good translation of the first series, by G. R. Porter, author of "The Progress of the Nation," was published in London in 1849, with some useful notes, containing illustrations drawn from the history of the Anti-Corn-law League in England. The conflict being then over in England, it had comparatively a small circulation, but still enough to confirm thousands permanently in the free-trade faith. We have partially compared this with the first twenty-two chapters of the book before us, which is as far as the first series goes; and think Mrs. McCord's is, on the whole, the better—certainly the most thoroughly Englished. In one or two places, however, which Mr. White has perhaps overlooked, we think he might judiciously have made corrections. The title of Chapter II., "Obstacle—Cause," is slightly misleading. Its proper rendering would be, as it is in Porter's edition, "Obstacle—Object." The fallacy the chapter exposes is that of considering scarcity an object to be aimed at instead of an obstacle to be removed. Generally, however, the volume leaves little to be desired, and Mr. White's part of the work is exceedingly well done, and not the least valuable portion of it is his preface, which is a very useful introduction to Bastiat. Of Bastiat, it need only be said that he has never been answered, and that he is unanswerable, and that he has produced one of the clearest and most telling statements in existence of the free-trade theory, or, to put it more correctly, of the laws of human nature which regulate the interchange of human services—a statement in the presence of which protectionists are as helpless as savage spearmen opposed to a civilized army bearing breech-loaders. The discussion, as he conducts it, is hardly exciting. It is not a combat, but slaughter; and anybody who wants to know what free-trade doctrines are, stripped of all excrescences in the shape of figures, and set out in a style so sparkling that it reads almost like a vaudeville, cannot do better than study the "Sophisms." Mr. White, by the way, expresses in his preface his wonder how the protective system ever came to be called "the American system." The explanation is simple enough. The New York Tribune has persuaded hundreds of thousands that it was invented by Henry C. Carey, and is now being taught by him to benighted foreigners, and that Henry Clay first embodied it in legislation; so that people have got up a kind of patriotic attachment to it as a native product. The fact is, as Mr. White points out, that it is a piece of old European machinery, in use there, in one form or another, for four or five centuries, and nearly as much opposed to every idea which can fairly be called American as the doctrine of the divine right of kings, or the patria potestas of the Roman law.

The Internal Struggles of the North American Union down to the Presidential Election of 1868 (Die inneren Kämpfe der Nordamerikanischen Union bis zur Präsidentenwahl von 1868). By H. Blankenburg. (Leipzig: F. A. Brockhaus. 1869.)—German scholars are generally held in high esteem for the conscientiousness and thoroughness with which they examine the minutest details ere they venture to lay their opinions and the results of their investigation before the public. Every author considers this good repute of German scholarship as a kind of personal property, and, therefore, does his best to avoid endangering it. There is but one exception to this. Everybody thinks himself entitled to write about America as if the United States were still the wondrous island of some half-forgotton fairy-tales, so that it is the task of fiction, but not of knowledge and calm reason, to draw the picture of the semi-fabulous Western representatives of the human race. We regret to say that Mr. Blankenburg has also fallen into this only too common mistake. His work on the late German war (see the Nation, February 25, 1869) was well received, and proved him to be an author of ability, extensive knowledge, and sound judgment. He, therefore, ought to have been doubly careful not to blight his promising prospects by venturing upon a field of which he seems totally ignorant. Prudence alone ought to have sufficed to prevent him from taking this step; for a man of his culture must be perfectly aware that the interest Europe, and especially Germany, is taking in the United States is increasing at a rapid rate, and that, in consequence, those golden days are nearly gone when a European work on the United States could pass unnoticed by American scholars. The book abounds to such a degree in the most shocking blunders that it would not deserve any criticism at all if it could not count upon an extensive circulation, thanks to the name of the author and of the publishing house. A few specimens, picked out quite at random, will sufficiently characterize this strange hodge-podge of ignorance and self-conceit, to say nothing worse. The history of the United States is so completely a closed book to Mr. Blankenburg that even the changes of the party names are unknown to him; p. 247, Washington and Madison are presented as "Whigs" in opposition to the "Democrats" Jefferson and Jackson. And such errors could be counted by the dozen. At p. 30, the removal of the Bank deposits is effected "by application of the veto power." So our historian does not know that the veto can be applied only to bills; nor does he know that the famous veto of President Jackson related to the rechartering of the Bank; nor that the removal of the deposits took place a long time after the veto; nor that the right to remove the deposits was vested by the charter in the Secretary of the Treasury and not in the President; nor that, in consequence of that, Duane had to be replaced by the more subservient Taney —in short, about this once all-important "internal struggle" he does not know anything. And about many of the most important events of the last two decades he knows just as little. At p. 49, the sixteen white and five colored partisans of John Brown at Harper's Ferry are increased to "several hundreds." But this trifling mistake hardly deserves to be mentioned; for Mr. Blankenburg evidently does not even know the year in which the Brown rising occurred, since a few lines further below the Presidential election of 1856 is spoken of as the "next," and on the following page the Kansas-Nebraska bill is mentioned for the first time. But the author amply indemnifies us for every minute he has been behind time in this instance; for on p. 145 and 197 we are informed that the Alabama question has been happily solved. All the numberless blunders of this kind will, however, be deemed insignificant, since proof upon proof might be offered that Mr. Blankenburg has never taken the trouble to read the Constitution, though he has had every facility for doing so, since it happens—by some fortunate accident which it is difficult to account for —to be appended to the work. A little pamphlet, published during the war by Mr. Theodore S. Fay, to secure the sympathies of Germany for the Union party, is the only authority the historian of "the internal struggles of the United States" has consulted upon the Constitution. We shall, therefore, hardly be surprised to find (p. 236) a provision of the Constitution relating solely to the States misrepresented and applied to the Territories; or to see (p. 270) "treason" and "impeachment" confounded, and then some provisions invented which apply neither to impeachment nor treason. After these specimens of the author's ignorance it is hardly worth while to mention such a trifle as that the national debt at the beginning of the war is estimated, on p. 137, at sixty to seventy millions, and, on p. 200, at "not three hundred millions." But, to do justice to the author, we cannot help acknowledging that some of his remarks hit the nail on the head. It would be utterly impossible to account for these oases in the vast desert if he did not inform us that this book is based upon an essay published by him in "Unsere Zeit," and if we did not know that this essay in "Unsere Zeit" is based upon a treatise written by the late Dr. Reinhold Solger for Mr. Blankenburg, to be read by him, as his, before a company of Prussian officers. The treatise of Dr. Solger, the pamphlet of Mr. Fay, a long-ago-antiquated work of Fr. Raumer, some newspaper clippings, and the messages of Andrew Johnson, are—the rough outlines of the history of the war excepted—the materials which have served to fill these 349 pages purporting to be an historical work.

The Swiss Family Robinson, in Words of one Syllable. By Mary Godolphin, author of "Robinson Crusoe, in Words of one Syllable," "Evenings at Home, in Words of one Syllable." (New York: George Routledge & Sons. 1869.)—There can be no need to recommend the volumes of this series to such parents as have already provided one or more of them for their children. Thus far, the stories selected by Miss Godolphin for rewriting have all been good ones, and her monosyllabic system has doubtless put them within easy reach of some very small readers. They may also have superseded, where used, the ordinary uninteresting primer, and so made the first effort at learning to read less of a toil and more of a pleasure than it usually is; and we can also imagine these little books to be useful in educating the freedmen and other illiterate adults. The present volume, however, we find to be seriously marred in the abridgment, and, it seems to us, unnecessarily so. We should never recognize the philosophic Ernest, who made most of the discoveries which made life endurable on the desert island, in the selfish "Ned" into whom he is transformed by one monosyllabic necessity—why not have called him Ernst?—while, by another, almost his sole good deed consists in his discovery of the great "boon" of a "cask of lard," which is monosyllabic for butter. Her rule of adhering strictly to words of one syllable often leads Miss Godolphin into amazing straits, as in the sentence: "I see some toil lies in our path this day"—which might well need explaining to little children even more than ordinarily well-versed in the meaning of words; or else into awkward phrases like these: "just hark at what we saw," "when our first burst of joy had gone off," or "vague things which I took for wild beasts"—an expression which is monosyllabic in form at the expense of being trisyllabic in intelligibility.

Some allowance must be made for the difficulties presented by the original work in this case, as compared with the older and simpler style of "Robinson Crusoe," or with that of "Evenings at Home," which last, as Miss Godolphin has treated it, is comparatively free from stiffness and obscurity, though showing in occasional passages a certain bondage to the text under reduction, and contentment with synonyms, which indeed fit the monosyllabic measure, but need to be translated in turn. Much greater capacity for this kind of editing has been shown, we think, by Mrs. E. A. Walker in the two books, "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress" and "From the Crib to the Cross," in Words of one Syllable (New York: George A. Leavitt). The former was announced and in type last spring, but has only now been published—almost simultaneously with Miss Godolphin's version of the same work. We do not wish to prejudge the latter, but should nevertheless expect Mrs. Walker's to surpass it in fluency and perhaps also in proportion. That, after all, is most troublesome in condensing Bunyan. He often supplies long sentences, as if made to order, of monosyllables, and the editor has merely to copy them bodily. "From the Crib to the Cross"—a somewhat sensational, if monosyllabic, title for a life of Christ—has a double advantage in the language of Scripture and in the latitude of an original narrative. Here, as in the Bunyan, Mrs. Walker has been more wise than Miss Godolphin, in not attempting to curtail or in any way meddle with the proper names, which are easily explained to refer to persons or places, and should cause no more trouble to children than "mamma" or "New York" in actual conversation.

Phocylidis Poema Admonitorium. Recognovit brevibusque notis instruxit J. B. Feuling, Ph.D., A.O.S.S., Professor Philologiæ Compar. in Univer. Wisconsinensi. (Andover: W. F. Draper. 1869.)—It was a good omen for the Philological Association, formed at Poughkeepsie, that its birth should be celebrated by a dedicatory publication worthy of its high aims. The brief poem ascribed to Phocylides, and at any rate declared to be worthy in its lofty morality of a Christian author, has been edited by Prof. Feuling with learning and judgment, and published in a style well adapted to the use of college classes. We trust that it will meet with a fitting welcome, and that future meetings of the Association will call out special pieces of philological work equally honorable to American scholarship.

HOURS AT HOME

FOR NOVEMBER

NOW READY.

BEGINS THE TENTH VOLUME.

It contains a chapter of "Recollections" by Thomas Sully, the oldest and greatest living portrait-painter of America, including Reminiscences of Queen Victoria, Lord Palmerston, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Benjamin West, Charles Leslie, Rembrandt Peale, Gilbert C. Stuart, and other notables; a hitherto unpublished poem by Fitz-Greene Halleck; "Scraps from my Autograph Book," by George M. Towle, with characteristic letters by Washington, Jackson, John Randolph of Roanoke, Lord Brougham, Garibaldi, and many others; "Marriages among Men of Genius;" "Madame de Chantal," by Miss Yonge, author of "The Heir of Redclyffe;" "Life in Mexico City;" "Henry Philpotts, late Bishop of Exeter;" "The Returned Veterans' Fest in Salzburg," by "H. H.," etc.

With the November number HOURS AT HOME commences its tenth volume. In the volume which begins with the November number, the charming story, "Compton Friars," by the author of "Mary Powell," will be concluded, and will be followed by a serial by a distinguished author, whose name will be hereafter announced. Short Stories, Sketches of Travel, Papers upon Natural History, Essays on Social Topics, Reminiscences, and Poems will be furnished by the following among other writers: Prof. Noah Porter, Miss C. M. Yonge, author of "The Heir of Redclyffe," R. H. Stoddard, Lucia Gilbert Calhoun, Mary Clemmer Ames, Dr. H. Bushnell, Maria Mitchell, Adeline D. T. Whitney, Mary E. Dodge, Dr. S. B. Hunt, E. C. Stedman, Jane G. Austin, Alice Cary, Dr. E. H. Gillette, Julia Ward Howe, J. T. Headley, George M. Towle, and "H. H."

The Conductors of HOURS AT HOME will also use every exertion to enlist in the service of the Magazine new talent, to ensure the discussion of topics of current interest by the writers best qualified to treat of them, and to make their periodical in every respect still more worthy of the favor which has thus far been so generously extended to it.

The Week.

THE Pennsylvania and Ohio elections, on Tuesday the 12th, turned out fully as well as we stated last week, and better, considerably, than we had been expecting for a fortnight or so beforehand. Republicans generally, throughout the country, were prepared for a defeat in Pennsylvania, at least; and some shrewd Republican observers conceded the success of Pendleton in Ohio. The latter State is always to be called uncertain—or, rather, it is always pretty safe to count on some sort of a surprise from her. Nobody therefore felt perfectly sure that a wild mistake had been made when a majority of 40,000 for Hayes was prophesied; and nobody felt sure, either, that the telegrams were wrong which announced on the day of the election that the State had actually been carried for Pendleton. In fact, it gave Governor Hayes a majority of about 8,000—thus disposing, finally, of Mr. Pendleton, who, as "Young Greenbacks," is by all odds the most conspicuous and most popular of the advocates of repudiation—and, what is of as much consequence, or more, this majority gives us a Senate and House of Representatives which, on joint ballot, can, and probably will, give a majority of four in favor of the Fifteenth Amendment. That the Amendment will be ratified is not, however, absolutely beyond question, we believe. Should it be ratified, the Democrats will have themselves to thank. In Hamilton County, in which Cincinnati is situated, they bargained with a certain set of Republicans, under the lead of Mr. Hassaurek—a flaming Radical once, as, not long ago, accomplished politicians were apt to be—and a "Fusion" ticket was voted for and was elected. As it happened, a "straight" Democratic ticket might just as well have been put in nomination and the Legislature might thus have been saved to the Democrats. That it was not, and that the Amendment is now pretty sure to be incorporated in the Constitution, is to be attributed to the extreme anxiety of Mr. Pendleton's friends to keep him safe for the next Presidential contest. It was with what seems to us about equal wisdom that that gentleman's managers engaged the services of General Samuel F. Cary, whom surely almost all mankind in Ohio must by this time have found out. The Prohibitionist candidate seems to have been opposed by the Temperance leagues and lodges, and figures not at all in the returns.

The result in Pennsylvania would seem to show that General Geary is stronger with the voters than he is with the politicians. He runs a good deal behind his ticket, however, and was a weak candidate. It may be doubted if he would have been nominated at all had it not been for a prevailing impression that the Democrats would carry the State. The Republican success seems to be due to the facts that the steady-going Pennsylvanians are, on the whole, satisfied with Grant's administration; that the miners look on any coal-mine owners, especially if worth twenty millions of dollars, as oppressors and tyrants; and that an efficient registry law, well executed, prevented fraudulent voting in the city of Philadelphia. Then the Federal patronage was on the Republican side, and that counted for a good deal in a State where the postmaster is a not unimportant centre of intelligence and moulder of opinion, and which has within its limits a great navy yard. But Governor Geary's scant majority may not improperly set the managers to thinking about the character of their candidates. We should hope, at least, that the widespread belief that he has been in league with the corruptionists who have made the last Pennsylvania Legislature a by-word, was what put him at the polls so far behind Judge Williams. But they say that the real reason was that Mr. A. G. Curtin's friends thought Geary had jockeyed that gentleman, and prevented his getting a position in Grant's cabinet. It is too true that not unlikely this may have been the real reason. Nevertheless, it is true too that some of the best Republicans in the State had a very bad opinion of the Governor, and we are safe in saying that some votes were withheld from him for strictly moral reasons.

In this State there is no general confidence among the Republicans that the Democrats will not sweep everything before them; but certainly there is now a more cheerful tone of feeling than there has been at any previous time during the fall. Doubtless, too much is made of the fact that, on the first and second days of registry in this city and Brooklyn, the number of voters who put their names on the rolls was only about half as great as the number entered at the last election. There yet remain two days for registering, and the Tammany candidates being now at last settled upon, and some opposition Democrats being also in the field, we may expect to see the voters, real and false, brought out in much greater strength. Moreover, the falling-off in the registry probably affects the Republicans much more in proportion to their total strength than it does the Democrats. There is, however, a considerable chance that the State may go against the Democrats. We should set down the Legislature as secure in any event; and it will not greatly surprise any one, we suppose, if General Sigel should be elected Secretary of State. He will, at least, be sure to run ahead of his ticket, his name still being strong among Germans of all kinds of politics, and a good deal of work being done for him individually. As to the probable fate of the new constitution nothing seems to be known; but the conjecture on all hands is that it is to be defeated. One thing at any rate the Republicans can say—that almost to a man the corruptionists of the last Legislature have been sloughed off the ticket, and there is hardly a district where an honest man need blush next month to be seen at the polls.

The Virginia Legislature has chosen for senators to represent the State in Congress the actual Lieutenant-Governor Lewis and Judge John W. Johnston, they receiving a pretty nearly strict party vote. The record of both these men is good, as original opponents of secession, and as Union men throughout the war. In Tennessee the message of Gov. Senter has quite disappointed those who found his short inaugural cold and heartless. If words were everything, he would, in fact, be as sound as possible in Republican doctrine and policy; but even if he were as sincere as we are ready to believe him, he is powerless with the faction whom he has raised up and seated in the Legislature. The Senate, however, has adopted, unanimously, resolutions scouting repudiation, and so far followed the Governor's lead; and on the first ballot for Senator—which is all we can report as we go to press—it was fairly divided against that eminent repudiator, Andrew Johnson, whose strength was greater in the House, though not sufficiently great.

President Grant has seen fit to write a letter to Mr. Robert Bonner, which Mr. Bonner, we need not say, has seen fit to publish, to the effect that he had no knowledge of the "disreputable proceedings" of the Gold Ring. Such is the penalty of having an enterprising editor among one's personal friends. Nobody, unless we except Mr. Bonner, thought the letter necessary, and we hope the thing is not going to be considered a precedent. How unscrupulous and rascally the dealers in the raid on Wall Street were may be inferred from the fact which is stated on what seems like good authority, and which at any rate is perfectly consistent with all that is known of the characters of the Erie men, that one of them, when he was "interviewed," showed the reporter a telegram which read: "Delivered letter. All right!" from which—such was the nature of the circumstances, which are too long to detail here—the inference was that Grant had an understanding with Fisk and Gould. This was when the Ring was trying to avert odium, and dissipate the personal danger that threatened it, by making it believed that high officials were at the bottom of its nefarious scheme. In fact, however, the telegram read: "Letter delivered all right"—according to orders, that is. From lying to a newspaper reporter, and tapping a telegraph wire, up to wholesale piracy on the commerce of the continent, there is no sort of commercial villany that the engineers of the Ring seem to have been incapable of committing.

Another of the sort of appointments for which Grant has become noted, and which we are inclined to think has done about as much as anything else to satisfy the average voter with him—little as the average politician could be made to believe it or to believe anything but the reverse—he has made this week, in giving the place of Secretary of War to General Belknap, of Iowa, who is no "statesman," or politician, or "favorite son." Little is known of him, except that he is a native of New York, thirty-eight years of age, educated for the law and by the army, and praised as a very capable soldier and honest man, who had the confidence of Grant and Sherman throughout the whole rebellion, in which he served from 1861 till after Appomattox. One thing, however, is known of him which makes the appointment particularly likable. General Belknap is the man whom, as Collector of Internal Revenue in one of the Iowa Districts, Mr. Hudson, a relative of Grant's, approached, on the subject of disposing of the patronage which was in Belknap's gift, and who, in short terms, told Mr. Hudson to go about his business.

One of the most striking points in Mr. Jenckes's strong array of arguments in favor of his projected reform of the civil service, was the adhesion to the principle of his bill of a vast majority of the Government officials who were applied to for an expression of their opinions about it. These were all, however, above the grade of clerks, whose views were not, for obvious reasons, solicited, and who of course have not been forward to make them public. A certain proportion of them, of long experience, we all know to hold their positions almost as securely as if the reform were already inaugurated; without them the machinery of government could not go on, and they have been hitherto the sole obstacles to an absolutely thorough displacement by each new Administration of the servants of the preceding one. In them Mr. Jenckes would naturally find firm supporters, but how far they would be sustained by the rest of the clerical force has only been conjectural. A recent Washington dispatch seems to indicate some approach to unanimity in the whole body. It states that a committee of fifteen appointed by them to consider an appeal to Congress for the bettering of their condition, have concluded not to ask for a direct increase of salary, but a reorganization of the service on Mr. Jenckes's plan. That this is the more sensible procedure will be evident to any one who reflects that the clerk's misery arises much less from the smallness of his wages than from the uncertainty of his tenure, and that his salary, even if enlarged by one Congress, will be subject to reduction at the hands of the next, so long as we have not definitively established the practice of treating the nation's employees as men of business are expected to treat theirs—paying all that they are worth, and keeping them as long as they do what is required of them.

The Hornet has been libelled, and its commander, Higgins, has surrendered stiffly to a United States naval officer. The part taken in this Cuban business by ex-Confederates is not a little exasperating, desirable as it might be in the abstract to rid the country of them; and it is, if possible, still more trying to see the applause which certain Republican and Radical papers bestow on their efforts to embroil us with foreign powers, and to enlarge that national indebtedness with which they have already favored us. But it is fairly amusing to witness the easy promotion to saintship which lies in espousing the cause of the Cubans. During the war, Commodore Higgins, for example, could have been for the Tribune only an unmitigated traitor and villain, but in his present command he appears to it "an upright gentleman," who should be protected from the "calumnious insinuation" of having sold himself to the Spaniards and put into Wilmington on false pretences, in order to be nabbed.

Our readers may remember—and if not, they could have predicted it—that Mr. Seward, when he was in Sitka, made a very contented little speech to the inhabitants, in which he pitied them for only one thing—that the weather was so warm as to make the supply of ice for drinking purposes a very uncertain one. The people were healthy, the coast-line was 26,000 miles long, the climate had been criticised "in outside circles" as wet and cold, but on the contrary it was one in which, while the eagle soared, the humming-bird fluttered, fish were most abundant and most excellent, and the moonshine surpassed any other in the world. But if the papers do not misrepresent him, General George H. Thomas, who is a careful man, takes a view of affairs there which is not so rosy. There is not business enough transacted, he says, to do anything like pay the salaries of the revenue officers who have been sent up there; grain will not grow, and the small vegetables that can be raised will keep but a very little time; the territory was always a burden to Russia, who was glad to get rid of it; timber, fur, and fish are to be had in plenty a great deal nearer the States than Alaska; no mines have been discovered which it would pay to work; stock-raising is impossible; and, in brief, the place is of no value. But then, on the other hand, Mr. W. H. Dall, who probably knows more about the country than Mr. Seward or General Thomas, says that Alaska was by no means a burden to Russia, but paid into the imperial treasury between 1841 and 1862 about two millions of our paper dollars in taxes; that vegetables do not rot in a little time, for that he has eaten turnips in March which had been gathered the September previous; that there is no such timber for ship-building anywhere else on all the Pacific coast as the abundant yellow cedar of Alaska; that the mines of marble and coal are also the very best on that coast, and so on. In brief, says Mr. Dall, the place is of great value. When, we wonder, since the days when one explorer found an El Dorado up some southern river and cities walled with solid silver, and another explorer the next season found only ague and naked savages on the same shore, has a civilized government bought a pig in a poke more decidedly than we seem to have done in the case of this purchase? The only thing that seems certain about it is that there is good shooting after you get there. As to St. Thomas, meantime, we are still where we were—in a position that the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs ought to find embarrassing, and that certainly is sufficiently humiliating to the rest of us.

Father Hyacinthe having arrived, and, as appears, for the simple purpose of observing the working of our political and religious institutions; and not having abjured his Catholic faith, or given any signs of abjuring it, and being just now placed in very delicate relations with his ecclesiastical superiors, and being tired and agitated, the best thing that his admirers can do for him is to offer up fervent prayers that all ministers of all denominations, including the "Evangelical clergy of Boston," and all proprietors and publishers of newspapers, and all politicians, "prominent citizens," and "advanced thinkers," may be filled with sufficient grace to let the gentleman alone; to refrain from giving him, or causing or procuring to be given him, public "receptions," including brass-bands and refreshments; to refrain from pressing him to deliver lectures, discourses, or sermons, for the purpose of widening the breach between him and his Church, and from hanging round his bedroom door, or looking in at the key-hole, or soliciting his autograph. And the reason is this—that if Father Hyacinthe gave himself up to these injudicious worthies, and did their bidding, his influence, which is now great, would vanish like a mist; all the mind of the world—and the world is still governed by mind—would desert and repudiate him as a blatherskite, a voice and nothing more; and there would be an end of him.

A committee of Congress has been sitting in this city during the past week, for the purpose of enquiring into the cause of the decline of the American shipping interest, and has now gone on to Boston for the same purpose. A large number of ship-owners and ship-builders were examined, and all agreed that the American commercial marine was on its last legs, and would, if something was not speedily done, totally disappear, as least as far as the foreign trade was concerned. The foreign steamship lines are now getting such fast hold of the trade that it will, it is feared, be impossible to oust them, if something is not done to relieve the American shipping from its burdens. About the remedy there was of course considerable difference of opinion. Most of the shipbuilders ask for admission of ship-building materials duty free. Ship-owners ask to be allowed to buy their ships where they please, or, in other words, to have the navigation act repealed; and against both of them appear a small band of old protectionists, who want to have the matter mended by giving subsidies to great steamship lines. The solution of the difficulty that has the best chance of being tried is the admission of materials duty free, as this would be a sort of compromise between protectionists and free-traders. But the solution which would promise in the end the largest amount of employment to American labor and capital would be the admission of foreign-built ships duty free. Some of the stories told before the committee of the low condition to which the American commercial marine, once the envy and admiration of the world, has been reduced, by emotional legislation, were melancholy enough.

If Mr. Roebuck could see his "dumfounded Spaniard" as he appears on this side of the water, he might properly doubt whether his own genius for calling people names is as great as it has been thought. The "full Spaniards" in Cuba and the Spanish natives of the island have recently prepared an address, which is certainly fluent enough. They declare, to the number of two thousand, who speak for two hundred thousand more, that the thought of selling Cuba to the United States, as has been proposed by some traitorous wretches, and notably by Señor Mañé y Flaquer, of the city of Barcelona, is a foul, dishonoring, humiliating outrage on Spanish pride. And, further, they inform the world that if any government of Spain should be so far abandoned by the hand of God as to think of committing the infamous baseness of selling the Queen of the Antilles to any other government, "the purchasing nation" would find it had reckoned without its host, for "the one hundred thousand Spaniards who already have arms in their hands, together with as many more," who will not bear the affront of being sold as cattle, would be sufficient to resist all the armies of the invader, "to annihilate them, or to add a fresh page of glory to that of Sagunto and Numancia, Zaragoza and Gerona. Not one of us should survive; and the foreigner that would seek to penetrate here would find, instead of the fertile fields of Cuba, arid deserts, bathed with our blood and whitened with our bones. Instead of its populous cities, he would find heaps of ashes and ruins; and, floating over this frightful picture of desolation and ruin, presiding over its defeat, but not its humiliation, that glorious flag of gold and scarlet which is the idol of our proud hearts." Making due allowance for the eloquence peculiar to the Latin races, this may be taken, we suppose, to express with sufficient exactness the feelings which are entertained on the subject of annexation by a good-sized majority of the white inhabitants of Cuba; and we imagine that the Junta in this city contains men who, if once the island were released from Spanish rule, would express their feelings on the same subject in much the same manner; which is a point for our American Friends of Cuba to consider.

The Republican rising in Spain turns out to have been a considerably smaller affair than it was made to appear by sensational reports from various quarters. Valencia, which seemed anxious to become a second Saragossa, has surrendered, but there has since been a renewal of resistance, if the last despatches may be credited. The loss of the besieged is as yet unknown. Their leaders have disappeared. So have almost entirely the armed bands in Catalonia and Andalusia, the number of which but a few days ago was stated to be twenty thousand. The threatened outbreaks in and around Madrid have not taken place, though friends of the Government continue to show great alarm—which may be real or may be feigned. This alarm, the general consternation caused by repeated attempts at a new revolution, and the overt acts of some members of the Republican opposition, are the best weapons Prim can make use of for the restriction of the public liberties, whether in his own interest or in that of the state. Numerous arrests of prominent Republicans have taken place, and the sittings of the Cortes have been suspended. Whether Prim has, as some assert, concerted his measures with the sick Emperor of the French, whom he has just visited, or not, is perhaps indifferent, as his policy is one clearly indicated by the circumstances. What his ultimate objects are would, of course, be more interesting to know, but he has as yet not betrayed them. It is very likely that the extraordinary exaggeration of the importance of the Republican movements is the result of the eagerness of both radical and reactionary reporters on both sides of the Pyrenees to represent the actual government of Spain as in a condition of speedy dissolution.

While everything of late has shown a relaxation of the Imperial régime, and symptoms of insubordination and resistance have been unprecedentedly rife in public meetings, and in the almost unmuzzled press, the French Opposition have made a grand movement in favor of peaceful revolution by meeting and solemnly declaring that they would not risk provoking disorder and violence by assembling on the 26th, but would, when convened in November, exercise their constitutional right of enquiring why the session was postponed. They announce their intention also of pushing the democratic programme without abatement, part of which, according to a speech at Rouen by M. Pouyer-Quertier, will consist in abrogating the commercial treaties, as incompatible with the government of the country by the country. The Opposition occupy now a position of great dignity and effectiveness, and we can be only too glad that the effort of a small wing of the Left, headed by M. Simon, to determine on the policy which has been rejected, failed miserably. It is one of the discouraging features of the present agitation that men of such calibre as Simon and Favre are found consorting with radicals like Gambetta, suddenly thrown up into place and notoriety, rather than with the wiser heads that have fortunately carried the day. They could not have chosen a better means of confusing the popular judgment. Sainte-Beuve died on Wednesday week, and by so much diminishes whatever of Liberalism exists in the Senate.

THE RESULTS OF THE ELECTIONS.

The late elections have owed nearly all their importance to the effect they were likely to have on the Fifteenth Amendment and on the public credit. As far as the Amendment is concerned, the result is, if not all that could be desired, all that could reasonably be expected. The ratification of Ohio is sure, though barely sure, and Governor Hayes has been re-elected by a majority which, considering the general apathy, may fairly be called respectable. In Pennsylvania, the total vote is larger than it was last year, and so is the Republican majority, showing that the lassitude which usually follows the Presidential election has not reached that State. The Democrats are, on the whole, to be thanked for having made repudiation, in one form or another, a prominent plank in their platform, because it has elicited from the voters a renewed expression of opinion as to the expediency of paying off the public debt in anything but the current money of the civilized world. This is now the third time that the principal States of the North have passed upon this proposition, and each time the answer has been increasingly clear. When the movement against the public credit was first begun in 1867, by Pendleton and Thurman amongst the Democrats, and Butler and Sherman amongst the Republicans, the Republican conventions, with a want of courage and confidence in the popular honesty which did not do them much credit, refrained carefully for a good while from fairly joining issue with the repudiators. The repudiators said the debt ought to be paid in paper; that this was all the Government was pledged to do; that "money that was good enough for the soldier and laborer was good enough for the bondholder;" and to make this proposal somewhat more palatable to people with tender consciences, a curious attempt was made to blacken the character of the bondholders. They were denounced throughout the country as a mean, grasping set of persons, living in idleness on other men's labor, while others, Andrew Johnson for one, went still further, and accused them of designing the "establishment of caste in America," of converting the Government into an oligarchy, and so forth.

The discourses delivered by Senator Sherman and General Butler on this subject, and the studious silence of other Republican politicians, created some doubt as to the condition of the party mind, and the conventions—nay, even the Chicago Convention—handled it somewhat tenderly. They spoke out boldly about the duty of "preserving the public faith inviolate;" but this was not joining issue; for the question, What is the public faith, and to what is it pledged in regard to the payment of the public debt? still remained unanswered. All that was needed to answer it was to make use of the little word, "gold;" but it was not till the spring of this year, and after Butler, followed by a large body of Republican representatives, had made a determined effort in the House to reduce the interest on the bonds, that the party was roused into a solemn and formal renewal of the promises made during the raising of the Government loans, both by party leaders and by the Government officers, that the Government obligations should be met in specie. This and Mr. Boutwell's resolute fulfilment of the Sinking Fund Act have had a decided effect on the public credit; the price of Government securities has risen both at home and abroad; and the credit of the United States will now bear, as it has not done since 1860, comparison with that of other civilized powers.

So far, all is well; but it must be borne in mind that the Government has thus far made no substantial gain by the improvement in its credit. It profits the United States nothing that its bonds now sell at 80, where they formerly sold at 70, unless it has bonds to sell. At present it has not; on the contrary, it is buying its own bonds, and in doing this is actually losing by the improvement in its credit. But the intention, and we believe the desire, of the Government and people is that the present outstanding loans, on which the country is paying a heavy interest—nine or ten per cent.—owing to the fact that, when they were contracted, capitalists doubted seriously whether it would ever be able to pay its debts or not, should, through the aid of this improvement in its credit, be converted into another at a lower rate of interest, say four or four and a half per cent. It is at this Mr. Boutwell is said to be aiming, and this he ought to be able to attain. But here comes a difficulty, and a serious one. We believe it to be very unlikely that the Government can ever get any very large amount in this country at this rate. Active capitalists will certainly not lend money on any security whatever at any such rate. They can always make more on unexceptionable security; can make nearly three times as much without difficulty by devoting a little time and attention to the management of their investments. We have no large body of timid annuitants here as they have in England and France, without either business knowledge themselves or friends competent to invest their money for them, who will accept any interest, however low, for the sake of safety. The country swarms with securities yielding at least six or seven per cent. without any appreciable risk; and owing to the rapid change in our habits of life, persons of fixed incomes are more eager than ever to add to their means. Contrast the style in which people live even in country towns with the style in which they lived before the war, and we shall easily see that, even if we were back to specie payments, a dollar would not go as far in supplying the needs of an average family as it did in 1859. No trustee now, acting for persons of mod te means, would feel justified in taking four and a half per cent. from the Government for the mere sake of the security it offers, in the presence of the innumerable other ways which offer themselves of getting double that sum.

Our conclusion is therefore that the four and a half per cent. loan, or even the five per cent. loan—and it must be remembered that to get money at four or five per cent. the Treasury must sell its bonds at par—will, to be successful, have to be largely taken abroad; and that it will be taken abroad we have no doubt, when there are no United States bonds to be had on any better terms. At present, a couple of thousand millions, paying seven or eight per cent. in gold, can be had by any one who wants them. When these are out of the way, or the interest on them reduced by their still greater appreciation, the time for the new loan will have come, and the place for it will be the English and German markets. But in order to hasten the loan and ensure its success, the Republican party must constantly and emphatically repeat the expression of its determination to uphold the public credit. Every presentation of the repudiation issue by the Democratic party injures the public credit, and we have no doubt the party will present it every year as long as the party or the debt exists, if for no other reason, for the simple one that it is the only thing in the least degree attractive it has to offer. There is in all its other doctrines something too shadowy and impalpable for popular appreciation; the net gain of repudiation can, on the other hand, be set down in dollars and cents. Now, we must bear in mind that even the best-informed foreigners only understand American politics very imperfectly. They attach great importance to utterances at which Americans only laugh. They are unable to see the working of a large number of the influences by which public opinion is moulded, and the public policy finally determined, and yet American credit is largely, and must continue to be largely, dependent on the correctness of their judgment on our affairs. There is only one indication of the drift of public sentiment which they thoroughly understand, and that is majorities. If repudiation be the principal issue in a campaign, and the Republican party meets it by a large majority, American credit will rise. If they meet it by small majorities in a large vote, American credit will fall, because the impression will gain ground that the repudiators are after all gaining in strength. Until, therefore, the national finances are placed on a sure and lasting foundation, there should be no "off-years" in politics. It is not enough for us to know here that repudiation has no chance; the world has to be made to know it. The Treasury is dependent now for the success of its plan of reducing the public burdens on steady Republican support. It is not enough to elect our candidates; we have to elect them in such force as to show that republican principles are losing none of their hold on the popular mind.

THE GERMANS IN POLITICS.

The nomination of General Sigel for the Secretaryship of State in this State, and the recent entrance of Carl Schurz to the United States Senate, and the present enthusiasm amongst the New York Germans for the former of these gentlemen, are amongst the numerous indications now visible that the German element in our population will hereafter, as such, exercise a more marked influence on politics than it has hitherto done. In fact, there are few features of the political life of the country more singular than the small amount of perceptible and direct influence on legislation and electioneering hitherto enjoyed by the German voters. For some years past, they have, we believe, surpassed the Irish in numbers; they now far surpass the Irish in the amount of the annual reinforcements they receive from the Old World; and yet, politically speaking, if it were not for the temperance question, one would hardly know of their existence as a class. Individuals amongst them make very valuable contributions to American thought, in various fields of literature and science, and the country is under immense obligations to them, as a whole, for the extent to which they cultivate some of the arts, and particularly music. Moreover, American society in general owes them more than can be put down on paper, and more than most Americans understand or appreciate, for the solid additions they have made, and are every year making, to the national love of order, of industry, of frugality, of simple tastes and pleasures, and of quiet domestic life. But in spite of their numbers, their wealth, their intelligence, we have yet to hear of a blatherskite politician, a party newspaper, paying assiduous court to them, or being thrown into indignation by the spectacle of their "wrongs." Of late, it is true, there has been more or less fury infused into the party platforms by the contemplation of the doctrines held by various foreign governments on the question of naturalization and allegiance. These doctrines weighed, for many years, with peculiar weight upon the Germans, owing to the existence of military conscription and other burdens of the same nature in most of the countries they have left; they weighed with very little, and indeed hardly perceptible, weight on the Irish, who were exposed to no conscription, and whose allegiance no foreign government had the slightest hankering after; but it was not till the Fenians wanted to use their American citizenship as an aid in the military operations against Great Britain that the party trumpets began to blow loud blasts about the rights of our foreign-born citizens. The woes of a hundred Germans, thrust into Prussian or Austrian ranks as privates, with their American naturalization papers in their pockets, and houses, homes, business, family, and fortune left behind them in this country, passed almost without notice; while the imprisonment of one Fenian voter in "a British dungeon," for having ripped up a police constable, or taken arms out of a gentleman's bedroom in the middle of the night, sent dozens of politicians madly to the stump.

The causes of this difference are various. Some are German, and some are American, and some are Irish. The Germans, first of all, are kept from anything like a thorough social blending with the American population by difference of language—an obstacle which, except in the case of persons of cultivation, may be said to be insurmountable. In addition to this, they have, what the Irish have not, strongly developed and tenaciously held social tastes, which Americans do not share, and which the Germans are now in sufficient force to maintain and cultivate, without caring whether Americans share them or not. This of itself does much to separate them from their native neighbors. One has only to visit one of the Liederkranz balls, in this city, to get a glimpse of a world, and a world in every way admirable, in which there is not the slightest perceptible trace of American manners, ideas, or influence, or even neighborhood. With this social separation it must be said, also, that the difference between the position of women among the Germans and among Americans has a good deal to do. The position of the German woman may be said, in a rough way, to embody the older ideas as to woman's proper place in society; that of the American woman, the very newest and latest. The sphere of the one—and it is a sphere with which she has thus far shown no discontent—is the household, and of all the arts that pertain to the material comfort of the household she is perfect mistress, and she practises them with but little care for abstract notions of woman's dignity or final cause. The American woman, on the other hand, tends to treat the household as simply a means of affecting the world without, or playing a figure in it, or as a retreat from care and toil, or as a simple burden or drag, and is profoundly impressed by the ills of family life and very restless under them—ills which the older or German type of woman treats as ultimate facts, like the changes of the weather, or death, to be borne with as best one can. Considering the part women play in forming and cementing social relations, this difference of views on some of the most important social problems is, of course, in itself a powerful cause of social separation, and social separation means, to a greater or less extent, political separation.

In addition to this, however, it must be said of the German men that they do not bring with them here the habit of political activity. They have very settled, and for the most part very sound, ideas as to the nature and functions of government, but they show here, as indeed they have shown at home, but little skill in the working of the machinery, and even less taste for it. The educated men, too, having been familiar from boyhood with the more accurate and well-adjusted administrative systems of European countries, are repelled by the makeshift and clumsy character of a large number of the expedients of popular governments, and the uneducated are so accustomed to having governmental work done for them, that it takes a long time, and some strong personal stimulus, to bring home to them the fact that they are in this country expected to take part in it. Their political ideas, or what may be called their political growth, is nevertheless far more advanced than that of the Irish. The Irish, from having been long used, either by priest or landlord, in turning the cranks of a constitutional system, have acquired the political activity and interest in politics in which the Germans are wanting, but the political ideas of the Irish are little beyond those of clansmen. In fact, it is looked on as rather discreditable amongst the Germans for a man to busy himself in politics, while amongst the Irish it is looked on as almost his chief end.

There are numerous signs, however, that the German apathy is passing away. Large communities of them already exist in various parts of the country who, though they have hitherto not said much on politics, have kept up a great deal of thinking, and then the Germans all over the country begin, as was sure to happen sooner or later, to feel their strength—to feel that they can on election day strike a heavier blow than any other class of men in the community. Feeling this power, they would be more than human if they did not use it, and they are using it. What will be the immediate effects of their using it, it would be hard as yet to say. There is an immense mass of ignorance amongst them, as well as a very high order of cultivation; their press at the East is but a sorry instructor, and apparently pays as close attention to "sales" as its most enterprising American contemporaries. But then, in the long run, German culture is pretty sure, we feel satisfied, to tell on German politics abroad as well as at home. The universities, it has been well said, conquered at Sadowa, and, unless we are greatly mistaken, they will yet make themselves felt, and felt for good, in the American legislation.

THE ORIGIN OF PROTECTION.

Professor Perry said, if correctly reported, in his recent discussion with Horace Greeley in Boston, that protection was only two centuries old. If he had said six centuries, however, he would have been rather nearer the mark. It is true that the practice of levying import duties on foreign commodities at the frontier, solely with the view of giving home products an advantage in the home market, may be said not to be older than the seventeenth century; but then the idea on which our modern protection is based, of the bestowal of monopolies by governments for one purpose or another, is nearly as old as modern civilization. The first traces of it are to be found in the feudal practice of forcing the peasant to grind his corn at the lord's mill, and bake his bread at the lord's oven; to sell his produce in the lord's market, and press his grapes in the lord's wine-press—all, of course, for a consideration. All these exactions were insisted on as of common law on the continent of Europe for centuries. Originally, there is little doubt the lord set up these various conveniences as the only man who could afford to do it—or, in other words, from motives of humanity; but he made the use of them imperative on true protectionist principles. The seigneur in France had, too, by the common or customary law, a mode, known as the banvin, of getting rid of his year's wine every fall, which was in every respect conformable to them also. After the vintage, "he published his ban," as it was called by the public crier—that is, announced that on a certain date, and for a month thereafter, he would sell his wine at a certain rate, and during "the ban" all taverns and houses of entertainment on his estate were forbidden to sell wines, and all persons desiring it had to purchase it of his agents. These usages were in full force as early as the eleventh century. At the same period, markets furnished many lords with a most profitable source of revenue—all persons being forbidden to buy or sell except in certain specified places, or on certain days, when the lord levied market duties on all present. There is on record an excommunication pronounced by a French monastery in the tenth century against certain persons for infringing on a market privilege granted to the monks by a neighboring seigneur for "the salvation of his soul, and that of his father and mother."

The practice of granting to manufacturers the exclusive privilege of selling certain commodities in certain places is of later date, and naturally only took its rise with the rise of industry. Prior to the eleventh century, there can hardly be said to have been any class in Northern Europe to whom a monopoly would have been of any value except the land-owners, for no other class had anything to sell except the rude toil of their rude hands. But as soon as industry began to revive, and free artisans, with their guilds and corporations, to come into existence, the bestowal of monopolies by the government on certain trades as a reward for services rendered, or as marks of special favor, or the creation of them by the burghers, was seen in every direction. But these monopolies never extended beyond a single town or small district, for the simple reason that there existed no machinery for anything like an extended system of protection, even if the idea of wholesale national protection against foreigners had yet been conceived. As it was, town dealers protected themselves against country dealers; the trade guilds against outsiders in their own neighborhood. Every district, after a while, came to have its own custom-houses and duties; and Colbert's fame in the seventeenth century was due to his efforts to nationalize the system, and reduce it to order and method, and not to his having originated it. We draw our illustrations from France, simply because nowhere else has the protectionist idea had such fast hold of people's minds, or been so faithfully worked out through many centuries.

Anybody who wants to know to what lengths the French carried it, and what firm hold it secured on the national mind, can hardly do better than study the various royal edicts drawn by Turgot, during his brief tenure of power, in his efforts to evoke order from the awful social and political chaos of the old régime. Take the system of protection for the wine interest, for example, as he describes it. The city of Bordeaux, the centre of a very rich wine district, and the principal port of Southwestern France, enjoyed from the earliest times the privilege of protecting the wines produced in what was called the Sénéchaussée, or manorial district, round the city, which was formally confirmed by Louis XI. so long ago as 1461. The regulations adopted for this purpose were thorough. No wine from any of the adjacent provinces watered by the Garonne or its confluents was allowed to be sold in the city to any of the inhabitants, or even to be sold and shipped there to foreigners, before the 1st of December in each year, by which time, of course, the Bordeaux people would have disposed of their own crop of the season. The wines of Languedoc were, indeed, not allowed to come down the Garonne at all before the end of September, and those of Périgord and other more distant districts not before Christmas. More than this, after the strange wines were allowed to enter the city, the proprietors were forbidden to tranship them at once for foreign parts. They had to lodge them in a store in a particular part of the city, and in barrels of a particular shape and of inferior construction. If they did not manage to dispose of them before the 1st of September of the following year, they had either to make brandy of them or take them back again up the river. The surrounding provinces protested and petitioned the king against these privileges for centuries, but in vain. Their want of success, however, was not wonderful, and hardly regrettable, considering that they did the same thing themselves. The greater number of the large towns of Périgord, Querci, and Guyenne had precisely the same kind of regulations as the Bordelais. In fact, every city protected its own commodities against all the rest of the kingdom. One town, Bergerac, tried to forbid the navigation of the Dordogne to the people along its banks.

The Marseillais, however, far outdid the Bordelais. From time immemorial, they prohibited the introduction of strange wines—that is, wines produced in other French districts—within their walls. When they put themselves under the jurisdiction of the Counts of Provence in 1257, they expressly stipulated in their bill of rights—known as the Chapitres de Paix—that the Counts should never permit the importation of foreign grapes or wines except for the use of the court. As early as 1294, a municipal ordinance provided that the carts in which foreign wines or grapes were brought in, or the buildings in which they were found, should be burnt; and another of 1610, in addition to these penalties, directed that the teamsters should be flogged. But it was not till 1717 that the restrictive system reached its climax. In that year, an ordinance was passed providing that no ship leaving that port should receive a clean bill of health unless it had a stock of Marseilles wine on board. So that every vessel had to purchase Marseilles wine in order to avoid quarantine—and quarantine in those days was no joke—at the place of her destination. The crews of ships entering the port were forbidden by the same ordinance from drinking the wine or beer they had on board during their stay—or, rather, obliging them to purchase in the city such quantity of the city wine as the municipal authorities thought they ought to consume, provided they had no other. The city even went so far as to refuse to allow the inhabitants of other parts of Provence to ship wine from the port for foreign countries; but this rule, after a long contest, it was compelled to abrogate in 1740.

It would take a volume to describe the various forms of local protection in use in other places. Every city and province had its own custom-house for the promotion of some pet industry. Cities on the great rivers claimed and exercised the right of deciding what commodities the population higher up above them should send to market by water, and in some cases particular towns claimed a complete monopoly of a particular species of industry. Lyons, however, surpassed them all in its exactions. In early times, Piedmont was the great rival of Lyons in the silk manufacture; and as all Piedmontese goods passing into France went naturally, and indeed inevitably, through Lyons, the Lyonnais clapped a heavy transit duty on them, no matter what their destination. After a while, silk goods began to come in from other places—Flanders, for instance—and then Lyons claimed duty on all silk goods entering the kingdom, and, in order to facilitate the collection of the tax, all silk goods, no matter from what quarter, were compelled to pass through the city. Other cities—Valence, for one—protected themselves in precisely the same way. Colbert tried to change this state of things by his tariff of 1664; but all he aimed at was to have the duty levied at the frontier instead of forcing importers to pass through certain places in the interior, but still agreed not to interfere with the final disposition of the receipts; but even in this moderate compromise he was only partially successful. The opposition offered by several provinces was so violent that the tariff was never fully carried into effect, and most of the internal custom-houses survived him.

It may be said, therefore, that the protective system is as old as feudalism. It showed itself almost contemporaneously with the revival of industry. As soon as it became apparent that money was to be made by either forcing people to sell their goods, or prohibiting them from selling their goods, in certain places, the feudal aristocracy began to avail themselves of the expedient, and, as the manufacturing towns grew up, and became strong enough to make their own laws or exact concessions from the king, they followed the example of the seigneurs, and, as states became consolidated, and the administrative machinery became more efficient, the general government undertook to do on a great scale, by means of its frontier custom-houses, what each district or trade had previously done for itself.

ENGLAND.—THE LAND QUESTION—PROTECTION—EMIGRATION.

LONDON, October 1, 1869.

IF no business is being actually transacted at the present moment, it cannot be said that we are having a dull time. The French are providing us with a ghastly murder, with a most important theological event, and with plenty of rumors of coming changes. If there are no events here of an equally exciting character, there are yet indications of approaching controversies of which it is difficult to overrate the importance. Thus, for example, the Irish people—now that they have once gained the ear of Parliament—are obviously not going to drop their advantage. Mr. Bright once proposed that a session should be held in Dublin, that the whole attention of the legislature should be devoted to Irish questions, and one great dead-lift effort be made to start some sort of reform. Parliament won't sit in Dublin, because, amongst other reasons, gentlemen who have spent many millions in building a gigantic palace rather like to occupy it. Like private persons, they find a big house to be not merely an accommodation, but sometimes also a heavy weight about their necks. The remaining part of Mr. Bright's proposal seems to have a better chance of adoption. We shall have to listen to debates about Irish land-laws which, if present symptoms be true, will be far more exciting than the perfunctory and languid debates about the Irish Church. They will touch our most sensitive parts—our pockets as well as our prejudices—and English landlords will feel that the precedent is uncomfortably applicable to themselves. The difficulty of the position is exceedingly great on all sides. The cry from Ireland, which is constantly becoming louder, is for fixity of tenure, and the cry is emphasized by occasional hints conveyed from blunderbusses. That expression is, of course, susceptible of various meanings, from something like wholesale confiscation to a moderate confirmation of tenant-right. At a little meeting held the other day, certain peasants gave their interpretation of the words, and quietly proposed that Government should provide every family in Ireland with a slice of freehold land sufficient to support them. They would cut very short all difficulties about vested interests and respect for private rights. The ultra radicals, though scarcely prepared for such a summary proceeding, would work towards the same ultimate end, and propose to start some system of legislation which would have for its result the establishment of peasant-proprietors throughout the country. A kind of society has been formed for this purpose, with such members as Mr. Mill, Mr. Fawcett, and others like-minded. Mr. Bright, again, whose dislike of Government interference amounts to a superstition, would only set to work with the voluntary consent of everybody concerned. Mr. Lowe swears by the strictest doctrines of political economy, and would leave things to the supervision of his great idols—the laws of supply and demand. On the other side, we have the dogged Conservatives, who would rather go backwards than forwards, dread the thin end of the wedge, and shrink from anything tainted in the slightest degree by the odor of revolution. Never was there so wide a discord of opinion, and so many issues not only between rival parties, but between different factions of the same party. Every one has his own nostrum, and denounces all his rivals as quacks, impostors, and cheats. The Government will have to steer a course through a stormy sea, beset on every side by all kinds of rocks and shoals. Whether they will agree on some ingenious compromise or fall asunder, whether they will command the support of their own followers or conciliate some fragment of their opponents, is a matter of doubtful speculation. Hitherto no certain opinion can be formed, and though a few of them have treated the country to solemn utterances, the oracles have been so doubtful and confused that it is in vain to examine them. All we can say is that, in their own opinion, they will somehow reconcile justice to Ireland with a due consideration of all private interests; but to translate that "somehow" into plainer language passes all powers of derivation. The Times of this morning devotes a long article to a speech of Mr. Cardwell's; but can only say that Mr. Cardwell has very properly kept to pompous commonplace, and Lord Hartington did not throw much more light upon the subject.

Of this, however, I shall have enough to say hereafter. Meanwhile, there has been a curious manifestation of opinion, which deserves a few words, as its real significance may be easily misunderstood. The ghost of a dead superstition has suddenly been stalking abroad, and refusing to listen to the voice of exorcism. If one doctrine more than another had been considered as finally slain, dead, and buried, it was the doctrine of protection. One article of faith to which everybody was prepared to swear unhesitating allegiance was the benefit of free trade. Heretics—if some few might linger in out-of-the-way places—were mere wandering outcasts; poor relics of a bygone era, to be regarded rather with curiosity than dislike. Yet protection has once more raised its head, and, horrible to report, in the very headquarters of the true believers—the manufacturing districts. It is true that it has sought to disguise itself under a new name, and, without venturing in so many words to dispute the general truth of our holy principle, calls itself reciprocity. The French treaty, negotiated by Mr. Cobden, has been condemned as unfair, and as delivering up our trade to French competitors for no due compensation. I need hardly add that, in the eyes of the orthodox, a cry for reciprocity really differs in no essential particular from a cry for protection. A protective tariff is an evil in itself, which is not the less an evil because it is a retort to a tariff in another country. To impose it would be to cut off our nose to spite our face—according to the significant proverb. The leaders of the orthodox school have not been silent, and have, on the whole, held their own satisfactorily.

Are we, then, really coming back to our old system, or doubting of the policy of our course? I will say at once that I don't believe it for a moment. I think that the direct importance of the present agitation, though it is made much of by the Tory press, is really trifling; and that it will probably die away before bearing any fruit even in election contests. But the sentiment which it indicates is a more serious matter. It shows how deeply the depressed state of trade, especially in the cotton districts, is beginning to make itself felt. The difficulties of the last three years have produced a widespread discontent; pauperism has increased in a distressing ratio; and there is everywhere a lamentable want of confidence and of the old elasticity of resources. Much discussion has taken place as to the causes of the depression, especially in the cotton trade. The production has increased, but the increase has brought with it no increase of profits; the prices, as the manufacturers tell us, are not remunerative; and till we get cheaper cotton, the injury inflicted by the stoppage of American supplies will not be repaired. I will not, however, plunge into the enquiry thus suggested. The depression complained of is not confined to us nor to Europe, and depends upon deeper causes than the French treaty. Nor is there the slightest prospect that any protective measure would remove it, or the remotest chance that such measures will be adopted. My moral is very different. I read in the last number received of the Nation the remark that you would not be better off in the United States until you had returned to more economical and prudent habits. Of that I am no judge; but a very similar statement applies with equal force to ourselves. The cry for protection is an indication that there is something unsound in the state of our commerce. The revelations of Overend & Gurney gave some measure of the morality of some of our leading men of business. The recklessness with which their credit had been employed, the way in which they had been victimized by unscrupulous rogues, and the desperate means by which they had struggled on till the final smash, were unpleasant indications of a widespread system. Another shock of a similar kind has been given by the collapse of two or three life insurance companies. Though a full revelation has not yet been made, they give an amazing proof of the ease with which most respectable names may be used to cover something like reckless swindling; and I need not add that there is nothing more cruel than the deception thus practised upon poor people, whose savings for their families are thus remorselessly swept away. Such cases as these have naturally produced a widespread distrust, which is combined with an impression among much of the industrial population that our commercial supremacy has received fatal wounds. In short, there is an ominous sense of a general want of confidence, from which we are emerging very slowly, and, for a time at least, are considerably crippled.

At the same time, the accession of a lower class to political power has a considerable significance. The Times is engaged in a dispute with Mr. Odger—probably the ablest representative of our workingmen—as to the alleged desire for protection amongst the working-classes. Mr. Odger denies its existence, though with some qualifications. He is undoubtedly an excellent authority, yet there are many symptoms that his class are by no means unqualified believers in free-trade doctrines. I do not suppose that they will exercise their new-found power towards restoring a protective system, nor indeed could they, under present conditions, do so if they would. The wealth of the country is too great and too unanimously arrayed against them. But, on the other hand, the agitation of which I speak proves that the general want of confidence is felt even in an exaggerated degree by them. It is curious to remark how rapidly the idea of emigration seems to be spreading. A meeting, for example, was held last night amongst the working-classes in this quarter of London, to start an emigration society, and the word is pronounced more frequently and emphatically every day, as indicating the most promising remedy. For more reasons than I can hint at here, I hesitate to accept the more sanguine anticipations of the advocates of a systematic emigration; but it is a curious fact that the working-classes seem to be more and more looking for improvement in their condition not to any revival of home trade, but to the abandonment of their country altogether. If trade speedily revives, this sentiment may die away as speedily; but it is a significant phenomenon, which deserves to be noted.

In a powerful paper in the North American Review, Mr. C. E. Norton lately drew a very dark picture of the state of the English poor, and expresses certain anticipations of a possible revolution. I do not share all his opinions, though the facts he mentioned are curious and lamentable. I will only speak, however, as an observer of present indications, not as a prophet—to which office I have a rooted objection. It is, to my mind, remarkable that the discussions about Ireland have, as yet at least, produced a very faint echo here. However much discontent there may be below the surface, it has not taken any open form. There is no warmth of agitation about the English Church—to which, to say the truth, the working-classes are very indifferent—nor even about English land-laws. The very notion of becoming landed proprietors has scarcely as yet entered the heads of our agricultural laborers, though they are vaguely discontented with their position. So far as one can see at present, the prevailing opinion is not in favor of reforming matters at home so much as of giving up home altogether, and seeking better fortunes at the antipodes or in America. What other forms may be taken by the discontent are of course uncertain, and there is little use in enquiring at present. Meanwhile, I will only say that, as the best remedy for commercial distress lies not in protection, but in an improved tone of morality and increased intelligence in commercial affairs, so the best remedy for the distress of the poor lies not in transporting them bodily elsewhere, but in the education and general civilization which will render them more prudent, self-denying, and self-helping. Legislation cannot, it may be, do very much in that direction; but I hope that in all the cloud of coming controversies we shall not lose sight of the various ways in which schools and other agencies to such reforms may be multiplied and rendered effective.

I am, however, straying into generalities, which can be of little interest to any one. I have sought to indicate what seem to me to be the main currents of our political opinion at present; before long I shall be having to enter into more detail as to the agitations to which they are giving rise

THE CONGRESS OF PEACE AND LIBERTY AT LAUSANNE.

II.

VEVAY, September 23, 1869.

THE Congress held its final session on the 18th. It was closed by a speech from M. Victor Hugo of a spasmodic character, but of interest as an attempt to reconcile the two parties in the camp of the European liberals—that of the republicans pure and simple, and that of the socialists—the one aiming at political revolution alone, the other at social revolution as of first necessity. The dissentiment between these two parties had made itself obvious in the meetings of the Congress, and there was need of Victor Hugo's appeal: "Citizens, let us be enemies of the enemy, and friends to one another. Let us have one single soul for fighting it, one single heart for loving each other. Ah! citizens, let us utter the grand cry of fraternity."

The vagueness of his phrases, and his good faith in them, formed the appropriate close to the four days' speeches of a congress devoted to the discussion of objects for the attainment of which no practical means could be suggested. Peace and liberty are eminently desirable, and the present political and social system of Europe affords no guarantee for either. Unquestionably, a federative relation between the various European states and a change from monarchical to republican institutions, might promote freedom and diminish war. But as to the means for bringing about a federal union, and for establishing the desired republics, the members of the Congress are not only at discord among themselves, but, indeed, have no course of action to propose.

The Congress has been, in truth, no deliberative body consulting as to measures to be approved and steps to be taken to bring about the results its members coincided in desiring, but a mere assembly for the utterance of wishes, hopes, and aspirations; of schemes, theories, and speculations. "During these days," said one of the speakers, "we have been living not in the nineteenth, but in the twentieth century." But unless the course of history be profoundly different in the future from what it has been in the past, the next century will hardly see the fulfilment of the anticipations of these ardent and convinced men. For neither a political nor a social revolution would much advance the cause they have at heart. It is a moral revolution that is needed—in other words, a miracle. These reformers, like so many others, seem to forget that peace, liberty, and justice depend not upon forms and institutions of government, but upon the moral dispositions of the individuals who compose a nation; and that these dispositions cannot be evoked or altered at will, but are the result of slow historic processes. The way to peace and liberty leads through a long series of struggles and disappointments. It is the path of the education of mankind. The distance between the actual condition of society and that ideal social state which shall be the realization of men's hopes and aspirations is too wide to be traversed in a short time. The period of revolutions is not drawing to its close.

But the Congress which the Journal des Débats with an obvious sneer calls "the Congress of Perpetual War," transfers the fulfilment of its aspirations from a distant future to the near present. For it the day of regeneration is "un jour prochain"—is to-morrow. Substitute new institutions for the old, republic for monarchy, militia for standing army, and the end is achieved. It was curious and instructive to listen, day after day, to the various expressions of this doctrinaire faith in forms and institutions, not as the evidences but as the sources of human progress, and to hear the virtues of the people exalted, as if the establishment of a democratic form of government, based on universal suffrage, were synonymous with the abolition of selfishness and all evil passions—as if men and women were bad because of imperialism and the government of kings, and nothing were needed for the millennium but popular liberties.

In one view, all this is natural enough. The selfish and repressive forces embodied in the governments of Europe, and the injustice and cruelty involved in the actual conditions of society, are so great that it is not to be wondered at that men who suffer under them should regard the destruction of the present political and social order, and the substitution for it of an order in which human rights should receive fuller recognition, as likely to produce more beneficial results on society than can justly be anticipated from any such revolution. Their error is in supposing a step toward the goal to be the accomplishment of the greater part of the course, if not, indeed, the arrival at the goal itself.

The debates in the Congress derived a great part of their interest from their wide scope, which gave opportunity to the different speakers to express in the freest manner their various creeds and sentiments. The conclusions which were adopted by vote after a three days' discussion of the first question that had been proposed by the committee, namely, that of ths basis of a federal organization of Europe, did not formulate in any exact manner the opinions of the various speakers as they had been expressed in the previous debate, but were accepted as a sort of manifesto of the general sentiment. They were as follows:

"1. That the sole means of establishing peace in Europe is the formation of a federation of peoples, under the name of The United States of Europe.

"2. That the government of this union must be republican and federative.

"3. That the constitution of this government must be perfectible.

"4. That the European federation must guarantee to each of the peoples composing it:

"Sovereignty and autonomy;
"The liberty of the individual;
"Freedom of suffrage;
"Liberty of the press;
"Liberty of meeting and association;
"Liberty of conscience;
"Liberty of work for individual profit (sans exploitation);
"Direct individual responsibility of all the officers of the executive order.

"5. That no people can enter into the European confederation if it have not already the full exercise:

"Of universal suffrage;
"Of the right of agreeing to and refusing taxation;
"Of the right of peace and war;
"Of the right of concluding or of ratifying political alliances and commercial treaties;
"Of the right of perfecting its own constitution."

These conclusions were plainly not drawn up by a very skilful hand, and in adopting them the Congress hardly felt that they were binding themselves to any definite scheme. So, too, on the question of "the means by which economical and social antagonism between citizens may be made to disappear," the Congress, after an animated but desultory discussion, which occupied its two final sessions, voted to refer the whole subject to a committee to report at the next annual meeting.

Such proceedings are not dangerous; and such a meeting is not an assembly from which a new republican crusade is likely to date its origin.

It simply indicates the temper of a section of the advanced radical party in Europe, and affords a vent to their sentiments.

In contrast with the previous meetings at Berne and Geneva, the course of the public proceedings of the Congress at Lausanne was orderly, and the debate was maintained at a high level of talent. There were but few dull speakers, and these few were listened to with commendable patience. For the most part, the speakers showed rare natural qualifications for oratory. In ease and fluency of speech, in neat turn of phrase, in precision of statement, in variety of illustration, in force and propriety of action, they far surpassed the average orator of an American convention. The rapidity and animation of elocution, the perfect form of the hurried, impromptu sentences were in some instances amazing to one accustomed to American awkwardness of expression and to the English drawl. There were no speeches against time. Many of them were hot, fervid, passionate bursts of native eloquence that would have been extremely effective with a more popular audience than that which crowded the little hall of the Casino. The applause was always ready, often general, but rarely vehement. As usual at such a meeting, two different orders of thought or sentiment seemed to excite nearly equal approval. A bit of good sense, of satirical humor, or a sound practical suggestion clearly put, met with applause as quick and warm as that which greeted the enunciation of an extreme doctrine or some piece of fiery declamation.

In comparison with other assemblies of professed reformers, there was not much extravagance in the speeches. The doctrines of pure communism found little voice; the idea of the equalization of properties, "economical equalization," as it was termed by one of the orators of the new "collectivist" school, did not meet with much favor, while, on the contrary, that of "the destruction of the monopoly of capital" was vague enough to receive a pretty general approval. During the final sessions, the long-standing quarrel between the bourgeoisie and the ouvriers showed itself not indistinctly, and gave point to the words of M. Hugo at the close of the Congress, which were directed to that "immense apaisement des haines" which he had announced at the beginning as one of the chief objects of its efforts.

Besides the Polish-American-Cosmopolite, Mrs. Rose, but one woman took part in the proceedings. This was a Madame Goegg, who is perhaps as well fitted as Mrs. Rose herself, and certainly not much better, to promote effectively the emancipation of her sex. She and her husband are types of the "irreconcilable" German radical—not the wisest or most charming of human beings.

The only person present of great distinction, besides Victor Hugo, was M. Edgar Quinet. He is now between sixty and seventy years old, and does not bear his years as well as M. Hugo. At the opening of the afternoon of the 17th he took his place at the tribune, amidst hearty applause, and read in a dull way a brief discourse, which possessed little interest except as coming from a man of such note, a man once of genuine literary power, if not genius, and who had given proof of devotion to principle at the cost of poverty and exile. There was in what he said a naïveté of self-conceit almost touching in its childishness, and strongly in contrast with the vigorous, theatrical display of M. Hugo's gigantic self-confidence. "Two years ago," he said, "at your first meeting at Geneva, I addressed, from the depth of the moral death in which everything seemed sunk, an appeal to the human conscience, and I conjured it to rise from the night, and to come to the aid of those who still persisted in the combat for justice and for right. To-day I salute the reawakening of this conscience." This gives the key-note of his short address. Thirty years and more ago, Sainte-Beuve said of Quinet that he belonged "to a generous and pure generation, avid of hope, insatiable of fine desires," and he applied to him and his fellows the lines of a contemporary poet, now forgotten, describing him as one—

> "Qui pâlit de travail, et les larmes aux yeux, > Cherchant son avenir, au plus profond des cieux
> Suit l'étoile mysterieuse."

The old Quinet is what the young was. In his thin voice one heard, in his trembling hand, in his pale, amiable face, one saw the man worn with disappointment, but still avid of hope, insatiable of fine desires, and still following the mysterious star in search of the future. He has a large, round head, a heavy face, and a kind expression; his hair is white, but his broad figure is still erect. But what hope is there for the future while such rhetoricians as Quinet and Victor Hugo are accepted as pioneers and guides through the dark road?

The Congress did not do much toward founding the true Commonwealth.

Correspondence.

A MANUAL LABORER ON MANUAL LABOR.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Permit me to express the peculiar interest that I felt in your article on "Manual Labor" in the Nation of Sept. 16, and in the subsequent discussion of the subject, under the head of "Correspondence" (Sept. 30 and Oct. 7). Being employed at manual labor in one of the largest steam-engine shops in the country, and daily practically associated with the class referred to, I agree with you that it is "high time that this most important social problem of the day were discussed in the language of soberness and truth." Now that you have taken up the subject, give it full and free discussion, until it is stripped of its glamor and the fallacious sentiments through which we are now required to look at it. Let "Greek meet Greek;" rub brain against brain, and give us the benefit of the heat and sparks produced, since it is a fact that "for all progress in the best sense of the word we are indebted to brain labor." In the ancient world, "robbery, either wholesale or retail, was the favorite mode of making provision for one's old age. . . . Labor was openly and unblushingly spoken of as disgusting and degrading. Under this theory, however, the world went rapidly to the dogs," etc. History repeats itself, for in the present time "there is nothing which every person in the community more carefully or strenuously avoids, if he can, than manual labor." Verily, we are not so different from those ancients; no, not even in the matter of robbery—wholesale at that—in some of the municipal "rings" that we occasionally read of in the Nation, and if they are not going "rapidly to the dogs," they ought to be quickly sent there. Apparently, however, we are not sufficiently courageous openly to acknowledge that muscular toil is emphatically naturally repulsive; but that is a fact which admits of ready proof.

This, as I understand it, is your point, to which "W. S.," Sept. 30, assents, but cannot recognize the preference for mental labor as "a sign of the progress of society." Say "the increasing preference," etc., and I can. "W. S." would "rather endeavor to show how weak, unmanly, selfish and mean such a disposition often is." So it may be, when it is permitted to get the mastery of the mind and prevent the performance of what one "knows to be his duty."

Statements stand for what they are worth, but they are never so unanswerable as facts practically demonstrated. One man states that muscular toil is elevating, dignifying, ennobling. Another, that it is wholly disgusting, "necessarily degrading." Supposing we admit, for the moment, that any and all toil is elevating, dignifying; the next question is, to what does it elevate? Or, if he is not down, degraded, how can a man be elevated or dignified? If he is "a man for a' that;" or if, as an inebriate once said, "One man is just as good as another, and a ——— sight better," what is meant by elevating or dignifying him? Is it not pure fallacy to state that he is just as elevated and noble who toils daily perpetually with his muscle for mere existence, as he who possesses a master-mind and gives to the world the benefit of its power? Does "W. S." recognize "any divine Providence in the affairs of men" when he understandingly reads the parable of the man with five talents and the man with one? The latter brought back just what was given him—an unused life—but it was not enough. He had existed—call it lived, if you will—but had in no way increased or elevated himself. Take for your basis muscle, and for your altitude the highest mental perfection ever attained by mortal, and I will build you a pyramid whose base shall be immeasurable, but which shall quickly terminate in a sharp point with the minds of men.

Manual labor may be the means of elevating a man, if he brings together in his character industry, skill, frugality, and a long-continued, persevering, patient effort. But to what does it elevate him? To manual labor more arduous? No, sir! to brain labor, as his constant, highest, natural aspiration. But let me witness that it is "a hard road to travel." Did any one ever hear of a man with mental culture and occupation trying muscular toil as a means of elevating and ennobling himself? If you ask, is a man more degraded by doing honest muscular labor in order to support life than he would be by leaving it undone, depending upon charity? I say, no! a hundred times no! But imagine Mr. Blank going into the furnace-room to feed the fires, leaving his present position of owner and manager of this large shop. Is he degraded? I say, yes! a hundred times yes! What, by the smut on his hands and his heretofore clean linen? No; for this will wash off and leave him, "to all intents and purposes" just as he was before. Or, again, will "W. S." try to imagine the editor of the Nation taking his seat upon the box and driving through his city, crying "charcoal! charcoal!" and then say is he elevated or degraded—is he below or above his sphere of usefulness? Every human being feels "in the marrow of his bones that the respectability of any kind of labor depends upon the amount of mind it calls for."

We lost our foreman last month by death. Does any man doubt the preference of men for mental labor? Let him come here and witness the evident aspiration, among manual laborers, for the honor of filling the vacancies that are sure to be created by promotions, and where mental not muscular capacity is required. May not these three or four hundred men be cited as a fair representation of human nature among their class?

How much more does the community approve a man who chooses to make labor "elevating," at least in his own case, than one who plods on in the same beaten track, like a blind horse grinding bark! Of how much more value to his employer is a man capable of using his mind in the control and direction of any amount of muscle applied to labor, than one who is only capable of managing his own small supply! Does any man compare the muscular toil involved in making the first model of a new and valuable machine with the mind that conceives and directs? No, indeed! The labor of all the men that ever worked on steam-engines is not to be compared in benefit to the world with the mental labor of Watt and the other pioneer steam-engine builders, because the brain worked first and required and controlled the muscles, which seem in no way superior to the machine itself except as they are affected by the mind. God made mind superior to matter, and so it must ever remain. Hence, the more mind, the higher the elevation; and the less mind, the lower the degradation—there is no need to use a sugared word to express it. Therefore, I conclude that it is as natural for men to desire to elevate themselves to mental labor as to draw the breath of life. Really, it seems superfluous to make these propositions, since every well-balanced mind ought to feel them for itself; but from them we see that men not only do, but why they should, prefer mental labor to physical. And this view, so far from "justifying the existence of a servile class," is, on the contrary, their only salvation, giving to them encouragement to rise, to elevate and dignify themselves. How? by seeking more arduous muscular exertion? No; but by taking the shortest practical honorable road to a position of mental labor and usefulness. But why should "W. S." so flatly contradict himself, by inferring that there is anything obnoxious in a position in such a class, since he finds any such "tone" in your article "so very objectionable?"

And is it indeed "notorious that all muscular toil exercises a more or less deadening influence upon the mental perceptions?" Is there any one who doubts it? Is this question asked for information's sake, or because the writer could not deny the truth of the statement? Look at the degraded class of manual laborers lately slaves in our midst. There is an example of labor with the least possible exercise of mind. They had not so much as to care for the ordinary necessaries of life. Were they degraded? How? by the colored skin and soiled hands, and by the character of the work they performed? No, but by the want of or non-employment of mind. Can he look at these poor beings and doubt that constant disuse deteriorates the active power of mind or keeps it smouldering under the ashes of its own consumption? The poor day-laborer here is not owned as property, but he sells his labor for nothing more than a "living." He is a slave to circumstances, compelled to work at muscular toil to the almost entire neglect of his mental faculties, and its elevating influences upon him in the development of the purer qualities of human nature are not as yet perceptible to the naked eye. "The deadening influence" upon his "mental perceptions" is less than upon that of the late slave in the ratio of his greater use of mind in maintaining life.

If any man thinks that a weary laborer can improve his mind and increase his knowledge equally as well as a clerk or some one in mental occupation, let him try it for one week with my hammer and chisel. First, the means and opportunity are not his; second, his associations are no assistance nor stimulus; third, the "deadening influence upon the mental perceptions" and the body render it almost impossible to receive the necessary impressions.

God Almighty deemed it sufficient—shall I say punishment or degradation?—to Adam and his family to doom them and their race to perpetual toil, from which no mortal can escape who eats what must be bought with money. But I hold that the further one removes himself from manual labor by the improvement of his mind, keeping honor bright, he is just so far to be commended over one who does not elevate himself at all; that a man who acknowledges that he can be of more service with his muscle than brain, acknowledges what a good-natured ass would if he could speak. Even one ass is superior to another by being more serviceable, but an ass is an ass "for a' that," and we don't need a poet to tell it. The highest order of beings are those with minds, not muscle. There is no enjoyment from muscle that is not indulged in by the brute, and I agree with "L. H." (Oct. 7) that when muscle gets to be better paid (I suppose he means paid more, for it is proportionally better paid now) than mind, men will forsake their callings and work at manual labor—love of money however, not of labor, being the incentive. But when this happens, the skies will immediately darken. I can also agree that "the pleasure a mechanic takes in his work is not in the strain on his muscle, but in the growth and completion of the thing which he creates." That is, the eye conveys to the mind the growing and completed beauties of his work, the "strain on the muscles" being forgotten—compensated by the mind's pleasure in the contemplation, not of the labor expended, but of the growing or completed work. The contemplation of the toil would invariably cause a deep-drawn sigh—because there was not more work? No; but a sigh of relief that it was all done. E. R.

PROVIDENCE, Oct. 11, 1869.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY AND THE CHAIRMAN OF THE "WAYS AND MEANS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The importance of the subject leads me to intrude upon you once more. The country is flooded with financial schemes and criticisms, which are like shots fired in the air, almost without the possibility of any real effect. Concentration of effort is absolutely indispensable to any practical result. Only on the floor of Congress can this be brought about, and thus far the progress there is but little greater. Almost all of our present legislators have, as you well point out, risen to their places upon one single question. For a quarter of a century, all other interests of the country have been subordinated to one issue, that of slavery. Of course it was well it should be so; and, when one looks at the result, one can hardly regret the sacrifice. It is to be hoped, however, that time will now settle what is left of this question, and there are others pressing so hard that they can no longer be placed in the second rank. In the cases of slavery and the war, the issues were so simple that the popular will and intelligence could be brought directly to bear; but the subject of finance, and especially currency, is so largely technical that it is not to be expected the people will ever understand it. What is wanted is a leader who, with courage and self-possession, shall have an apparent understanding of the subject, and such definiteness and consistency of views as shall enable him with entire frankness to state the method of their operation, to explain them as he goes along, and to defend them against all comers. I believe the people would be only too eager to bestow their confidence on such a man, and to lend him an irresistible support.

In the speeches of the members of Congress, including Mr. Schenck, it has seemed to me that with very little knowledge of the technical history of the subject, they have attempted to reason it out à priori, and proceeding, as it were, à tâtons, they have stood upon very uncertain ground. Had Mr. Schenck been very certain of his position and of the arguments in its defence, he would not have been bowled over by General Butler or anybody else, but would have been ready with a Roland for the latter's Oliver.

But what I would here especially urge is this; that the position of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House is not at all such as that of the Secretary of the Treasury would be. In the first place, he has little or nothing to do with carrying out the financial scheme. It is no object—indeed, it is almost impossible—for him to do battle in its favor on the ground of its practicability and necessity for successful operation, because he cannot be sure of the co-operation or as to the course in any respect of the official who is to conduct that operation. If the plan proves a success, he gets but little of the credit; if it fails, little of the obloquy. Probably not one person in ten in the country understands the function of the Chairman, and I doubt if a much larger proportion know who he is. All eyes are turned on the Secretary of the Treasury, who is really little more than a chief clerk, to carry out the plans of others. This want of direct interest in the result of the plan cannot but affect the action of the Chairman also in its preparation. He is much more interested in getting a bill through the House than about its fate afterwards. Suppose there is a question of a large railroad grant. He is much more likely to yield, for the sake of support, than to hold out in opposition for the sake of the financial administration. The success of this administration is, however, the main object of the Secretary, and he would be much more likely to stand up firmly on points essential to it.

Again, there are sad reports as to the state of the Treasury Department. It is said—I know not with what truth—that there have been many persons drawing pay without any service, appointed by Mr. McCulloch at the request of Mr. Johnson. On the other hand, it is said that Mr. Boutwell is effecting a reform in this respect. But as the case now stands, the public cannot learn the truth of either report. There is a rumor that Assistant-Treasurer Butterfield has had some connection with the recent gold corner. There is now no possibility of getting at the truth short of the cumbrous method of a Congressional Committee. But if the Secretary were in the House, a few well-directed enquiries would settle the matter. I am inclined to think that such an arrangement would be a first step also in the reform of the Civil Service.

The main objection to such a measure would be that if Congress should refuse to support a plan advocated by the Secretary, the latter must resign, or fail in his administration, and that such a control by Congress of the Executive is contrary to our system. But there is no other way to secure efficiency. What would be thought of the general of an army who should be forced to receive his plan of campaign from the War Department? His only protection is in resignation.

In England, the failure of any important measure involves the resignation of the whole Cabinet, and a total change in the policy of the Government. But if the resignation were confined to the head of a single department, it would be much more limited in its effect, and might thus be not inconsistent with our theory of government. G. B.

LITERARY.

Mr. Henry Carey Baird, of Philadelphia, announces "Civil Architecture: a Complete Theoretical and Practical System of Building," by Mr. Edward Shaw, with an added "Treatise on Gothic Architecture," by Mr. Thomas Silloway and Mr. George H. Harding.——Mr. G. W. Carleton has in press a new poem—"Bothwell," we suppose—by Mr. A. C. Swinburne; a new novel by "Orpheus C. Kerr;" and "Josh Billings's" "Farmers' Almanac."——Messrs. Harper & Brothers have in press two new books by Mr. J. S. C. Abbott, the one entitled "Joseph Bonaparte," the other "The Romance of Spanish History." The same house continue the publication of their editions of George Eliot's and Charles Reade's works, and announce a reprint of the revised edition of Haydn's "Dictionary of Dates." It is a pity that they did not keep on with their "Thackeray" till they reached "Catherine," which Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. have recently published in a mutilated form, their reason being that the catastrophe—which consists of the burning of the criminal heroine—is too shocking for publication. There is nothing like delicacy in such matters.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. will publish "In Both Worlds," which is by Dr. W. H. Holcombe; "Madame Louise of France," a translated novel; "Helen Erskine," a novel of native manufacture, the author being Mrs. M. H. Robinson; and the second volume of the "Memoirs of Alexander Campbell."——"The Prince of Darkness," by Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, is "A Romance of the Blue Ridge," as we have not heretofore mentioned. It will be issued by the Messrs. Peterson.——Messrs. Porter & Coates, of Philadelphia, announce a translation, by Mrs. Coleman and her daughter, of the Countess de Ségur's "Fairy Tales;" a new edition of "Popular Tales and Household Stories," by the Brothers Grimm; and several other "juveniles."——"Sanctum Sanctorum" is the title of a new book by Mr. Theodore Tilton, which will be published by Sheldon: "Leaves from an Editor's Table" is the second title. The same firm will publish an illustrated history of the United States, which has been prepared for the use of grammar schools by Mr. B. J. Lossing, and a work announced as by "Professor Upham," and called "The Wise Men of the East: Who were They?"——Mrs. J. H. Thomas, of Philadelphia, has in press a pocket edition of "The Imitation of Christ," a book of stories that illustrate the Church of England Catechism, and a story called "Janet's Two Homes," which is the work of a clergyman's widow.

—It was rather interesting to notice, when the decision of the Court in the Lawrence-Dana copyright suit was announced, the various views of the judgment taken by different sections of the press. Republican papers with one accord held that the decision was of no importance whatever as having a bearing upon the character of the contestants, while Democratic sheets all over the country declared that here was new evidence of the inborn rascality of that party of which the defendant was a member. There was a very funny article in the World, the gist of which was that the public might now see how genuine were the professions of the party of "moral ideas" in public matters when one of its most prominent members had been branded in open court as a thief. The suit was treated by the Democratic papers as if it had been an indictment for larceny. How the Butler organs of the Fifth Massachusetts District dealt with the subject we regret to say we do not know. On one side, their duty as Republican journals would have required abuse of Lawrence as a Democratic editor; on the other side, the recollections of the campaign of '68 would certainly have predisposed them to look with a suspicious eye on the proceedings of Dana. If we remember right, one of Butler's most telling thrusts at his adversary during that contest was in a speech in which he intimated, or, perhaps we should say, stated broadly—for the General rarely intimates—that, waiving all questions of "irregularity," considerable indecency was shown by any gentleman who came down into another gentleman's district, and opposed him on moral grounds, when he himself was at the time laboring under the grave suspicion of having purloined private property. Under these circumstances, we should much like to know what the Ipswich Light and the Marblehead Palladium did think about the decision of Judge Clifford. No doubt their native sagacity guided them right at last. However, important as the case is in its political aspect, it has also a legal side, which is not without interest to the non-political classes of the population, and indeed may be said to affect the interests of the literary classes very closely. We have already given our readers an abstract of the decision, so far as it concerns the parties to the suit; but besides this, a novel point of law was settled, which seems to have escaped notice in the discussion to which the case has given rise. The whole decision has not been published anywhere; and we speak as laymen, so that we may well go wrong, but as we understand the ruling of the Court, it is this: The first question, of course, was whether Mr. Lawrence had the right to bring any action at all—whether he was a proper plaintiff; and the doubt on this head arose from the fact that he held no legal copyright. The copyright of Wheaton's International Law stood in the name of Miss Wheaton; and the first question for the Court was whether a plaintiff who had no recorded copyright could avail himself of the copyright held by another. In other words, could it be shown that Miss Wheaton was trustee for Mr. Lawrence—that the latter was really entitled to the beneficial use of the copyright, while the legal title to it remained in the former? And the Court held that this could be done. The point is new, we believe, in the jurisprudence of this country; whether the English courts have passed upon it we do not know. The practical effect of the decision, so far as publishers are concerned, would seem to be that they must be careful with whom they deal; that if any facts are brought to their knowledge which lead them to suspect the existence of an equitable as well as a legal copyright, they must take care not to infringe either the one or the other. It will not do for them to protect themselves against the legal holder simply; they must beware also of the equitable holder. It is just like the case of a landed estate held by A. in trust for B. Those who deal with A. must see that he does not exceed his powers as trustee.

—Among the cloud of new periodicals that are coming out in England, the most noticeable are Messrs. Macmillan & Co.'s Nature and Mr. Murray's Academy. The title of the former is not very specifically descriptive; we suppose, however, that the "nature" of the new paper will partake of the "Macmillanism" of which some people have complained, for it is to be given up to science in its various branches. It will be published weekly, will be illustrated, and is to have for editor Mr. J. Norman Lockyer. The Academy we have mentioned before. A distinctive feature of it is to be its signed reviews. Very few people will expect this to be a good feature. Impartiality and completeness become impossible under the system of signatures. The critic must often be dishonest and thus injure the public, or else he hurts the feelings of authors and soon is surrounded by enemies. The anonymous system is but very seldom used as a cover for malice, while the other, even in its best estate, in France, constantly ministers to vanity and induces falsehood. The objection is made sometimes that even where the anonymous system is nominally in vogue, it practically is not maintained. Everybody knew, it is said, what articles in the Edinburgh were written by Macaulay and Carlyle, and what in the Quarterly by Southey. This is partly so, and so in the case of a few men. They, however, were not the men who can be said to have carried on the critical business of the reviews named, and others like them, their criticism of contemporaries being no great portion of their work. And where, as in the case of Jeffrey and Wilson, criticism of contemporaries was a regular occupation, what did it often result in? Jeffrey found there was an occasional duel to fight, and the number of men who would have liked to shoot Wilson on sight was probably just about half the whole number of men whose books he had had in hand.

—Parallel with the expensive reprints from rare copies issued by the Rev. Mr. Grosart in the Fuller Worthies' Library, appears another series of English reprints excellently edited by Edward Arber, Associate, King's College, London. His object is not, like Grosart or Collier, to serve the rich book-lover by furnishing him exclusively with works which had become so rare that even a rich man could with difficulty obtain them. Mr. Arber wishes to diffuse as widely as possible the best specimens of English style and the richest treasures of English thought. Accordingly, instead of limiting his reprints to 156 copies, he courts a large sale by issuing, at prices which a poor student can afford to give, works which every student of English literature would wish to possess. Some, therefore, of the pieces selected are common enough. Latimer's "Sermon of the Ploughers" had already been published once separately, and fifteen times conjointly with other works; of Sir Philip Sidney's "Apologie for Poetrie" there had been three separate and twenty-one conjoint editions; of Selden's "Table-Talk," thirteen separate and one conjoint editions; of Ascham's "Toxophilus," five separate and five conjoint; of Addison's "Criticism on Milton's Paradise Lost," one separate and thirteen conjoint, to say nothing of the innumerable editions of the Spectator; of More's "Utopia," six editions of Robinson's translation, ten of Bishop Burnet's, one of Arthur Cayley's; of the Duke of Buckingham's "Rehearsal," eleven separate and eight conjoint; of Earle's "Micro-Cosmographie," six separate and two conjoint, one translation and one adaptation; of Whetstone's "Remembraunce of the wel imployed life of George Gaskoigne," of Gascoigne's "Certayne Notes of Instruction," and of his "Steele Glas and the Complaynte of Philomene," four or five editions each. On the other hand, of Webbe's "Trauailes" there have been only three editions, all in 1590; of Puttenham's "Arte of English Poesie" only the original issue of 1589, lately priced by Lily at £4 14s. 6d., and a reprint in the first volume of Haslewood's "Ancient Critical Essays," London, 1811–16, 2 vols. 4to, of which the greater part were destroyed by fire; and, though Lyly's "Euphues" passed through twelve editions in fifty-six years, it has only appeared once (in 1718) since 1636, and the "Euphues and his England" has not appeared at all since that date; and similarly, although there were four editions in all of Gosson's "Schoole of Abuse"—which occasioned the writing of Sidney's "Apologie for Poetrie"—the "Short Apologie of the Schoole of Abuse," in reply to Sidney, had not been published since 1586. The list we have given shows what interesting works have been selected. The style of editing, too, is very satisfactory. Each piece is preceded by a brief "chronicle of some of the principal events in the life" of its author, which, so far as it goes beyond a mere statement of events, with dates conveniently set at the side of the page, is usually quoted from contemporary or slightly subsequent sketches, so as to correspond in quaintness to the quaint language of the book; an introduction furnishes the literary history and any necessary remarks on the scope and contents of the work; a bibliography gives in short space a list of the various editions; and occasionally brief notes at the end explain difficult passages. Mr. Arber knows how to use types to make things clear—one of the qualities which distinguish an editor who understands his craft from the general run of editors, who do not. All this good work is furnished at very low prices, averaging about 9d. per hundred pages of the issue in stiff covers, with about twenty-five per cent. addition for cloth binding. The success of these English reprints is a gratifying evidence of the renewed interest taken in the best writings of the Tudor and Stuart age, and would be more gratifying if one could be sure that the volumes enthusiastically bought with the best intentions did not often lie unread on the table or in the book-case, like the works of "standard" authors; yet if anything could tempt one unaccustomed to such reading to attack old-fashioned thoughts, further veiled by strange orthography, it would be the convenient form and clear type of these editions.

—Col. Sir Henry James, the inventor of the art of photozincography, encouraged by the success of the fac-similes of the Domesday Book, recommended to the English Government the publication of a series of fac-similes of national manuscripts which should illustrate the change in language and writing from the time of the Conquest to the reign of Queen Anne. The plan was approved, and the work has appeared in four large quarto volumes (London: 1865–68). A set has just been received at the Boston Athenæum Library, and proves to be of high interest. The reproduction is very well done, although Col. James complains that many of the documents were defaced by age or faintly written. A sort of calendar of the MSS., by W. B. Sanders, with such explanations, biographical and other, as were necessary, is prefixed to each volume. A translation of foreign documents and a transcript of those written in English is printed on the page opposite each fac-simile, and is, to all but students of palæography, an absolutely indispensable help to reading the crabbed handwriting of the earlier parts. In the fourth volume the character of course approaches much more nearly to our own, and the writers generally appear to have taken more pains, or at least to have had more skill, in handling the pen. The selection of documents has been admirably made by Thomas Duffus Hardy. The series not only contains autographs of all the sovereigns, beginning with Richard II.—the first English king whose signature we possess—of many princes, prelates, famous nobles, and of a few men of letters, but some of the most interesting passages in English history are illustrated by their contents. A long description of Flodden Field; an account of the execution of Queen Catherine Howard; reports of foreign ambassadors; letters from Mary, Queen of Scots, to Queen Elizabeth; a letter of Knox covertly advising the execution of Mary; records relating to the Gunpowder Plot; the early colonization of the West Indies, Virginia, and Newfoundland; the murder of Overbury; the fall of Bacon; all the chief events in the reigns of the Stuarts—these are but a part of the contents. Among the letters of less public concern are one in Greek to Lady Jane Grey; the extraordinary letters of Sir Christopher Hatton to Queen Elizabeth; two letters to her from the Earl of Leicester, one of them endorsed in her hand "his last letter;" Sir Philip Sidney's urgent death-bed appeal to his surgeon to come with all speed. The royal license to Shakespeare and his companions to act at the Globe and elsewhere is also given. A more interesting collection of autographs has perhaps never appeared. The volumes need only an index; but that they do need greatly. The work is sold for four guineas. The first volume of a similar series of Scottish national manuscripts is published, two others are preparing, and a list of manuscripts relating to Ireland has been recommended for publication.

—Probably the very latest pasquinade that has been produced is this epigram, written a day or two since by a poet and artist who had just heard of the Pope's new carpet, presented him by the King of Prussia:

> "The Hohenzollern arms enwoven there
> With Mastaï-Feretti's." Outs and ins
> Of heretic-Papal stitches! tell us where > The Arms of Nazareth. How St. Satan grins!

So there are still some good haters of the Holy Father who are outside of all the churches.

—M. Michel Chasles has given up the name of the forger who sold him the hundreds of autograph letters from Julius Cæsar, Charlemagne and several of his successors, Shakespeare, Montaigne, Gregory of Tours, Agnes Sorel, Petrarch, Mary, Queen of Scots, Rabelais, Raphael, Philip Augustus, Newton, Pascal, Michael Angelo—in short, everybody who ever figured in history. The man who made M. Chasles so great a dupe is a M. Lucas, about whose history little is known previous to his connection with this extraordinary affair. For some years he got his living, it is supposed, by making genealogies for persons afflicted with a desire to display coat-armor. How he found out M. Chasles is not stated, but when he did find him he used him remorselessly, and, as it turns out, with a stupid greediness, as a banker, to supply him with the means of paying for his little suppers with members of the demi-monde and of the class below it. The mathematician's credulity made him an easy prey, and Lucas must have got from him, first and last, twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars in gold. The Academy is said to have listened with evident hostility and contempt while M. Chasles half-inaudibly read his almost incredible explanation and confession.

MR. EDWARD POLLARD'S SECRET HISTORY OF THE CONFEDERACY.*

THE author of this book probably needs an introduction to but few of our readers; and as he himself in a preface introduces his book to the public, perhaps we may as well repeat the announcement briefly. Mr. Pollard says that although there was ostensibly a republican form of government at Richmond under Mr. Davis, yet really the government there was as secret and recluse as the most absolute and arrogant despotism. A curtain veiled its operations; and to the region behind this curtain Mr. Pollard hints he had access. He has until now rigorously curbed his desire to publish what he saw in secret. He says that he was moved by a fear of creating a prejudice against Mr. Davis whilst the Ex-President was in danger of being brought to trial. But he should have taken advice on this head, and he would have learned that to show up the Ex-President as an incompetent soldier, a stupid counsellor, a chief so arrogant as to disgust all his subordinates, an utterly impracticable man, a promoter of dissension—as, in short, a main cause, in fact, the cause of the ruin of the Confederacy—would have been an excellent way of disarming Northern indignation, and would have indefinitely increased Davis's chances of being let off easily. As it is, Mr. Pollard sees of course that so far as his book will have any effect, the effect will certainly not be of making anybody, South or North, think "the passenger by the Java"—as a Boston paper called him the other day—a man to be held in fear or respect, either for his powers or his character. Things being as they now are with Mr. Davis, Mr. Pollard says it "would be unreasonable that he should longer weigh a calculation so tender and remote against a debt severely due to history." Moreover—and here is a curious reason, for we suppose it does duty as a reason—has not Mr. Davis "condescended to trade," in Liverpool, England? Mr. Pollard feels "conscious of attempting a high and difficult task—an extraordinary work. He comes to it not only with ample literary preparation, but with an unusual animation." He repels the accusation of any prejudice, though he says that he "has been accused of personal hostility to Mr. Davis, and is to-day, perhaps, in all his literary capacities, most widely known to the country as censor of the Confederate chief." He promises to disappoint those who suppose that they will find in his work "a declamation against Mr. Davis—a mere amplitude of rhetoric or an excess of passion." He proposes to ask, "Who were responsible for the failure of the Southern Confederacy?" and will assert the rule that those who assume power are responsible for its discharge, and may not squander their responsibility through subordinates. "To do this, indeed," says Mr. Pollard, "would be to scatter and enfeeble all the lessons of history; to render impossible its unity of narrative, and to nullify its philosophy. Responsibility must rest somewhere in history; it naturally and inevitably ascends."

If, as reported, Mr. Davis has determined to reply to this work, he will have, it appears, what our Irish friends call a heavy handful: "he is welcomed to the task, and is challenged to the combat. He shall have facts to oppose; and in such conspicuous, stern, and unrelenting contest, the world will decide who falls, who retreats, or who covers himself with defeat." Finally, our author is convinced that "he attempts no mean and evanescent commentary on the late war. In betaking himself to a literary task excelling all his former ones, and in which he is fired by various desires, he proudly ventures to produce a work that will not only interest these present times, but that 'will live' permanently and assuredly, if even among the humbler monuments of the historical literature of America."

We feel that in one sense we have hurt this preface by curtailing it; yet we believe we have given the spirit of it with exactness. It ushers in a book of which we have but little to say, and nothing that is favorable. If any one wants to know Mr. Pollard's opinion of Mr. Davis, and of other men and things, it may be got from the contents of this work. If any one is fond of "declamation, mere amplitude of rhetoric, or an excess of passion," he will find that his favorite style has not been left wholly out in the cold, in spite of the author's promise not to entertain it. If any one hates Mr. Davis, and would like to know what hitherto unknown blackness may possibly be painted on him, and in what, as Mr. Pollard calls them, "various conspiracies and vengeful plots" he was perhaps engaged, a hearty hatred may find in these pages some gratification. But we cannot say that the book has one of the qualities which go to make a history. So many legends and traditions have latterly been blown into the air when historical truth, like a slow fire, has at last crept up to them, that nowadays people like before believing to be sure there is no train laid which will by-and-by explode and demolish our belief. The prevailing sceptical feeling attacks us not only in reference to Mr. Pollard's charges against Mr. Davis, but also and chiefly—for Mr. Davis we do not find so interesting a figure as some others—in reference to some military anecdotes which come along here and there to relieve the pitchy darkness of Davis's maladministration. It would, for example, make a difference in our estimate of Stonewall Jackson's character if we were led to believe the story Mr. Pollard relates of him, that he advised at a war-council at Fredericksburg a night attack by the men of his corps, stripped to the waist to produce a horrible effect on the minds of our troops. What Mr. Pollard declares of D. H. Hill is really interesting, if true; that he threw down on the ground in a pet Lee's order of march at Frederick City, which fell into McClellan's hands at a critical moment in the Antietam campaign. If it can be relied on, there is some value in the denial of the story we have heard that during a raid of our troops on Richmond the Union prisoners were undermined. Mr. Pollard asserts that they were only told they were undermined to keep them quiet—a great plot of theirs to get out and murder everybody having become known to the Richmond officials. But as not the slightest evidence is offered to sustain any of these accounts—and as the Stonewall Jackson bugaboo story has been disproved, if we do not remember incorrectly—we do not set much store by any of them. There are in the book two or three disquisitions or essays which would be effective if they were anything more than expressions of opinion; but premises and argument have one common source in the author's unsupported pen. Richmond, if accurately described, must have been a bad place during the war, and Mr. Pollard lights up its wickedness by thrusting a torch into its dark spots now and then. Also, he reads some lectures to the people of the South on their provincialism, and he is very wroth with them for their moral weakness in surrendering their cause.

But his own provincialism is so very pronounced—he is, indeed, so typical a provincial—that, as may be imagined, his advice can hardly by any possibility have any good effect—the manner of it being bad and irritating, of course, and the matter of it being not good. As for the moral weakness of the Southerners in acknowledging themselves defeated—on which our author expends some fearful eloquence—it is difficult to see what the Southerners could have done more than they had done. Mr. Pollard, however, is in the position of some of his British brethren of the quill, who, having all along predicted bloody war in every bush throughout the whole South for forty years, more or less, after Richmond should fall—admitting that fall it could—were immensely disgusted when they found that the men who had done the fighting in the field, and the men who had paid for it out of their property, were not at all of the same opinion as the warriors who had done the fighting on paper and made money by their extreme valor.

But for one thing, we should say nothing about this work, for it is undeserving of serious attention, being essentially no more than Mr. Edward A. Pollard's not too lively abuse of a man he does not like, and never, or almost never, possessing higher interest than that which attaches to gossip about people of importance. Not that it might not have greater merit than this had the author only remembered that readers of history, such readers as he hopes for, want proofs as to all matters of importance. As it is, we can take Mr. Pollard's word only when very clearly not the faintest prejudice can be in his mind as to the matter in hand; and, for that to be the case, we suspect the matter would have to be a trivial one. But, slightly as we value the book before us, we have thought fit to point out a few of its peculiarities for the sake of illustrating an important matter. What is wanted for the purposes of history at the South is more collecting of materials and less writing of books. If we are ever to have a history of the war on the Southern side, it is high time now that facts should be verified and set in order, and that fiction should be discarded. So, too, we may profitably dispense for a time with philosophizing and declamation. It now is too soon for the one, and already it is far too late for the other. "Richemont la Pucelle" is gone now, we should all remember, and gone with her—"afay in de ewigkeit," for ever and for ever—is all the bravery of the leaded editorial which used once to be so terrible by the banks of the James. Mr. Pollard will not remember this; but every intending writer of Southern history will assuredly find it so much the worse for him according as he forgets it. But documents of all kinds should be gathered together; each State should devote some of its revenues to the purpose of collecting information; new documents in the shape of memoirs should be written by soldiers, of high or low rank, conversant with the movements of particular bodies of men in action or on the march. A history of his campaigns by General Johnston or General Lee might be made a permanent addition to the literature of war, and could at all events hardly fail to have great interest for a long time as a book in general literature. But stilted, unsupported tirades like this of Mr. Pollard's are bad in all ways, and worse than worthless. "The future historian of the war," when he comes—if ever he does come—will come with candor at least, and simplicity let us hope, and with coolness, too, we may be pretty sure, and without hatreds and revenges.

TEN ESSAYS ON THE WOMAN QUESTION.*

To one who has made it a business to be acquainted with the literature of women's rights and wrongs, it is a pleasure to take up this new volume—which has its faults certainly; but faults so few, so incidental, and so trifling, that they may be passed by in consideration of its solid merits. The book consists of ten essays and a long introduction. The introduction is by the editress. Of the essays, five are written by men and five by women. Each discusses one particular topic in the main subject, and all together they present the whole case in its general aspects; the men dealing with the legal-scientific and historical phases of the problem, the women undertaking the philosophical, or, as it may perhaps be more properly termed, the abstract argument. Yet this is not a fair account of it either, for the discussion throughout is conducted on the sober level of the practical intelligence, and hardly ever soars away into the regions of pure speculation. The editress ventures on theological ground, but for a moment only, and in a manner so serious and so modest that to find fault with it would be cavilling; and Jessie Boucherett, conjecturing how to provide for superfluous women, betrays an innocent trust in the right-mindedness of men-kind, that shows her at least to be utterly unperverted by her zeal in the cause of her sex, and gives us a delicious assurance that the feminine nature is as yet unspoiled. But with these qualifications, the essays are remarkable for reasonableness and dignity. The temper in which they are written is beyond all praise. "To redeem the cause advocated, as much as may be, from the flippant and heartless treatment, and from the exaggerated and too passionate advocacy, to which it may have been subjected on the one hand and on the other," is the avowed purpose of the volume. There is absolutely no bitterness; there is no heat. Neither the men of the present generation, nor the men of past generations, are held accountable for the deplorable state of social arrangements; nor is any living being charged with wilful and conscious participation in any existing social wrong. The austere judgment of Mill, that men have deliberately put the whole sex in a state of subjection and kept it there, is dismissed quietly along with the intemperate declarations of less eminent people to the same effect. The present distress is ascribed not to masculine malignity or meanness, but to the rapid advances in discovery, invention, expeditive processes, and productive implements, which have outstripped the accepted customs, theories of life, and ideals of character.

To this key all the discussions are arranged. The moderation in the tone of reasoning would seriously displease the American advocates, and earn for the English authors the title of "spooneys," if not of traitors. The very able writer on family life and marriage declares that he looks forward with the greatest dread to any further relaxation of the marriage tie, as playing into the hands of wealthy voluptuaries, and tending to increase the number alike of injudicious marriages and of hasty divorces. The writer on female suffrage—a woman, and a remarkable woman, Julia Wedgwood—pronounces no one qualified to say whether women ought to have the suffrage who has not weighed all the large changes which it is likely to introduce into public and domestic life, one against another, and solved an intricate problem of profit and loss. For such a task few know enough, and many feel too much. She refuses to consider the strong-voiced and strong-mannered partisans whom the preliminary battle for rights has roughened and toughened as samples of the women that will be produced by the new order when fairly inaugurated. A share in the government of the nation does not appear to her a matter of natural right for either man or woman. She has no hesitation in admitting that in all joint action between men and women, the apparent predominance on the part of men is not likely to have resulted simply from human arrangements. She will not be committed to the advocacy of woman's independence. She fears that some of the noblest of her sex enlisted in this cause have not awakened to the knowledge that truth demands their undivided allegiance; that the love of light as light—a love rarer among human beings than any other virtue—is rarest among women. And she believes that woman's natural shrinking from the collision may be fairly trusted to hold her back from any profession or office in which, as in the bar or the senate, she must meet men as opponents. Admissions like these, and there are many such, would be considered at one of our woman's rights conventions so grave as to be fatal to the very principles of the reform. And yet these writers abate no jot of the full claim on the part of women to have, hold, do, become, enjoy whatever their feminine nature craves or is competent to. They are for taking possession of all that belongs to them in the labor market, in the professional field, in art, literature, education, society. In a word, they desire equality before the law, and freedom from purely conventional restraint. But there is such a difference in the modes of reasoning! The tone of the argument is half the argument. These women will hurl a dart with force as great and aim as unerring as Anna Dickinson or Elizabeth Stanton; but the dart hits the enemy, not the friend, and it kills by its weight, not by the venom on its point. They contend for mixed schools, but their appeal is made to observation, experience, economy, and general good sense. They deny that the wife's full title to her own personal property will affect injuriously the peace of the marriage relation; but the reasons they give are drawn from the history of property tenure in marriage among different nations, and from the actual condition of women under different codes, proving that the recognition of the wife's right to property has coincided with a stricter rule as to the indissolubility of the conjugal bond than prevails in England. They protest against the idea that culture and occupation will deprive women of their feminine charm; but their protest is quiet, and is made under reservations that might anger the strong-minded. They charge men with having deprived women of their former occupations, but they show how inevitable this transfer became on the invention of steam-working machinery.

That these essays add materially to the stock of principles or ideas involved in the "woman question" cannot perhaps be affirmed, but they add immensely to the stock of considerations that support them, especially of incidental and accessory considerations. Miss Cobbe's clever paper on the "Final Cause of Woman" discourses brightly and suggestively on the two classes of theory: that based on the idea that women were created to render service to men, either as mothers of their children, as mistresses of their households, or as presiding geniuses in their social world, and that based on the idea that women were created for ends proper to themselves. The pages are crowded with wit and wisdom, but contain no original ideas. An attenuated but, as far as it goes, fair account of the position assigned to woman by Auguste Comte is interesting, but ought not by this time to be new. Jessie Boucherett's notion that young men ought to emigrate voluntarily in order that women may have room for work is original, no doubt, but is scarcely to be regarded in the light of a contribution to social science. Sophia Jex-Blake gives a capital summary of facts proving that medicine is a suitable profession for women. Mr. Charles H. Pearson throws the light of history on the problem of woman's right to the use of her property. Mr. John Boyd-Kinnear throws out searching and clear thoughts on the social position of women in the present age; and Julia Wedgwood places the suffrage question in an unusual aspect, as proposing one way among others of enlarging the range of women's intellectual and social interests, and so making their minds more vigorous, their lives richer, their hearts more sympathetic, and their homes more sure against vacancy, ennui, and frivolity. But in all these cases, the contribution is made to the general sum of intelligence on the whole class of problems, rather than to the number or the weight of principles. This is not said in disparagement of the essays, but cordially in their praise. The principles involved in this discussion have been stated over and over again. They are few in number and they are clear to apprehension. The great need is of temperate, honest, wise, competent discussion, and in several of these essays we have something that approaches to that. These papers are written by trained pens governed by cultivated minds. Indeed, if there is any one respect in which the English mind shows its superiority to the American in this field of reasoning, we find it here. The sore need and the manifest injustice that oppress women in England have made its cry heard by the best heads and hearts, and its wrong felt by the finest characters that English society produces; thus the ripe maturity of feminine power in its highest state of discipline is enlisted in the cause of the sex. Moreover, a heavy weight of law, custom, and conventional prejudice keep the intellect and feeling of the English women down to the sober, earnest business of their cause, allows them no room for sentimental rhapsodies or imaginative flights. Their range of endeavor is limited; their work is cut out for them; their method of work is prescribed. They must examine their grounds and fortify their positions with the utmost care. They have learned that society is a very delicate and complicated structure, an organized thing, deeply rooted in the past, closely affiliated with every kind of interest, and very slow of growth. They are obliged to consult the actual constitution of things and the law of historical progress. Hence their power and their success. Hence their ability to draw to their side such men as F. W. Newman, John Stuart Mill, P. A.

Taylor, Professor Fawcett, Lord Houghton, John Morley, and Professor Masson.

The American women who espouse the cause of their sex necessarily lack these peculiar qualifications. The cause they advocate, urgent enough, heaven knows, in some of its aspects, is not so urgent. They themselves do not speak from so rich a store of social experience or with the same weight of inherited or acquired dignity. They are not kept in position and held closely down to their work by an accumulated burden of law, custom, usage, and prejudice, that compels them to be moderate in desire and reasonable in demand. Elated by the American idea of complete individual independence, animated by the love of freedom, their temptation is to soar away on the wings of the eagle to heights of abstract theory and speculation from which the constitution of terrestrial society, regulated by the ordinary laws of reason, looks mean. They must reach the loftiest peak of attainment, above all the earthly atmospheres of history, tradition, usage, precedent, by one bold flight. Hence their impatience of criticism, their audacity of generalization, their recklessness of statement, their disdain of sober argument, their generous assumptions of feminine nobleness, their liberal assumptions of masculine meanness, their utopian fancies, and their faith in rhetoric. Hence, too, their failure to carry with them the assent of the masculine reason, or even to win the approval of the most cultivated of their own sex. This volume of essays should be read carefully by those—and they are many—who judge the cause of woman's rights and wrongs by the unfortunate attitude and unregulated speech of its leading champions in America. The perusal will teach them that the holding of very decided and very radical opinions on the subject of woman's present and future condition is wholly consistent with the wisdom, the dignity, and the sweetness which constitute the finest womanly charm.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY CONFLICT.*

The true history of the United States—that history which shall trace outward events to the changes wrought in men's minds from which they sprang—has received from Mr. May an acceptable contribution to its materials in the little work mentioned below. He was one of the earliest disciples that gathered around Mr. Garrison when he first rallied the movement which marched forward during thirty years through an unbelieving and resisting world to its final triumph. At the time Mr. May's attention was first called to the condition of the slaves and the duties it created by the voice of a poor and unknown mechanic, the Northern people had succeeded in forgetting, to all outward appearances, that such an anomaly as slavery made a part of their institutions, or that it could ever prove an occasion of fatal disturbance to the working of their machine of government. The energies of the North seemed to have expended themselves in the good fight made against the permission of slavery in Missouri, twelve years before, and a fatal reaction of torpid indifference to have set in. The North was busy with its ships and its looms, and the South with its cotton-raising and sugar-growing, and all was peace and good feeling. But the general conscience, though seared as with a hot iron, was not dead, as was shown by the sympathetic response of a few congenial souls to the demands of the pioneer, and by the blind rage and frantic folly which his words stirred up, not only in lewd fellows of the baser sort, but in honorable and reverend men, governors, judges, doctors in divinity, senators, and representatives. A more unequal fight has seldom been seen since the early days of Christianity, nor one that better shows the power of a true idea to prevail mightily to the pulling down of strongholds, and also the method of its prevailing.

The ferocity of the pro-slavery papers of thirty years since can hardly be conceived of by the generation that has grown up since then. Even the mob-spirit which was abroad and so rampant just before the rebellion broke out, evoked and directed by its master-spirits, as the late President Pierce declared, to fight the battles of slavery in the streets of the Northern cities and villages, did not precisely reproduce those former times, because of the antagonistic spirit of resistance which had been called into existence by the struggles of those thirty years. Then, there was no Republican party controlling States and electing a President. To the general looker-on there was substantially but one party, and that was the whole community engaged with laudable unanimity in suppressing a handful of pestilent disturbers of the peace of society, scarcely enough to be discerned by the naked eye, by every means of sectarian compulsion, of social ostracism, of business persecution, and, in the last resort, of mob violence. Mr. May was spectator and part of all this passage of history, and we think his tale of what he witnessed and underwent while a minister in Connecticut and as General Agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society will seem hardly credible to the present generation. And yet it is but a plain unvarnished tale of unexaggerated facts.

Mr. May does not profess to write a history of the anti-slavery movement, but merely to relate his own experiences in connection with it. One unacquainted with its beginnings and progress, however, may obtain a good general notion of its course as far as it touched public affairs. And his sketches of the men and women who took part in it, especially in its early days, are generally good, though perhaps a little undiscriminating in point of praise. Although always an ardent and active Abolitionist in whatever sphere of other duty he might find himself, he was not directly connected with the operations of the movement after he ceased to be the agent of the Massachusetts Society, after the Gem of Mobs. As a settled minister in Massachusetts and later at Syracuse in this State, and as the head of a Normal School in the interval, he was withdrawn from active participation in the direction of anti-slavery affairs, which may account for his passing over some of the most important passages in their internal history in silence. Therefore, an accurate idea of all the experiences and of the method of the entire movement would not be received from his narrative. There was much about these things that was painful and especially distasteful to a man of Mr. May's gentle and kindly nature, and he was doubtless glad to think himself excused from relating them as he was to be removed from immediate participation in them.

The anti-slavery test was one which tried men's souls to the quick. Slavery had so interwoven itself with American politics and religion, that to attack it was to attack the great political parties and the great religious sects. Many who had joined themselves to the cause, unknowing what they did, were swift to find excuse to separate themselves from it as soon as party growled out its interdict and sect fulminated its excommunication. Such walked with it no more, and not a few who had run well in the days before their own particular temptation had encountered them, lifted their hand against it and its true friends. Mr. May, in his characterization of the earlier Abolitionists, makes no distinction in his dispensation of praise between such and those that endured unto the end. By successive fallings away, the Abolitionists were reduced to a very compact body, which did not much increase specifically to the end. But they kept on their way, advanced from point to point of doctrine and of action as it was given to them to discern the same, never ceased from their testimony against the guilt of the people, nor from their continual claim for the rights of the slaves. They held their meetings regularly, which were sure of crowds from the outside; such "a drug," as Emerson said of them, was "eloquence" there. They maintained their journals, circulated their tracts, sent out their agents, and kept up their agitation as they had means and opportunity. And, gradually, by the laws which govern all reforms, the idea which was the vital principle of their movement forced itself on the minds and consciences of the world without, and showed itself in various shapes in the domains of the church and state. The little leaven spread more and more, and great was the fermentation of the mass. It rent asunder the great Presbyterian body, and cleft in twain the Tract Society, disturbed the peace of the A. B. C. F. M. itself, and intruded into Methodist conferences and Congregational conventions. Then, in politics the Liberty Party, the Conscience Whigs, the Freesoilers, culminated in the great Republican party which elected Lincoln, conquered the rebellion, and abolished slavery.

The Abolitionists proper remained all this time, and up to the firing upon Sumter, as distinct a body as they had ever been. Those that stood nearest to them were most careful to make it clear that they were not of them. And in the closing days of the movement, as in the opening, they were pursued by a mob-spirit as malignant and far better organized than ever before. The attacks upon Mr. Phillips, Sunday morning after Sunday morning, on his way to speak in the Music Hall in Boston, requiring the protection of the police and, we think, sometimes of the military, showed an organized conspiracy to suppress the agitation of the slavery question. And the mob which, with the countenance of Mayor Wightman, broke up the annual meeting of the Massachusetts A. S. Society, in January, 1861, was the most dangerous one the Abolitionists had had to encounter. Had not the mayor closed the Tremont Temple against the evening meeting, bloodshed would inevitably have ensued, as the mob were resolute to seek the blood of Garrison and Phillips, and there were as resolute men, well armed, determined to defend them. But the first gun fired on Sumter cleared away these foul vaporings, and the true relation of slavery to the life of the nation stood out in clear relief. Doubtless, many of the fiercest and most clamorous of that mob afterwards laid down their own lives for their country on Southern battle-fields. The anti-slavery conflict was virtually ended by that first cannon-ball aimed at Sumter, for it struck slavery full in the heart. The movement necessarily fell into the background: a small army of observation watching events until the death of slavery was formally and officially recognized and announced by the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, when it necessarily ceased to exist, by the happiest of euthanasias. The younger generation, to whom the greatest part of what we have glanced at is as ancient history, will find much to interest and instruct them in Mr. May's volume, and perhaps to make them desirous of learning more fully the details of that most remarkable passage of history; while they whose memories do run back to those stirring and pregnant times will find in his recollections a lively help to their own.

Service Manual for the Instruction of Newly-appointed Commissioned Officers, and the Rank and File of the Army, as compiled from Army Regulations, the Articles of War, and the Customs of the Service. By Henry D. Wallen, Bvt. Brig.-General U. S. A., and Commander of the General Service Depot, Fort Columbus, New York Harbor. (New York: D. Van Nostrand. 1869.)—Since the time when our armies folded their tents and silently stole away, we have had but little to remind us how important a thing it is in troublous times to have good soldiers within call. But our war experience has taught us, once for all, that if there are to be soldiers, few or many, it is best to have them good. It is a hopeful thing for an army that officers think it worth their while to write such works as General Wallen's, for they prove that the esprit and discipline of the army are still deemed by its members to be worthy of care. The author of the "Service Manual" has taken less credit to himself than he deserves; for although it is true, as he says, that his book is in part a compilation from the army regulations, the articles of war, and the customs of the service, yet he has imparted a new meaning to those respectable authorities. He has added an appeal to reason to what was mainly an appeal to memory.

His book deserves commendation especially for this—and it is not too slight a thing for the notice of civilians—that there should be addressed to the small communities of the army posts such healthy advice as this little work contains. No officer is too high in rank to profit by it, and no non-commissioned officer or soldier could follow better teaching. The duties of officers and men are well defined, and such a line of conduct is urged that, were the rules and recommendations alike observed, the result would be a life in barracks and camps of a propriety not now attained.

What is expected of officers and men, in a great variety of circumstances, is fully explained in a way to illustrate the phrase in some of the volunteer commissions issued during the war, which ran that John Jones was hereby appointed to the office of captain, and was enjoined to do and perform "all manner of things" thereunto belonging. There is a quaint simplicity in some of the author's rules which enlivens the record of mere routine. "Non-commissioned officers who appear to be in liquor should be carefully inspected—if corporals, by three senior non-commissioned officers of the company; if sergeants, by the three senior sergeants in barracks—and this inspection ought to be made as far apart as practicable from private soldiers." . . . . . "Soldiers should never appear out of their quarters except clean and properly dressed; and they are expected never to present a slovenly appearance, nor to carry umbrellas." . . . . . "The non-commissioned officers' wives who wish it, the musicians' and soldiers' wives, are all to have a portion of the washing, according to their behavior. The allotment of the washing vests in the commanding officers of companies. In the first instance, a general and equal distribution is to be made; after this, officers will diminish the portions of individual laundresses in every instance of their misbehavior, giving the well-behaved that which is taken from the bad." The best of all this is that an officer in charge of a military community can see to it that no principle inculcated by this book is grossly violated within the limits of his command. What a comment it is on our civilization that only a man-at-arms can enforce such golden rules; and what a pity it is that only in garrisons is the domestic discipline so complete that even the washerwomen are under its control!

Scènes et Récits des Guerres de l'Indépendance—Grèce Moderne. Par Eugène Yemeniz." (Paris: 1869.)—In vivid, though not particularly sharp traits, M. Yemeniz reproduces before our mind characters, scenes, and events the familiarity with which formed one of the delights of the liberty-loving generation that witnessed Navarino, the Three Days of Paris, and Ostrolenka, but which to those who saw the revolutionary storms of 1848 and 1849 sweep over their horizon begin to be dim recollections of a remote past. Such, however, are the peculiar features of the men and things he depicts, and such is still the interest felt in the people who, in our century, have fought for freedom at Thermopylæ and framed constitutions in the language of Solon, that in perusing these sketches we feel as if we were revisiting highly attractive persons and spots, whose remembrance, though dimmed by more recent impressions, we have never ceased to cherish. The strong sensation we are apt to experience when reading of the tragic fate of Alexander Ypsilanti, his "sacred band," and his Olympian friend; of his nobler brother's more successful, but almost equally tragic career; of that most amiable of modern Spartans, the Mainote chief Mavromichalis, who, if he knew nought of the first of all Spartan virtues—obedience to law—yet carried, without hesitation, scores of relatives, as ready victims, to the altar of his country: of Odysseus, who, if he possessed not a particle of his namesake's, the ancient Ithacan's, wisdom, nor a particle of the virtue of the Lacedæmonian, whose fame he rivalled by the defence of the Pass of Thermopylæ, can at least not be denied the distinction of being a Greek hero; of the deeds in the field or services in council of Colocotronis, Mavrocordatos, and so many others who worked at the regeneration of Hellas—that sensation is little impaired by the thought that, after all, ancient Hellas has not been revived; that the war with the Turk, so bravely carried through by clephts, palicars, and pirates, was not followed by an age of Hellenic culture like that which followed the wars with the Persians; that Arcadia is still a desert; that Parnassus and Cithæron are haunted by robbers instead of by the muses; that savagery only is exhibited on the plain of Olympia; that lawlessness dwells where Lycurgus framed his laws; and that the city of Pericles is a poor, uncomfortable borough.

It is the great merit of the book before us that, in sketching modern Greece, it not only shows the bright scenes of the heroic struggle to which she owes her existence, but also the unattractive features of her everyday life after the victory; that, while breathing Hellenic patriotism, it is entirely free of that spirit of Hellenic pride and prejudice which is the bane of the restless, always turbulent, and never happy little kingdom. With the best of the foreign friends it still has—their number is unfortunately decreasing from day to day—the author sees the salvation and future growth of Greece in the development of her inner resources and powers, in the culture of the soil and of the mind, in a firm and sound administration, in the curbing of the spirit of lawlessness and party strife that constantly distracts her, and in the taming, also, of that senseless patriotic exaltation which, heated with "the grand idea" of Panhellenic freedom and glory, constantly boasts of the past and dreams of the future, but entirely forgets the demands, the difficulties, and the powerlessness of the present. In Mavrocordatos he sketches the wisest statesman of modern Greece; in Odysseus he shows the opposite type of Greek leaders. In the antagonism of tendencies and passions they represent, he sees a struggle as old as the days of the Hellenic republics—a struggle in which the mind is destined to conquer the sword. Not without considerable historical license, he says:

"At the bottom of these strifes, bloody at first but subsequently assuming the shape of political wranglings, accompanied by perpetual changes in the cabinet, we perceive the ancient rivality of Sparta and Athens, of barbarism and civilization, which reappear in a thousand forms in all the ages and at every epoch of Grecian history. The Hellenes call now this antagonism the struggle of the politicians and soldiers; the former working at the regeneration of Greece by promoting internal reforms and intellectual, moral, and material progress; the latter dreaming the extension of the frontiers by mere force of arms, keeping the country in constant agitation, and, when unable to display their heroism against the Turks, carrying on a small warfare in the mountains against the laws, against society, and more often still against inoffensive travellers. And just as Athens has conquered her sombre rival, whose seat can now hardly be discovered by the passer-by, so will the progress of civilization slowly destroy from the face of Greece the vestiges of barbarism that still stain and agitate her. Only when the ancient spirit of Lacedæmon shall be entirely crushed on the soil of modern Hellas, will this country be entitled to call herself truly regenerated, and to expect the day that shall crown her legitimate national aspirations."

In spite, however, of this aversion to the spirit of ancient Sparta, M. Yemeniz devotes his most interesting pages to pictures of the life of the Mainotes, the most genuine descendants and representatives of the Lacedæmonians of old. And those pictures are far from abounding in repulsive features. The most attractive ones, perhaps, are grouped in the dialogue quoted from Stephanopolis, which gives the primitive formulas of Mainote morality:

"Who art thou?" the young Mainote is asked.
"A free man."
"On what is thy freedom based?"
"On the remembrance of my ancestors."
"Who were they?"
"Spartans."
"What are the duties of a Mainote?"
"To honor the aged and the women, to aid one's father and mother, to be slow in promising and faithful in doing, to revenge insults, to cherish liberty—the greatest of boons—unto death."

Altogether, M. Yemeniz is more successful in delineating the national life and manners of the modern Greeks than in writing the history of their revolutionary leaders. What he states in his biographical sketches is generally correct, but he omits a great deal of what is unavoidably necessary to make them complete. The most defective is the life of Alexander Ypsilanti, which is eulogistic to the exclusion of almost all critical judgment. None of the pieces contained in the book—most of them originally written for the French reviews—shows a careful and exhaustive elaboration; collectively, however, they offer a pleasant and instructive tableau, the merits of which are but slightly marred by evidences of haste in execution. To the latter belong, e. g., the speaking (p. 69) of a Czar at a period when there was only a Czarina—Catharine II.—and the contradictory statements concerning the base surrender of Rhigas, the martyr bard, to the Turks, which under "Odysseus" is charged to the Venetian Government, and under "Ypsilanti"—correctly—to the Austrian.

Jenkins's Handy Lexicon, on the basis of the Vest-pocket Lexicon. By Jabez Jenkins. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1869.)—Save the preface, this work is identical, word for word, and page for page, in its contents with the tiny lexicon by the same compiler on which it is somewhat oddly said to be "based." The type is larger and clearer, the page fitted for the coat-pocket, but otherwise there is no change. We are only criticising the title: the design and execution of the dictionary itself are almost beyond criticism, are very nearly perfect. We have tested it, and speak from experience. The words a fairly cultivated man ought to know will seldom be found in it; but the vocabulary of science and technology, and all words whose meaning does not lie on the surface, or which have derived or secondary meanings of importance, and "the common Latin and French phrases of two or three words, and also many of the names of classical mythology," together with those which represent "foreign moneys, weights, and measures," will almost infallibly reward the search for them. The definitions are admirably concise and clear, and the labor of understanding or of reference is reduced to a minimum. In short, no one who has used this lexicon can have anything but praise for it. By way of sample, we annex a few consecutive definitions selected at random:

Fleer, v. to mock; to grin with a civil air. Flemen, n. a tumor, or chaps on the hands or feet. Flench, Flense, v. to cut out a whale's blubber. Flesh, v. to initiate; to harden; to glut. Fleshment, n. eagerness from a successful initiation. Fletch, v. to feather an arrow. Fletiferous, a. causing tears. Fleur de lis, F. an ornament like a lily. Fleuron, n. sculptured foliage. Flew, Flough, n. waste flying fibres. Flew, n. the large chaps of a deep-mouthed hound. Flex, v. to bend or curve. Flexanimous, a. having power to change the mind. Flexicostate, a. the ribs curved. Flexile, a. easily bent or managed.

A Latin Reader: Consisting of Selections from Phædrus, Cæsar, etc., with copious notes and vocabulary. Prepared by William F. Allen, A.M., Professor of Ancient Languages and History in the University of Wisconsin, and Joseph H. Allen, Cambridge, Mass. (Boston: Edwin Ginn. 1869.)—It is difficult to appreciate the gulf that separates this Reader, in every respect, from those which have hitherto been tolerated in our classical schools. In saying this, we put aside the question as to what is the best mode of teaching the young to read Latin and Greek authors, and indeed any authors whose language is foreign to our own. We compare the work of the Messrs. Allen with those of other book-makers who agree with them in giving the second and not the first place to translation, the first and not the second place to theory and rules; and, thus comparing it, we can speak positively of its unusual merit. There is great freshness in the selections, which range from Plautus to Pliny and Tacitus—omitting, we may remark, besides Horace and Livy—whom students will be sure to meet further on in their course—at least one "first-class name in Roman literature." That name cannot be denied to Lucretius. Besides the merits of variety and freshness, the selections have another marked advantage over those of most "Readers;" they are effectively employed in conveying instruction in ancient history, as well as a rational conception of the private and everyday character of the cultivated Romans. "Nor will it be held void of interest," say the editors, "that we have given from Tacitus, Pliny, and Suetonius every notice to be found in classical antiquity of the early Christians; while, in Virgil's 'Pollio,' and Cicero's correspondence with his friend Sulpicius, is afforded some hint of the level which the most cultivated Pagan thought had attained on religious themes." In the notes, which abound in idiomatic renderings of much originality and aptness, is given a slight but serviceable sketch, semi-critical, of each author. To crown all, there is a condensed vocabulary prepared for general reading, and not for this compilation alone, which might well be issued separately for convenient use. These are the features which commend the Reader to all sub-collegiate students, and lend additional value to the series of text-books prepared by the Messrs. Allen. The typography and paper are almost of holiday fineness, and we trust will be imitated by other publishers.

Outlines of Composition. By H. J. Lander and T. E. Howard, A.M. (Boston: R. S. Davis & Co. 1869.)—This book is to the art of English composition what decalcomania is to the art of painting. Ninety-nine subjects, ranging in dignity from "The Frog" to "The Egyptian Custom of Judging the Dead," are skilfully cut into patterns and spread out on a flat surface, leaving it for the artist only to lay on the colors. Indeed, we do not see that there is much laying on of colors to be done, as the pupil is not only provided with ideas and arrangement, but with a most elegant and artificial diction, all sorts of appropriate moral reflections, and charming poetical quotations. It would be the despair of the teacher of a large school if his scholars were to expand their models much. If, after working through them faithfully, a boy should fail to be master of an artificial and pedantic style of expressing other people's thoughts, then Mr. Lander and Mr. Howard will have labored in vain. We predict for their book a large sale among the members of the lower half of college classes.

Rhetoric: A Text-book designed for use in Schools and Colleges and for Private Study. By E. O. Haven, D.D., LL.D., President of the University of Michigan. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1869.)—We can very well believe Dr. Haven that the method presented in this book has proved with him more successful in practice than any other. It is his own, and that is enough. But it does not by any means follow that a successful oral method will be equally successful when turned into a text-book. Indeed, the contrary would very likely be the case, for an oral method will be completely imbued with the personality of the instructor, and this in proportion to its excellence; take this away, and the life of the method is gone. Now, the book before us strikes us as, above all things, commonplace; and perhaps it is not discreditable to the head of a great university that he cannot compete in a particular branch of study with those who have made it a specialty. But, commonplace as it is, it did not seem so when springing fresh from the mind of an able and earnest man, and presented by a skilful teacher to his class. Even a second-rate illustration will be effective in the mouth of such a man.

The book certainly adds nothing to our educational literature. It is not a book of ideas; it contains no novelty in the way of method; and we see no reason why it should have been written. Moreover, there are many careless and clumsy sentences, and the remarks are often lacking in point. Still, the definitions are generally clear and good, and the illustrations well selected, and it might be made the basis of good class work.

The Week.

VIRGINIA seems to have done very well in the election of her Senators, and made the most creditable addition to the Senate that has been offered by any of the returning States—though Mr. Pool, of North Carolina, is a good man, and will very likely be heard from in due time. The Virginians are Mr. Lewis, who was recently elected Lieutenant-Governor, and Mr. Johnston, a nephew of the Confederate general of that name, a lawyer and a man much esteemed. He was a secessionist, and will represent the decided Conservatives, while Mr. Lewis, who is one of the few members of the Virginia Secession Convention who, after voting and speaking against the ordinance, refused to sign it, will be the representative of the Republican or progressive wing of the party that elected Walker. Both Senators appear to be gentlemen of middle age, of good education, and possessed of the confidence of their fellow-citizens. There is no talk of a refusal to receive Mr. Johnston as Senator, though he cannot take the oath in its integrity. Governor Lewis can, for he was an "outspoken Unionist" during the war—a personage less common in real life than in newspaper notices of candidates, but still a really existent personage in a good many districts of the South.

North Carolina is threatened with martial law in four of her counties, the Governor not feeling quite ready to order it at once, and contenting himself for the present with threatening it, as he wishes to spare the good name of the State. Two of the counties in bad odor are next neighbors to Wake, in which Raleigh, the capital, is situated, and which are in that middle region between the black Republican coast and the white Unionist Republican mountains, and in which the secessionist is still to be found, and in greater relative force than elsewhere. "Ku-klux outrages" are the cause of the disturbance. Masked men open houses at night, kill or whip a man and disappear; one of the jails has been broken open by a mob, and two prisoners put to death; sheriffs and constables are killed or beaten; and, generally, there is a reproduction of the Middle Tennessee mode of dealing with negroes and whites of unsuitable politics. The troubles are of a local character, and no doubt will be but temporary—these attempts at terrorism having always since the war been of a spasmodic character, and not lasting long after one or two of the more enterprising leaders have had enough of excitement, or have made themselves rather uncomfortably conspicuous.

Of a spirit next in evil to that which inspires these murderings, and perhaps even more foolish and stupid—namely, the spirit which refuses "to affiliate with Northerners"—there is, we imagine, a constantly diminishing amount; but still a good deal is left. Bishop Simpson being in Atlanta, Georgia, the other day, was to preach in one of the Methodist Episcopal churches; but a certain number of the members of the society united in refusing him leave to do so. This purely for political reasons. Further South, we have the Dent and Alcorn contest in Mississippi, and have no reason but Judge Dent's word to the contrary for supposing that he is not going to be defeated, as every Republican in the North hopes he may be. He talks to the Mississippians about his brother-in-law, and says, we suspect, rather more things from the sunny stump than he would altogether like to make oath to in the solemn silence of midnight. He seems a flighty, incapable sort of man. In Texas, there is a Democratic candidate in the field, and if he stays in it Hamilton is sure to be defeated, for of the votes that would be given to Hamilton if the fight were between him and Davis alone, many would be given to any straight-out Democratic candidate who should appear. The new constitution is likely to be defeated, we hear.

Politics in Mississippi and Texas we may suppose to be a little warm, and there is considerable interest, which increases week by week, among our German fellow-citizens in this State; but elsewhere there is now no excitement. In Tennessee, Ex-President Johnson is at last out of his misery, or if not, it is through no fault of the Legislature, which "elected him to stay at home," as some of his enemies told him, with cheers, on the evening after that result had been reached. "Moses under a cloud," and "Where 's 'my policy'?" were other unseemly outcries that were set up under the chief's windows on the same occasion. It is hard, however, to feel any sympathy for Mr. Johnson when in such circumstances. Utterly without dignity, case-hardened by the amenities of political life in Tennessee, and being by birth a gentleman not of shrinking delicacy, it is probable that he suffered less because of his defeat than some other people might. It was brought about by the union of the men who hated him for his military rule in Tennessee, the out-and-out Radicals, and the milder and more sensible of the Conservatives—Mr. Emerson Etheridge being the manager of the allied forces, and the majority against Johnson being one. Some of the newspaper men who wanted "Andy" in the Senate to make absurd speeches and furnish them with dispatches, are cruelly disappointed. He is up again, we see, and now wishes to be president of the new Constitutional Convention, which is to meet by-and-by and tear the present Republican-made constitution to pieces; and he is understood to be waiting with some natural impatience for the death of Parson Brownlow, to whom be length of days. Mr. Cooper, who goes to Washington in place of Johnson, is a man of education, a sound judge it is said, and in politics Conservative, but not bitterly so.

The rejoicings over Johnson's defeat have in this part of the country been mainly based on the consideration of the way in which he would bore and disgust people by his oratory in the Senate. But there is in it much more substantial matter for consideration. He has figured for a long time as a repudiator. He has long been in favor of cheating the national creditors, and, since his return to Tennessee, has been in favor of cheating the State creditors—some of whom are just now in rather bad plight. His election, therefore, would have shown that the repudiating element was uppermost in the Tennesseean Democracy, which would have been a very bad sign, for the repudiators are not in any State a financial party, properly so called, but a party of undiluted rascality. A Senator representing them directly, therefore, would have been something far worse than a bore or donkey. There are some useful warnings to be derived from Johnson's career, particularly as to the danger of trusting people who have nothing to recommend them but roaring "faithfulness." Johnson lived for some time before his nomination on raw rebel, seasoned with human equality, and yet he turned out in one short year afterwards "the greatest criminal of this or any other age."

The Supreme Court has given judgment in the Yerger case, not on the merits, however, but on the question of jurisdiction simply, and we are probably still some months from knowing what it thinks of the constitutionality of military tribunals in districts governed under the Reconstruction Acts.

General Butterfield has, it is positively announced, resigned his office, though the Government investigation will still go on. His participation in the "gold corner" has, as we have more than once intimated, been strongly suspected, even by those who had no knowledge of the facts, but there was danger at one time that his case would escape unnoticed under cover of the attack on Grant. The result throws a stronger light than ever on the way in which appointments were made last spring. This one appears to have been actually arranged by the gamblers months beforehand with a view to their operations, and secured without exciting suspicion. The extraordinary chorus of applause from the city newspapers which immediately followed it was enough to excite suspicion—not that we mean to insinuate that the papers spoke under the influence of improper motives, but they evidently spoke under active solicitation or instigation, and this is rarely put in operation unless there is something wrong.

Mr. Boutwell interfered in the Tennessee election for the purpose of defeating Senter. The election was none of his business, and was the business of the people of Tennessee, of whom Mr. Boutwell is not one, and his only practical mode of interference was to give the employees of the Treasury engaged in the work of collecting the public revenue to understand that if they voted for Senter, or did not work for Stokes, they would be turned out of office, and men entirely unacquainted with their duties would be, to the great loss and damage of the Treasury, put in their places. Senter was accordingly elected, the net result of Mr. Boutwell's meddling being, first, the increased demoralization of the revenue service, caused by the deepened conviction of the officers that their places did not depend on the faithful performance of their proper work, and the increased exasperation of the old rebels against the Federal Government—the exasperation of old rebels and the management of local elections not being one of the functions of the Federal Minister of Finance. Undeterred by this pleasing result, Mr. Boutwell, it is said, announces his intention to interfere in Texas, and to disorganize the revenue service there unless the employees "work" against Jack Hamilton. This will probably help Jack Hamilton a good deal, Federal office-holders in Texas being by no means an influential or esteemed body of persons. We wish General Grant could be got to stop the introduction of these caucus tricks into the administration of a great department. The state of things in and about Washington is bad enough, without diffusing and deepening the same evils in distant States.

The Grand Jury is now, at this writing, solemnly engaged in investigating "the gold conspiracy," with the view of indicting the "ring." Now, as the "gold conspiracy" was neither more nor less than a combination to raise the prices of a particular commodity, such as is made with reference to various other commodities every day, and as the world found out nearly a century ago how foolish and ridiculous attempts to punish such combinations by law were, the present inquisition of our Grand Jury is peculiarly interesting. The jurors would do well to look into the influence of witches on the brokers before they separate. The difference between Fisk and Gould's operations and those of all speculators was simply one of degree, not of kind. They were more reckless, more unscrupulous, and were engaged in a more delicate operation than others, and the mischief wrought by their work was greater than in the case of other speculators; but this is all the difference there is. As at present engaged, the Grand Jury is a real curiosity; if it wants to be useful, it will pass a resolution or sign a petition in favor of a return to specie payments.

Five colored clergymen and four colored laymen, of different denominations, unite in making to their fellow-Christians in the State of New York an appeal for the abolition of the clause in the Constitution which denies to a colored man the right to vote unless he possesses property to the amount of $250 over and above his debts. The petitioners beg every clergyman in the State to say something in behalf of this object in the course of his pulpit exercises, on Sunday, October 31, which is the last Sunday before the election. They also solicit the prayers of all men, and the favorable notice of the religious press. The effect of the appeal might very probably be good. In one place it says:

"We are few, poor, and despised. You are relatively many, rich, and powerful; and you make us realize the gulf that separates us. We are shut out of schools and seminaries, then taunted with our ignorance; we are excluded from workshops, and flouted as idle and beggarly; every avenue to political or social eminence is sternly closed against us, and men wonder that we lack energy, thrift, and aspiration. God grant that you may never feel, as we do, the agony of seeing your children insulted and tortured, for no pretence of cause or reason but the color which they inherit, and which it is beyond their power to change."

It is not exactly in one's capacity as communicant in a Christian church that it is pleasant to have facts of this kind stated. It is to be feared that the new Constitution is going to go by the board; but it is of some importance that the vote on this particular clause should, at any rate, be as heavily as possible in its favor.

The influence and circulation of the New York Tribune give anything which appears in it, no matter from what quarter, claims to notice which in a large number of cases it would not otherwise merit; and this must form our excuse for calling its attention again to the performances of the young person who acts as its London correspondent, and who has, during the last two years, furnished so much amusement, not always harmless, we regret to say, to the intelligent public; for he is not simply silly, and pert, and ill-informed, and easily duped, but very malignant and unscrupulous. Of his folly and conceit, his pooh-poohing President Woolsey's knowledge of international law, the other day, was a comical illustration; of his want of principle, we are forced to give one or two examples. He has now been permitted three times to repeat in the columns of the Tribune the statement that the "Nation had accused General Grant of bribery." The first time it was perhaps excusable, owing to its having been suggested to his rather foggy mind by something he saw in the Pall Mall Gazette. The two last times it has had nothing whatever to take it out of the category of wilful falsehood. So, also, he asserts by implication, in Monday's issue, in the course of a clumsy though well-deserved eulogy on Mr. Walker, the late editor of the London Daily News, that the fact that the editor of the Nation and the New York correspondent of the News were one and the same person was unknown to Mr. Walker, and that the result was that he (Mr. Walker) had been "imposed on." Mr. Walker, being a friend of the editor of the Nation of many years' standing, and probably more familiar with all that the editor of the Nation has ever written anywhere than any other person, will probably be as much surprised and disgusted at having his relations with him made the subject of malicious comment in a newspaper laying claims to respectability as anybody can be or ought to be. The assertion, we need hardly say, is an impudent invention without even the shadow of foundation.

The New York Tribune, which is a warm friend of the Cuban insurrection, has at last felt it necessary to urge the large band of Cuban patriots who now parade the streets of Washington, Philadelphia, and New York to go to Cuba and face the Spanish foe on the battle-fields of that island. The gentlemen to whom these remarks have been addressed, however, have taken the advice in bad part, and have written to the editor informing him that they are ready and willing to go, but that the minute they make any attempt to do so, the naughty Marshal of this district steps in and stops them. General Barlow is a soldier himself, and knows "the stern joy that warriors feel" when approaching the enemy; and we feel sure he sympathizes with these brave men, though his duty compels him to hold on to their coat-tails whenever he finds them collected ominously on the melancholy beach. So he and they are both to be pitied rather than condemned. We will, however, mention one source of consolation to these afflicted and disappointed patriots, and that is, that though there may not be much fighting in Cuba, what there is is dangerous to life and limb. Spanish bullets kill and maim, and in addition to this, if the accounts we have read in the Tribune of some of the "battles" there be correct, the part played in them by the native Cubans is one of great embarrassment; for it appears the Americans and other foreign sympathizers form a reserve, whose very peculiar duty is not to support the main body, but to attack it in the rear whenever the enemy advances, and thus furnish a counter-irritant which is intended to rob the Spanish onslaught of its terrors. On the whole, if the Spaniards can be got out of the island by speeches, bazaars, "readings," and the distribution of bonds in this country, we advise all Cuban gentlemen now here to stay here, and give the Marshal no further trouble. That the Spaniards can be expelled in this way, who can doubt? for is not "the pen mightier than the sword?"—and the tongue is mightier than both put together.

Mr. Curtis, famous for nose-pulling, having served out his sentence has been released and is now at large. We fear those who flattered themselves that his punishment would put down the conspiracy of which he was a member, will find themselves greatly mistaken. Our firm conviction is that the unscrupulous Boston nobles will persevere in their guilty designs, but now with greater caution and with more concert of action. The common Bostonians will some fine morning find their noses all pulled before they reach their places of business, and then we shall have "caste established in America," and farewell to our great dream of human brotherhood. We trust the brethren of the Commonwealth will keep a watch on Curtis. If he succeeds in "establishing caste in America," he is sure to put them amongst the Vaisyas and employ them in all sorts of dirty jobs.

Father Hyacinthe, we are glad to learn, has had sufficient perception, or been sufficiently well advised, to avoid the snares laid for him by noisy and foolish Protestants. They are only able to get their cards into his room, and he remains in blessed ignorance of their "views" as to what he ought to do. What has been most astonishing about their performances has been the ignorance or forgetfulness shown in them of the fact, that whatever value the Father has as an enemy of the Papacy lies solely in the fact that he is still a Catholic. If he left the Church, he would perhaps draw a crowd for a month or two to hear him speak, but after that his denunciations of Rome would weigh even less with the world than those of any average Protestant minister, who disposes of the Pope and Cardinals, under three heads and a conclusion, in a Sunday evening discourse. Besides, to all right-minded persons, the monk would prove himself simply a charlatan by running over here to put himself in the hands of sensationalists for public exhibition, at such a crisis in his religious history as that through which he is now passing. Strange as it may seem to a large class of preachers, and lecturers, and writers, and politicians, there are times in which men of real mental power and real weight of character do not wish to star it at public meetings and receptions, and feel the need of solitude and reflection and the society of intimate friends only. It is not everybody who is willing to reveal his deepest personal experiences at fifty cents a head or twenty dollars an article.

The great Pantin murder and the revolt of Father Hyacinthe have gone out of the Parisian mind under the influence of the movement in favor of the meeting of the Corps Législatif, on the 26th of October, without waiting for the Emperor's call. The forty-sixth article of the constitution says: "The Emperor convokes, adjourns, prorogues, and dissolves the legislative body. In case of a dissolution, he is bound to convoke a new body within the period of six months." The six months expire on the 26th, but the Emperor apparently considers the meeting in June as in some sense a session; so he is not going to call another till the 29th of November. Whereupon the Radicals, headed by the veteran "Red" Raspail, talked of meeting on the 26th inst. whether the Emperor would or no, and going to business in imitation of the famous session in the Tennis-court of ominous memory. The Parisians were a good deal excited by it, and there was, of course, talk of an insurrection, but the army remaining faithful, artillery has too good a sweep in Paris streets just now to make this possible; and Marshal Bazaine has not the reputation of being scrupulous or tender-hearted. Rochefort has received an address, signed by 253 voters, asking him to run for a Paris district in place of Gambetta, who has decided to serve for a country district, and it is said not to be unlikely that he will consent. In the meantime he keeps up a stream of abuse on the Empire, and everybody connected with it, unparalleled, or nearly unparalleled—for we remember the encounters between Parson Brownlow and George D. Prentice—in virulence; but then he is sometimes witty, which could hardly be said of the Parson's or Prentice's vituperation. The Orleanists are also said to be "active," whatever that means—most probably nothing in particular, as men of all shades of opinion are active just now. The Empress goes at last to the East, taking Italy on her way, and doing some sentimentalizing on the battle-field of Magenta, which would, a few years ago, have been effective; now, the French public laughs.

The Earl of Derby is dead, after a long and brilliant career, of which, however, he has left hardly a trace in the thought or legislation of the country. He was chiefly remarkable, after all, as a debater and Tory leader, and anybody who led the Tories since the Duke of Wellington's death had but little scope for the display of anything like constructive ability. He made himself slightly ridiculous when he took office, in 1858, by the announcement that he considered it to be his mission to "stem the tide of democracy," and the last speech of his life was a violent protest against the Irish Church Bill, which Punch caricatured by a picture of an aged bull going full tilt at a stone wall. He was, perhaps, as near an approach to the aristocratic ideal, and had a larger number of the aristocratic virtues, than any other man of his day in England, and is probably the last of his kind. The aristocrats of this generation have strong marks of "the man of the people" on them, and show signs of being a little ashamed of their rank—those who go into public life, we mean.

The news from England is what may be called moral and ecclesiastical rather than political. Gladstone has had an immense windfall of bishoprics, which he has distributed amongst Broad Churchmen, to the increasing alarm of the more orthodox. A Church Congress has been sitting at Liverpool for the discussion of church questions, but without any very striking result. The debates went over nearly every debatable point of doctrine or discipline, but contained very little that was new, beyond strong testimony to the power of the devil borne by a clergyman from "personal" experience, and he added, curiously enough, in explanation, an expression of opinion that the devil owed much of his present activity to the great experience acquired by him during the last two thousand years. Public meetings held in connection with the Congress brought workingmen out in great force, but they exhibited, if we may judge from the reports, but a moderate amount of reverence for the clergy and a very decided detestation of the Ritualists—Archdeacon Denison's confession, that he got up games of cricket for his young men between the services on Sunday, being fiercely hooted, Sunday cricket being esteemed Popish. The Archbishop of York, however, seized the occasion to utter some warm and we have no doubt effective comments on the amount of money and time wasted by workingmen in drink—waste compared to which the wrongs inflicted on workingmen by either "bloated capitalists" or society are but trifles.

COTTON STILL KING.

The steady material revival of the South, as indicated by the size and quality of this year's cotton crop, is perhaps one of the most remarkable social phenomena of the present century. The crop this year bids fair to reach, as far as quantity goes, the yield of the years immediately before the war. The quality has never been surpassed, and the price is more than double what it was before the war. The flow of money into the South is, therefore, something the like of which the South has never witnessed, and, what is more important than all, the money is distributed as it never was before; it will furnish fewer Southerners with the means of travelling in Europe, or spending their summers at the North, but it will furnish the great body of Southerners with what they never had before—the means of comfortable living. The maintenance of the high price of cotton, too—twenty-five cents a pound—in this the ninth year since the old industrial organization was broken up, and many other cotton-raising countries tempted into vigorous competition, furnishes a striking refutation of the theory so generally held by the supporters of slavery, and indeed hardly gainsaid by many of its enemies, that whatever might be said in favor of emancipation on moral grounds, or as regards its effects on the general condition of Southern society in the more distant future, it was sure to be fatal to its chief industry. In fact, it was said, and generally believed, that the South, as far as material interests were concerned, was a peculiarly unfavorable field for trying the experiment of free negro labor; that the cultivation of its great staple would be impossible on a large scale, under the new system, partly owing to peculiarities in the negro education, and partly owing to the peculiarities of all free labor, black or white, and notably to the uncertainty as to the quantity and quality of what may be required of it in any particular month or week under which the planter must always labor in a free society, especially in a thinly settled country.

It turns out, however, that the South, so far from being an unfavorable field for the trial of the experiment, was an unusually favorable one. The proportion borne by the white to the black population was so large that the negroes, instead of being left without guidance or stimulus to work out their own social regeneration, found themselves surrounded at the outset by a race of unusual energy, whose eagerness to retrieve their own fortunes has proved a constant incentive to the negroes to go to work vigorously, and whose standards of living, and aims, and habits have naturally been adopted in a greater or less degree by the subject race as soon as they found themselves placed on a footing of political equality. There has been no chance offered the black man of the South such as was offered him in Jamaica, and in some of the South American states, either to form distinct communities of his own, closed to or distrustful of white civilization, or to enter into a league with lazy Caucasian neighbors to sit down under a tree and let the world wag. The spectacle of long rows of negroes lying on their backs in the sun when not pressed by hunger, and whose hunger was to be of that peculiarly coarse and sensual kind which cares not how it is satisfied, which we were so constantly promised as one of the great results of emancipation, has, accordingly, never been witnessed at the South.

Of course, anybody who goes down to look closely into their condition, and particularly persons like Mr. Parker Pillsbury, for instance, whose long and earnest struggle for freedom had led them perhaps to entertain extravagant expectations as to its immediate results; or others, whose furious advocacy of universal suffrage at the close of the war led them to think of the ballot as including meat, drink, clothing, a pew in church, and a policy of life insurance—will be sadly disappointed. They will find a great deal of poverty and nakedness, and, what is worse, shiftlessness and laziness and degradation; but then these are simply the phenomena of that mysterious process of natural selection which goes on as constantly in the moral as in the physical world. In civilized free society, the morally weak are weeded out by the hand of Providence as surely as the physically weak are weeded out among the animals. Slavery, by degrading all, saved the most worthless from perishing, and, of course, carefully concealed from view the moral differences of its victims, just as among domesticated horses thousands live a feeble and sickly life which, in the herds of the Pampas, would perish. We must, therefore, expect, when the system is broken up, that a great many blacks who made very valuable cattle, should prove but indifferent men and women, and that evils which are the plague and grief even of societies which have enjoyed freedom for ages should show themselves with greater virulence in societies which have just emerged from chattel slavery. The general result of the change is most encouraging for civilization in this—that it shows that "the great law of supply and demand," so often laughed at, and so much distrusted by certain social doctors, works even amongst the most uncultivated races with nearly as much efficiency as amongst the most cultivated. Offer fair wages, and a reasonable certainty of regular payment, and it may be said with confidence there is no race which will not work, and work with reasonable steadiness, and work better than under any system of artificial rewards and punishments. The Creator has provided for the restraint of idleness, and the promotion of industry, far better than man can do it, and he provided for it when he formed human nature.

The question whether the high price of cotton will last is now one of considerable social as well as commercial interest. We need it as a civilizing agent, as well as for commercial reasons, for some years to come. The result of the last ten years' experience seems to show that the South really has a monopoly of a certain class of cotton at all events, and almost a monopoly of the article itself, for the supply from other countries, even under the stimulus of the war, seems to have produced little or no perceptible effect on the markets. Lancashire is suffering terribly for the want of the raw material. The consumption on the Continent grows steadily, and, indeed, grows everywhere, as the standard of living rises amongst the laboring classes. The substitution of two shirts a week, for instance, for one amongst workingmen, a small matter as it would seem, would add enormously to the demand for cotton goods; and there seems no good reason for believing that the South will not count for more in the markets of the world twenty years hence than she does now—barring the discovery and extraordinarily rapid settlement of some new cotton region of great producing power, in South America, say. So that it is probably still more true since the war than it was before that "cotton is king"—one of the sayings which the war was believed to have made ridiculous as well as proved false. "Cotton is king," but he has been converted from a slave-master into a constitutional monarch—and long may he reign, since he reigns over freemen.

THE "WOMAN'S PARLIAMENT."

The long threatened "Woman's Parliament"—a kind of deliberative body composed entirely of women, and intended, as well as we understand it, to be a rival of the various male legislatures, showing what women can do in the way of debating and resolving (legislating has, of course, still to come) over the various social and political problems of the day—has at last met. All we know of its proceedings is a report of an address delivered by Mrs. C. S. Peirce—the same lady who has set on foot a scheme for co-operative housekeeping in Cambridge, Mass. Her speech, which had a good deal of power, was devoted in the main to the development of a theory of woman's condition and capabilities in modern society, which may be briefly summed up by saying that, according to it, woman now holds simply the place which she held when society was in its beginnings, and the man and his wife were simply fellow-laborers engaged in the rudest kind of toil—man denying her all share in the vast fields of activity which have since opened to him. Society, however, having proved in man's hands a failure—witness its crime, its pauperism, its drunkenness, its legislative and judicial corruption, its ignorant politicians, its imperfect sanitary arrangements, and its bald social life—what is needed to reform it, purify it, and elevate it is to give woman her proper share in its management. To prepare public opinion for this change, and give the world some idea of woman's capacity for business, occasional meetings are no longer to be relied on. A regular and permanent parliament is to be organized, having committees to prosecute distinct branches of investigation.

There are two objections to this plan. One is that a parliament which cannot legislate and does not really represent anybody, will be simply a debating club—or, in other words, a place where people talk simply for rhetorical victory or display, without any sense of responsibility; and a debating club aping the ways of a real legislature must always be a little ridiculous, and call up reminiscences of the Fenian Congress and other shadowy bodies of portentous pretensions and no weight. The other is that nearly as much has already been done for the cause of woman, as the advocates of woman's rights understand it, as can be done by talk simply. Some of the ablest minds, both in the Old and New World, have said their say upon it, and it would be almost impossible to add anything to it. The arguments on both sides have been of necessity strictly à priori; and one marked peculiarity of à priori argument is, that you soon get to the end of it. Those who oppose "the emancipation of women," and those who advocate it, have now got to that point—which is sure to be reached soon in all such discussions—where one party cries, "I say it is," and the other replies, "I say it is not." Take, for instance, the question, Would a woman make a good lawyer? One side says she would not, because no women have ever been lawyers; the other side says she would make a good lawyer if men would let her. To decide disputes of this kind, there is nothing for it but to appeal to experiment. In other words, the world craves facts, and will not budge an inch further till it gets them.

The woman's rights advocates seem to us to underrate seriously the magnitude of the task they have set themselves, and are evidently laboring under the idea that what they are assailing is simply a social excrescence like slavery, or religious intolerance, or landed entails, which can by a little strenuous hacking be cut off, and leave the rest of the body politic just as it was. The truth is that what they are trying to do is to revolutionize human society, to destroy ideas and usages which not simply have received the consecration of all recorded time, but have their roots intertwined with the innermost fibres of the human heart. The relations of the sexes, which they are trying to change, are relations which, though they have been, like everything else in this world, disordered by folly and ignorance, have supplied the race with nearly all the pure happiness it has ever known. Under them the homes from which countless generations have issued have been built up; they have supplied the ideal which millions of lovers have worshipped, and the mothers to whom a whole army of saints and sages have ascribed, and fairly ascribed, whatever was best and most glorious in their lives. They are relations, too, under which a great body of the female sex are happy and contented, much as many women suffer, and the only relations which the vast majority of mankind believe to be sanctioned by nature and religion. In short, they have history, tradition, usage, the most deeply rooted and most respectable prejudices of all races at their back. It is, therefore, no light matter to overthrow them, and it cannot be done by talk simply.

We say, for instance, that women are fit for the management of commercial enterprises. We may continue to say this for the next century, and nothing will result from it but waste of breath. More has probably been done towards convincing men of it by the fact that in France women do manage a large number of commercial undertakings, and manage them well, than all the argument or assertion that has ever been brought forward on the subject. But then the number of such women, even in France, is infinitesimally small; and moreover, France is a country in which the men are anything but keen, active, or energetic business men, so that the test to which women's business capacity is subjected is not as severe there as it would be here. Therefore, we still need to see a large number of women engaged in business successfully in order to satisfy the incredulous. The success of Mrs. Peirce's co-operative housekeeping, for instance, would, if managed by women, produce more effect on the public mind than forty parliaments sitting for half a century each. There is nothing to hinder women from going into business if they can either get capital or save it. Nobody can hinder women from opening stores, buying in the cheap market and selling in the dear, keeping just and true accounts. There is public prejudice to contend with, to be sure, and there is women's want of business training to be met, but then this prejudice can never be overcome except by the sight of successful experiments; and if, out of the hundreds of thousands of women who are sighing for occupation, there cannot be found even a few hundreds each year to form the advanced guard, we might as well drop all further talk of fighting.

Women, their parliament says, can make as good legislators or lawyers as men. Now, the reiteration of an assertion of this kind is of no sort of use. It is true that women are excluded from political life, but they are not excluded from the study of legislative science. Furnish the world with a fair number of women who can write and speak wisely and weightily on political questions—who show they know more history, more political economy, and can reason better on what they know than the common run of men—and, our word for it, the day is won. Thus far, with very few exceptions, female labors in this field of activity have not been very successful. There runs, too, through many of their public utterances an undertone of comedy which makes a painful impression, in view of the seriousness of the work in which they profess to be engaged. So, also, we must remember that many great lawyers—in fact, some of the greatest—have never entered a law-school, or had a master, or opened their mouths in court. What they had—the books, the brain, the unconquerable will, the scorn of delight, the love of laborious days—are as much within the reach of women as of men, or, at least, must be, if women are to compete with men for forensic honors. Let us have a few good law-books from women, and they may depend upon it the bar will speedily be theirs. A lady now edits a law paper in Illinois; it is humble work, though well done, and yet, we believe, contributes more to the admission of women to the legal profession than all the speeches ever made. If, however, there are no women to be found willing or able to endure the strain on the powers of mind and body which the acquisition of a respectable amount of legal lore requires, let us cease talking about it before the world wearies of our talk. Whenever women have really demonstrated their capacity for any line of duties, nobody any longer thinks of disputing their right to engage in it. They are practising medicine successfully—though we hear unpleasant rumors as to their inability to perform delicate surgical operations; they are editing periodicals and writing certain classes of books successfully; and who opposes them? And this because they went and did it instead of repeating that they would like to do it if "society" would only not frown on them and discourage them.

Then there are, it must be admitted, some ugly facts on the other side to be met—facts which the present discussion is bringing more and more prominently before people's minds. The number of employments to which women have access has increased enormously within fifty years. The farmer's daughters, for instance, have fifty means of escape from dependence on their hard-worked father for the one which their mother or grandmother had; and they are availing themselves of them. They swarm in factories and workshops all over the North, and yet the testimony of observers is all but unanimous in declaring that they compare unfavorably with their grandmothers in health, in character, and in tone. They are less fit to bear children and less fit to educate them; and, even if they do not bear them, are both in mind and body less respectable human beings. The facilities for divorce—that is, for unequally mated couples getting rid of each other—have been enormously increased within half a century. In other words, the "marriage yoke" is now light as a feather; but competent observers all testify that this laxity, so far from helping to purify society, is polluting it. It is not liberty, but licentiousness, which gains by it; and the number of children who are every year left without parental guidance, by the hideous indifference of father or mother to the moral obligations of which the legal contract of marriage is but the outward and visible sign, is rapidly increasing. They say, too, that cookery—good, plain cookery, the first condition of healthy and happy domestic life, an art, too, which has been left wholly in female hands—has greatly declined. A distinguished bishop of the Protestant church, whose duties have for thirty years made him a constant traveller in the rural districts, declares that when he began he was sure to find a wholesome meal in nearly every farm-house; that now safety requires him to carry provision with him; and he is not a man of weak digestion. We might say a word, also, with regard to the increasing failure of women to supply society with healthy mothers—a failure which must, before long, begin to have serious effects on the vigor and activity of the male population; but we think it may fairly be replied that this point is involved in the general question of woman's occupation, as a large amount of the prevailing ill-health is doubtless due to the aimlessness and listlessness of their lives. We mention all these things as points that are weighing against the Woman's Rights Movement in the minds of thoughtful people, and which cannot, we think, be met by argument merely.

THE RING IN THE WEST.

THE wise men who are continually talking about the protection which the ballot per se affords against fraud and oppression would do well to read a few of the startling exposures of tyranny and injustice on the part of elective officers that now fill the columns of the leading journals of Chicago. We have already more than once adverted to the reform movement now going on in that city, which seems for the time to have entirely obliterated the old party distinctions, and to have decided voters upon the simple issue of honesty and dishonesty, intelligence and ignorance, capacity to govern and incapacity. Republicans and Democrats have united for the purpose of electing an independent ticket, and thereby breaking down one of the most corrupt rings that has ever infested a great city. It is natural enough that at such a time the thousand villanies of the municipal government should be thoroughly unearthed. The iniquities which the necessities of party have hitherto decently cloaked are now first laid bare to the world; the chartered footpads of Chicago politics—the city has really for many years been in the condition of a town given over to the sack—at length find that their hour is come; they must abandon their fair spoil to the rightful owner. They do not confess their crimes, it is true, but there is no need; a true bill has been found against them; the indictment is a long one, and the evidence is full. It is to the peculiar nature of some of this evidence that we would call our readers' attention, showing as it does the futility of the notion that in a time of great corruption the ballot has of itself any protective force—the absurdity of the idea that the elective system of itself, without public opinion behind it, without statesmanship to guide it, in some mysterious way acts for society as a bulwark against wrong. The idea is that as soon as the people find out that the official whom they have elected is not a creditable representative, they will immediately turn round and elect some one else. The elective principle, like some others which we might mention, is supposed to be distinctively "American," but in its present form is hardly old enough for that, having been introduced into the State constitutions for the most part within twenty-five years, and therefore not being in its present extensive application so old as that of the system which produced it. Those who wish to learn how the obstacles in the career of plundering dishonesty, supposed to have been introduced by this extension of the elective system, may be avoided by astute knaves, may acquire wisdom by attending to the story of the "Assessor of the South Town" of Chicago.

This gentleman, whose name we are sorry to say we do not know, is a prominent member of the "Ring," and has enjoyed the office for many years. In 1865, he was re-elected, but for some reason or other trembled for the tenure of his office. His term would expire in 1869, and he needed the office until 1870. The laws of the State provide for annual elections of the town assessor, and thus far the annual election had proved for the gentleman in question a complete success; but who can predict the future? All human happiness, even that of "rings," is short-lived; the ballot is, in their theory, never quite secure—at any rate, the Assessor for the South Town decided that his future was not certain enough, and decided at the same time to make it more so. To a credulous public, it would appear that the law providing for annual elections stood in the way—far otherwise to the sceptic Assessor of the South Town. He appeals from the statute-book to the Ring, and the Ring solemnly decides that he shall remain in office for two years instead of one. A bill is prepared extending the term of the assessor from 1868 to November, 1870. But here a new difficulty arises: the constitution of Illinois gives the Legislature power to "provide by a general law for a township organization;" it does not, however, give it power to provide by a special law for the extension of the term of a single town-officer. As the Chicago Tribune very pertinently asks: "Can a general law be so amended as to provide one thing in one county and quite another thing in another county? Can there be a general law which provides for holding office under it two years in one county or town, and one year in all other places?" But objections like these, however forcible and weighty to the legal or journalistic mind, are wholly without value in the eyes of the office-holder. The Assessor of the South Town has something definite to accomplish; the taxable property of which he has the "listing" amounts to $140,000,000. "His assessment is final in ninety-nine per cent. of cases. There may be a few appeals, but they are so rare that they do not affect the case. A, B, and C own taxable property worth one million of dollars. The tax on this property, at seventy-five cents per hundred dollars, would be $7,500. The assessor, if he be disposed to turn an honest penny, can omit one-half this property, or return it at one-half the value, thereby exempting the owners from $3,750 tax. Five hundred dollars would probably satisfy an assessor in such a case. A fee or a present of $500 upon every million of dollars' worth of property would make the office a valuable one. But there are always people who persist in being blind to their own interest, and the owners of one-half this property would probably refuse to 'come down;' this would, of course, reduce the annual offerings to the assessor one-half, but would give him an opportunity of making the aggregate of his assessment what it ought to be, because he could then add the amount of his reductions to his customers to the assessment of those who asked no favors of him. In the hands of a man fully understanding his business, the office, particularly if held for two years, can be made interesting and profitable."

So the bill was carried to the State capital by the Ring. Does any one think that objection was made to it? An objection was indeed made, but on what ground? On the ground that the measure ought to have included the other Chicago assessors—that the bill should have taken the suffrage away from the inhabitants not merely once, but three times. It was amended, and passed the House. When it reached the Senate, it found obstacles in its path. The Senate did not dare to enact such an open, glaring fraud. The Ring was perplexed. It seemed as if the Assessor of the South Town might have to vacate his office without carrying off the spoils of more than one additional year. What was to be done? A gentleman skilled in legislation—"professionals" they are called in Chicago—was consulted. He promised his assistance. The Ring went home; the Senate adjourned without passing the bill, the honest members no doubt congratulating themselves on their successful resistance; but when the journal of the Senate came to be examined, there was the record that the bill had been read three times and passed, that a quorum was present, and that fifteen senators or so, whose names were printed in regular form, voted for the bill. "From this recital," says the Chicago Tribune, in concluding a recent article on the subject, "the general public can understand why no assessors are to be elected this year in the three towns included in the city of Chicago. Those assessors were members of the Ring, were useful aiders and strikers for the Ring; they had a good thing each of them, but particularly he of the South Town; and therefore their election was taken away from the people, and the men continued over in office by special statute. The power and the effrontery of the Ring are peculiarly exhibited in this transaction. It shows the power of absolute control over one branch of the Legislature, and that, baffled in the other branch, it attained its end by a corrupt and dishonest falsification of the official records of the State."

It shows, moreover, by a signal instance, the precise value of constitutional safeguards such as the ballot, in times of public apathy. Certainly a case can hardly be imagined where the supineness of the population could be more glaring. The indifference of the mass of the citizens of this city to the character of the judiciary is not so astonishing, because the administration of justice does not touch the pockets of the people at every instant. But taxation does. Unjust assessments tell upon each individual who is assessed, year in and year out, month in and month out. It might certainly be supposed, then, that the public would care enough about the matter, particularly in times when taxation is exceptionally high, to make some effort to throw off the yoke by the constitutional methods provided for such cases. But lest the ballot interfere with the schemes of the Ring, the Ring actually has a bill forged to take the very right of suffrage itself away from the people; and this bill stands on the statute-book as the enactment of the representatives of these same people, themselves elected by the same ballot of which they now deprive their constituents. We are far from wishing to imply that the ballot is of no value. It is of inestimable value, as we have no doubt the result of the present reform agitation in Chicago will triumphantly prove. But what we do say is that there is no divinity which hedges it about, that it may be polluted and prostituted to base ends like any other piece of political machinery, and that its chief value lies in the force which it lends the decrees of an enlightened public opinion. At present, the protection of the ballot is the same sort of protection which coats-of-mail and spears and swords would afford the weak against the strong, after these defences had been carefully secreted by the latter in some secluded place whence they could only be drawn by himself.

FRANCE.

PARIS, October 1, 1869.

TWO things have convulsed the public in this country within the last few days: 1st, the letter of Father Hyacinthe to the General of his Order in Rome; and, 2dly, the murder of a whole family of seven or eight persons at the instigation, if not by the hand, of one man. Distinct as the two may seem at first sight, there is a connecting link between them which is becoming daily more clear, and will end by showing that both tend, in their ultimate results, toward freedom of thought.

What is the hydra against which Father Hyacinthe has been struggling for the last five or six years? Jesuitism. Jesuitism which is rising to such a height that the worst immoralities of the period of Escobar in Spain would be menacing in this intelligent France, if the nineteenth century were not there. Now, what is the one aim of Jesuitism, and what are its means? Its one aim is power, secular power; and its chief means lies in the complete and utter enslavement of the individual will, the annihilation of the individual conscience. There is no compromise to be attained. Christianity teaches the independence of the conscience, the responsibility of his acts borne by each man, and the necessity for his possessing what Father Hyacinthe calls "the Christian's royal liberty." The Jesuit teaches that no man can be worth anything; that he is so miserable a being that, whether he sin a little more or a little less, it is of prodigiously small consequence; that the most upright, honest citizen is simply less than nothing unless he take a Jesuit for his guide and master; and that the worst criminal ever created is immediately redeemed by the proper intercession of some Jesuit or other with the Virgin Mary. Under no end of various aspects, this is the unity of the Jesuit creed: the degradation of man inescapable, and the vast similarity between the most virtuous and the most infamous—all being equalized by the practices of a blind, superstitious piety; but by that only. This is naturally the religion that all despots must lean to and protect; and this is the secret of the alliance of all absolutist governments with the disciples of Loyola. But this leads much further than people think; it leads upwards, towards the destruction of the Christian doctrine, towards pure paganism, the personal infallibility of the Pope as a man and a temporal sovereign; and downwards towards the wholesale corruption and abasement of the people. Jesuitism, as a force openly organized and worked by avowed and sanctioned Jesuit hands, can only exist and predominate in communities perfectly oppressed, as in Rome or Spain (till the Queen was expelled). It is an anachronism, an eccentricity, a manner of lusus naturæ in a country like France, and in a given time comes to an end—contemptuously or violently—but not until it has done incalculable mischief. Whenever France, from some cause, passes under the temporary yoke of a despot, the Jesuits reappear, as they have been doing for the last ten or a dozen years; and their teaching and its effects are always identical.

Human thought is not compressible absolutely. All that the hard hand of power can achieve is to block up the nobler issues of its nobler currents. It can be forbidden a whole generation to live publicly—that is, to enjoy the invigorating, healthy life of a free community, to whom every public event is a natural portion of existence. But the mental energies that would take part in public action and public thought cannot be annulled; the only plan is to give them some other food. Instead of healthily, they are *un*healthily fed, and in that work the Jesuit is a master. The moment a community is (and can be) weaned from politics, a species of literature invariably rises up which is (later) regarded as a scandal and a shame. Look at the obscene literature of France under the last Bourbons, before 1789, and look at the literary food given to her during the last fifteen years. And it was impossible it should be otherwise. Politics, as Dr. Arnold said, are the most natural and grandest occupation of the human mind. Deprive a nation of them, and the public thought is rapidly degraded. The present empire has in this respect been guilty of far heavier sins than any previous régime. The Emperor thinks ill of his fellow-creatures, and thinks indulgently of evil in itself (two notions often coexistent), and his belief is, that whatever most amuses, or offers most "distraction" to the general public, is to be adopted indifferently. Now, it is certain that, as far as "the true, the beautiful, and the good" are concerned, the masses require education, their tastes being mostly unrefined. Instead of this, all official art and literature have been encouraged to be as low and coarse, and coarsely frivolous, as it was possible they should be. When no poetic grandeur was left unridiculized, and a generation learnt to chaff Homer and the Greeks by making Agamemnon dance the Cancan to the sound of Offenbach's music, when Thérésa was the star, and an ambassadress, disguised as a cocher de fiacre, sang ignoble couplets in the intimate réunions of the Imperial châteaux—what was to be the popular estimate of true art, and what its notion of the habits and manners of those whom success had placed in high places? The answer is easy to find.

At the same time, another chord was found to vibrate in the fibres of the masses—the morbid love, namely, of crime. Newspapers, ruined by the prohibition to deal with public affairs or public men, fell back upon the one subject which could fill their caisses, and pandered to the public viciousness of taste by heaping detail on detail of contemporary crimes, or, when these failed, of past ones. It was a perfectly natural result, and has brought its natural consequences. The Pantin murder is the ghastly work of a man who has been taught nothing good since he was born, and whose naturally perverse inclinations have been influenced by the moral food that has been offered to him ever since he was of an age to partake of it. The sum of what Traupman has learned during his twenty years of life is the same that has been realized by every man of his age and class, and amounts to this: Honesty is an illusion; there is no difference between a good, upright citizen and a swindler or murderer; success is everything. If the President had not succeeded in the coup d'état, he was only a wholesale butcher; if you succeed, it is no matter how you do so. Out of all those who are in high stations in France, there is not one who is not in public opinion charged with some default or other; yet all are equally powerful. There is no true religion. It is sufficient (if you do not scoff at any idea of the sort) to do homage to the Pope, and confess yourself to a Jesuit. Let any impartial mind study the mental condition of a human being in the state we point out, and see what are the outward helps afforded him, what the chances on the side of right. Then, let any political philosopher, casting a glance over the moral health of France under the Second Empire, say if he does not understand the tremendous reaction excited by the crime of Pantin, and does not see how it is linked with the eloquent protest of Father Hyacinthe against the action of Jesuitism.

SAINTE-BEUVE.

THE telegraphic announcement of the death, on the 13th inst., of M. Sainte-Beuve, must have been to some readers of this journal the saddest literary tidings that they have ever received from across the ocean. The most accomplished critic, the most delightful and instructive talker upon literature, of this generation, to whose weekly causerie now for twenty years we have all been welcome as listeners, has spoken his last word. M. Sainte-Beuve, who would have completed his sixty-fifth year in December, was born at Boulogne of a family that was English on his mother's side. Among the many things for which he had to thank his mother, a woman of superior qualities, was a knowledge of English and a taste for English literature, at a time when such knowledge and taste were far rarer among Frenchmen than happily they are at the present day. The relish he then acquired for the poetry of Cowper, Crabbe, and Wordsworth, whose influence is apparent in his own poems, must have predisposed him to take part in the reaction of the Romanticists against the classical traditions of French poetry which was preached and practised with such fervor during the reign of Charles X. Sainte-Beuve, after brilliant successes at the Collége Charlemagne and the Collége Bourbon, had resisted for a time his own bent towards a literary career, and was pursuing the study of medicine, when the influence of Victor Hugo, the great apostle of Romanticism, led him, in 1827, to give himself up to literature. The spirit of those early studies in medicine, however, he never lost. The most characteristic feature of his work as a critic from 1828, when he published his Sketch of the French Poetry of the Sixteenth Century, down to the time of his death, was the application of the method of the physiologists to the study of literature. Nor is the same spirit difficult to trace in the poems, of which he published several volumes before he was thirty-five; while his single novel, "Volupté," written when he was about thirty, has no other merit than as a study, more revolting even than clever, in the morbid pathology of character.

While wooing the muse with indifferent success, as a critic he more than fulfilled the expectations raised by his studies in the poetry of the sixteenth century, in the "Portraits Littéraires" with which he enriched first the Revue de Paris, and afterwards the Revue des Deux Mondes, during a long series of years, and which, under various titles, he has collected in a dozen or more of volumes. At the age of forty, he won the great prize of a literary career in France, and was received into the Academy. Seven years earlier, an invitation to lecture at Lausanne had drawn him into the only work de longue haleine of his life, the "History of Port Royal." On this he was employed at his leisure for nearly thirty years, and the five volumes of which it consists were published at intervals during that period. The interest in the religious side of the Jansenist community with which he began his task was, however, gradually lost, and he devoted himself chiefly to the studies of character and the literary discussions for which the society of Port Royal furnished abundant material. Sainte-Beuve was a painter of miniatures, and his work on Port Royal, which should have been an historical picture, is but a collection of exquisitely finished portraits.

In 1848, a disagreeable passage with some officials of the Republican Government of that day led Sainte-Beuve to spend a year at Liége, the fruit of which was two volumes of criticism on Chateaubriand, of a most damaging character to that idol of French literature for a previous half-century. The incense which Sainte-Beuve himself in former days had burnt at the same altar made his iconoclasm the more hateful to true believers as being the work of a renegade. On the 1st of October, 1849, at the age of forty-five, he began in the Constitutionnel the series of critical articles, the "Causeries du Lundi," by which he is best known. These were continued until 1859, when a new series, of identical character, the "Nouveaux Lundis," was commenced, which ended only with his death. On nearly every Monday for twenty years he has furnished to the Constitutionnel, the Moniteur, or, recently, to the Temps, an article of a length, on the average, of twenty-five duodecimo pages. These articles, as subsequently collected, make in the former series fifteen volumes and in the latter ten, the publication in book-form having as yet been brought down only to January, 1867.

In 1855, M. Sainte-Beuve, having been appointed Professor of Latin Poetry in the Collége de France, began a course of lectures, which was so rudely interrupted by the students that he proceeded no further than the opening discourse. The hostility of his audience seems to have been aroused by a belief that his adherence to the government of the Empire showed a want of personal integrity. The amende honorable, however, was made to him some two years ago, when his vigorous defence in the French Senate of freedom of thought, as represented by M. Renan, against brutal opposition, led to a demonstration in his honor on the part of the students of Paris which must have been peculiarly gratifying to him. To his appointment as Professor of Latin the world is indebted for the longest and one of the most charming of his critical essays. The lectures which he had prepared, but did not deliver, he published as an "Étude sur Virgile." The commentary proper covers only the first book of the Æneid, and is about a hundred pages long; but we venture to say that it is better fitted to give the student a discriminating relish for the diverse beauties of Homer and Virgil than all the notes that have been accumulated in all the learned editions. If classical scholarship oftener produced such results, it would fare much better in its future rivalry with the claims of modern literature.

Of the qualities of this acknowledged chief among the critics of this generation we must speak briefly. If a motto was to be prefixed to his collected writings, none fitter could be chosen than the humani nil a me alienum puto of his favorite Terence. It would be difficult to name a subject outside of the exact sciences which is not treated on some side in the forty volumes and more of his critical essays. Poetry, politics, fiction, history, art, philosophy on its practical side, war—every topic, one might almost say, of interest to man, he has somewhere dealt with, save that which is commonly regarded as the proper field of the critic, the determination of first principles. In another sense, too, than as an expression of the width of his intellectual sympathies, would the motto we have suggested be not ill-suited to Sainte-Beuve. His interest was always in men and women. Varied as are the topics he has discussed, he has treated them always in the concrete—so to speak—as they are presented in the character or career of some individual. Even in the extremely rare cases in which he discusses abstract questions like "Qu'est ce qu'un Classique?" the discussion does not become abstract. He dwells on the peculiar merits of this and that acknowledged classic with the greatest delicacy and discrimination of observation, but he attempts no generalization. Readers who like to have their knowledge in the portable shape of formulas will find small satisfaction in Sainte-Beuve. Criticism, if it would not impose on itself, he firmly believed must remain an art. The critical faculty must be cultivated, as a sense is cultivated, by the widest possible experience; but its function remains to the end, like that of a sense, simply to report what with ever increasing delicacy of apprehension it discovers, together with the pleasure or pain, the recognition of beauty or ugliness, which, by laws of whose workings it is unconscious, accompany its perceptions. "He would maintain that the lily is beautiful for seven reasons, but not for eight," said Sainte-Beuve of a brother critic. To reproduce the exact impression the lily made upon him, and its charm, is all that Sainte-Beuve would have deemed profitable. How far his conception of a critic's functions was defective we need not now consider. That it was sound as far as it went, can hardly be denied. To render the mind as delicately sensitive as possible to every impression; to present to it as many sides as possible of the object to be studied; not till all these impressions have been received without disturbance from prepossessions to let the results of past experience come in to throw light on the new experience; and to make this illuminating past experience as varied and large as possible—this method of studying character and the mind, with its products, must be as rich in results as the like method in the laboratory of the physiologist. As we said before, Sainte-Beuve simply retained the spirit of his studies in anatomy. His marvellous success was due, of course, chiefly to his admirable mental gifts and to untiring labor. In his mind was combined extraordinary sensibility with a coolness of judgment which in his later years kept him painfully free from illusions. By the respective predominance of these two qualities in his earlier and later life, the changes in his views on many matters that have been made a subject of reproach to him may be explained without disparagement to his integrity. With these capacities for receiving impressions and passing judgment upon them were joined a fertility of thought and liveliness of fancy which carry the reader without a moment's weariness over volume after volume of essays on kindred topics. Nothing but a thorough mastery of the subjects with which he deals, and an affluence of illustration from vast stores of knowledge, could have made this possible. How wide then was the range of acquisition of this man who had given more than forty years to literature? In Greek the French have never been strong, but Sainte-Beuve had got the true flavor of Greek poetry, though we may fancy he preferred editions with Latin translations. In Latin literature, especially in that of the time of the Empire, he was at home. In English literature, particularly in that which had any connection with France, he appears well-read. With the literature of Italy and Spain he deals but sparingly. In German he seems to have been dependent upon translations, but was in this way familiar with the best of its literature proper. Of the France of the last five hundred years he may be said to have known everything, great and small. Few students in any portion of that field did their work so thoroughly that his gleanings after them, as they appear in his notices of their labors, are not of real value. But the treasures of knowledge which he has given the world can be but a fraction of what he had accumulated. It is plain from his essays that he must have made it a habit to put down everything that he met with, in literature or in life, which he thought could ever be of service to him. Now and then we find him referring to the very words of conversations that occurred twenty years before; and it is evident that no system of study and preparation for his work other than one which gave him substantial command of all the researches and all the experiences of his life, of whatever topic he might be treating, could have enabled him weekly, for so many years, to bring out of the treasure-house of his mind such abundance and variety of things new and old.

Correspondence.

CHINA.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Among the late telegraphic notices from China was one which said that Prince Kung had refused to receive the Duke of Edinburgh. This report is probably true.

Now, although the young Duke may not have been commissioned to open intercourse with the Imperial Court, the fact that they refused to extend any courtesy to the son of the reigning sovereign of England—with whom their own sovereign had made a treaty of "perpetual friendship"—may very properly be considered to be at variance with the spirit of that treaty, and a strong indication of their purpose to adhere as much as possible to their old system of exclusiveness.

Those who have carefully studied the history of the controversies which have taken place between the two governments for the past thirty years, and who are acquainted with the importance which the Chinese attach to ceremonials, will not fail to see the significance of this refusal. So long as China refuses to interchange those personal courtesies which are the indices of equal and friendly relations, there is reason to believe that she does not desire to maintain them.

In connection with this subject, it is amusing to read the remarks of a Washington correspondent in one of our leading journals of this morning, in regard to the instructions which are to be given to our new minister to China:

"It is understood that the instructions to the new minister will be based upon the Burlingame treaty, and it will be the object of the Government to put that important instrument into force in every particular, and let the Chinese Government see that the treaty was something more than a mere form."

Did the writer intend to be sarcastic, or was he in sober earnest? If the intimation be true, then Mr. Low will be instructed to enforce himself not to say a word to the Chinese Government about "any privileges or immunities in respect to trade and navigation within the Chinese dominions which may not have been stipulated for by treaty," and not to attempt "any intervention in the domestic administration of China in regard to the construction of railroads and telegraphs, or any other internal improvements;" but, at the same time, it will be his duty to enforce the right of citizens of the United States "to enjoy all the privileges of the public educational institutions under control of the Government of China" (there are none), and also enforce the right of "citizens of the United States, of every religious persuasion, to be exempt from all disabilities and persecutions on account of their religious faith and worship" (they always have been).

These duties, negative and positive, are about all which that treaty calls for; hence they can easily be performed, and the minister will have an easy time of it. We are only surprised that our Government should not have sent Mark Twain to perform them, and show the Chinese Government that the treaty is "something more than a mere form;" then also his ample leisure would have enabled him to write many an instructive and entertaining letter to the New York Tribune upon the beneficial and soothing influences of the Burlingame treaty upon Chinese sensibilities. But we don't believe that our Government will give any such instructions to Mr. Low.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Mr. George W. Carleton is to publish Miss Evans's new novel, which has for its title "Vashti; or, Until Death us do Part." "To-day," the novel that Mr. Richard B. Kimball has had in Putnam's for some months, Mr. Carleton will issue in book-form.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce that with November they will begin the publication of Good Words for the Young, which is the juvenile Good Words, and no doubt is to be an agreeable magazine, as it always has been, for Mr. George Macdonald takes the place of Dr. Norman McLeod, who is compelled by other labors to retire. After January 1, Lippincott & Co. will be publishers of four magazines—as many as Fields, Osgood & Co. Two of the Philadelphia magazines, however, are really English with the Philadelphia house's imprint.

—If there ever was a "live topic" for our educational journals to take up and dispose of, it was undoubtedly Mr. Worman's exposure as the maker of a pernicious German grammar, and the controversy growing out of it between his publishers and the publishers of the American Educational Monthly. Except this journal, however, not one had, to our knowledge, lisped a word on the subject, or made any allusion to the disgraceful announcement of the Messrs. Barnes that they meant to continue publishing text-books by the same pretender, until the Rhode Island Schoolmaster, in its issue for October, spoke the manly and dignified protest which should have been heard on every side. It was a good beginning for a journal just revived, after suspension for many months, and we trust it will remain faithful to its purpose of criticising text-books impartially, without fear or favor. The Messrs. Barnes may never advertise on its covers again, but the Schoolmaster has only to persist, and in time it will convince the journals of the same class—which now dare not speak their minds freely lest they should lose the patronage which keeps them alive—that safety as well as honor lies in independent criticism, and that the publishers of school-books cannot make head against them if they are united in this policy. The present system by which text-books are introduced into schools and exchanged for others is shockingly corrupt, and needs a vigorous overhauling. If proofs are wanting to convict the publishers—and they frequently come to light—nothing less can be done than to examine the books for which favor is bought. Not to do this is to surrender entirely.

—All school committees know the reprobate parent who periodically hauls them before the courts for requiring his evil children to bow their heads or to fold their arms while the teacher repeats the Lord's Prayer. He is a familiar figure in every township and almost every school district. He is the Biblical critic who is accustomed to enquire of the neighboring church member where it was that Cain got his wife, if at the time of his marriage there was no other family than Adam's in existence; and how the whale—the size of whose throat modern science has shown to be inconsiderable—could have swallowed the prophet Jonah. He is the gentleman who ostentatiously works in his garden on the Sabbath-day while the people are "coming home from meeting." It is he who sets on foot the greased-pig chase on Fast-day, and the raffle for turkeys on the eve of Thanksgiving—sports not looked on with favor by the straiter "professor" whose offspring this bad man is willing to decoy and lead away into unregenerate practices. That his own offspring, otherwise neglected, should be compelled to hear the reading of the Scriptures or the reciting of a prayer, causes this parent unalloyed indignation, but if to that grievance is added a requirement that they should by some change of posture seem to add the weight of their authority to the evidence in support of Christian doctrine, he commonly decides that the time for action has arrived. Very likely he begins hostilities by arming the eldest son—normally barefoot—with a pair of heavy cowhide boots, and instructing him, thus shod, to "go late" and enter the school-house with resounding steps as soon as the teacher has got devotional exercises fairly under way. Probably this move on his part may be met by a standing order that the school-house door shall be promptly locked at nine o'clock, and no tardy pupil admitted till the morning recess. Then the young gentleman is instructed to adopt some irreverent attitude as soon as the Testament is opened, which ensures that obedient Spartan one or two sound thrashings. However, he would get them at home, he considers within himself, and sagaciously he chooses glory with the rod rather than shame with a rod of greater diameter. There are many and various steps in controversies of this character, but in the end the courts for the punishment of assault and battery, and afterwards the higher courts, are invoked by our advanced thinker; and we may add that generally it is not much that the contentious rascal makes by it. And besides this fellow-citizen, there are some of our Roman Catholic brethren who are dissatisfied with the religious instruction given in our schools. Our histories, reading-books, parsing-books—all our books—are filled, they allege, with implicit or expressed accusations, mostly false, against their religion and its professors. So they want denominational schools, and money from the State to support them. We are not going to discuss that question here, for it is too large; but there seems no reason why the evil complained of—and we should say that it is not altogether imaginary—should call for so radical a mode of treatment as the one proposed. That by the way, however. On the whole, we are not afraid to assert that among the American people—the laity of all denominations or none, and most of the clergy—our system of secular instruction is approved as making not only the intelligent citizens whom a republican state must have or die, but also as being in a high sense moral and religious. And the luxuriant strength of religious denominations on this side of the water shows that this is not an ill-grounded belief. Whatever might be the reply of a Roman Catholic to the argument here suggested, the mouth of a British Protestant, at all events, should not, so far as we can see, be opened against it. Yet there seems to be but very little progress towards what an American would think the very easy settlement of the interminable wrangle between the various sects in England as to how so to educate the people that at the same time the sects still may keep each its flock. The common schools here certainly should teach them—unless we are good for nothing as observers—that colorless or nearly colorless instruction, such as is given under our educational system—secular instruction, in short—is without effect upon the allegiance of the scholars to their various spiritual masters. We say nothing now of the Roman Catholic pupils, though we have an opinion in regard to their case which is different from that which seems to be held by the Roman Catholic clergy. But the child of Baptist parents, or of Presbyterian parents, or of Episcopalian parents, is no less a Baptist, or a Presbyterian, or an Episcopalian, at the end of his course of study than when he began it; or if he is, it is for reasons with which the school instruction had no connection. In England the discussion is just now going on vigorously, and much ability is shown by the parties to it; but few that we have heard speak have laid down two propositions which we believe to be perfectly sound, and which, if accepted, would at once end the muddle: these two, namely, that the home and the church are the places where religion should be taught, and that the secular common school leaves children, considered as members of churches, precisely where it found them. To these we will add another: that there is not a Christian of any denomination in England who ought not to look on any kind of instruction whatever for the English masses as a blessing beyond human computation.

—Mr. F. C. Burnand is the author of two funny books that are indeed funny, though perhaps it is a distinctively British and not altogether pleasant kind of fun that he habitually favors us with. Mr. Emerson, who found brutality and cruelty at the bottom of "Punch and Judy," which may be called the most popular of British shows, would doubtless find in the essence of much of Mr. Burnand's books the same two qualities Neither "Happy Thoughts" nor "Out of Town" would be selected as works the popularity of which would be wholly incompatible with the simultaneous popularity of the prize-ring or rat-pit. In both of them the laugh is almost always a laugh at some one; almost always there is some one who is in a position of ridiculous embarrassment, and is made a butt. To be sure there is something else in Mr. Burnand's writings, which sometimes are sincerely good-natured and droll, and which certainly are clever and witty. "Happy Thoughts," in particular, is notably clever in conception, and well worth anybody's picking up and reading for amusement of a new and fresh sort. Mr. Burnand, besides being the author of these books, is a contributor to Punch, and a dramatist whose writings for the comic stage have had good success. Just now he has on the stage of the Royalty Theatre, in London, a burlesque drama called "The Beast and the Beauty," which, and whose author, we mention for the sake of a remark which it has called out from an English critic. One of the scenes presents the incident—which we believe is new—of the reading by the whole force of the company, or all of it that is on the stage at the moment, of a rhyming letter, which is snatched in turn from each after he has read one line, and so goes round till the whole of it has been read. This is said to be effective, and the critic appears to think that the verses were about as well read in this manner as they would have been had almost any of the characters read it through alone. "Why it is," he remarks, "that actors rarely seem to understand metre, is one of the mysteries of the stage which will perhaps never be cleared up." Perhaps not; though we submit the problem to our readers with some hope. We ourselves should say that it might puzzle the critic to prove that actors read metre worse than other persons. The people are few, so far as we observe, who can do anything but murder metre and sense, or else give themselves up to sing-song, when they attempt the reading of verses. The poets, to be sure, are usually first in fault.

—Mr. John Murray's Academy has made a conspicuously successful first appearance, and a second edition of the opening number has been called for, the other having gone off with such rapidity that none of it was secured for the American market. It may not improbably be more of a favorite here than most of its English contemporaries; but our eclectic periodicals will probably eviscerate it with great promptness and regularity. Among its contributors are Dr. Lightfoot, Mr. Matthew Arnold, Professor Huxley, Sir J. Lubbock, and Mr. Mark Pattison, and Professor Conington was to have been, but is just dead we see. Mr. Arnold writes for this number an account of Senancour—"the subject, as he takes care with unnecessary egotism to remind the reader, of one of his own poems," says the Times, kindly. Dr. Lightfoot, the Biblical critic, discusses the critical introduction prefixed by Renan to his "Saint Paul;" Lubbock and Huxley, and Mr. Pattison, take charge respectively of the interests of science and classical literature; literature in general will be safe in Mr. Arnold's hands; and with Mr. Murray's numerous alliances with authors of the highest name, there is no reason why he should not make a magazine worthy of his father, "the Emperor of the West." "A monthly Athenæum" the Academy is pronounced, and, if that is a true characterization, it will be a repertory of literary news, as well as a collection of reviews by eminent men of letters and science. Among the items of intelligence given this month is one to the effect that Darwin is on the point of publishing a book, in which he will apply to man the main conclusions arrived at in his "Origin of Species," and another to the effect that Sir Edward Twistleton thinks that, with the help of an expert in handwriting, he has found out the true Junius, and shortly will lay the discovery before the public. Byron, as was to have been expected, receives some of the Academy's attention, but no light is thrown by either of the two documents now published on the controversy as to the recent accusation brought against him and his half-sister. One of them is a letter written by the poet in Italy for circulation among his friends in England, and given by him to M. G. Lewis—"Monk" Lewis—to be used for that purpose. Byron simply denies point-blank that he has any notion why it was his wife left him. But everybody knew that he used constantly to say so, and it is some years since his oral or written word would have been taken as reliable on that head. The second document relates to the destruction of his autobiography, as to which event none of the Lives of Byron now in existence are quite correct. It appears that, in 1821, Mr. Murray's father bought the manuscript of Thomas Moore for £2,000. In consideration of this sum, Moore not only parted with the manuscript, but agreed to edit it and to add to it. Afterwards, however, he went to Murray, and begged him to grant a right of redemption. This was done, but it was stipulated that the redemption must take place before Byron's death. Byron died before Moore had redeemed it; but the latter then went about among his friends, raised £2,000 on his note, and desired very much to get the autobiography back into his hands. Mr. Murray, however, had come to the conclusion that it was best for all parties that it should be destroyed. So thought Hobhouse, who acted for Byron, and so, also, thought Lady Byron and her friends—Lady Byron, in fact, offering to give £2,000 for it, "which she did not pay, however," says the Academy. Moore alone was of a contrary opinion; but the autobiography, and the only existing copy of it, were destroyed. Moore then paid back to Murray the £2,000; but Murray afterwards took up the note that Moore had given for a like sum, and paid £1,020 interest on it, and finally gave him £1,600 for writing "Moore's Life of Byron," so Moore lost nothing by what many people of that day, devoured by curiosity, thought "a disgraceful violation of his duty as a biographer." Whether the Academy is right in saying that there are no copies of the autobiography in existence may perhaps be doubted. Dr. Shelton Mackenzie declares, in his edition of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ," that there are several copies, or were several a few years ago. Another thing that may be doubted is whether it would have been worth while to publish it.

THE MAGAZINES FOR NOVEMBER.

All the magazines of November bear witness to the fact that the editors are in the curious American habit of making up each number some couple of months before the date it bears, and there is none of them that evidently was not put together in the relaxing heats of August. There is none of them, however, that has not some good thing in it, apart from the inevitable continued story in each which moves on like fate, above the influence of times and seasons. Lippincott's "Vicar of Bullhampton" we have been reading only intermittently; but we advise anybody who does not care to be drawn to the end of each instalment at least to decline resolutely each month to be drawn into beginning upon the opening paragraph. Incarnate prose as he is—almost sordid prose—in this, as in all his other works, Mr. Trollope retains his old gift of readableness—his old power, one may say, of compelling a perusal once entered upon. By monthly publication, however, with the spell broken at regular intervals, the reader has a chance of escape, and in our case we find that he avails himself of it. After all, the brick can better be a specimen of the house in Mr. Trollope's case than in that of most equally good writers of fiction, and one does not know his late novels so very badly if one knows half-a-dozen chapters of each of them.

But Lippincott's comes very near being an exception to the remark just made, that none of the magazines is without some good thing besides its regular allowance of novel. The monthly gossiper tells something which certainly is curious and amusing; and that it is true we suppose there need be little doubt. He says that the master of a certain ragged school in London has to let the children out in time to pick the pockets of the people leaving church, or else he would at once lose all his pupils. "George D. Prentice" is one of those personal sketches which are in every way unsatisfactory. The writer invades the privacy which is every one's right; the story he tells is as disagreeable to listen to as it ought to be disagreeable to tell; no good end is answered by telling it that compensates for the harm such exhibitions do; and if there were a good end to be answered, the duty of gaining it should be entrusted to a person with more knowledge of life and letters than was possessed by the writer of the article of which we speak. Something will have to be done with the "interviewer," who is near of kin to the writers who abuse the opportunities of intimacy to make disclosures that friends would not, and who just now infests journalism to such an extent. Once he was glad to be the humble servant of some pushing demagogue, desirous of "keeping himself before the people," or some statesman who, out of vanity or ambition, descended to make use of him, or—more recently—some operator in gold or stocks who desired to affect the market, and who got hold of the newspaper by working the "enterprise" of its reporter. But within this twelvemonth he has become a social pest, and with an arrogance that would be amusing if it were not so successful, and if its success were not so disgusting, he forces his way into people's chambers, into the private rooms of judges, and the offices of bankers and merchants, and demands categorical answers to any set of impudent questions he may choose to ask. To dissemble one's love for him to the point of kicking him down-stairs, will turn out to be the true course to be taken with him, but as yet, strangely enough, it seems to have occurred to none of the many men on whom he has bestowed his attentions. The fault rests primarily with editors, however.

"Recollections of an Attaché" is, we suppose, by the Mr. Robert Walsh whom some of us remember as a bold defender of Columbia's honor and glory when these were in so much danger from the sneers of monarchical reviewers. "The Last of the Buccaneers," a subject never without attraction, treats first of Morgan, the renowned Welsh freebooter of the Spanish main, and then for the "Last of the Buccaneers" singularly enough chooses the Emperor Maximilian. Thus, as Doctor Johnson would perhaps say, the exigencies of discovering a sonorous title for his production drive the bookseller's slave to outrage the nicety of derivation and diction, and to violate the exactness of history; as if to be ephemeral were an excuse for being slovenly, and the confession of want of importance could be pleaded against the accusation of inaccuracy.

In the Nation of June 3, we called attention to a lecture by Capt. Silas Bent before the St. Louis Mercantile Library Association, which argued that the true approach to the North Pole is by following either the Gulf Stream to the east of Spitzbergen, or a corresponding current on the West Pacific coast through Behring's Straits. This theory commended itself to us at the time for the reasons stated, but we cannot say that the favor with which we regarded it has been particularly increased by the opening article in Putnam's, the author of which reprints a good deal of Capt. Bent's reasoning, goes into rather unnecessary ecstasy over it, and then attempts to strengthen it by other considerations drawn from the works of modern physicists. The writer, in our opinion, says a deal too much. He certainly uses too many words, too many italic and capital letters, and too many exclamation points, and does not impress one with his scientific training. Capt. Bent's pretensions are modest enough, but his disciple styles him "this profound thinker," speaks of the "profound reasoning" of his address, and of "this remarkable hypothesis, if such a term can be applied to it." In another place, he declares certain facts to be "wonderfully confirmed by a single inference"—an inference which is immediately treated as a fact, and begs the question besides. A map of the Pole accompanies the article, and will be found helpful; and to those who have not before considered the subject, and who may be interested in an investigation, we may safely commend this article, which, though too zealous, will furnish the reader of discrimination with a fairly good presentation of the arguments in favor of Captain Bent's theory.

"Hellenic Nationality and the East," by Karl Blind, is very clear, and no doubt is sound, and calculated to do good in the latitude of Boston The Hellenic cause is not, however, in very vigorous life anywhere at present. Mr. Putnam continues to give us extracts from his letter-book. They are mostly business notes of no importance or interest except as autographs of people more or less well known. We have never before, though, seen anything of Mr. M. F. Tupper's which puts that singular person in so good a light as his letter. Mr. Putnam had sent him a presentation copy of a work called "American Facts," and Mr. Tupper replies sensibly, denouncing the "forward race" who in the English newspapers were at that time accustomed to insult America, and prophesying much greatness for the United States. "The Radical Duke" is about Argyll, and is a piece of contemporary history by Mr. G. M. Towle, the rediscoverer, or independent discoverer, of padding; "Tent Life in Kamschatka" is good reading; "Lady Cinella" we make nothing of, except that it reminds one of Poe's stories of mystery; "The New Fuel" is concerning prepared peat, and is very strongly in praise of that superior substitute for coal; "Contemporary French Literature" is translated from Élie Reclus, who abuses the Empire in reviewing a Roman tale, "Melœnis," by Louis Bouillet. The criticism of domestic literature is hardly well done, being a little peevish in tone and not going very deep; but that of foreign literature is considerably better than usual.

Mr. Towle we find again in Hours at Home, to which he contributes several pages from an autograph book, for which it seems he has made a good-sized collection—some of the letters having been bought by him or otherwise obtained from third persons, and some having been given him by the writers themselves. Victor Hugo, having been applied to, puts his name to this characteristic mixture of big sentiments and defective English:

> "De tout mon cœur, Monsieur > et cher concitoyen de la > république universelle, et recevez > mon cordial shake-hand."

John Adams figures as the writer of a sensible letter to President Madison. The President very much feared a charge of nepotism, and though he wished to give an office to the Hon. Richard Cutts, of Massachusetts, was afraid to do so because Mr. Cutts had become a connection of his by marriage. "I hope you will excuse me, sir," says the solid-headed and downright Adams, "if I take the liberty to express my opinion of the Justice and Prudence of this Principle. The hyper-superlative Virtue of General Washington introduced it; but it has done more harm than good, and in my Judgment, the sooner it is discountenanced the better. A President ought not to appoint a man to office because he is his relative; nor ought he to refuse or neglect to appoint them for that reason. . . . . A thousand cases might be put to show the Absurdity and Iniquity of such a Rule. Merit, Talents, Integrity, Qualities, Qualifications, have claims on the Nation and the Nation has claims upon them, which ought not to be overruled upon any such personal considerations." There is a ponderously sarcastic letter from Jackson to a pair of "Whiggs," who had kindly sent him two "coper cents" on hearing that he was bankrupt; a good "sentiment" from Elihu Burritt, who said "the heart that can hate the master, cannot love and pity the slave;" a jocose letter from Garrison; and half a dozen other scraps worth looking at.

"To Margaret" is a neat enough copy of verses, now first printed, written by Halleck, who declines to accept Margaret's hand because she says, openly, that if given, it shall be given to the Poet and not to the Man. "Henry Philpotts," late Bishop of Exeter, is the subject of a slight sketch by Mr. C. Lempriere. "Recollections of an Old Painter" is some rather agreeable chat by Mr. Thomas Sully, who talks of people that he painted—Victoria, Decatur, Cooke; of fellow-artists, such as West, Gilbert, Stuart, Leslie, Reynolds, Fuseli; and of poets and others whom he met abroad. Irving, we learn, was in the habit when he was merry of singing to himself rhymes out of "Mother Goose." Campbell, on the contrary, was not always a desirable companion so far as good temper was concerned, as he did not hesitate to throw his wig at a person who disagreed with him, and has been known to follow it up by flinging the decanter—a severe reasoner. There are several other articles that will be found more or less readable—one by "H. H." on a German holiday at Salzburg; one by General J. G. Wilson—which has to be done once in so often, or who knows what would happen to the world of periodicals—on the "Marriages among Men of Genius;" and one, not long enough and full enough, on "Crime and Punishment in the East." Altogether, Hours at Home is this month very good in its way.

In the Galaxy, Mr. Grant White returns to the subject of the decay of the stage, which he took up two or three months ago in his article on the "Lydia Thompson Troupe" of actors. In August, he enforced the opinion that this is "the age of burlesque," and referred the existence of the Saturday Review and the flourishing of the "British blondes" to one and the same cause. Our love of broad fun, then, is what prompts us to read the Review. The argument seems to lead to that point. For no one could well maintain that the farcical extravagance of Mr. Harry Beckers when, as a very red-nosed Minerva, he was singing "Taffy was a Welshman," or was drinking spirits out of a small flask, has anything in common with the worldly wisdom and the sneering of the worst of the reviewers, or with the cynical contempt for the romantic and the ideal which opêra bouffe often expresses. "The nineteenth-century spirit" that we have heard so much about since Werther, Mr. White, however, did hold responsible alike for "Sinbad" and for the "indifferentism" of Pall Mall. This month he brings forward in support of his position one remarkable argument. Mr. Charles Reade, it seems, makes Mr. Raby, in "Put Yourself in his Place," say to Grace Carden, "This is the age of burlesque." So "I merely happened to see," says Mr. White, "what Charles Reade saw and said at the same time." What Charles Reade saw at the same time, however, was that it was necessary for Mr. Raby—a representative of the case-hardened British Tory, a most perfect and complete country squire, of the so-called fossil kind—to make the usual conservative remark as to the irreverence of an age which had got ahead of him. Surely, it is odd enough that Mr. White should pick up the old gentleman's bit of stereotyped croaking, and make it do service as corroborative proof of the soundness of the theory about the cause and effect of Miss Thompson's and Miss Markham's success. There always has been, and no doubt always will be, talk of the decay of the theatre; and we are not going to deny that the theatre changes its character from age to age; but when we see Mr. White's detestation, "Formosa," withdrawn after a very short run; and see people crying over "Enoch Arden;" and going to hear Booth in Shakespeare for score on score of consecutive nights; and when we see the crowded audiences—who, true enough, may here and there laugh in the wrong place—who assemble week after week to see Jefferson's "Rip Van Winkle," we are not going to say that dramatic taste, perception of poetic beauties, artistic sense, are very strongly developed among theatre-goers, since that has never yet been in modern times; but we are certainly not going to say either that theatre-goers are wholly given over to the stage-carpenter and the scene-painter, for they are not.

"Imperialism in America" is a laborious performance which professes to explain the founding of the late Imperialist newspaper in this city, and to describe a secret band—the "T. C. I. O.," the "Triumviri Civesque Imperii Occidentalis"—which to-day meditates the overthrow of republican institutions. The piece is equally inane, whether it is somebody's hoax or somebody's honest statement of his belief and his facts. The man who could talk seriously of the Imperialist, and the man who could think that there is any merit of facetiousness in the dull joke of pretending that it and the "T. C. I. O." were formidable, would alike be subjects for deep pity. "The Prince Suvarof" is a story that gives rise, as one reads, to some expectations, but ends with the strangest flatness—disappears in the sand like one of those Western rivers in which one may have been expecting a cataract. Otherwise—but the deduction is a sufficient one—it is not without merit. "An Editor's Tale" is a skilful little sketch by Mr. Anthony Trollope, and one's surprise at the catastrophe of it is even greater than one's surprise at the want of a catastrophe in "Prince Suvarof." The tale begins in a Turkish bath-house, which is partially described, and then takes us up into the editorial rooms of a magazine. But the Galaxy tells the story, which will be found quite a model of a short magazine article of the kind that mixes essay and narrative. "The Galaxy Miscellany" has a brief notice of Père Hyacinthe, apparently written by a foreigner, and at any rate by some one who knew the Father in Paris, and who speaks very well of him. The "Driftwood" talks about our New York courts, and about the newspaper of sixty years ago; and there are longer contributions, one from Mr. Justin McCarthy on "English Universities," and one from Dr. J. C. Dalton on "The Circulation of the Blood."

The Catholic World has an argumentative commentary, which Presbyterians will read with interest, on "The Reply of the Assemblies to the Pope's Letter." They will read the writer's remarks with more interest than Christian pleasure. It begins by remarking to the reverend gentlemen who signed the "Reply" that the mere fact of their making it, and denying that they are heretics and schismatics, is properly considered a complete proof that they are in heresy and schism. Not heresy and schism of the worst sort, to be sure, for the present generation of Presbyterians are but the descendants of the men who are responsible for the separation of that sect from Rome; but still indubitably in heresy and schism—for when a man stands up to defend his own judgment against The Church, he passes on himself judgment of condemnation. As to what The Church is, such Presbyterian doctors as are bothering over that simple question may get the answer to that question from a great many easily obtained books—from Episcopalian books, for example, the writer points out—with a suggestion of the old monitorial system of teaching less advanced pupils by help of pupils somewhat more advanced. So he goes on in a manner that the Assemblies will find more familiar than satisfying, as indeed they might have expected, and probably did expect. Their adviser is abundantly courteous, however, which is more than can be said for Father Hecker, who has a word or two with Mr. Emerson, Mr. F. E. Abbot, Colonel Higginson, Mr. Frothingham, and the other members of the "Free Religion" convention held at Boston last spring. "Esteeming themselves wise they become fools," it seems, and the boasted breadth of their views is narrowness, superficiality, and falsity.

A sketch of "The Irish Volunteers" who served the Pope in 1860 is translated from the French of Count Frank Russell Killough, who seems to be a descendant of some expatriated branch of some family of Irish kings, and whose degenerate soul was much amazed by the apparition of two hundred pious "boys" from Dublin and the County Kerry, armed with "enormous cudgels, with which each had provided himself before quitting his native parish." "It would be difficult to portray the terror," says the Count, inspired by this body of the finest peasantry in the world in the breasts of the ignorant people of Ancona, who erroneously termed them "Ollandesi," and who lived in constant fear of total extermination, especially after the "Ollandesi" had circulated "the gourd of brandy," and begun to vent a few of the astonishing whoops and yells with which the British and American ear is somewhat familiar, but which to the Count and his friends seemed capable of shaking "the walls, the city, the gate, even the ocean itself."

We can recommend also a good part of "An October Reverie," and there is, besides, an article giving a minute account of the death-beds of various saints, which may profit some readers; an essay in review of Darwin; an article on "The Council and the Roman Congregations;" and a long review of the Life of Father Faber—a man whose rashness, vanity, self-consciousness, and spiritual self-indulgence make him a most distasteful personage in modern religious history.

Mr. Parton opens the Atlantic with an article, "The Small Sins of Congress." Readers will take a truer view of the matters dwelt upon than otherwise they would if they will recollect how large a proportion of the sovereign people are men who hold in fulness a belief held by a certain Connecticut farmer: talking to a neighbor on the subject of an increase of salary desired by their minister, he says, according to the story, "You and I know that a man can't spend six hundred dollars a year. Can't if he tries." Afraid of this feeling, Congress likes to have what may be called a hugger-mugger fund, and lumps moneys under the head of "contingent expenses" which, if the members durst vote themselves sufficient salaries, would not be added to the public expenditure, and would probably never be expended at all. However, it is to be admitted that in mentioning this cause of the evil complained of, we mention only one cause, and that it is true that all legislative bodies are apt to be too liberal in laying out public money for their own comfort and convenience, and this all the more easily because there is a foundation of right and justice at the bottom of the fund for contingent expenses. I, as Congressman, ought to pay for my own paper and ink and pen-holders, and perhaps I ought to pay for my steamboat and railroad tickets; and perhaps I ought to pay for posting my letters and speeches to my constituents—though it might be bad, too, to clog any channel for the diffusion of political intelligence among the people. But certainly I, as chairman or other member of a committee, ought not to pay for the stationery it uses any more than I ought to pay the rent of the room in which it meets. And so of numerous expenses spoken of by Mr. Parton, who, as usual, is headlong in his zeal, and apparently is more concerned to make points that will tell than careful to say only what it is really right to say and ask people to believe and hold fast. If, says he, a gentleman rises in the House and says, "Will the honorable member from Ohio allow me five minutes to make an explanation?" and the honorable member from Ohio does grant the request, the United States—counting the cost of a session and the number of hours in it—is out of pocket six hundred dollars. And there too is the chaplain's prayer, which, if it lasts one minute, costs the people one hundred and twenty-eight dollars. And the calling of the Yeas and Nays comes to over four thousand dollars. So we should have no prayer, we suppose? the Yeas and Nays should never be called? and no member should be allowed to make an explanation of his meaning? In other words, the member from somewhere else than Ohio ought to become economically deaf, ought to decline to hear a word from the gentleman he is going to attack, and ought to go on and make a sixty-minute speech against some windmill, more or less absurd, of his own construction, at an expense to the country, if we adopt Mr. Parton's method of computation, of about eight thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. The "previous question," which used to choke off debate so handily—and which made necessary the discussion and passage of two or three of our numerous Reconstruction Acts—is a money-saving device, then? Other things Mr. Parton says as heedless and wild as his argument, to call it so, against debate. There is, for example, little reason why anybody who is, presumably, so ill informed as Mr. Parton is should bring the charge that Gladstone, in making bishops, seeks merely to strengthen himself politically. But more or less of what the article contains is deserving of attention.

For the rest, the Atlantic is noticeable for containing "A Pedestrian Tour," which relates more of Mr. Howells's experiences in Cambridge and the country immediately surrounding that "beautiful and blossoming" town, as the poets courageously say. The essay has much of the charm of the author's best work—has all his lightness of touch, and perhaps a little more than might be desired of a sort of remoteness and shadowiness which remind one of Hawthorne when he is essaying to do something with the real world around him, and is not doing much more than make it manifest that he does not greatly like it. "The Brick Moon" is still an unaccountable story. What with the lunatic fantasticalness of the plan of it—so to speak—and the careful realism of its details, and the insignificance of its ending, there has not recently come in our way a story more unpleasingly troublesome and less worth reading or writing. "From the Orient Direct" will be found one of the best articles intelligently descriptive of life in California that have lately been published. Praise is also to be given to "Our Phil" and to "The Foe in the Household," and for occasional verses those on "Bonaparte and Humboldt" are better than common, though they do not take the highest rank among occasional verses, which sometimes are really poetry, sometimes "fire the shot heard round the world."

CURRENT FRENCH LITERATURE.*

"L'Histoire Universelle du Théâtre" is the title of a new work by Alphonse Royer—a very clever writer, familiar with dramatic literature, French and foreign, and well known as the translator of Gozzi, Cervantes, and other leading Italian and Spanish dramatists. But this matter of preparation of Universal History is a question more of industrious erudition than of fine writing, and, on examination, there is reason to believe that the true title of this book should be "History of the Modern Theatre, from the Middle Ages to the Nineteenth Century." The work is to be complete in five volumes, of which but two have thus far appeared. The first volume takes us to the end of the fifteenth century, giving all antiquity and the East in a single chapter of seventy pages; the second volume presents the sixteenth century; thus leaving three volumes for the three remaining centuries.

The history of the French Revolution has been written from the records of the Assembly, from its military annals, from its press, from the traditions of the clubs, the prisons, and the streets; and now we have a history of it from the theatrical standpoint. We refer to "Le Théâtre Révolutionnaire," by E. Jauffret. Although not precisely a school of morals, the French theatre from 1789 to 1799 held the mirror up to Paris in depicting on its stage the same intrigues, the same passions, the same recklessness, that animated its streets and its revolutionary clubs. As a partial history of the period, it is a curiously interesting work. As strictly a contribution to literature, in its reproduction of the numerous specimens given of the dramatic composition of the day, it is beneath criticism. It would be impossible to find in the entire dramatic records of any nation so great an amount of foul and worthless trash. Of the entire list of authors who wrote for this Revolutionary stage—a list numbered by hundreds—there are scarcely four names ever heard of afterwards. Two of these four were Pigault Lebrun and Marie Joseph Chénier. Lebrun contributed but one piece ("Charles et Caroline"), and Chénier one ("Charles IX."), both in 1789. In Chénier's drama Talma played the King and Madame Vestris Catharine de' Medici. There were difficulties at first as to its representation. It was adjourned, suspended, and then withdrawn; and it required all the influence of Mirabeau and Danton to have it produced. Anti-monarchical and irreligious in 1789, it was mild and innocuous in 1793. Down to 1790 it was still possible to give the correct portraiture of a Jacobin. In the "Journée des Dupes" one of the characters asks, "Where are these Jacobins?" ("Où sont-ils, ces Jacobins?"), and is answered, "If you meet a fellow with short, greasy hair, cut round, ferocious eyes, flat and sinister aspect, salute with fear and respect—c'est un Jacobin!" As a matter of course, there was no measure observed in language concerning monarchy and religion, but the indecent horrors allowed to be represented in calumny of Marie Antoinette surpass belief. That such things could be printed in secret and read in private, one might understand; but that they could be put in action, in presence of hundreds of spectators, is dreadful even to think of. For a long time the Queen had not shown herself in public through fear of the gross insults to which she might be subjected, and it was thought desirable that she should make the effort. She did so, and went to the theatre, accompanied by Madame Elizabeth and by her children. On her entrance she was loudly cheered, and an air, "Ah! que j'aime ma maîtresse!" sung by Dugazon, was seized upon as a pretext for an outburst of loyal applause. Although the Jacobins present gave expression to their rage, there was yet a momentary consolation to the Queen in this manifestation, which, however, was never renewed. M. Jauffret places this incident after the famous 20th of June. There is good reason, however, to suppose the possibility of a mistake here, and that it occurred in July, 1790. Then came riot, pillage, blood, and terror. In 1793, two hundred and fifty pieces were represented, of which eighty were of a political complexion. Of their one hundred and thirty-eight authors not one is known to-day. In a piece of no political significance ("La Chaste Suzanne," 1793), the following line was struck from the text: "You are her accusers, and cannot be her judges." Louis XVI. was then on trial before the Convention. One of his defenders said energetically, "I look around me in vain for judges, and see only accusers." The allusion was transparent, and brought down peals of applause. The Convention first expurgated, then suppressed the piece. The authors, Barré, Radet, and Desfontaines, were arrested, and came very near going to the scaffold. But they immediately began to incense liberty as revealed by the Jacobins, and we find them for many years afterward with songs and odes ever ready for the masters of France. They sang the 18th Brumaire, Radet and Desfontaines enjoyed a pension of 4,000 francs during the Empire, and the Restoration found them prepared with Royal hymns.

Then there was the piece by Olympe Degouges, and the amusing history of its failure. She anticipated the "woman's rights" party by declaring (1793), "If woman has the right to mount the scaffold, she also has that of mounting the tribune." Having wounded Robespierre's vanity by one of her pamphlets, she did mount the scaffold. The dramatic Revolutionary muse had incense ever ready for the worst excesses, with her "Oui, même en se vengeant, le peuple est toujours juste;" and actors wore the carmagnole even when representing ancient Greeks and Romans. But after the Ninth Thermidor (27th July, 1794) comes a change. Robespierre has fallen. Then broke out the long-pent-up disgust and indignation of the people. The favorite actors were those rescued from the Revolutionary prisons. Fusil and Dugazon, and others like them, who had identified themselves with Jacobinical violence, were hissed. For five years the fool, the villain, and the traitor of every piece had been the modéré, the anti-revolutionist, the federalist. Now it was the Jacobin—the one name that summed up all things vile:

> "Car tyran, voleur, assassin,
> Dans un seul mot tout cela s'exprime,
> Et ce mot là, c'est———Jacobin."

In the "Jacobins aux Enfers" we find Charon idle on the banks of the Styx. A gang of Jacobins arrive. Charon refuses to ferry them across. Pluto, appealed to, decides to admit them for the sake of giving the devils a higher standard of excellence:

> "Oui, sois certain qu'à dater de ce jour > Tous les démons les prendront pour modèle."

Pluto was too sanguine. His charming abode is revolutionized. The Furies, headed by Tisiphone, chase the Jacobins even into Pluto's palace. "What!" says the sooty king, "cannot the very Furies live in peace with Jacobins?" "No," answers Tisiphone. "The sole duty of a Fury is to torment the wicked, the malefactor, all the monsters of crime; but the ferocious Jacobin was ever the tyrant and assassin of helplessness and innocence." And now the stage becomes more serious, more decent, and the Revolutionary impurities disappear.

We usually open statistical or semi-statistical books with more or less of distrust, and in that frame of mind took up "L'Europe Politique et Sociale," by Maurice Block. Its perusal restored confidence, and we very cheerfully recommend it. In a volume of 628 pages it presents an excellent and reliable picture of Europe, statistical, social, and political; not in mere dry tables of figures, but in well-digested chapters on finances, resources, agriculture, manufactures, education, railroads, commerce, and social progress for all Europe, and a series of divisions presenting each country specially. We were already well acquainted with the ability and acquisitions of the author as a publicist and one of the editors of the "Annuaire de l'Économie Politique et de la Statistique."

The late celebration of Macchiavelli's birthday at Florence on the 3d day of May (he was born May 3, 1469), has drawn renewed attention to his works. Macchiavelli's "Commentaries on Livy" are already well known. Montesquieu used them freely in the preparation of his "Esprit des Lois," and we are all familiar with Macaulay's estimate of them. In 1857, Guicciardini's inedited works were published at Florence, and among them his "Reflections on Macchiavelli's Commentaries." A French author has now selected the first thirty chapters of Macchiavelli, with Guicciardini's "Reflections" upon them; to which he adds his own "Observations," chapter by chapter. Thus made up, the work is published under the title, "Essai sur les Discours de Machiavel, avec les Considérations de Guicciardini," by Victor Poirel. Those who have read "The Prince" of Macchiavelli will readily recognize in the present work many pages. Indeed, "The Prince" is merely the corollary of the "Commentaries." In this, as in almost every work of similar character now published in Europe, and more especially in France and in Germany, the American reader may find abundant consolation if at all discouraged by the critics who daily assure him of the ruin and degradation of his country and of the failure of our free institutions. For these institutions in general, and for the conduct and bearing of the Government in putting down the rebellion, there is now, abroad, a chorus of admiration and praise. Thus, in the fifth chapter of the work under consideration, there is a passage in which both Macchiavelli and Guicciardini by common accord give to a mixed government the preference over all others. After it, Macchiavelli places a democracy, which Guicciardini proclaims the worst of all, preferring an aristocracy. Commenting upon this passage, M. Poirel says: "The example of the United States, from the date of their independence down to the late civil war, whose dangers they surmounted with incomparable vigor, demonstrates that democracy under certain conditions can conduct the greatest state with fully as much vigor and ability as any aristocracy whatever. After passing through the most trying crisis without the slightest violation of existing laws, the American Republic, since peace was declared, has returned from an army of a million and a half of soldiers to a modest effective of a few thousands. Even their generals, all, victors and vanquished, have returned to civil life. A people thus constituted, endowed with the civic qualities, the intelligence and the morality which are acquired by participation in public affairs, is the people of whom Macchiavelli speaks. Such a people has nothing in common with the multitude as Guicciardini understands it—the populace that you constantly find in history, ancient and modern, lighting up civil war in empires with no other result than that of giving them up to despotism."

Under pretext of writing "L'Histoire des Corporations Religieuses," a certain M. A. de Bolland inflicts upon us an old-fashioned French Terroristic attack upon Christianity. He begins thus: "An association more or less secret, and founded in hatred of Roman authority, Christianity, in its origin, brought nothing new with it into the ancient world. Its simply Platonic morality had long been preached at Alexandria, for we know that Mark, on his arrival there, found it taught with brilliant success." Here we rub our eyes, and go back to the title-page to see if perchance we have not read 1869 for 1793. One thing above all others specially shocks this gentle disciple of Carrier and Barrière. It is the shedding of blood.

The French Expedition to Mexico has been fruitful in books, most of which are narratives of what the authors saw and heard in a land which they invaded gaily and left suddenly. Some of these works are novels, of which "Benito Vasquez, Étude de Mœurs Mexicaines," by Lucien Biart, is by no means a favorable specimen. It conveys but little idea of the peculiar characteristics of Mexican life, and is mostly given over to dialogue, in which the Mexicans talk like the author's countrymen and women.

A more serious and a really meritorious work on Mexico is "Histoire de l'Intervention Française en Mexique," by E. Lefèvre, in 2 vols. 8vo. The author was, during Maximilian's reign, editor-in-chief of the Tribune de Mexico, and afterwards had access to the official documents left by Maximilian at Queretaro. He gives in his book the famous decree of October 3, 1865—upon which mainly turned Maximilian's fate, and which decided his execution. Under pretext of the flight of Juarez, this fatal decree treated his partisans as vulgar malefactors, ordered their condemnation by court-martial without appeal, and execution in twenty-four hours after capture. On the night of the signature of that decree—which within ten days sent to death Generals Arteaga and Salazar, with numerous other Mexican patriots, and soon afterwards Maximilian himself—there was a gay ball, it seems, at the palace in Mexico. The author troubles us but little with any effort at polemics or rhetoric. He tells his story in a straightforward way, resting on his documents at every page; and he dissipates much of the official obscurity industriously thrown around the most unfortunate as well as the most unjustifiable of expeditions. Under the smoke of Confederate guns, the theory of success and the doctrine of the fait accompli appeared to serve as a justification of the double iniquity of a gratuitous invasion of Mexico and a treacherous alliance with rebellion. But the fait accompli vanished at Appomattox.

The name of Count Agénor de Gasparin is, or should be, familiar to every American as one of a small band of such men as Montalembert, Cochin, and Laboulaye, who withstood the tide of public sentiment in France in favor of the Southern rebellion and its ally, the Mexican Expedition. At Geneva, Switzerland, Count Gasparin last winter delivered a course of seven lectures on "Equality," giving his subject a thoroughly philosophical and historical treatment. These lectures developed the subject somewhat in the following sequence: Equalities and Inequalities that are Indestructible; March of Equality in History; the Equality that Elevates and the Equality that Lowers; Equality in Communism; Equality through Liberty; Equality through the Gospel; and, finally, Social Harmonies. Political equality and woman's rights were incidentally discussed, and frequent allusions made to American precedents. These lectures have been lately published: "L'Égalité, par le Comte Agénor de Gasparin."

The ninth volume of the works of Montalembert, just published, contains what he has written on the Polish, Roman, and American questions. Of Poland, Count Montalembert has ever been one of the most constant, faithful, and eloquent defenders, and, with Laboulaye and others, an unflinching advocate of the United States. The principal article of the volume is his life of Lacordaire.

The last number of the Revue Positive contains a noteworthy article from the pen of M. Littré—yet another great voice to swell the chorus now heard in France against the false glories of the First Empire. "If," says M. Littré, "the hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Emperor Napoleon had been privately celebrated at the Tuileries, I should not have made it a text—leaving to private sentiments all the respect they merit. If it had not been sought to make of this centenary a national celebration, it would not have occurred to me that this head of the nation caused Paris to be twice taken—a thing that had never happened under a king of France or the Republic. If Napoleon I. had been merely an emperor and not at the same time the oppressor of the Continent, I should not as a European have felt wounded in those sentiments of national confraternity in which we all now share." Citing the speech of the present Emperor to the army at the Camp of Châlons, M. Littré then proceeds to comment upon it. In that speech, it will be remembered, Louis Napoleon told the soldiers "the history of our wars is the history of the progress of civilization," and "to continue to be as in the past, and they would always remain the worthy sons of the great nation." "La grande nation!" ejaculates M. Littré—"the same flattery which Napoleon I. used in order to mask the system of conquest and oppression which he put forth the arm of France to support. I am well aware that in saying it I shall shock every French prejudice, but, in my opinion, France was never less great than during the years between 1804 and 1814. She seemed to have forgotten all that even but recently had created her glorious enthusiasm, and gave the example of the saddest fickleness. The enormous power remitted to her by the Republic she employed only in unjust wars, odious conquests, iniquitous spoliations, and the erection of ridiculous theories. All that was most elevated in civilization suffered, and she at last only retained the sanguinary distinction of sterile triumphs; for they were gained at the expense of that liberal development which more and more becomes the soul of Europe. And even this bloody éclat was wrested from her. Defeats even more signal than her victories were inflicted upon her, and it became evident that nations with a just cause, with courageous hearts and capable leaders, could in turn conquer those who had conquered them."

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

M. GUIZOT'S "Saint Louis and Calvin" is published by Messrs. Lippincott & Co. in their series of "The Sunday Library for Household Reading." We observe in the preface one or two expressions to the effect that Romanism and Protestantism have at last learned that they can and ought to live together in peace, and that liberty must be their watchword and safeguard; also, that the author has "tried to depict these two lives as glorious and profitable examples of Christianity, and of its persistent unity in the midst of its most striking variety." But a perusal of the chapters corrects the impression which is here sought to be conveyed. The biographies, though condensed, are conscientiously done—too conscientiously, we are tempted to say, for their purpose. As historical studies they are admirable for candor. Saint Louis receives full praise for his virtues, but is faithfully charged with lack of statesmanship in his crusading enterprises, and with lack of charity in his wars against religious liberty—defects which implicate him in the two great errors of his time, and, we may add, gave a mediæval cast to all his graces that renders them nearly useless for modern imitation. Calvin, too, is fairly dealt with in every aspect of his character, M. Guizot's sturdy Protestantism not blinding him to the fact that his conduct towards Servetus was hard, ungenerous, and "much more influenced by violent animosity than he imagined," and that "the measures by which he endeavored to ensure unanimity of conviction are a stain on his memory." A little more brilliancy in style, a little more picturesqueness of description and arrangement, would make the biographies very agreeable as well as valuable reading. As it is, the cautious fidelity of the historian, coupled with the speculative zeal of the dogmatic thinker, somewhat diminishes the attractiveness that draws the general reader to this class of literature. It is needless to say that the author has consulted the latest and best authorities on his subjects, or that he gives his readers the benefit of all his own intellectual accomplishment. The chapters on Calvin contain much suggestion that will be new to all but critical students; and throughout the chapters the evidences of a full and accurate mind abound. The work, as far as it goes, is genuine.

We remarked, some time ago, in reviewing Mr. Thorold Rogers's compilation of John Bright's "Speeches on Questions of Public Policy," that they afforded very few passages of the kind which a schoolboy would mark for declamation. As this, however, in our opinion, only renders them the more worthy to be studied as models of eloquence, not only by schoolboys but by any one disposed to speak in public, we take some pleasure in calling attention to Macmillan & Co.'s popular edition of the work just mentioned. The contents are the same as those of the elegant volumes of the first edition—here compressed into one, yet without rendering the text difficult to read, or producing a book too bulky for good looks or for convenience. The price is correspondingly reduced, and puts within the reach of every one a peculiarly valuable contribution to the history of recent events, as well as an example of the purest and noblest oratory of our day, and indeed of modern times.

Miss Braddon may do her worst, and Victor Hugo in translation may do his; but while "The Initials" holds its own, there need be little fear of an utter perversion of the taste of the fiction-loving public. We venture even to set the Messrs. Peterson's new edition of this charming story against the thousand-and-one editions of Mrs. Southworth's novels, published by the same house, and to find a little balance to their credit as purveyors for American readers. Stronger testimony in favor of "The Initials" will hardly be required of us; but we are free to add that few novels have remained at once so fresh and so delightful in our memory, and that we do not know where to turn for a more pleasing love-story in a thoroughly realistic setting. We like it better than any other of the Baroness Tautphœus's works, and we hope and expect to see our opinion of it confirmed by the latest generation of which we shall have cognizance. The judgment of the two sexes as to the character of Hamilton may very probably differ, but we doubt if any one seriously thinks the worse of Hildegarde for having at length married him.

The pious care of a brother has given us "Sights and Sensations in France, Germany, and Switzerland; or, Experiences of an American Journalist in Europe," by the late Edward Gould Buffum (New York: Harper & Bros.)—a selection of letters and articles published by the author in various periodicals during his ten years' stay in Paris as a foreign correspondent of the press. Switzerland enters into a single chapter—"A Tramp in the Bernese Oberland"—not the most favorable specimen either of Mr. Buffum's powers as a writer or as an observer; and Germany one—'Trente et Quarante at Hombourg." There is a chapter on the Champagne district and its peculiar industry, which appears at a disadvantage not wholly merited after Mr. Robert Tomes's exhaustive and edifying little work on the same subject; there is another, and a very good one, on the Mont Cenis Tunnel; and all the rest relate to Paris life, or to a few famous towns west and north. Taken together, these last serve pretty we as a Paris guide, and contain information not always obtainable elsewhere. They are generally too brief, however, when considered singly, and are none of them remarkable for their thought or diction. In this we are inclined to think they do injustice to Mr. Buffum, who had the reputation of being an able as well as amiable man; but the sketch of him given in the preface portrays the born Bohemian, and the letters show us little else. Still, stripped of their rather commonplace and often misanthropic sentimentalism, they may be read with considerable interest and profit.

Those who possess Miss H. W. Preston's translation of "The Life and Letters of Madame Swetchine," and care to make further acquaintance with that religious enthusiast, can do so by procuring her "Writings," also translated by Miss Preston, and published by Roberts Bros. For ourselves, we have not found her a particularly attractive character, in comparison with others of her sex, and are inclined to assign to her so-called "Writings"—they are very fragmentary—a greater value for understanding her cast of mind and habits of reflection than for persuading or consoling others religiously disposed. On this point it is not becoming to be positive. We can only say in explanation that her aphorisms—designated either as "airelles" or as "thoughts"—have produced on us about the same effect as works composed of "beautiful extracts," which tire the mind with fine sentiments taken out of connection; with this difference, that they are a little more monotonous. The most vigorous we have met with is the seventh of the "thoughts:"

"I feel toward God as they say the Russian women feel toward their husbands: the more he beats me, the better I love him. That is all the devil gains by my chastisements."

Madame Swetchine's notion of the plan of creation and the divine government appears to be embodied in a "thought" which we cannot help believing was not "thought out," viz.: "Miracles are God's coups d'état," and in the following, from her essay on resignation, on the office of prayer:

"God would be swayed, God would be sued: it is due to his justice, and his original designs for man."

This essay, together with one on old age, form the body of the book; and besides these and the aphorisms mentioned, there is a sophistical argument on the exclusiveness charged against the Catholic Church, and one or or two other bits of equal valuelessness.

The lady who signs herself "Howard Glyndon" has done good service, and done it well, in translating Julie Gouraud's "Mémoires d'un Petit Garçon" ("A Little Boy's Story." New York: Hurd & Houghton). It is a little French boy, of course, who has the floor, but he is not so much unlike other boys that we have known, whether in making use of his older sister, in being guided by her for his good, or in despising her at times as a girl. There is some very effective satire of the quiet sort, rebutting Henri's masculine pretensions, and the author's humor touches not a few humbugs and foibles in a manner that only adults will appreciate. Thus, the French tutor and the English governess dispute over the merits of certain cheeses:

"Marguerite and I could only make out one single thing in the discussion, and that was, that there are in the county of Chester thirty-two thousand cows, the milk of which furnishes every year 11,500 tons of cheese, amounting in all to 25,760,000 English pounds."

The boy's character is well preserved throughout, and he is made to go back and recall omitted events in a boyish, unchronological way, which materially heightens the reality. The authoress very ingeniously contrives to put on the autobiographer the burden of moralizing, which he does with great naturalness and perfect justice; and the result is one of the best, because best disguised, aids to juvenile discipline that we remember to have seen. It is, moreover, a very happy picture of a genuine French home which is sketched for us in these pages, and we are only too glad to welcome it, especially from the child's point of view. The narrative is plentifully adorned with pictures, large and small, which add much to its jollity.

"The Panorama," published by Mr. G. W. Carleton, is a reprint, edited with notes by the author's executors, of the Californian and Mormon lectures which Artemus Ward used to deliver in this country and in England. All of its jokes were once familiar to most of our readers, and some of them are still recollected and may be heard repeated in conversation. The editors, in order to convey to the reader some notion of the manner in which the great showman delivered the lecture that accompanied the panorama, have adopted the curious device of printing all the jokes in very much smaller type than the rest of the letterpress. Thus: "Nothing of special interest occurred at Acapulco—only some of the Mexican ladies are very beautiful. They all had brilliant black hair—hair 'black as starless night'—if I may quote from the Family Herald. It don't curl—a Mexican lady's hair never curls—it is straight as an Indian's. Some people's hair won't curl under any circumstances. My hair won't curl under two shillings." The volume contains too many jokes of this rather feeble quality—though it is one of the characteristically fatuous kind which may be considered the generic Ward joke. But there are many good ones, too; and all of it, good and not so good, is Artemus Ward. The volume—printed on the wretched paper to which Mr. Carleton has accustomed the readers of his publications—is made larger than it should have been by the insertion of thirty-four woodcuts which are supposed to reproduce the panorama. On the back of the leaf on which the illustration appears nothing is printed. Then, again, over against the woodcut, on the opposite page, a third of a page is always occupied by a picture of a man's hand holding a riding whip—a specimen of pictorial art about equal to the little illustrations of houses and packet-ships which head advertisements. Then, too, there are rather more notes by Messrs. Robertson and Hingston than there is lecture by the showman—though we do not find particular fault with these, except for a way they often have of breaking in on the lecture at points where they are not at all desired or needed. By these various means the volume is made of a size that suits the views of the publisher. He, however, let us say, follows the example set him by his British forerunner, Mr. John Camden Hotten, and perhaps the more energetic protest against such a way of dealing with the public as this book exemplifies should be made in England rather than here.

Anybody who wants an edition of the complete works of Mr. Whittier, well printed on fair paper, and prefaced by what we take to be a good portrait on steel of the well-loved poet, may get it in the two-volume edition just printed by Fields, Osgood & Co. "In these volumes, for the first time," said the poet in 1857, and he can truthfully repeat the words now, "a complete collection of my poetical writings has been made. While it is satisfactory to know that these scattered children of my brain have found a home, I cannot but regret that I have been unable, by reason of illness, to give that attention to their revision and arrangement which respect for the opinions of others and my own afterthought and experience demand. That there are pieces in this collection which I would willingly let die, I am free to confess. But it is now too late to disown them." And it is also too early, we may say; for there is none of which Mr. Whittier need be ashamed. He began writing when he was very young, and has gone on writing, and writing better till now; and if he has written some poetical pieces that were not poems, he is in that respect like every poet who ever took up the pen, though perhaps there are not too many of them who would have the candor and modesty to make the confession. It is not a general confession of sinfulness that Mr. Whittier makes, either. He accomplishes the more difficult task of specific acknowledgment of sins, and says in effect that he wishes he had not written "Mogg Megone." Perhaps, however, the writing of it may have been necessary to "Snow-bound" or "Abraham Davenport." And then too it is well to have done with one's poor poems; and the writing of them is not too heavy a price to pay for that freedom, if perchance, as often happens, it is the only price that will avail to buy it.

"Her Majesty's Tower" is a second series of more or less bloody and "improper" historical studies, so to call them, by Mr. Hepworth Dixon. It is difficult to express fully, and not too fully, the impression which this writer makes on nerves of any sensitiveness. Morally, spiritually, æsthetically, he gives pain and causes displeasure.

We had supposed that the day for a "Hemans" in two volumes had passed away. And so it has, probably. But the book-market vitality of an author oftentimes lasts long after the real life has gone out of him, just as the hearts of some of the inferior animals will beat for hours after the anatomist has dissected them—the heart of the sturgeon, for instance, has been known, they say, to beat after it was so dry that at each pulsation it gave a rustling, rattling sound. Pretty much of this unvital kind is the life that is left in "The Siege of Valencia" and "De Chatillon," and the thousand or two other effusions of the fluent lady who pleased our mothers so well when Mrs. Norton and L. E. L. were also pleasing them in much the same way, though hardly so innocuously. Poeticalness, in a state of extraordinary dilution, is the prevailing characteristic of her muse. But, by times, she did things that were on the poetry side of poeticalness, though none that is far from the line. Domestic misfortunes compelled her to write, poor woman, when doubtless she would a thousand times rather have remained silent. This makes one wish all the more that the Messrs. Appleton would employ editors in the preparation of their Globe Editions of Standard Poets. A judicious short selection from Mrs. Hemans's writings would give us a thin volume of very good verse, and a properly prepared introduction to it would commend her to the kind thoughts of her readers.

Similar remarks as to inadequate editing apply to the edition of Dryden before us which also bears the imprint of the Appletons. The book is reproduced from old plates and put on the market without care. Dryden cannot be properly read in this form except by an accomplished student of him; and a student of him will already have his writings in other forms. Here are no notes, no criticism, no good biography. The same things or nearly the same things may be said of the companions to the "Dryden"—the "Burns," "Cowper," "Pope," "Milton," and the rest. They are cheap however.

We have more than once spoken of the Lowell Institute lectures on the "Early History of Massachusetts." Mr. Winthrop delivered the introductory lecture, which was strictly historical; then followed the Rev. Mr. George Ellis, on "The Aims and Purposes of the Founders of Massachusetts," and the "Treatment of Intruders and Dissentients;" Mr. William Brigham, on the "Relations between Massachusetts and the Colony at New Plymouth;" Mr. Samuel Haven, on the "History of Grants under the Great Council;" Professor Emory Washburn, on "Slavery in Massachusetts;" Hon. C. W. Upham, on "Massachusetts Records under the First Charter;" Judge Joel Parker, on "The First Charter;" Dr. Chandler Robbins, on the "Regicides Sheltered in New England;" the Rev. Mr. E. E. Hale, on "Puritan Politics, and the Political Connection between the New Englanders and the English Puritans at home;" Dr. Samuel Eliot, on "Early Relations with the Indians;" Mr. George B. Emerson, on "Early Education in Massachusetts;" and Dr. O. W. Holmes, on the "Medical Profession in Massachusetts." This last-named article is instructive and is also of course amusing. The whole book has value, and if the wicked defamers of Massachusetts will only listen quietly and hear the people of that State talk about her, they will spare themselves much shame and trouble. Evil-intentioned Democrats have spread abroad a great deal of ignorant abuse of her which books like this will fully expose in its true light and cause to seem as ridiculous and wickedly foolish as it really is.

As our readers know, both Messrs. Harper & Brothers and Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. are publishing rival editions of George Eliot's novels, and have made them so nearly alike that there is not much to choose between the two. Perhaps the Harper edition is a little preferable. The Boston edition divides the page into two columns; the New York one carries the lines all the way across; the type of the former is of about the size of that now under the reader's eye; that of the New York edition is larger, and so also is the page, but the larger page is of thinner paper. The two editions are in the market for the reason that the Harpers believe that they have the right of publication, as having paid George Eliot for advance sheets of several of the novels that they wished to secure for their magazine—in which they have appeared. Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co., on the other hand, have the writer's own authorization for publishing the novels, and for this have paid her. The rival "Thackerays" have the same points of likeness and difference in the make-up of the volumes that we have noted between the two "George Eliots." The Harper "Reade," however, is paper-covered.

We may properly congratulate the reader upon the appearance, with Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co.'s imprint, of a twelve-volume duodecimo edition of Froude's "History of England," which is to be sold for fifteen dollars. The paper is good and thick, the type is clear and large, the margins are of sufficient width, the volume is of a handy size, and is substantially bound in cloth. Altogether, a good and cheap edition of a work which it is worth while to own and read.

In all other respects comparing favorably with the first English edition, Mr. Gladstone's "Juventus Mundi," as just published by Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., is superior in point of accuracy, since it contains nearly two hundred corrected references to Homer, besides a number of typographical emendations. It is therefore to be recommended to those who have not yet provided themselves with a copy, and to whom careful editing is as much a desideratum as ornamental appearance in works of this character. Of the merits of the treatise itself, we have already spoken at length.

The Yosemite Guide-Book: A Description of the Yosemite Valley and the adjacent region of the Sierra Nevada, and of the Big Trees of California. Illustrated by Maps and Woodcuts. By Prof. J. D. Whitney, of the Geological Survey of California. (Published by Authority of the Legislature.)—It would be strange if on any western-bound train over the Pacific Railroad, approaching the confines of Nevada and California, there should not be as great a demand for this elegant guide-book as the most enterprising vendor of railway literature could supply. It is a work which combines scientific accuracy with a genuine appreciation of natural beauty and grandeur, and which, in describing a region whose scenery almost takes the breath away and would justify almost any exaggeration of speech, prefers always to understate and to leave something to the reader's imagination. Those who should pass it by on account of its title, and suppose it adapted only for the practical needs of the tourist, would greatly mistake. The Sierra is a part of the continent of which it will not long be permitted any of us to be ignorant, and which a few years hence will undoubtedly inspire an ambition to climb and to explore such as the Alps alone have hitherto inspired. Those who have been fortunate enough to examine stereoscopic views of the stupendous engineering of the Central Pacific road, will have had a tolerable introduction to Prof. Whitney's account of the Sierra south of this highway, but they must be prepared for loftier and grander peaks, for more awful chasms, and a more savage desolation than they have yet conceived. In the actual midst of these pinnacles and obelisks and granite domes, sharp ridges, lava fields, unfathomable gorges, glacier-worn valleys (polished by ice-ploughs often more than a thousand feet thick), sheer precipices from base to summit of lofty mountains, immeasurable waterfalls, the spectator must needs be mute for want of language. To bid others go and see for themselves will be all he can do to communicate his sensations, and this is admirably done in the present work. Accompanying it, besides excellent illustrations, are two maps, one of the Yosemite Valley particularly, and another of the ranges of which it is the centre. These are declared, and no doubt with truth, to be the first accurate maps of a high mountain region ever made in this country. The narrative falls under four divisions: first, a general survey of the topography of California; second, the Yosemite Valley; third, the High Sierra; fourth, the Big Trees. The statistics of all these curiosities are here given as they should be, but have never been given before, much as has been written about them. And finally, we are put in possession of the facts which enter into the controversy over the national title to the Yosemite, and can judge of the desirability of surrendering it to squatters who seek their profit in monopolizing the most wonderful valley on the face of the earth. A wide circulation of the Guide-Book will ensure the defeat of the efforts of these gentry.

Independent Third Reader. By J. Madison Watson. (New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1869.)—The peculiarity of Mr. Watson's series consists in the phonetic marks which he employs to distinguish different sounds of the same letter, as, for example, a dot over s when it has the sound of z. This is an excellent feature in a book for beginners, but we should suppose that in a Third Reader the need of it would be outgrown. The same system (originated, we believe, by Rev. Mr. Zachos, of Ithaca) has been successfully carried out in an admirable primer by Messrs. Soule and Wheeler. Their method is indeed more philosophical and consistent than that before us; for instance, it is odd to mark a hard c and a soft g; and we like Soule and Wheeler's way of marking only the sound th, and leaving the sonant (as well as ch, sh, etc.) unmarked, better than Mr. Watson's, of giving a special mark to each of these. The selections are for the most part much superior to the average of books of the same class. The definitions are excellent, and the illustrations are, as a whole, unusually neat and tasteful. But that on page 178 is an abomination, and almost enough by itself to condemn the book: we do not nowadays adopt the Spartan method of teaching our children to despise drunkenness.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

IN THE EIGHTEENTH AND NINETEENTH CENTURIES.

By K. R. HAGENBACH, D.D., Professor of Theology in the University of Basle. Translated from the last German Edition, with additions, by JOHN F. HURST, D.D. 2 vols. 8vo, $6.

Dr. Hagenbach, the author of the work of which this is a translation, is known as one of the ablest of German Evangelical Theologians, and as one of the most prolific of the authors belonging to that nationality. The frequent editions of his works treating the history of the Church, owing at once to their fascinating style, their liberality of view, and fidelity to fact, prove him to be the most popular of all European writers in that department. The work which is here presented, inasmuch as it brings down the History of the Church to a much later date than any similar work now extant, fills a want which all students will gladly see so well supplied.

II.

Ancient States and Empires.

A WORK FOR COLLEGES AND SCHOOLS.

By JOHN LORD, LL.D. Illustrated with maps and plans. Uniform with the "OLD ROMAN WORLD." 1 vol. crown 8vo, with map, $3.

The author has simply aimed in this work to present the most salient points—the most important events and characters of four thousand years, in a connected narrative, without theories or comments, and without cumbering the book with details of comparatively little interest. Most of the ancient histories for schools, for which this is in the main designed, have omitted to notice those great movements to which the Scriptures refer; but these are here briefly presented, since their connection with the Oriental world is intimate and impressive, and ought not to be omitted even on secular grounds.

 Those desiring to purchase this edition of FROUDE'S HISTORY can have the volumes sent post-paid to their address, as soon as issued, by sending $15 to the Publishers.

Two volumes will be brought out at monthly intervals until the work shall be completed.

II.

A New Volume of Lange's Commentary.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE ROMANS.

By J. P. LANGE, D.D., and Rev. F. R. RAY. Translated from the German by J. F. HURST, D.D., with additions by P. SCHAFF, D.D., and Rev. M. B. RIDDLE. 1 vol. 8vo, price $5.

The same accurate scholarship and broad catholicity of spirit which have marked the previous volumes of LANGE'S COMMENTARY distinguish this, and make it worthy a place in what has justly been called "the greatest Biblical enterprise of the age."

 The seven volumes of LANGE'S COMMENTARY previously published are Genesis (1), Matthew (1), Mark and Luke (1), Acts (1), Corinthians (1), Thessalonians, Timothy, Titus, Philemon, and Hebrews (1), James, Peter, John, and Jude (1).

The Week.

TUESDAY last was a beautiful day, a forerunner of the Indian summer; but in spite of the good Republican weather, the country vote was not brought out, and the Republican State ticket seems, as we write, to be certainly defeated, while the Senate and House are in doubt, though it is probable that neither is Democratic. General Sigel runs ahead of his ticket, and so does Mr. Greeley, but perhaps by a smaller figure. There was of course a good deal of illegal voting in this city, but, as it appears, the fraudulent registries were more numerous than the fraudulent ballots. Many arrests were made, and Judge Dowling and Judge McCunn distinguished themselves as usual by their free use of the writ of habeas corpus in aid of the repeaters. Captain Isaiah Rynders was, however, astonished at the amount of double voting on the part of the Republicans. The new constitution is probably defeated; and we regret to say that Judge Brady, the Tammany candidate, is elected over Judge Clerke for the Supreme bench. In Massachusetts the Legislature is claimed by the Prohibitionists and by the License men; but it is most likely that the latter have it. Mr. J. Q. Adams made a good run; and Mr. Chamberlin, the "Labor" candidate, made a better one than had been expected, polling some 12,000 votes; but Governor Claflin is of course elected, though by a smaller majority than any Governor of Massachusetts for a long time. The vote on all hands is light. New Jersey may be Republican. In Chicago the Citizens' or Anti-Ring ticket was successful. Minnesota is of course Republican.

Governor Geary recently dismissed, in a very abrupt manner, his Attorney-General, Mr. B. H. Brewster—whom some of our readers may remember as one of the gentlemen who were "struck" by the proprietors of the Morning Post—and put in his place Mr. F. C. Brewster, a brother of the former incumbent. This was a very good appointment, Mr. F. C. Brewster, always a rising man, being well fitted for the position, and very well able to bear a comparison with Mr. B. H. Brewster, as regards either abilities, industry, character, or habits. The change has long been impending, and, in fact, there was expectation so long ago as when Governor Geary was first elected that the present Attorney-General would then get the appointment. But as soon as the change was made, the ousted official, aided of course by the Democrats—who flock round a discontented Republican leader much as outlawed negroes flock round a white man who is under the ban of his fellows—raised a cry of bargain and sale. Mr. F. C. Brewster was one of the four judges—three Republican, and one Democratic—who compose the court that has just decided the contested election cases. For about a year these cases had been pending, and they resulted in the removal of six prominent Philadelphia officials. The cry is raised at once that F. C. Brewster sold himself as judge for the sake of the Attorney-Generalship. And another cry, confirmatory of this one, is set up, to the effect that Judge Allison's decision in favor of removal was bought by two clerkships which were given to his nephews, or to a nephew and a favorite student. Hereupon the World enquires if we are to allow the citizens of Philadelphia to cast imputations upon the purity of our New York ermine? Shall these Brotherly Lovers call themselves better than we? The fact is that the clerkships complained of—and they are petty—were held by the present holders under the old régime. The young men simply are not turned out, and Judge Allison's decision in the contested election cases was bought a long time ago, or else it was not bought at all. As for the evidence of Democratic frauds, on which the decision of the judges was based, it was perfect.

There is a possibility, it seems, that we may not be done with Andrew Johnson yet. It has been discovered that a clause in the constitution forbids the election or the appointment of a member of the Legislature to any other office of trust and profit, and that this clause has been violated by the election of Mr. Cooper. So a motion was made for declaring it null, and for fixing upon a day for new balloting. This was opposed by a warm anti-Johnson man, who was for laying it on the table incontinently. The House, however, declined to do so, and referred it to a Judiciary Committee. It does not seem probable that much will be gained by Johnson's friends in consequence of this move. The majority against him was four instead of one, as was at first stated, and the bitterness of the contest was so great, and so much in the way of applause and execration has since been said in Nashville, that we should think it will hardly be in the Tennessee human nature for any member to change his vote. Mr. Cooper did not vote before, so it will be rather surprising if his majority is not maintained should a new election be ordered. He seems to be personally an unobjectionable man. Still, some of the constituencies may instruct their members to change, for not improbably it is true, as his friends assert, that Johnson is stronger with the rank and file of the Conservatives than with the leaders. Let us hope that some leading Northern Democrats may have sense enough to urge their Tennessee friends to keep him out of sight. When a national disgrace is injurious to the Democrats as a party, it ought not to be too much to expect even a New York sachem to write letters against it.

The news in other parts of the South is nowhere of greater importance than the Georgia news. In Mississippi, Judge Dent talks to crowds of people, who are said to "cheer for Jeff. Davis," and not to care who is Governor so that they get control of the Legislature. Then, says one gentleman, writing from that region, a poll-tax of seven dollars on every Mississippi negro and negress, big and little—a tax now existing—will be found just the thing to defray the expenses of the State, while property will be exempt from nearly all levies. Other advantages will no doubt easily accrue to "the white man" if he can get the Legislature into his hand; but still an executive tool is useful, and the Democrats will not decline Dent. Alabama, Louisiana, and Texas are quiet, and so is Virginia, but the Carolinas have their share of troubles. In South Carolina the two Mackeys, uncle and nephew, who are both aldermen of Charleston, have had a shooting affray in the official room of the board, which certainly ought to cause the assailant to try the penitentiary.

Governor Holden has just written to some firm of New York bankers a letter, which they have published, in which he complains that the North Carolina bonds of various kinds sell here at rates very much lower than they should. North Carolina has, also, idle mines to be worked; idle mill privileges to be used; worn-out land for sale, which improved methods of farming could make good again. So has Virginia, so has Georgia, and, in fact, all the Southern States—even those of them which have within their limits the rich cotton lands and the plenty of labor which make them less in need of outside assistance for their development. But when Governor Holden was writing his letter to the bankers he was just done writing his proclamation, threatening martial law in four of his counties. He might profitably have incorporated the letter into his address to the rioting, murdering citizens of Orange, Jones, and Lenoir. So in Georgia there appears to be a state of things that is wholly, or in great part, incompatible with Northern belief that capital would do well to seek employment in the South. Returns from seventeen counties in that State show that during the six months just past, 29 murders of colored men and women have been committed, and but two arrests have been made in consequence. "In Tatnall County murders are very common." Now, some of these murders are perhaps, and even probably, done by negroes. But who did most of them may be guessed from the fact that in Dougherty County there is "no justice for negroes in the civil courts;" in Early County negroes are whipped "same as in the days of slavery;" in Burke County "many colored laborers have not received one dollar since 1865;" in Newtown County, "Kuklux outrages are frequent," and so on, affairs being much the same in more counties than we have space to enumerate. In many counties, to be sure, the state of affairs is very much better; but neither Georgia nor any other part of the South is yet in such good order that Northern men are much tempted to go down.

Senator Casserly, of California, promises to be before long a very remarkable man. Addressing a Democratic club in San Francisco the other day, he furiously denounced "the cry for cheap labor," and asked indignantly, "What built up California? Was it cheap labor? No. Our State became populated and prosperous because labor was better paid here than in any other part of the world." As the price of labor depends partly on the number of laborers and partly on the cost of living, that country must, on the Casserly theory, be most happy and prosperous in which there are fewest men to do its work, and least for them to eat and drink. In a community, for instance, in which there were a thousand persons to be provided for, and only five laborers to do it, these five would command any wages they pleased, and if Mr. Casserly were there he would indignantly oppose all attempts to add to their number. Nevertheless, from one point of view he is right. This is the way in which a workingman ought to talk who wants to have the price of his particular commodity, that is, his labor, artificially kept up. He ought to say that the fewer laborers there are, and the less work they do, the better for the State; that those who clamor for more hands to dig, and spin, and carry, are designing men, who secretly approve of the slave-trade, and would probably, if they got a chance, steal the widow's silver spoons; that the love of multiplying laborers is of monarchical origin, and justly exposed to the suspicions of a free people; and that the greatest enemy of his kind is he who makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, and sets a machine to do as much mowing in an hour as a man could do in a day.

An important decision of the Supreme Court has been delivered in the case of Thornington agt. Smith & Hartley—the principal question being whether a contract entered into at the South during the war, the consideration of which was to be paid in Confederate money, could be enforced in the courts of the United States—and if so, what was the value of such money?—that is, was each dollar to count for a dollar in Federal currency, or was it to be rated at its actual comparative value? The first of these questions the Court decides in the affirmative, holding that the Confederate government was neither a government de jure nor yet a government de facto, but "a government of paramount force," such as that which an invader establishes on the portion of territory occupied by his armies, and that as such its money was to all intents lawful money, and its will binding law. As to the mode of paying a debt contracted in Confederate notes, the Court decided that the actual value of the notes at the time of the contract should be ascertained, and payment made in its equivalent in United States money.

A funny illustration of what a man has sometimes to go through who attempts to enter public life, was afforded last week in Mr. Frederick Kapp's case. He was offered the Republican nomination for the Secretaryship of State before it was offered to General Sigel, but declined it. The rumor having got abroad, however, that he was to have it, preparations were made by his Democratic fellow-citizens to make it pleasant for him, and an old woman was procured to swear a charge of forgery against him, under which he was arrested and brought before Justice Hogan of the Tombs Police Court, a gentleman who, we believe, practised as an emigrant runner before mounting the judicial bench, and in that capacity made, and came to mourn, the acquaintance of Mr. Kapp, then and now a Commissioner of Emigration. The reporters had received due warning of the importance of the case, and had Mr. Kapp accepted the nomination, he would doubtless have been held for trial, and the universe would have heard on the following morning that the leading Republican candidate in this State was accused of forgery. It appeared, however, that he had refused it, and the prosecutor thereupon denied all knowledge of him, and the learned and upright Hogan discharged him. Nominations are evidently not to be accepted hastily.

Mr. Boutwell has issued his monthly statement, which contains nothing new, except that the debt has been diminished upwards of seven million dollars last month, making $64,322,070 since March 1, 1869, and leaving $116,994,711 coin in the Treasury.

No progress seems to have been made, at least none is apparent, in the investigation of General Butterfield's connection with the Gold Ring, and he still retains his office. The Solicitor of the Treasury is said to be on here looking into the matter, but there is no sign of compliance with General Butterfield's request that he should be tried by a court-martial. The request was extraordinary, but the trial would be more extraordinary still. The court-martial could only try him for conduct "unbecoming an officer and gentleman," and the merits of the case might be reached in this way, but only incidentally. What the public wants to have enquired into is not his conduct as "an officer and gentleman," but as a functionary of the United States. He might just as well ask to be tried by an ecclesiastical court in his capacity of Christian, as to be tried by a military court in his capacity of soldier. But we ought to have an enquiry of some sort at once, and it ought to be formal, and certainly public.

Marshal Barlow, of this district, we are sorry to say, has resigned, and returned to the practice of the law. The salary of the office, it is well to mention, when held by an honest man, is only $6,000 a year. We doubt if this fact would have come out if General Barlow had not filled the place. The history of the office during the last ten or fifteen years had impressed most people with the idea that the pay ranged from $20,000 upwards, and that a four-years tenure of it placed a prudent man above the reach of want, while an eight-years tenure enabled him to pass the evening of his days in luxury, tempered by hospitality or philanthropy. The General's successor is a Mr. Harlow, one of his deputies we believe, and whom, from our never having heard of him before, we take to be a "man outside politics." How he got into the place, unless he had his chief's assistance, we do not well understand, for, unless we are misinformed, the Twenty-second Street Gang keeps its eye on it, and that is by no means a sleepy body.

The Sun worked indefatigably, and in a style which has long gone out of fashion, for the election of Horace Greeley; and naturally brought into play nearly every known mode of recommending a candidate. It is not easy to be novel in this line, but the Sun has, we think, succeeded in being so, for amongst the reasons it gives why Irishmen should vote for Horace Greeley, it mentions with emphasis the fact that "he boarded with an Irishman" at two dollars and a half a week when he first came to this city. If it could be ascertained that he was satisfied with his meals, it would naturally strengthen his claims on the support of his first landlord's countrymen. The reasons given for not voting for a candidate are, however, generally much more varied and striking than those given on the other side, as they are more apt to be invented, the shameful fact being that the human imagination in this field works more freely for hate than for love; but Mr. Greeley has been so long before the public that nearly all the possible stories against him—the frauds, peculations, lies, and thefts—have been used up, and are not worth reproducing. The only one that has made its appearance in the present canvass is his wholesale appropriation of a fund raised for charitable purposes. A remarkable testimony to the peaceableness of his disposition is furnished by the fact that no crimes of violence, so far as we know, have been alleged against him, nor has any attempt been made to connect him with the origin of an incendiary fire.

The English papers during the "silly" (dull) season devoted a great deal of space to the complaints of bankers' and merchants' clerks, who set up a dismal wail over the lowness of their pay, and some very sad stories of lifelong penury, aggravated and embittered by the necessity of keeping up a "genteel appearance," were told in their letters. But they got no consolation from any quarter. The difficulty was—there was no denying it—that the number of men in the community willing and able to do their work was practically unlimited. The only thing which resulted from the discussion, if, indeed, the discussion was not originated by it, was a suggestion from Sir John Lubbock that the universities, particularly that of London, should establish examinations for clerks, and give certificates to those who passed them, which would supply employers with the information they needed as regards capacity and acquirements. The Paris shopmen have, however, now done what the English clerks did not dare to do—struck, and are holding out for twelve hours' work, and rest on Sunday, demands in which the public ought to support them, but which without public support will probably fail. They get, however, as little comfort from the press as the Englishmen—the fact being that the number of Frenchmen of small education, genteel appearance, and unwillingness to go far in search of a living, is even greater than that of Englishmen of a similar character. But it would be a good thing for the world if women cut them both out.

The latest English question is the propriety of pardoning all Fenians now undergoing punishment, for which a vigorous agitation is raging in Ireland, but Mr. Gladstone refuses to give way. The Fenian argument is that the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and the admission of most English statesmen that the land question must be radically treated, are so many admissions that the Fenians had grievances which they were justified in resenting; that the only question then remaining is, whether they used proper means in seeking redress of them; and here the petitioners for their pardon split into two sections—one party maintaining that the Fenians did what was right, and that it is, therefore, cruel and unjust to punish them; and the other acknowledging that they acted wrongly, but that under the circumstances they are guilty of error rather than crime, and ought for this reason, as well as on general grounds of expediency, to be let off. Mr. Gladstone holds, however, that pardoning them would, under the circumstances, be taken as a confession of weakness and fear on the part of the Government, which would lead to a renewal of the outrages, and the English public and a large portion of the Irish public agree with him. It is hard to see, considering what the nature of the Fenian operations was—assassinations, and nocturnal assaults on dwelling-houses—how he could take any other course. Had they risen in anything like an organized body, and stood their ground anywhere in fair fight, it would be different.

In the meantime, the land question makes steady progress. The London Times has had a "commissioner" travelling in the country, who has brought to the consideration of the question an unusual amount of candor and perspicacity, and his letters have evidently produced a powerful impression on English opinion. In fact, the old theory that the English law of landlord and tenant is good enough for the Irish peasant, is rapidly disappearing; and the Pall Mall Gazette, which has no great indulgence for exceptions to political rules, acknowledges at last that the feeling of the Irish farmer about what the land-laws ought to be, and about his rights in the soil, should be provided for by legislation. There is an agitation going on in Ireland for "fixity of tenure," but the chances are that the question will be settled by a compromise partly made up of legal presumptions favorable to the tenant in the absence of an express agreement, and partly, perhaps, of a limitation on the landlord's power of eviction.

The London Morning Star, whose death is noticed by our English correspondent, enjoyed the reputation of having leading articles contributed to it regularly by Mr. John Bright. Mr. Justin McCarthy, its editor before Mr. Morley, writes to the World to contradict this report, and says Mr. Bright never wrote for it, or contributed anything to its columns, beyond, and this only rarely, a statement of facts. He adds that he thinks Mr. Bright would have had conscientious scruples about writing anonymously as long as he was in public life. We believe it is the general understanding of English politicians that the editor of a paper who personally engages in party warfare takes an unfair advantage of his opponent if he uses his paper to help his political fortunes. They think it, in short, somewhat akin to the wearing of concealed armor by a duellist. The rule has no force here, somewhat owing to the fact that the editors of papers are so well known, and whatever appears in their columns is generally ascribed to them. Whatever support Horace Greeley gets from the Tribune, for instance, never wears in the eyes of the public the appearance of disinterested testimony from an impartial looker-on. But still, even here public life would be improved by the total exclusion of editors from places of honor or emolument.

If monarchy be still possible in Spain, the chances seem to incline in favor of the Duke of Genoa, but this involves a regency, and, at all events, a government of influence. The Duc de Montpensier is the other candidate, and he being full-grown has enemies, and consequently less chance. The Republican insurrection has been proved by its followers to be a mad undertaking, which gives one a very poor idea both of the brains and the courage of the party. It was stained, too, by some dreadful atrocities. There is no fresh news as to Cuba, but the condition of the finances, which daily grows worse, is pretty sure to affect it.

The 26th of October passed off in Paris without disturbance, the more moderate radicals refusing to do anything which would give the Government an excuse for sanguinary repression, for which it was fully prepared, troops having been massed heavily in Paris and its neighborhood. The truth was, there was nothing to be gained by a collision, and the point in dispute was not worth one. The Emperor did not deny his obligation to summon the Corps Législatif every six months at most, and he announced that he was going to do so in November, but he held that the July meeting was a regular session though so short, and therefore to be counted in computing time. The leading radical deputies have issued an address to the country, telling why they refused to meet on the 26th ult., in which they say they will on the opening of the session "call the executive to account for this fresh insult to the nation." The moderation of the chiefs of the party is generally taken to be a good sign. The Emperor, meanwhile, is better in health and is busy preparing projets de loi, or, in other words, drafting bills making various reforms to be submitted to the legislature when it meets. The idea has, however, got firmly seated in the public mind that his days are numbered, and speculations are constantly going on as to what is to come after him, whether his cousin, or the Empress and her son, or the Orleans family; and anything better calculated to break down the Imperial nerves could hardly be imagined.

A PROPOSED REMEDY FOR JUDICIAL CORRUPTION.

THE all but incredible prostitution of certain of our courts to the service of a notorious stock-jobbing, gold-gambling, railroad-ruining, and generally swindling clique will probably do more ultimately towards effecting a reform in our judiciary system than will ever be accomplished by the united efforts of the bar, the legislature, and the indignant people. The whole Erie scandal in all its manifold ramifications, the preposterous usury trials, the Pacific Railroad cases, the farce of the "Gold Corner" investigation, the recent utterly unjust and untenable injunctions against the Stock and Gold Boards and the Gold Exchange Bank, all issued by the men habitually spoken of by a certain class of people as "our own judges;" the systematic attempts to make convenient vacancies by removing honest judges—as Halifax might have said, "by kicking them upstairs;" all these are gradually producing the conviction in the minds of many men, that all our former beliefs in regard to such matters were whimsical, childish prejudices; that courts are not institutions where the weak seek protection against the strong, the injured redress from the wrong-doer, the honest citizen punishment for the criminal; but that, on the contrary, courts are specially provided to give the strong and the wicked an opportunity to oppress the weak and the honest, and actually to deprive the latter of all means of redress even outside of a court. So strong is this conviction becoming in the minds of people that already many business men feel ashamed to go to law, that a readiness to go to law is looked upon as the strongest evidence of an unjust claim, and that to commence a suit exposes a man at once to the suspicion of being a friend of the judge. Many respectable men will nowadays rather bear any loss short of absolute ruin than expose themselves to the disgrace of going into Court. To sue has become almost equivalent to levying black-mail. To commence proceedings, for the justest of claims, is becoming disgraceful. It is getting to be honorable to be charged with the blackest of crimes. Dishonor begins to attach only to an "honorable discharge" or a "verdict for the plaintiff."

It is true that other reasons besides the corruption of our judges have contributed to lower the decisions of our courts in the esteem of the people. Notable among these reasons is the great change that the last few years of war, debt, taxation, tariff, paper currency, railroad and telegraph extension, have wrought upon our business methods, upon the nature of our industries and our whole social fabric. So great, so rapid, and so widespread have been these changes, that it has become physically impossible for the most industrious judge to become even imperfectly acquainted with the existing conditions, much less to enable him to decide understandingly complicated questions growing out of them. Nor as a general thing have the lawyers been able to enlighten the judges, for they have generally been equally ill-informed. No more striking illustration of this last assertion could be furnished than the fact that of all the eminent array of counsel engaged in the defense of the so-called usurers in the recent proceedings, not one took the ground that the usury laws are actually, practically, and in every sense abolished by the common consent of all parties affected by them, and that the attempt to enforce them under the whip and spur of disappointed gamblers was simply a judicial outrage. Another illustration has been furnished us quite recently. An article in this journal, a few weeks since, explained that many of the time contracts in gold, about which so much has been said and written, were not only legitimate business transactions, but, under the existing currency, absolutely unavoidable in large and important branches of trade. We have since heard from several eminent lawyers in this city to the effect that the fact thus explained by us was entirely unknown to them, and that whenever they had been engaged in cases involving such contracts they had, in spite of the assertions of their clients, been unable to rid themselves of an uneasy impression that they were defending transactions but little, if at all, removed from gambling, and hence utterly illegal and immoral. One has only to witness the conflicting and contradictory decisions of the Government officials in custom-house or internal-revenue cases to become satisfied hat no judicial verdict in relation to them is entitled to confidence; while every man of science will readily point out some of the most complicated problems in mechanics, chemistry, or practical manufactures which have come up for adjudication under the patent laws, and been decided, involving sometimes large amounts of property, by judges totally and absolutely incapable of even understanding the problem under discussion. This cause has largely contributed to produce a growing want of confidence in the efficacy of our courts, which recent events have changed into contempt, disgust, and downright fear. There are numerous signs here that these feelings are likely to find expression, not in a reform of the judiciary, but in the provision of a substitute for the judiciary, in a very large number of civil cases at least, by the development of the "Arbitration Committee."

It is well known that both of the principal money exchanges, the Stock Exchange and the Gold Exchange, require their members to settle all disputes among themselves by arbitration. The same is the case with the cotton-dealers and members of the Produce and Corn Exchanges. It is now proposed to establish the same rule and the same practice in all the other leading branches of trade. A memorial is about to be submitted to the Chamber of Commerce in this city urging its co-operation in a wide-reaching system of local arbitrative jurisdiction, somewhat similar to the Handelsgerichte or commercial courts of the North of Germany. The plan is to adapt the system of arbitration as now existing in certain trades to the wants and needs of all classes of business. The men engaged in a certain line of trade are to appoint from among themselves, at certain stated periods, an arbitration committee, or court of arbitration, to whom all persons joining in the election agree formally to submit all questions in dispute. When differences arise between men of two different trades or different lines of business, they are to be submitted to a joint court, composed of the respective courts of the two trades, and there shall be an appeal from the decision of these lower courts to a court of appeals, to consist of the chairmen of all the lower courts united.

It must be evident to every one that courts of arbitration thus elected will be practically free from every suspicion of injustice. They may not contain the highest order of judicial talent, but they will be likely to be guided in their decisions by common sense instead of by mere legal precedents; by the equity of the case instead of by the written law; and, above all, they will be guided by the customs, practices, and agreements of the trade as thoroughly understood by them. There are few men of business who would not submit an honest claim to the decision of the best men in their own trade rather than to any law court, be it never so righteous.

It is true that the courts of arbitration, even where now existing, are frequently rendered inoperative by the interference of the judges in the exercise of their executive functions, by injunction, mandamus, etc., and it has been urged that this power of interference would always remain, and would detract from the effectiveness of courts of arbitration. It is further urged that as the arbitrators have no power to enforce their decrees, they would become useless if set at defiance. But the objections are not well founded. The courts of arbitration now in existence are finding means to evade the unjust interference of the courts, and to enforce their decrees by means of a daily rising public opinion, to which judges may be able to turn a deaf ear but which few other men can afford to disregard. The men who might set at defiance the decrees of an arbitration court are the very men who now control the judges; so that in that respect their adversaries would be no worse off under arbitration than they are now. But, besides this, the general adoption of the arbitration system in all branches of trade alike would give to public opinion such a wide and at the same time so concentrated an influence, that few would have the hardihood to resist it. Again, to-day there are hundreds and thousands of good men who totally disbelieve in the existence of corrupt judges, for the simple reason that corruption cannot be proved against them; to them a judicial verdict is still an unquestionable decision of right or wrong; for them the Erie Barons, who always leave court with decisions in their favor, are still models of purity and injured innocence. As long as public opinion can still be divided on such questions, there will still be places where judges and their owners may hold up their heads, and claim and receive the respect due to honest men. But when the courts of arbitration come to be adopted everywhere, and in all branches of trade, the dimmed judicial halo will no longer deceive any one, and the full force of an undivided public opinion will fall on every one who resists the verdicts of the arbitrators. It is for this reason that the general adoption of the principle would give the new courts at the outset fully as much moral power as the law courts have legal power to-day. If the Chamber of Commerce represents the wisdom of the commercial community, it cannot give this subject its too serious attention.

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE MEETING.

The eighth annual meeting of the Social Science Association, and, from certain points of view, the most successful, was held in this city last week. The papers were almost without exception read by men of mark, and they were almost without exception of a high order of excellence. There was real light thrown on the questions treated of in the papers on Immigration and Vaccination by Mr. Kapp and Dr. Bacon respectively. Those on the Public Libraries of the United States, and on the Public Charities of this city, were exceedingly interesting, and full of facts which nobody but specialists would be likely to bring to light. From General Garfield the audience got an idea of what the next census ought to be, and the next census will probably be the most important ever made, as it will furnish the basis of legislation affecting some important social problems, to deal with which no attempt has hitherto been made. Mr. Dawes made some extraordinary revelations regarding the procedure in contested election cases. Mr. Adams called attention to a defect, of which the New York election frauds help to show the gravity, in the mode of electing Presidents; and Mr. D. D. Field, who is one of the Committee appointed by the last International Congress of Jurisprudence to draft a code of international law, explained the principles on which such a code should rest, and showed the feasibility of making it. Perhaps, however, the paper most likely to produce an immediate influence on public opinion was Mr. G. W. Curtis's on Civil Service Reform. We have not often listened to anything more effective in the best sense of the word, and as Mr. Curtis is about to repeat it during the winter, we think the Association has established a solid claim on the public gratitude in drawing it forth. If anything can on this question rouse the public conscience, this lecture will do it.

Nevertheless, the audiences were small, in spite of the ample publicity given to the proceedings by the daily press, no doubt often to the exclusion of things of greater popular interest. From this circumstance some of the papers, the World for one, which on matters of this sort is usually very sensible, draws the conclusion that the meeting was to a certain extent a failure. It thinks the smallness of the attendance shows that the Americans do not and cannot be got to take an interest in "social science," being too much occupied in the task of making ends meet, in providing for the daily wants of their families, and making a provision for old age. But in so far as this is true, it is true of Europeans as well as Americans—nay, even truer. The struggle for existence is a great deal keener in England than it is here; and let us add, that although the average quality of the papers read at the meetings of the British Social Science Association is much inferior to that of the papers read at ours, the attendance is little if any larger. The reason is very simple; the details of nearly all subjects, except the relations of the sexes, are to the mass of men what is called "dry," and they will continue to be so till some great change occurs in the constitution of the human mind; and yet the scientific treatment, or anything approaching to scientific treatment, of a subject, is impossible without close attention to details. The facts, in other words, have to be carefully collected and classified before a generalization can be based on them; but the mass of men do not want to assist at the collection or classification; all they want is the generalization, and they will not listen till the generalization is ready.

We do not mean to say that "social science" has reached a stage in which it can be compared to the physical sciences, or which entitles the opinions of its professors to the respect one pays to the dicta of Agassiz or Peirce or Huxley, but it has reached a stage in which some persons know a great deal about questions of which most persons know and care very little. There is no way of getting those who know little or nothing to listen eagerly to those who know much without abandoning altogether the scientific or detailed treatment of the subjects discussed; and this once done, your Social Science Association becomes an elaborate and unwieldy debating club. We have got so accustomed to having things decided by majorities, that many people are almost disposed to doubt the discovery of a new planet till the astronomer has submitted his observations to a popular vote; and many others, in the eagerness for popular improvement, feel as if they would prove false to the human race if they conceded that anything was worth saying or doing which a popular audience would not enjoy. How things sometimes go when attempts are made to discuss scientific subjects before "popular audiences" was well illustrated the other day by the debate between Messrs. Greeley and Perry on the tariff. Mr. Greeley, if we have been correctly informed, had the best of it, owing, in part at least, to his having "got the laugh on Mr. Perry" at the outset. Now, conclusions reached about the tariff, or any similar subject, in this way, can hardly be said to be valuable.

There is probably nothing from which the country is suffering so much politically at this moment as the current belief that not only is one man as good as another, but that one man's opinion is as good as another's. The result is an ill-concealed hostility to training and an ill-concealed contempt for experts, both feelings showing themselves conspicuously in Congress, and, as we all know, with lamentable effects on legislation. Even if the Social Science Association should never make a single positive contribution to human knowledge, it will render society a great service if it simply helps to rouse the public into a perception of the fact that there is no subject of greater intricacy, and of greater importance, than the proper adjustment of the relations of men in society; and that with regard to it, as to all other subjects, men who have made it a special study are better worth listening to than men who have not.

The absence of any general discussion of the subjects of the papers read is undoubtedly to be regretted, as it would greatly increase the popular interest in the meetings, and would, doubtless, do a good deal to enlarge the attendance, and we hope some attempt may be made hereafter to provide for it; but the matter, it must be confessed, is surrounded with difficulty. In the first place, there is not much time to spare. To allow the audience to discuss each paper with any fulness would greatly prolong the sessions, and the sessions are nearly long enough already. Then the mere announcement that such subjects as are treated by the Association were open to general discussion at the hands of all comers would be sure, after a while, to bring together from all parts of the country that large and not particularly wise multitude who fancy they hold the key of the universe or the grand panacea. Debates in which they figure largely would, we believe, do more to make disciples for Carlyle than to promote social science. Moreover, the number of persons who talk on such occasions in total ignorance of the subject is amazing, or would be if we were not so familiar with the demoralizing influence, even on good minds, of the gift of the gab. We published a letter in the Nation two years ago from one of the foremost thinkers in England, in which he recounted his experience as the reader of a paper on a subject of which he was thorough master, at a meeting of the British Social Science Association, and it was certainly melancholy, for he said he sat for a couple of hours listening to the remarks on his essay from persons who evidently were completely ignorant of the subject, but, feeling an "interest" in it, felt bound to say something about it. Debates of this kind, of course, are not profitable; and, more than this, they take time which might be better employed. Whether these objections might not be met by a ten-minute rule, however, and by some process of selection of speakers by the chairman on receipt of previous notice of their intention, so as to keep out notorious ranters and bores, is well worthy of the consideration of the Association.

METHODS OF AGITATION.

A letter from Mr. John Hooker in another column suggests some observations as to the mode of conducting reform agitations which are worth consideration. But let us first dispose of the immediate subject of his reply, by saying that we are glad to find we were mistaken as to the estimate set on the Ten Essays by the women who conduct the Revolution. The critic's judgment was a deduction perhaps too hastily, but we think not inexcusably, drawn from the general policy of the women in question. Whether Miss Anthony is entitled to be considered "the Garrison of this movement" is, we think, open to much question. Mr. Garrison himself, we have reason to believe, would deny the justice of the comparison, and we know from his recent letter to the Hartford Courant is by no means an admirer of Miss Anthony's paper, and by no means approves of her processes. Let us add that the writer of the critique of which Mr. Hooker complains is himself a radical, knows what it is to hold, and suffer for holding, unpopular opinions, and his judgment is therefore not to be met as that of "one standing on the outer points of indifference or hostility;" he is neither hostile nor indifferent, nor inexperienced. To explain fully the low estimate in which we confess we hold the Revolution, as a means of acting on public opinion on a very delicate question, would need far more space than the vast majority of our readers would care to see devoted to the subject. We shall content ourselves for the present with one illustration, but it is an illustration which throws some light on the spirit in which the paper is conducted. At the very outset Miss Anthony seems to have entered into a partnership with Mr. George Francis Train, a notorious mountebank, and a considerable portion of the paper was given up for a time to the advocacy of his peculiar views of finance, the nature of which may be best described by saying that what of them were not wildly foolish were wicked—if, indeed, there exists in matters of finance any distinction between wickedness and folly. In so far as they had any point at all, they were attacks on the public credit, then seriously assailed from other quarters. The Train spirit, too—that is, the spirit of mendacity, absurdity, and bombast—pervaded the whole paper; and as if to mark still more strongly his connection not only with it, but with the movement, Miss Anthony went about the country with him canvassing for subscribers, and incurring for herself and for the cause a part, at least, of the responsibility of his tricks. Moreover, after having canvassed, she travelled about with him, giving an account of the canvass. At one of their joint public appearances, on a platform in New Jersey, they carried on a vulgar and silly dialogue about their travels, for the amusement of the crowd. When one considered the nature of the "movement" for which the lady and gentleman were working, and remembered that its success depends not simply on getting certain legislative acts passed, but on overcoming certain deep-seated prejudices held by the very best portion of American society, Miss Anthony's share in the performances was something far worse than an exhibition of bad taste.

As regards the general conduct of the agitation, we must also confine ourselves to one or two illustrations of our position. The Hester Vaughan meeting was got up by the leaders in this city. At that meeting the audience was given to understand that a young woman, the victim of a criminal assault, and convicted of infanticide in Philadelphia, had been betrayed by her lawyer, who had taken her money and neglected her case, and who was fiercely denounced, and that she was about to be hanged, owing to the cruelty and injustice of man-made laws; that the people of Philadelphia were utterly indifferent to her fate; and that her only friends on earth were the New York champions of woman's rights. A deputation of ladies was accordingly supplied with money and sent to Pennsylvania, first of all to visit Hester Vaughan, and then to hunt up Governor Geary and get a reprieve. When they got to Philadelphia, it appeared that they had either, when they held the meeting, been totally ignorant of the facts of the case, or had wilfully withheld them; for, in the first place, the Governor had no intention of signing the death-warrant—Philadelphian ladies not only having taken up Hester's case, but having ministered to her wants; and, in the second place, that her lawyer had not betrayed her; and, in the third place, that the woman's own story about her seduction made it very doubtful who was to blame in the matter. No apology to the public or to the lawyer for the gross attacks on his professional character was, however, made.

The meetings of the conventions in this city have been marked, on more than one occasion, by disgraceful wrangling, in the course of which Miss Anthony has been twice accused either of misappropriating the funds of the association or of failing to render a proper account of them. We believe no one who knows Miss Anthony doubts her integrity; but she has not, to our knowledge, made any answer to these charges; and unanswered charges of this kind against a leader in a philanthropic movement are sure to do it serious injury. Indeed, the effect of mere carelessness or incompetency in money matters is nearly as fatal as want of honesty. Moreover, at one of these meetings the list of vice-presidents contained the name of Mr. J. M. Ashley, of Ohio, to whose gross and corrupt prostitution of his position in the House of Representatives in aid of his speculations public attention had just been called—his selection, as well as that of others, for the honor—like the partnership with George Francis Train—producing the impression on the public that the female suffrage advocates were just as indifferent to the character of public men as the old male politicians. We might multiply these illustrations indefinitely.

It may be that such things are considered of very little importance by those warmly enlisted in the movement. But we may remind them that those warmly enlisted in the movement are as yet but a handful; that they have society, almost en masse, against them; and that if they mean to win their battle they must consider the prejudices, wants, wishes, and aspirations of society. Nor must they draw too much comfort from the result of the anti-slavery agitation. The anti-slavery men had at least the slaves on their side; the women's rights people have not yet succeeded in winning over the women. Slaves who hug their chains are proverbially hard to liberate, and, as we remarked last week, the world has drawn too much happiness, and happiness as sweet and pure as it is given to mortals to know, from the domestic relations as they now exist, and have existed time out of memory, to make it ready to change them on a light or hasty summons. The women's rights army march in an enemy's country. They hold the ground they camp on, and nothing more, and the most rigid discipline both of tongue and pen is necessary to their final success if not to their salvation.

For good taste, let us say, in the conduct of reform movements we care little or nothing. On this point we entirely agree with Mr. Hooker; but for scrupulousness in statement, for respect for the character of enemies and wise appreciation of the conditions of the work, for grave consideration of the remoter effect of all the methods resorted to on the general progress and morality, we care much. Violence, unscrupulousness, indifference as to means, may be excusable in desperate struggles against authority, such as have occurred and may yet occur in the Old World. Here, in a democratic community, where the reign of authority is gone for ever, and where appeals to the individual conscience and understanding are the sole means of general improvement, we have no right, in using them for the cause we have most at heart, to leave them in worse condition than we find them for those who are to come after us. Public sentiment may be likened to a pure spring of water—to which all reformers have to come, and from which each may draw as much as he needs; but nobody has the right to defile it in drawing from it, to empty his swill into it, or drive his cattle through it, careless of what comes of it as long as his own object is attained. Nor have we a right "to accept aid from any quarter." This is, as the Pope would say, "a damnable doctrine." We have no right, for instance, to take up any worthless, time-serving, self-seeking demagogue who chooses to support our cause, for the sake of his influence or dexterity. We cannot make any use of him without praising him, and covering up his faults; and if we do this successfully, we pervert the popular judgment as to the value of character in public men, and thus inflict lasting injury on the community. We have no right to lie about our opponents or misrepresent them, nor to paint good people in dark colors, because they refuse to enlist under our standard or because they oppose our movements. It takes all kinds of men to make a nation. Some of the very best elements in every nation are persons who discharge their individual duties faithfully, and are constitutionally opposed to all change. We cannot blacken the character of such people without diminishing the popular respect for their real virtues, and we cannot be habitually reckless in statement without lowering the popular estimate of the value of truth. The anti-slavery men did in their day seem to say violent things, but it was not their violence which excited society against them, but the fact that they assailed property, and seemed to assail the Union. In reality, it was society that was violent, not they; and the present reaction in their favor is due to the general perception of this fact. To ascribe their success in any degree to their violence of language, however, would be like ascribing the success of a storming party to the profane language used in the advance. Men often swear fearfully in mounting a breach, but what carries them over it is not their oaths but their courage.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, October 18, 1869.

THIS is the season of Congresses. Two or three have been held within the last fortnight, and have filled the newspapers with columns of (for the most part) rather purposeless eloquence. The Social Science Association occupied the first place, but I fancy it is rather declining in influence. Some years ago it was opened with a great flourish of trumpets and was attended by a good many distinguished men. Such a body, however, is exposed to one inevitable danger. If attended by really able speakers, it has also amazing attractions for bores; and at present it seems that the bores are rather getting the upper hand. The President of the Association for the year was that most worthy, but least lively, of Conservative ministers, Sir Stafford Northcote. Every one sincerely respects him, and his speeches are therefore listened to in the House of Commons; but as a rule they creep along a dead level of platitude, unrelieved by the feeblest sallies of humor or eloquence. On the present occasion, he indulged in an opening address of unimpeachable propriety, only one sentence of which seems to have succeeded in attracting any attention. He was discussing the condition of the British agricultural laborer—a melancholy topic, upon which there is indeed much to be said, and unluckily a good deal more to be done. Sir S. Northcote was delivered of a suggestion which has at least the merits of simplicity and originality. He remarked that it would be an excellent thing if the laborer would put more money into savings-banks. Every one must agree in the propriety of the remark, only there is the little preliminary difficulty that the laborer must have something to save. As Canon Girdlestone very forcibly observed, Sir S. Northcote would probably find little trouble in investing his savings if he had to keep himself, with a wife and family, upon nine or ten shillings a week. In short, the remark reminded me a little too much of the excellent advice given to the same class by a distinguished nobleman at the time of the corn-law agitation, who recommended the use of curry-powder as an admirable digestive—forgetting, with the touching simplicity of a rich man, how little the laborer had to digest, and how small a balance was available for the purchase of curry-powder. Canon Girdlestone, whom I have just mentioned, made the best impression during the meeting, as his efforts for the improvement of the agricultural poor have really deserved the credit due to practical remedies. He has helped many of the laborers from his own district of Devonshire—whose wages are about at their minimum—to emigrate to manufacturing regions, where the laborers are far better off, where they know the taste of meat by experience and not by tradition. and do, not unfrequently, put money into savings-banks. It is to be wished that more of the clergy would turn their energy into that channel instead of exhausting it upon fantastic ritualism.

Their only appearance at the Social Science Association was on a more attractive subject than the condition of the peasantry. Laws have recently been passed, and put into operation with considerable success, for the limitation of certain contagious diseases in garrison towns. Papers were being read to illustrate the working of these regulations. Hereupon an irruption of the clergy took place, who mustered in numbers to support the doctrine that it was impious to interfere with the spread of diseases, which ought to be considered as divinely intended means of punishment. If they had contented themselves with ordinary modes of argument, no one could have objected; but their feelings were too much for them, and they took refuge in hootings and disturbance, which made all discussion impossible. Such scenes, as the reporters mildly remarked, do not tend to increase public confidence in the practical benefits of the Association meetings. The clergy, meanwhile, have been having a Congress all to themselves. They met at Liverpool and discussed many interesting matters, and, so far as I know, with creditable temper and eloquence. They enforce an excellent rule, limiting speeches to ten minutes, and the result is that any undue ebullition of rhetoric is apt to be summarily cut short. The debate reported at greatest length had reference to the best means of meeting the spread of infidelity. I will not send you any quotations, because I cannot say conscientiously that any very novel ideas were brought to light. Of course they demonstrated that nothing was more confirmatory of theology than science, and that there was no cause for alarm or hesitation as to the full and complete truth of the Thirty-nine Articles. They made all this so plain that one could only wonder why it should require so much asserting. The only symptom of any wide interest was the general impression that the state church was doomed. A large party of the clergy are evidently beginning to contemplate the dissolution of the union as a probable though not an immediate event; and the opinion was most forcibly expressed by Archdeacon Denison, an extreme High-Churchman, who speaks with a great deal of shrewd humor. He strongly advised them to set their house in order, and said (which seems to be a very doubtful proposition) that the danger could only be warded off by the institution of diocesan synods, representing both clergy and laity. The tendency of such a measure would, I should think, be in the opposite direction. Separation of church and state comes very frequently to the surface of all clerical discussions, and has, I see, been mentioned in another connection. Mr. Gladstone has lately had to appoint a large batch of bishops. Some have died, and others have resigned in consequence of a recent act of Parliament permitting that step—bishops having hitherto been fastened to their dioceses "till death did them part." Most of his nominations have been very colorless. He has taken men whose names were scarcely known to any one outside a very small circle. A Mr. Mackarness, for example, becomes Bishop of Oxford (Dr. Wilberforce having been translated to Winchester); and however excellent a man Mr. Mackarness may be, his reputation was as limited as that of any other parish priest until his elevation to this important see. In one case, however, Mr. Gladstone has deviated from this safe, if rather ignoble, principle of selection, and has appointed Dr. Temple to be Bishop of Exeter. Now Dr. Temple was the author of one of the Essays and Reviews—though it may be said in passing that a more harmless essay has seldom been written, and were it not for the badness of its company, it would have been considered as a harmless average sermon. More than this, however, Dr. Temple has established a great reputation as head-master of Rugby, where he has proved himself to be a worthy successor of Arnold. Rugby has some faults, but it is, I believe, one of the few public schools where a serious effort is made to teach the boys, stupid as well as clever, something more than cricket. It was thought that Dr. Temple's questionable reputation for strict orthodoxy would injure the school, but no such effect has followed. Rugby enjoys the highest reputation; it is very difficult to gain admission for a boy unless his name has been put down years beforehand; and all persons who can judge are enthusiastic in Dr. Temple's praises. In a more public capacity he has lately done excellent service in the Commission for Middle-class Schools, the very able report of which is understood to be in great part his work. In short, setting aside his theology, there is no man in the ranks of the clergy whose elevation to the bishopric would give more general satisfaction. But that is like saying that, setting aside the head-centre's Fenianism, he would have been a good prime minister. The very mention of the appointment has thrown the clergy into convulsions of indignation. That an Essayist and Reviewer should be a bishop is to see the abomination of desolations entering into the Holy of Holies. Evangelicals and Ritualists are for once united, and a howl of indignation is being raised. Meetings have been held to protest. It is publicly announced that there was no one to whom the late Bishop of Exeter (the clever and pugnacious Philpotts, who, as was said, won his seat on the bench by ratting on the Catholic Emancipation question) had such an antipathy as to Dr. Temple. Dr. Pusey, it is asserted, has broken off his friendship with Mr. Gladstone in consequence of this monstrous appointment, and has declared that, should it be carried out, the only course left will be a revolt of the clergy from state control.

Now, it is not yet quite certain that the appointment has been made; and it is conceivable, though I hope not probable, that Dr. Temple or Mr. Gladstone may flinch under the storm they have provoked. One thing, however, is quite plain. It is easy to judge of the degree of cohesion in the church when a moderate and highly distinguished member of one large party cannot be elevated to the bench without encountering furious opposition and threats of actual secession. Some people may see in it an additional proof of the difficulty, illustrated in a different way by the case of Père Hyacinthe, of retaining a distinctly liberal element in the Church of England, as in that of Rome. But, at any rate, the degree of internal discord indicated is remarkable. The last discussion of the same nature took place at the elevation of Dr. Hampden (I think by Lord Russell) to the see of Hereford. He was also suspected of rationalizing tendencies, and resistance was made by the chapter to his induction. That trouble blew over, and in all probability this too, if met with firmness, will end for the time in rude bluster. But the spirit indicated is ominous.

Meanwhile, one other congress has pronounced an opinion not without bearing on this state of the case. A society has been formed for the purpose of securing a wider measure of national education, and has held a meeting at Birmingham. It was attended chiefly by decided radicals, such as Prof. Fawcett, Mr. Mundella (known by his success in introducing boards of arbitration into trade disputes), and a very promising if rather sentimental young radical, Mr. Auberon Herbert. The opinion of the meeting was unanimously to the effect: first, that compulsory education should be adopted; and, secondly, that it should be unsectarian. They maintained that a bill should be introduced in the next session to secure these objects, and that they would insist, according to the common phrase, upon "the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill." Of course, there are many rocks ahead of this agitation; but, meanwhile, it implies this, amongst other things: elementary education is now almost entirely in the hands of the clergy, and, especially in country districts, means a machinery for impressing upon the minds of the rising generation a reverence for the squire and the parson. Now, a school system which goes upon this principle can neither be universal nor popular; it supposes that the lowest classes are taught as a matter of charity, and have no right to give any opinion on the nature of the teaching. They are to learn the catechism, come to church, and touch their hats to the squire, as well as to learn reading and writing. Obviously, a truly national and unsectarian system is radically incompatible with this, and ardent reformers are inclined to make no compromise, and to insist upon nothing short of a root-and-branch change. Whether they will succeed speedily, I know not; that they will succeed ultimately, I am confident; and their success would imply that the church would be deprived of the control of schools, and thereby of one of its most important functions as a national institution, and of one, it must be added, for the discharge of which, however imperfect, it really deserves a considerable share of gratitude. English country parsons have many faults, and are certainly narrow-minded and ignorant; but they have made far greater sacrifices than any other class, and especially than the land-holders, to teach the people something. Yet it is impossible that they should be entrusted much longer with the superintendence of this duty.

I must add one or two items of recent news. The Star, which till lately was the chief radical newspaper, and was vigorous, though not always according to knowledge, has been absorbed by the Daily News. The Daily News some time ago lowered its price to a penny, and it seems that there is not room for two radical penny papers. We shall now have only four considerable morning papers in London: the Times—which still keeps up its price, though hardly its circulation, the Standard, the Telegraph, and the Daily News. An evening paper called the Echo, of moderate politics, has recently been started, for the strangely low price of a half-penny, and has an enormous circulation. When I add the Pall Mall Gazette, which has also come down to a penny, I have mentioned all the existing metropolitan daily papers of any real importance. Another periodical has just come out, called the Academy. It is a kind of improved Athenæum, though it only appears at monthly, instead of weekly, intervals; but has very superior claims to attention. It in fact promises to be by far the most learned and authoritative literary journal that has yet appeared in England. It gives, in particular, a large space to foreign literature, and its contributors are amongst the ablest men of the day. Their articles are signed, according to a fashion which seems to be growing in popularity; and amongst their authors are such distinguished men as Prof. Huxley, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Matthew Arnold, Dr. Pattison, Prof. Lightfoot of Cambridge, and other men of learning or scientific reputation. I must add in fairness that it has the fault of being rather heavy, and that some of the best known writers seem to have contributed some of the least remarkable articles; but its success will be a very good thing, as the Athenæum, which has hitherto claimed to be the chief literary paper, has for a long time past been a very feeble periodical. Mr. Murray is the publisher of the Academy, and seems to be launching it with great spirit.

RUSSIAN UNIVERSITIES.

WHATEVER failings there may be in providing education for the lower classes in Russia, no pains have been spared for the higher education, and there is an abundance of gymnasiums, high schools, and special academies to meet the demands of students in every art and science. The Government has dealt very liberally with them all in providing them with fine buildings, good libraries, large gardens, apparatus, and in paying liberally all the professors and teachers. The faults which may exist are not owing to any lack of money expenditure. Leaving out of view the agricultural, art, technological, and engineering academies, we will consider for a moment the universities, of which there now exist in Russia nine: at St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kazan, Kiev, Kharkov, Odessa, Dorpat, Helsingfors, and the one just established, or rather reopened, at Warsaw. At Helsingfors the instruction is in Swedish and Finnish; Dorpat, until now in German, except Russian history; and in all the others in Russian; at Warsaw Polish history and literature may be taught in Polish, and the present Polish professors (it was formerly a high school) will be retained, though required to lecture in Russian, and to take the degree of Doctor within a year at some Russian university. It is said that the professors are very glad to do this, to prevent any influence over the Polish youth falling into Russian hands. Kazan has always been celebrated for the Oriental languages, though that special faculty is now abolished; Kharkov and Kiev, for medicine; Dorpat, for astronomy; St. Petersburg, for mathematics; and Moscow, for the natural sciences. The university of Moscow is by far the oldest of the purely Russian universities, having been founded in 1755 by the Empress Elizabeth. Besides the botanic garden and the usual museums, it has very rich anatomical and zoölogical collections and a library of 160,000 volumes. There is a hospital attached to the medical faculty, where 1,400 patients are annually received. There are 75 professors, ordinary and extraordinary, docents and lecturers, besides the secretaries and inspectors, and about 1,600 students attend the courses. The fees are 100 rubles yearly for each student, except those who are on foundations, which are numerous, as it is very customary in Russia for private citizens to found scholarships in the schools and universities in commemoration of some public event. The Government contributes some 400,000 rubles a year to the expenses of this university, the buildings of which are large and convenient, in the heart of Moscow, just in face of the Kremlin. Kazan and Kharkov Universities were founded in 1804 and 1805, and have each from 500 to 600 students. The library at Kazan contains about 60,000 volumes, and is particularly rich in Oriental manuscripts, the most of them inedited. Owing to the exertions of one of the professors, who is an Englishman, the English section is quite full. The mineralogical collection is particularly good. At Kharkov there is a very fine museum of coins and medals, and an art collection, with some valuable specimens of the old masters—the only one attached to a Russian university. There is a large and beautiful botanic garden, and to the medical department there is joined a lying-in hospital. The professor of obstetrics, Dr. Lazarevitch, has a European reputation, and is even a member of some American medical societies. The University of St. Petersburg was established in 1819, has some 63,000 volumes in the library, and about 1,000 students. The University of St. Vladimir, at Kiev, was founded in 1833, and is now very flourishing, with about 500 students. Besides the large botanic garden, there is a fine zoölogical cabinet, very rich in the birds and animals of South Russia, a hospital, and a library of 107,000 volumes. The University of New Russia, at Odessa, was created in 1865 out of the Lyceum Richelieu. The University of Dorpat, which is very much like a German university, and where the student-life is exactly the same as in Germany, was founded in 1632 by Gustavus Adolphus as a Swedish university, and in 1710 took refuge from the Russian armies in Sweden. It was brought back only in 1802 by Alexander I. The botanical garden is one of the most complete in Europe, and the observatory and the labors of Prof. Struve have given the mathematical faculty a world-wide celebrity.

In all of the universities there are four faculties, usually divided into the historico-philological, the physico-mathematical, the legal, and the medical. The physico-mathematical faculty is usually divided into two sections—pure and applied mathematics, and the natural sciences; and at St. Petersburg there is in the law faculty a section of administrative sciences, for the special benefit of those who wish to enter the civil and diplomatic service. In St. Petersburg, also, a faculty of the Oriental languages takes the place of the medical faculty—the medical academy there being a separate institution. The course is four years, at the end of which, after passing a rigid examination, the student receives the degree of Can- didate. A year or two after, on the presentation of a thesis, which the candidate is required to defend publicly, the degree of Magister is conferred. The Doctorate of literature, law, philosophy, philology, etc., is given to graduates who have prepared some carefully written monograph, or treatise, but no examination is required. Honorary degrees are very rarely conferred; but when the university wishes to confer a distinction on some one not a graduate, it elects him an honorary member of the university.

It will be seen that the education given in the universities is thoroughly special, and that there is no such thing as a general course, as in England and America, and those young men who go to the university without any particular end for their studies usually attend the historico-philological or the law course. As law is now a rising profession in Russia, nearly two-thirds of the students are in the law faculty. Methods and theories of education change in Russia with every change of the portfolio of Public Instruction, which for some years back has been in the hands of classicists. The education in all the gymnasia and public schools is therefore now very classical, and Latin is required for the entrance examination to all the faculties of the university, and Greek, also, for the law and historical faculties. The course in the gymnasia includes the subjects usually taught in American colleges in freshman and sophomore years, and also French, German, and history. The final examination at the gymnasium gives entrance to the university; other applicants are obliged to pass a special examination. By a regulation to be put in force this fall, graduates of seminaries may also be admitted without examination. Latin is an obligatory study during part of the law course, German in the medical course, and both French and German in the mathematical course. The other modern languages may be studied at pleasure. Religion, taught by a priest, is obligatory in all the courses. The historico-philologic course is the least special of all the faculties, and the obligatory studies are the Greek, Latin, Servian, Polish, Bohemian, and Sanskrit languages, Russian and comparative grammar, the history of the Russian language and literature, Russian and universal history, logic, psychology, the history of philosophy, statistics, political economy, and religion. The European and Eastern languages, and the history of art, are optional studies. The German method of lectures is pursued, though in the study of the languages there are some few written exercises and oral recitations. The only examinations on the subjects are at the end of every year, and are oral. The professors are not all equally good; there are some who are far behind the age, and repeat now the same lectures that they gave twenty years ago, without the alteration of a word; but many of them are really learned men, who do credit to their universities. The writer has had the pleasure of hearing some of the lectures in the Moscow University, and remembers with especial pleasure those of Prof. Ivanoff on Virgil, and those of Prof. Tchitcherin on law. The Latin professor explained in one lecture about fifty lines of the "Æneid," treating not exclusively, as is the case in America, of grammatical and philological points, but speaking of the style, the object, and the history of the poem, and of the times, trying to awaken in the minds of his hearers a taste for the poetry. The lecture of Tchitcherin, who is one of the most eminent juristical writers in Russia, was on the Social Contract of Rousseau. Unfortunately, his services, as well as those of six other of the best professors, are now lost to the university in consequence of some incidents in a struggle between the old, or reactionary, and the young or liberal party among the professors, which caused them to resign. The students were unusually attentive and quiet, and there were none of the noisy scenes that are too frequently witnessed at Yale or Edinburgh. The whittling of the seats and names of actresses and of French ballet-girls written on the desks showed, however, that not all were attentive, and that students are much the same the world around.

It is possible to learn a great deal at one of these universities, but there are deficiencies in this way of education. No provision is made for learning to write or speak; and in Russia there is great need of instruction and criticism in this direction. Few people are more disposed to talk than the Russians, and few are more wordy; the new institutions with which Russia is being endowed are making it a necessity for every educated man to express his opinion on a variety of subjects in a clear and concise way, both orally and in writing. The result of a want of study of writing as an art is, that the newspapers and the journals of public bodies are filled with long, rambling disquisitions, which take three times the space necessary for the expression of the ideas contained in them. It is only the very best writers that have a readable style; and this tendency to wordiness is on the increase, especially among the young writers who have just left the universities. As the students are prevented from associating freely, there is nothing like an English Union or an American debating society, far less anything like the ardent discussions of the French École Normale, and all opportunities for mutual criticism are lost. It is also much to be doubted if the exclusive lecture system, and the infrequency of examinations, are not conducive to idleness, especially in a large city. No one can be compelled to learn; but frequency of examination may induce him to learn, prevent him from wasting his time, and force him sooner to decide whether he intends to study or not.

In Russia, as everywhere else on the Continent, the Government is afraid of the students; the old institutions meet with little mercy in the criticism of young and liberal minds. Here, as well as in France and Germany, politics form a great subject of thought among the students, for there is no internal university life, no college politics, no boat-racing to take its place. The Government, therefore, tries to the utmost to destroy the esprit de corps, to prevent any special university life, any social contact, among the students: the university is no more a little world, but is absorbed as far as it can be in the outside world. Though this repressive system does not entirely keep down the impulsiveness of the students, it still exercises an important influence on the development of student life. Under Nicholas the students lived in the university buildings, and even wore a uniform (for he tried to put all Russia in uniform), but first one and then the other were abolished as tending to form an esprit de corps. All societies and all meetings of any kind of the students are forbidden; gatherings of more than half-a-dozen are liable to be dispersed by the police. Yet still they meet in restaurants and hotels, and sometimes in their rooms, and have their slang and dialect, so as not to be understood by those who overhear them. Sometimes, if a student has parents in town, they will give him up the house one night in a week, and he will receive his friends at a modest entertainment, where there is often an essay read on some subject, almost always music, vocal and instrumental, and, if the family come in, they will end with dancing and games. They are naturally ungovernable and rebellious, and anxious to assert their rights to the utmost. In 1861, the University of St. Petersburg was closed in consequence of a rebellion. This last spring, disturbances broke out in the Medical Academy at St. Petersburg, which was consequently closed, and spread to the university at St. Petersburg, and then to the other universities. Two courses were closed at St. Petersburg, and some professors at Moscow ceased their lectures; some few students were arrested and kept in confinement for several days; but the movement was stopped by the efforts of the older students, for the examinations were just beginning, and they had no mind to lose all the results of their course by being excluded from public life just as they were entering upon it. The cause of the disturbances was the demand of the students to have a communal fund among themselves for the relief of poor students—a thing long in existence and winked at by the authorities; to have the charge and distribution of the relief fund contributed by the authorities (this, certainly, an inadmissible request); and, of course, the permission to meet freely.

The student type in Russia is much the same as in our Western and smaller colleges: he wears long hair, usually brushed straight back, or arranged so as to stand up on his head, and lets his beard grow, when he has any; moreover, he is generally dirty and careless in his dress. Just now he is inclined to Slavophilism, and in the street affects the red shirt, the high boots, and the Russian peasant costume, in which, however, he never dares appear at the lectures. In public he carries a heavy stick, and essays a general air de vainqueur. He is usually poor, and in his immediate circle of friends everything is common: coats, hats, shirts, tobacco, and books. A student's room is an amusing sight, with its disorder and dust, the single glass, the carafe of water (emptied as soon as filled) on the table, the paper of cheap tobacco on the window-sill, with scraps of paper which are rolled into cigarettes, the enduring cloud of smoke, the scattered books and lithographed lectures. It is here they meet, six or seven, for it is usual to prepare for the examinations in groups, to read over the lecture notes by the light of a tallow candle or a small kerosene lamp, and afterwards engage in one of those ordinary student discussions, where every one speaks his loudest and no one listens. They regale themselves with a little herring and whiskey, or rarely with beer. It is the poor students who give the tone, because they are in the majority; they are very democratic, regard all as their equals, despise gloves, neckties, and other belongings of aristocracy, and look with contempt on the "aristocrats" unless they will share in some way their mode of life. The few who are rich and live at home keep mostly together, go into society, and see very little of real student life.

These Russian students work tolerably hard, especially at Moscow and St. Petersburg, where many of them are obliged to give private lessons, to translate or do other odd jobs, in order to find their livelihood. Singing is not so much cultivated by the Russian students as even with us. They sometimes know "Gaudeamus" and perhaps "The Fox," but have no special songs: it is true, they would have few opportunities of singing them if they had them. Many of them play on instruments; a piano or a violin, or, more often still, a guitar, is very common in their rooms, and there is a student orchestra in nearly every university. For amusement, they patronize the theatre and the ballet, if they happen to have thirty kopecks to pay for their seat in the paradise; they have their drinking bouts, too, where they make zhonka, a peculiar punch, and other less pardonable dissipations. The irregularity of their life causes them all to be well acquainted with the pawnbroker and the usurer, especially the latter. The student manages to read a great deal notwithstanding, and is well acquainted with literature and with modern ideas; he swears by Büchner and Moleschott, Darwin, Buckle, and Draper, the most of whom he has probably read in the original. Wild theories of all sorts, of crime, of life, of communism, are the order of the day. He is as liberal in politics as in philosophy, will show all the faults of the government, will discuss the rights of man and the advantages of a republic, detests Napoleon III., admires Lincoln, believes in the cause of Poland, and regards America, and his imaginations of liberty, order, and simplicity there, with great reverence. As to religion, every university has a church, but there are no daily prayers, and attendance is never obligatory. The students endure the lectures on religion, for they have to pass an examination; they do their duty to the state by confessing and taking the communion once a year (without which they could not graduate), but always mocking and jesting at it, and there is probably not one in a hundred who believes at all in Christianity. Bazaroff, in "Fathers and Sons," is a not exaggerated type of the leader of student opinion. Pisareff, a young writer of genius, who died a year ago, not only believed in Bazaroff, but was himself a similar character, though of a better and more civilized sort. And these young men will have an important influence on the country. They go into public service, practise law, are teachers in schools and families, and are prolific writers for the press. Their journals are sometimes stopped, and one young "nihilist" was sent to Siberia for a romance he wrote, but their ideas remain and bear fruit. One of these ideas most prominent just now is the emancipation of woman, and Mill's "Subjection of Woman" finds universal favor with Russian critics. Many applications have been made to open the universities to the women, but nothing positive has been decided. Several professors at Moscow and St. Petersburg have announced their intention to give special courses of lectures this winter for ladies, but that is as far as the matter has gone. Ladies are now permitted to be examined by the universities (the examination is very slight and superficial) and receive certificates of excellence, which are necessary to enable them to become teachers. The more liberal portion of the press advocates the employment of women as teachers of the village schools as being the only way to success in popular education, and all agree that in this case the increase of female gymnasia (which are already in existence) and the opening of the universities will necessarily follow.

Correspondence.

"THE REVOLUTION" AND ITS CONDUCTORS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your paper of October 21, you commend very highly, and none too highly, the essays on "Woman's Work and Culture" just published in England, but you make your notice of the book the occasion for a disparaging and, I am sure, unjust estimate of the character and work of the advocates of the same cause in this country. You say, "These essays should be read carefully by those—and they are many—who judge the cause of woman's rights and wrongs by the unfortunate attitude and unregulated speech of its leading champions in America;" and you characterize the discussion of the subject by the latter as "a disdain of sober argument" and "a faith in rhetoric." Again, you say that "the moderation in the tone of reasoning (of the book) would seriously displease the American advocates and earn for the English authors the title of spooneys, if not of traitors."

Now, permit me to say a few words to correct the injurious impression which these remarks must make. Let me premise, however, that I have no personal interest in this defence; for, though heartily in sympathy with this reform, I have never been able, from pressure in other directions, to become a public advocate of it. And let me say further, that I am thoroughly sensitive to the irritations of such an illogical and injudicious advocacy as you describe, and especially of an unwomanly advocacy by women; an irritation which one feels far more who stands on the inner point of an anxious sympathy with a cause, than one who stands upon the outer point of indifference or hostility. And I ought not to assert that I have wholly escaped such irritation, though I believe there has been less to offend taste and judgment, especially from those who can be regarded as leaders in this reform, than in most radical reforms.

No woman has been more prominent in advocatiag woman suffrage on this side of the Atlantic than Mrs. Stanton. Indeed, you bring her by name into your disparaging contrast. I can say without hesitation that some of her arguments on this subject cannot be surpassed for the profoundness of their philosophy nor for the unanswerableness of their logic. I may properly rest mainly on her, as she has been for more than twenty years the untiring as well as unpaid advocate of woman suffrage, and the productions of her pen probably equal in quantity those of all other writers on the subject in America. But there is also Miss Anthony, the Garrison of this movement, who, when the work is accomplished, will receive the testimonials of a whole people's respect, as Mr. Garrison is doing for his advocacy, equally condemned at the time, of the anti-slavery cause. And so of Mrs. Livermore, who has no superior as a popular orator, and whose reasoning is addressed to the mind as well as the heart; of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, whose utterances are full of gentleness and elegance, but equally of strength; and of many others who might be named.

And here I cannot forbear to cite a resolution passed by a large convention held in behalf of this cause at Worcester, Mass., in the year 1852, which was organized and presided over by Mrs. Paulina Davis, of Providence, a lady unsurpassed in intelligence and moral worth and occupying the highest position in society:

"Resolved, That so far from denying the social and civil influence of woman, we are fully aware of its vast extent—aware, with Demosthenes, 'that measures which the statesman has meditated a whole year may be overturned in a day by a woman;' and for this very reason we proclaim it the very highest expediency to endow her with full civil rights, since only then will she exercise this mighty influence under a just sense of her duty and responsibility, the history of all ages bearing witness that the only safe course for nations is to add open responsibility wherever there already exists unobserved power."

It would be difficult to find a more dignified and comprehensive statement of one of the great principles which underlie this reform.

After all, I confess freely that the cause has made greater progress in England than in this country. Indeed, it has had a great triumph there in the recent enactment by Parliament of a law by which (if I correctly understand the case—I have not time now to investigate it) women can vote equally with men in certain municipal matters. But are there not reasons for this better progress there other than that of a better kind of advocacy? I think there are, and I will suggest some of them. First, the franchise is limited in England in the case of men, and the qualifications required shut out thousands of the poorer and more ignorant. The admission of women, therefore, to an equal right with men does not let in, as it would here, all the women, but thousands of the more ignorant will be still excluded. This gives them a great advantage over us in carrying the reform. I do not know how often I have been told by really fair-minded men that they would favor the enfranchisement of women without hesitation if it could be confined to the better class of women. Again, the people of England have before their eyes, as an object, too, of their homage, a woman in the highest political office in the land. The idea of a woman in political power, therefore, does not strike them so strangely as it does us. If a woman is fit to reign, they say, she surely is fit to vote. We lose half the force of this argument. With us, it is mere argument; with them, it is both conviction and feeling. There are many other cases besides that of the Queen in which political office has been or may be held by women. The Countess of Pembroke held the office of Sheriff of Westmoreland, which is in part a judicial office, and is said to have sat at the assizes with the judges on the bench. In a reported case, it is stated by counsel, and substantially assented to by the court, that a woman is capable of serving in almost all the offices of the kingdom, such as those of marshal, great chamberlain, and constable of England, commissioner of sewers, governor of workhouse, keeper of the prison, returning officer for members of Parliament, and constable. The office of jailer is in fact now frequently exercised by a woman. Again, the best educated women of England are many of them wealthy and with leisure both for self-cultivation and for philanthropic work. This is equally true of their ablest men. Here our best men and women, often with imperfect education, are compelled to use their hands and brains in the support of themselves and their families. How few have we, like John Stuart Mill, who can devote their well-trained powers in perfect leisure to the cause of human progress! England has many. Wealth with us is acquired by a lifelong devotion to business, and when it is acquired has too often unfitted its possessor for such work as this. Mrs. Stanton has been compelled to superadd all her labors in this cause to those household cares which would have occupied the entire time of most women, and which she has never neglected. I know you will say that all this goes to show that our women are, as you have claimed, less thoroughly educated, and so less able to reason well, than the English women. If I should admit this to be true, and admit further that many unwise things have been said, it would by no means justify either your charge that they disdain sober argument, or your conclusion that the more rapid progress of the cause in England is owing to the incompetency and injudiciousness of its American advocates.

Let me now set you right with regard to a certain point as to which your opinion is very positively expressed, but the fact directly against you and undeniable. You declare that the tone of the book referred to would "seriously displease the American advocates, and earn for the English authors the title of spooneys, if not of traitors." This is important only as an opinion founded upon your estimate of the American advocates of this reform, which estimate and opinion the fact proves to be unfounded. The Revolution, from the first appearance of the book, has in repeated issues commended it in unqualified terms. The women who conduct that paper procured a quantity of them for sale at wholesale price to every one whom they could get to buy them, and they are now making arrangements, I am credibly informed, to furnish them as a premium to clubs of new subscribers. I know the fact that the book receives the hearty approval of these women, who may certainly be taken as representatives of the most radical leaders of this reform, and that they would rejoice if a copy could be put into the hands of every man and woman in the land.

I cannot forbear, before closing, to avail myself, for the general purpose of this article, of some of the observations of the Nation in another connection. In the very next article to the one upon which I have been commenting, you review May's "Recollections of the Anti-slavery Conflict," in which you refer in terms of well-deserved praise to Mr. Garrison. In the course of the article you speak of "the blind rage and frantic folly which his words stirred up, not only in lewd fellows of the baser sort, but in honorable and reverend men, governors, judges, doctors of divinity, senators, and representatives;" and you say that "the ferocity of the pro-slavery papers of thirty years since can hardly be conceived of by the generation that has grown up since then. To the general looker-on, there was substantially but one party, and that was the whole community engaged with laudable unanimity in suppressing a handful of pestilent disturbers of the peace of society." I wish every one who condemns the intemperate zeal of reformers would remember that no one was ever so obnoxious to conservative censure as William Lloyd Garrison, and yet, in the review of the struggle of that time, the public sentiment of the present day, while not acquitting him of all indiscretion, nor of impatience and occasional bad temper (it is a wonder he had so little), is yet fixing its condemnation wholly on the other side. Every reform brings into prominence persons who are characterized by courage and energy and a disregard for conventionalities. There would be no reforms if it were not so. There is almost always some bad taste in their conduct; but good taste alone never wrought out a reform, and bad taste, though a hindrance and an offence, never, I believe, defeated one. LITERARY.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTMAN & SON have arranged with Father Hyacinthe for the immediate publication of a volume of his sermons and addresses. It will contain the oration on "Peace," which was delivered last July, and which is said to have occasioned the Father's troubles with his Order; the six discourses delivered in Notre Dame, on the "Relation between Christianity and Civil Society;" and, finally, some miscellaneous discourses. The Rev. L. W. Bacon, of Brooklyn, translates the work, and the Rev. Dr. Washburne, the rector of Calvary, in this city, has made an introductory biographical sketch. Besides this timely work, the same house have in hand a novel which will probably interest collegians throughout the country, and seems to have a public all ready for it. The title is "Fair Harvard," and the story, which is the work of a comparatively recent graduate of Harvard, is of undergraduate life in Cambridge and in one of the Boston public schools.

—We intended mentioning last week that Harper's Monthly for November contains an article about the recent inter-collegiate boat-race, written apparently by Mr. M. D. Conway, and very well worth reading. It comes a little late in the day, to be sure, and of course Mr. Conway has to do a little, or more than a little, philosophizing of a kind that—as we, for our part, are usually apt to think—might as well have been left undone. Usually, it seems to be done about as much in the interest of ornamentation as by way of seeking simple truth; though ornamentation has not for Mr. Conway so captivating a charm as formerly it had. Usually, too, there is more or less of fantastic vagueness in it, suggestive possibly, but not otherwise valuable. Thus the Greeks, says Mr. Conway, quoting his favorite Ruskin, drew around their battle-pieces a line, thus signifying that around all storms and commotions and conflicts was the still band of calm, inevitable fate. This, or something like; we quote from memory. However, the article is a good one. It opens with some reminiscences of a Mr. Simmons, the father of our American oarsman of that name, which are interesting, and of which Mr. Conway makes use as teaching the lesson that boat-racing may and does exhibit and exercise the moral nature as well as the physical—a thing not to be doubted. Next he goes on to preach to us about our national faults, of heat and haste and lack of finish; comforts us with the thought that, physically, we are as strong as our British brethren; and that, in the future, when we begin to "live a little closer," as the Times expressed it, and are exposed to keener competition, we need fear for the result of no contest. While we are upon this topic, we may say that some not particularly civil or good-natured comments have recently been made by the London Times and the Pall Mall Gazette on a conversation said to have been held between Mr. A. P. Loring, captain of the Harvard crew, and an "interviewer" of a Boston journal. No doubt the "interviewer" gave a version of the conversation which Mr. Loring would not have approved had he seen it. But even as it stands, there is no excuse for the Gazette's saying, as it does, that Mr. Loring complained "because he was not permitted to walk about naked at Putney." This is funnier than saying that he found it inconvenient to be obliged, by reason of the crowded river, to order the crew to wear not only drawers but shirts also, which got wet, so that some of the men, not being used to them, took cold. But it is not so fair as it is funny. And neither the Times nor Gazette notices the most damaging thing stated in the conversation referred to—namely, that at a certain point in the river where there is a back-set of water, in which, no matter how fast the tide is running out, the current runs up the river, the Oxford crew "bored" the Harvard, and forced her into this eddy, where she seemed to stand still while Oxford walked away. This little incident may have had no effect on the result of the race. We suppose it did not, our opinion being that the Americans were overmatched from the start; but it is surely worth a little attention if one is noticing the interview at all. As to Mr. Loring's notion about not giving Oxford the wash of his oars on the ground of its being an ungentlemanly act, we do not know why he might not as well call it an unmathematical or unconstitutional act. The winning of a boat-race depends on skill and strength; good steering is a part of the skill; and each side should use all it has.

—There has recently been considerable excitement in Cincinnati concerning the use of the Bible in the common schools, the Roman Catholics, of course, opposing it, and being assisted in their operations by the Jews, and by some gentlemen who hold what are described as advanced liberal opinions in religious matters. The city Board of Education, listening to their remonstrances, not very long since passed, by five more than a majority of its members, an order which, as we understand it, secularizes entirely the school instruction, and it is in this action that the popular excitement has its source. Of course, it has not wanted for fanning, on the one side or the other, and as usual in such cases a great many things have been said which the sayers of them will not hereafter approve. Some such were said the other evening, at a meeting of about four hundred persons in Pike's Hall, who listened to a speech by Judge Stallo, and then to a longer and very clever speech by the Rev. Thomas

Vickers, known as a champion of the Protestant principle, per se, against the Roman Catholic, and known also as being among Protestants a very advanced one. The authenticity of the Bible as the Word of God, in the sense in which that claim is usually made for it, he denies, and denies with the utmost frankness. It is worth while, then, to quote what he says in regard to the terms which his party are willing to make with the party which believes in the inspiration—verbal or otherwise—of the Old and New Testaments. He says:

"I said recently that I yielded to no man in reverence for the Bible. I revere it, however, for what it is, and not for what it is falsely represented to be. And, my friends, I go still further. If you ask to have the Bible read in our public schools as what it is, and not as a divine revelation, then I say we are prepared to consider the matter. I won't say that we are prepared to admit the reading of every portion of the Bible; but we are prepared—and I am convinced that every man who has thought upon this matter, every man in the School Board who favors this movement, is prepared—to have all the best passages, all the noblest poetical passages, and all the grandest historic stories, and all the beautiful parables, and all that, admitted into our readers, on their merits. I say advisedly on their merits, and not on anything else. Then we place the Christian literature and the Hebrew literature on a par with all the other great religious literatures of the world. But as you now present the problem to us—as you at present enforce the reading upon us—we say no. It is better, as one of the great characters of the Bible—nay, as the great character of the Bible—is represented to have said, it is better, we think, that the Bible go away from you for a season, in order that a comforter—in order that the Bible, in its true character—may return to you."

Mr. Vickers would perhaps like to try his hand at preparing a manual which should be this comforter. It looks to us as if he would have the hardest task of his life in preparing such a one.

—Certain clergymen of Salem, Massachusetts, are reported to have petitioned the Governor of Massachusetts to desist from issuing his proclamation appointing a Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer. They take the ground that the day is no longer celebrated in the manner in which it was intended by its founders that it should be—that it is not made a day of Thanksgiving, but of feasting and of enjoyments very different in character from those befitting the true Thanksgiving Day of the Fathers of the Commonwealth. This is a rather weak reason for the abolition requested, and, indeed, the statement of fact seems to us not to be over and above true. There is, to be sure, less church-going nowadays on Thanksgiving Day than there used to be; but that we may say of Sunday, and the Salem clergymen doubtless are not in favor of abolishing the Sabbath. And there is, perhaps, a little more theatre-going than in the old times; and more firemen's balls; and more horse-racing; and possibly—though we doubt it—a little more foot-ball playing; and possibly—though this we doubt very much—a little more chasing of the greased pig, and raffling for turkeys on Thanksgiving eve, and shooting at the same bird on the following morning. But some of these things may not be utterly unallowable even as so much expression of genuine thankfulness of heart; and if this is not so, still, nothing can be said against the day, as at present observed, as being the distinctive family festival, at any rate in New England and all that part of the West under the influence of New England ideas. It is still the day of all the year for children to go home to the old folks, and gather all together again round the same table. It is, all things considered, our truest holiday. Washington's Birthday is only a holiday by act of Congress; Christmas, which, no doubt, is yearly more observed than ever before, is as yet the holiday of one or two of the Christian communities, and, perhaps we may say, of the South; New Year's has been but little regarded except in and about New York; the Fourth of July is looked upon by a yearly increasing number of people as a nuisance to be escaped from; but Thanksgiving, which is now made national, and will, before long, be fully accepted by the South, is, as we have said, our truest holiday, and has a hold on the affections of the people that will hardly be shaken by historical considerations of its origin. For that matter, how many of the holidays of Christendom could in strictness be celebrated by uneasy Christians if their origin were carefully considered? We here in America have more holidays than we used to have, but we have not enough yet; and they must get to be days of very much greater license than they are now before we can afford to lose any single one of them.

—From time to time we receive the publications of the American Institute of Architects. They consist, for the most part, of papers read before the different chapters of the Institute, but published and distributed or sold by the central organization, the Institute itself. The latest two that we have seen are, first, "The Architectural and other Art Societies of Europe, some account of their origin," etc., "with suggestions as to . . . a National American Art Society with its local dependencies," by Mr. A. J. Bloor, and read before the New York Chapter, February 16, 1869; and, second, "Remarks on Fireproof Construction," by Mr. P. B. Wight, and read before the New York Chapter on the 8th of April. Mr. Bloor's huge pamphlet, of 126 quarto pages, seems to contain a great deal of matter, and to represent much patience and labor. We shall not exceed courtesy, perhaps, in saying that the subject is not of everyday and general interest; that the book is one to keep and bind up with the other publications of this important association, and to refer to on occasion. Mr. Wight's paper should be read carefully by every person interested in building. To those who see and observe the unintelligent way in which iron has been used for building in this country, every hint of better things must be valuable. To those who see in Mr. Wight the architect who designed the most beautiful building in New York—the Academy of Design in Fourth Avenue—the hints of that artist will seem of especial value, because sure to be in the direction of richer, more abundant, and more rational decoration. If anything can be done to make designing in iron a little more sensible, and beautiful results a little more feasible, it will be a gain to us all.

—The last number of the Quarterly Review contains an article on the Byron controversy which—though, like everything else on this topic that has appeared in the Tory press, it has a touch more of ill-temper than is necessary—is nevertheless able, and does really say something that is very much to the point. In fact, we do not now see how anything but the most undoubted testimony—the testimony, say, of two eye-witnesses to the commission of the alleged crime, and, if possible, two eye-witnesses from different quarters of the globe—can invalidate the presumption raised against the truth of the charge. As negative evidence, the letters from Lady Byron to Mrs. Leigh, which the Quarterly publishes, could hardly be more conclusive than they are. They were written during the month succeeding Lady Byron's departure from her husband's house, and three of them after she had decided to insist on a separation. The first of the seven was written while the two women were under one roof, and Lady Byron says, among other things:

"You will think me very foolish, but I have tried two or three times and cannot talk to you of your departure with a decent visage, so let me say one word in this way—[she means by letter]—to spare my philosophy. With the expectation that I have—[that of at once separating herself from Mrs. Leigh's brother]—I never can nor will ask you to stay one moment longer than you are inclined to do. It would be the worst return for all I ever received from you. . . . . Should you hereafter condemn me, I shall not love you less. Judge for yourself about going or staying. I wish you to consider yourself, if you could be wise enough to do that for the first time in your life."

The next note is a scrap, a line long, written from Kirkby Mallory the day after Lady Byron had left Piccadilly: "My Dearest A.—It is my great comfort that you are in Piccadilly"—with Byron, that is to say. In the third letter, Lady Byron says: "You have been, ever since I knew you, my best comforter." In the fourth it is still "My dearest Augusta;" and the question is asked, "Shall I still be your sister?" The letter goes on: "I must resign my right to be so considered; but I don't think that will make any difference." Writing after consulting with her parents, Lady Byron talks about the inevitableness of a separation, and says:

"It cannot be supposed that in my present distressing situation I am capable of stating in a detailed manner the reasons which will not only justify this measure, but compel me to take it. . . . . I will now only recall to Lord Byron's mind his avowed and insurmountable aversion to the married state. . . . . He has too painfully convinced me that all these attempts to contribute to his happiness are wholly useless, and most unwelcome to him."

It is not worth while to quote anything further from this correspondence. Throughout, it exhibits a woman grateful to her husband's sister for being extremely kind to her even though the dearly beloved brother was to be deserted; there is not one expression that is reconcilable with the belief that Lady Byron had anything but respect and affection for her sister-in-law; and there are plenty of expressions that go to show that she left Byron because he hated her, or made her believe he hated her. It is fair to say that Mrs. Stowe—who is making her long announced article into a book—requests all readers of these letters to suspend judgment until she has had an opportunity to point out the true historical connection of them, and show their true interpretation.

—A letter from Rome to Galignani's Messenger says the Chevalier Pietro Rosa—who is the director of the excavations making in that part of the Palatine which has become the property of the Emperor of the French—recently admitted the public to visit the archæological discoveries just made by the side of the Baths of Livia. A swimming school has been laid open to the light, and with it a set of chambers with stuccoed walls adorned with fine encaustic paintings. These pictures represent various mythological subjects. Here we see Polyphemus (depicted with two eyes) surprising Acis and Galatea; here Io chained to a rock, guarded by Argus (also with two eyes), and delivered by Mercury; and in other places there are birds, candelabras, hippogriffs, garlands, vases, festoons, and other ornamental work. All the pictures are covered with a preservative varnish, and are brilliant in coloring as well as delicate in drawing. Elsewhere, in digging the foundation of a house near the Trinita dei Pellegrini, an old building has been uncovered which has a mosaic paving of great beauty, representing Mercury with the caduceus, and a nymph with a cornucopia. These are in the middle, while at the corners are the Four Seasons. Nothing is less likely than that the end of discoveries of this sort in Rome has been nearly reached, and but for the policy of the Papal Government, each year of the next many would probably witness the unearthing of some important treasure.

PARKMAN'S "DISCOVERY OF THE GREAT WEST."*

HAD this volume at the time been issued from the press, a copy of it might most fitly have been transported in the first railway train on the Grand Pacific Route, as a symbol expressive of the full contrast between the not distant past and the present. The circle of appreciative readers among us, ever extending indeed, but not so rapidly as a lover of his country might wish, have been made acquainted by Mr. Parkman's previously published volumes with the theme to which he has devoted the labor of his life, and parts of which he has treated with such thoroughness, fidelity, and consummate ability. In the fulness and extent of his purpose, the gathering of materials, the pursuit of his researches, and the personal investigations by travel at home and abroad and by residence among the aborigines of the country, he has made his theme his own by appropriation, and is, in fact, its only historian. He has done what as yet not even any single French writer has attempted in its completeness, viz., the bringing a critical and judicial investigation, according to the severest model of historical capacity, patience, and fidelity, to bear upon the original documentary evidence and the local traces of French enterprise and dominion in North America.

The works already published by Mr. Parkman, though bearing separate titles, are substantially volumes of a continuous series, and are of course made additionally instructive and mutually illustrative by being read in order. The subject is one which is complete in all the attractions which invest narratives of adventure and personal prowess combined with an aim which took in lofty and noble aspirations of ambition and patriotism. There is no stage or episode in the annals and the development of our continent which is more richly invested with the elements of wild romance, while at the same time admitting, through the acumen and perseverance of a writer like Mr. Parkman in his severe fidelity in searching after and sifting original documents, of being cleared of all falsehood, exaggeration, or obscurity, so that the romance may not confuse the perfect credibility of the history. The monographs and the summarized and digested contents of volumes devoted to portions or the whole of Mr. Parkman's subject, covering its whole field, are sufficiently numerous considering their character. The original documents which he has for the first time gathered and put to use, are turned to the best accounts of verification, rectification, and illustration, while at the same time they take us behind the scenes and reveal many as yet untold secrets.

The same fancy which beguiled Columbus, that the nations of the East could be reached by a direct westward course through the waters of the Atlantic, presented itself to the early French occupants of Canada in the shape of a persuasion that they could find their way in canoes by rivers and lakes, with occasional portages, across our continent to the China Sea. Mr. Parkman, in a previous volume, has told us of an enterprise with this end in view which started from the mouth of the Ottawa River, and followed the streams and sheets of water north westerly. The great lure of the heroic adventurer whose career of success and disaster is the main material of this volume, was, that by following the course, supposed to be south-westerly, of the great River of the West, he might open a new route to the Oriental lands. All noble aims get divested of the element of fancy in the faithful pursuit of them, and generally result in a success which, if more prosaic, is also more substantial than would have been the realizing of the beguilement.

"The Discovery of the West" is the concise and prŏperly inclusive title which Mr. Parkman attaches to the contents of his volume. The Spaniards had, first of European adventurers, seen the Mississippi pour its muddy flow into the Gulf of Mexico, and had traversed a few leagues of its current. But the fact itself had been well-nigh forgotten, and the barren discovery of the mouth of a single stream in a waste of waters had been turned to no account, not even to that of curiosity as to its relation to other rivers and the extent and copiousness of its tributaries. La Salle, having obtained a seigniory in Canada which was but an initiatory step to the ultimate plans that brought him in the vigor and glow of youth to this continent, devoted his arduous life to the enterprise of opening the whole western expanses of the continent to French colonization and dominion. Though he was not unmindful of personal interests, he had no end of his own to serve which did not merge itself in broader and nobler views, which dignify ambition and sustain a great soul under baffling discomfitures, and invest achievements and catastrophes alike with glory and pathos. Mr. Parkman brings an admirable appreciation and candor to bear on his estimate of the character of La Salle. He won and kept the confidence of generous minds; the most faithful of his adherents were those who were most like him in the sinewy virtues of courage, persistency, and unselfishness. He inspired admiration in those who did not love him, and his enemies were men of crooked intrigue or of base motives.

La Salle is, of course, the central and commanding figure in the scene and enterprise which Mr. Parkman brings before us. Baffled again and again after all preliminary plans and efforts had been patiently wrought, and reaching the great river at points from which its descent would have been the easiest stage in the arduous work, he turned back from his weary tramps through the wilderness to his Fort in Canada, for supplies, and at last was rewarded by the smell and taste of the brackish waters of the Gulf. To erect there the cross of St. Louis; to retrace his course up the stream, and by lake-shore and forest-trail to make his way to Quebec; to present himself once more, a man of the wilderness, at the French Court, and there to sue for help in plans which looked to the opening of the whole west of this continent to French feudalism, and to driving out the Spaniards from their sluggish possessions, were acts which translated faithfully the aims of this intrepid but luckless pioneer of empire. Mr. Parkman gives us at intervals in his narrative enough authenticated details, with judicious and pointed comments, for appreciating the character and understanding the motives of the burgher of Rouen, who came to Canada in 1666, at the age of twenty-three, and for more than a score of years, against every conceivable form of hardship, obstacle, disappointment, hostile intrigue, and malicious treachery, kept steadfast to his purpose, and never lost his self-reliance or yielded under the frowns of fortune. His plans were wisely formed; he forecast the perils and exactions of his enterprise, and he provided himself against exigencies so far as the conditions of it admitted. The sort of characters on whom he was compelled to rely as associates and subordinates were men of a motley composition, often intractable and lawless, while the qualities most likely to adapt them to their wild experiences were hardly distinguishable from tendencies in them to wreck any baffled or delayed scheme which depended upon subordination and persistency for its success. The way in which our Northern and Western forests, nearly two centuries ago, were found to shelter a race of coureurs de bois, half-breeds and savages, with worse vices than those of the Indians, stragglers from civilization, deserters and traitors, is abundantly explained in Mr. Parkman's narrative. And yet, so strangely in this world are the elements of good and evil mingled, that it is easy to recognize the services that were done by these rough and coarse pioneers of civilization in our woods.

There is no chapter in any romance, combining promise in its most flattering aspects with the wreck of hope by a series of bitter and crushing disappointments, which can surpass in pathetic interest the admirably wrought narrative in which Mr. Parkman follows the fortunes of La Salle, when, after his canoe voyage down and up the Mississippi, he starts from France with his fleet of four vessels to plant a fort at its mouth, and then encounters a series of cruel disasters, ending only with his own assassination. The jealousy and mean intrigue of Beaujeu, his naval associate; the loss successively of three of the vessels and most of their stores; the blunder, which seems to have been design, that landed him and his reduced force at Matagorda Bay, in Texas, were but the shadows gathering in advance upon the close of the career of this dauntless man. That career, with its accomplishment and its catastrophe, takes a conspicuous place in the historic series of sad but yet ennobled experiences and issues which illustrate the course of human heroism and the thwarting of great hopes, so mysteriously appointed as losses incident to all our gains. There are enough of such examples to require a rectified definition for the word success, as consistent with failure.

We are constantly impressed in the reading of Mr. Parkman's successive volumes by the sense of his peculiar fitness by original genius and qualifications, as well as by laboriously acquired training and experience, for the class of works, in investigation and composition, to which he has so fruitfully devoted himself. His philosophy is that of a man equally skilled in the philosophy of life and history, and of a shrewd though kindly observance of human nature. His knowledge of Indian character, his woodcraft, his surpassing skill in describing the features and experiences of the wilderness, and his power of painting and delineating by a felicitous style of writing, give him, we think, a pre-eminence among our historians.

Our Western residents and travellers will find in this volume some profoundly interesting sketches of the characters and adventures of men whose names are borne, as most justly they should be, by the localities associated with their personal fortunes, such as Joliet, Marquette, and Hennepin—the last of whom was the first white man who, after the sight of them, has described the Falls of Niagara and those of St. Anthony. Does any place bear the name of La Salle's lieutenant—the trusty Touty—whom our author so honors?

A DEMOCRATIC DIPLOMATIST.*

READING this volume is something like looking at scenes by which one has passed in travel through the wrong end of a telescope—so diminishing to the mind's eye is the effect of the media of the events of the last ten years on those which went before them. The Central American Question! Who knows or cares anything about it? The Clayton-Bulwer treaty! What was it? Who was Clayton? We have a dim recollection of a shadow answering to that name which haunted the State Department for a while in the years before the flood. Where are the Bay Islands? In the name of all the devils, what had we to do with them? What was the Protectorate of them? And what was it to us? Has his Majesty, the King of the Mosquitoes, been squelched yet? Or does that potentate still flourish, like too many of his brother monarchs, by sucking the blood of his subjects? All these things and persons had their interest once, but it has been so obscured by the smoke of a hundred battle-fields, and by the glamour of newer celebrities, by "the thunder of the captains and the shouting," that it is all gone clear out of men's minds as if it had never been. Indeed, it vanished with the abolition of slavery, for we conceive all the interest that attached to the Central American Question lay in the purpose of slavery to devour those states next, after she had absorbed Mexico, as provinces of the empire over which King Cotton was to reign supreme. It vanished, with many another ill-boding spectre, at the rising of the New Year's sun of Eighteen Sixty-three.

The final arrangement of this question, whatever it may have been, was the chief diplomatic business of the writer of these letters during his five years' residence at the Court of St. James. But it does not occupy a great space in them, since, as the author says in his preface, they are "essentially private letters," addressed to Mr. Marcy and Mr. Cass, the Secretaries of State, and ancillary to his official communications. Being thus advised beforehand, we had looked for something more entertaining than we find in them. We are afraid that General Cass's acquaintance with epistolary literature must have been but limited if he really thought, as he wrote to Mr. Dallas, "that since the days of Horace Walpole he had seen no more successful effort of this kind!" It is perhaps creditable to the good taste and self-respect of Mr. Dallas that he did not enliven his letters with more private gossip and scandal, but they would have been much more like Horace Walpole's if he had. The art—or rather, the gift—of writing good letters is not one generally dispensed by Nature, and we should not judge from these specimens that the writer of them was one of the favorite exceptions. But, then, it is perhaps hardly fair to judge him by this test—for could Horace Walpole himself, could Madame de Sévigné, or Lady Mary, have written lively letters to Mr. Marcy and General Cass? They contain decorous, dignified accounts of passing public events in London and on the Continent, with his own comments, opinions, and prophecies concerning them—some of which have certainly not come to pass: such as his expectation of the speedy evacuation of Rome by the French troops in consequence of the "miff" of the Pope with Bonaparte at New Year's, 1860; nor of the renunciation of the Prussian crown by the Prussian king upon the death of his brother, so as to make way for his son and the Princess Royal of England as king and queen. We trust that the positive assurance he had received that "the alleged intemperate habits" of King Clicquot "were the false inventions of English travellers, and that he was uncommonly abstemious," may be well-founded—though we fear it will be remitted to the same category as a somewhat similar assertion as to the Emperor Nicholas once made by one religious gentleman, just returned from Russia, to another, who asked him "what kind of a man the Emperor Nicholas was?" "Why, sir, you may depend upon it he is a very much misunderstood man. I assure you that the Emperor Nicholas is hopefully pious!"

Mr. Dallas had his share of the annoyances incident to the envied life of a foreign minister. The Legation was in a state of incipient siege by the hordes of American travellers, more or less civilized, invading Europe. "Every steamer comes loaded with them. . . Some have families of eight children with them; others are spending their honeymoon; and wandering bachelors, sharp-set for Paris, the Pope, the Pyramids, St. Petersburg, or Persia, are countless. What a sinecure has the American Minister in London!" And again: "The steady stream of American travellers is a sort of moral Mississippi or Amazon. There is really a miraculous character about it. . . Only think for a moment of the rushing rapids that flow into the American Legation, on the arrival of every steamer, for Passports! Passports! Where to? Everywhere!" And this was thirteen years ago. If such was the extremity of Dallas, what must be that of Motley! And he had to investigate, early in his career, the great Breeches Question, in the case of Professor Mahan, who was very properly refused admission to Court on a levee-day because he had failed to comply with the rules of costume appointed by the lady he was to visit. In his correspondence with his chief, who was the first to discern the intimate connection, since recognized by Congress itself, between the philosophy of clothes and the dignity and glory of the Republic, Mr. Dallas makes the best of what must have annoyed him, as it would any well-bred man—the necessity of refusing to conform with harmless, if absurd, etiquette, and of appearing at Court, by a kind of contemptuous toleration, in the dress of a butler or a servant out of livery. The State Department, or Congress, we conceive, may ordain the dress in which the representative of the nation shall present his credentials and wear at all official audiences with the sovereign to whom he is accredited, and if they direct him to present himself on these occasions in his shirt-sleeves and with his hat on, or even instead of the three regulation reverences to spit three times on the carpet, in vindication of the rights of a free and independent citizen, we suppose it could not be gainsayed. But as to levees and drawing-rooms, to which admission is not had of right, but by invitation or permission, either general or particular, the Queen has the right which every lady possesses of prescribing the conditions on which her guests shall be admitted.

Mr. Dallas was a Democrat of the school of Jackson and Van Buren, and the son of a Democrat of the school of Jefferson and Madison. Being, moreover, a man of fair abilities, he received his due share of the spoils whenever the Democrats were the victors. Besides whatever State distinctions he received from Pennsylvania, he was sent to the Senate by her, was Vice-President of the United States, Minister Extraordinary to Russia, and Minister to England. A gentleman by birth and breeding, of a fine presence and polished manners, he filled all these posts gracefully and successfully. Though he does not make his allegiance to his party unduly conspicuous in this correspondence, enough appears to show that he was perfectly sound in his fidelity to the great power which has dominated the Democratic party for more than half a century. He is profoundly sensible of the incapacity of the English to understand "the relation of Slavery to our national Constitution, so as to vindicate the principles and practice of our national Democracy"—that Constitution which "shelters the Southern form of African labor from their crusade." He asks his chief, in a jocose vein, a question which perhaps had better have been omitted by his daughter, "what he is to do if placed at the Royal table alongside of Soulouque's representative, whose fine ebony our friend, Mr. Mason, estimated at $1,000!" And he describes the Siamese ambassadors as "admirable laborers for a Southern cotton-field." He discerns in the complications attending Bonaparte's attempt to revive the slave-trade under false colors, that the English feel "the straits to which they are reduced as to labor by their fanatical humanitarianism," while France is obviously reluctant to yield her scheme of reviving the slave-trade, "by seeming to pay wages to ignorant brutes, eager to exchange the actual servitude under their barbarous chiefs for the prospective and ameliorative one under white masters." He thinks that John Brown had more method in his madness than the English believed, and that it called for thorough investigation. But, then, "the conduct of those who were to be forced into liberty, willy-nilly, goes an immense way to show the real character of their condition as laborers, and at the same time to satisfy the most fanatic Abolitionist how utterly nonsensical as well as desperate is the object at which he aims!" He congratulates the whole country, and the Cabinet in particular, on the final votes on the Kansas question in April, 1858, which it was hoped would bribe and bully her into the accepting of slavery. And he speaks with approbation of the "light, well-written essay our friend, Mr. W. Beach Lawrence," had issued in Paris, "to vindicate the Southern form of labor," and which he had "flung out under a sense of duty." So it is natural that he should ardently pray, in November, 1856, "that our glorious Union might be again saved by our glorious Democracy!" And also that he should exclaim, in an ecstacy of patriotic fervor and self-devotion, "Alas! how much disinterested virtue the maintenance of a republic demands! But it is virtue, and it is its own reward!"

Though Mr. Dallas avoids personalities with due diplomatic discretion, he now and then gives a glimpse of a celebrated person which one likes to have. On his first attendance at Court, as he was passing to the throne room, he "was caught by the arm, and heard the exclamation: 'Welcome my countryman, welcome to England!'" He turned and saw "a very venerable man in court costume," whom he did not know. It was Lord Lyndhurst. Again, he speaks of the readiness of men and women of rank in England "to mingle in the light gaieties of life, night after night, and all night," long after they have reached old age. "Lyndhurst (85), Brougham (80), Lansdowne (77), St. Leonard (76), Palmerston (73), etc., may be found wherever amusement is to be had. So with the very ancientest of ladies. The effect on society generally is salutary and obvious. To be sure, the very young are cowed." So much the better for them, and much the better would it be for American society were these examples followed. We wish we had room for the account of his lunch with Lady Morgan, where he met Macaulay, Grote, Hallam, Monckton Milnes, and Lord Carlisle. "She is so short that when sitting her feet can't touch the floor. Her vivacity is boundless, and her intellectual attractions recognized by the first minds of the age. She dresses as you might imagine a discreet sylph would dress—that is, in a mass of light, many-colored gossamery stuff, with ribbons flying in all directions, and a fanciful, coquettish cap. Well! she rouges highly, and, though turned of eighty, might, under the magnetic mask of wit, were her sight and hearing not imperfect, pass for something over fifty." His description of Broadlands, Lord Palmerston's seat in Hampshire, is excellent, and his pride just in outshooting the veteran Premier in his own preserves—"he in the finished, jaunty costume of a thoroughbred English sportsman; I under my heavy beaver, in common frock-coat and light, thin boots." We should infer from these and a few other passages that Mr. Dallas's strictly private letters, should it ever be proper to print them, might be really good reading. One or two things he tells which, we imagine, will surprise the parties concerned—such as his attributing Macaulay's peerage to the New York Tribune, and his considering Mr. Bright as suffering under "a diseased want of self-confidence!" Describing the picture of the first Privy Council held by the Queen after her accession, he speaks of her as "only seventeen years of age," and of Lord Melbourne as "her guardian and prime minister." Mr. Dallas should have known that Victoria was eighteen years of age—the age of lawful majority where succession to the crown is concerned—a month before her uncle, William IV., died; and that Lord Melbourne was no more "her guardian" then than Mr. Gladstone is now. He ought to have known, too, that the Bishop of Oxford, whatever may be in store for him—and he is "no brawler"—was not in Mr. Dallas's day to be addressed as "Your Grace."

But it is time to stop. In taking leave of this book, we feel bound to say that it is one that had better not have been printed. It has no raison d'être. It contains no information not elsewhere accessible as to public events; and the author's rank as a statesman and publicist is not sufficiently high to make his comments upon them of material importance. He belonged to a time and a class which, we may hope, have passed away for ever. The Pro-slavery Democrat is a being of the past, and the opinions which made him so were such as will not grow more savory in the nostrils of posterity as time goes on. The prudent thing the contemporary generation can do for a man of this class is to draw the mantle of forgetfulness over his errors of doctrine and conduct as it presses forward to the things that are before, and to leave him to a friendly oblivion.

TWO AMERICAN POETS.*

Most New Englanders who are acquainted with Mr. J. T. Trowbridge's prose writings will recognize in him a very successful painter, after a strictly unideal and realistic fashion, of the worst and meanest side of Yankee life. The caput mortuum which was left behind by the subliming processes of old Puritanism was certainly a sad enough lump. Without religion and without show of it till sickness came; without so much intelligence as cunning; without knowledge, but still with much hard empirical sense and some sour wit; without natural affection, or nearly so; without public spirit or anything else as a set-off to lifelong, daily, intense selfishness; without any respectable moral qualities except tenacity, courage, and industry; griping, narrow, brutal, though not fond of inflicting physical cruelties, the residual Puritan man, the skinflint small farmer of New England, the hard-cider-drinking, practical atheist, who came up a gnarly, stunted sort of an ill-weed in the religious plantations of our new Israel, was and is a creature odious enough to be sure, not good to have too near one, but still picturesque and, when well depicted, amusing. That this personage Mr. Trowbridge thoroughly understands and has the skill to draw, any one may see by looking at his figure of "The Man who Stole a Meeting-house" or of the man and his wife who lost and found the coupon bonds.

Unfortunately, in the volume before us he keeps entirely out of the field in which he is strongest, and gives us only the ordinary vulgar Yankee of the prevalent type, and of him only two or three glimpses, and those chiefly while he is in the rudimentary stage of boyhood. Nor is his work of this sort, even, at all as good as its kindred prose. Some of it, however, is rather good in its way and cleverly done. Some of the rhyming in "Darius Green and his Flying Machine" is of a kind that would please Mr. Lowell, who has performed many remarkable feats of that kind. We quote a passage, wherein the contriving and much-inventive Darius is considering with himself about fitting to his back a pair of wings:

"'The birds can fly,
An' why can't I?
Must we give in,'
Says he with a grin,
'T the bluebird an' phœbe
Are smarter 'n we be?
Jest fold our hands an' see the swaller
An' blackbird an' catbird beat us holler?

"'Doos the leetle chatterin', sassy wren,
No bigger 'n my thumb, know more than men?
Jest show me that!
Er prove 't the bat
Hez got more brains than 's in my hat,
An' I 'll back down, an' not till then!'

"He argued further: 'Ner I can't see
What 's th' use o' wings to a bumble-bee,
Fer to git a livin' with, more 'n to me;—
Ain't my business
Importanter 'n his'n is?'"

What follows this—the boy's talk about Icarius and Dædalus—of whom, it is probable, he had never heard, appears to be dangerously out of keeping, and good for nothing if it were not. It has a decided vulgarness, at any rate, which, we may remark, is a common and offensive fault in the third-rate and fourth-rate New England humorists, and one that ought not to be found in Mr. Trowbridge. It is a fault more offensive than, morally considered, it quite deserves to be thought, perhaps; though, for that matter, it is not the absolutely bad that is so dangerous, even to the morals, as the lack of the good; and to offer the coarse and mean in place of what is beautiful and fine is to do something towards the general degradation of those under one's influence. This criticism does not, of course, apply to much of the deal of coarseness and meanness presented in Mr. Trowbridge's works in general, for most of it is seen to be artistically necessary.

Mr. Trowbridge's serious verses contain here and there a fancy or an expression that is pretty, or even better than that. This, for instance—is it old or new?—is at all events pretty at the end:

"On its bosom swims the fair phantasm
Of a subterranean azure chasm,
So soft and clear, you would say the stream
Was dreaming of heaven a visible dream."

The passage that follows is in what we should call the author's best serious poetical manner. It is natural, simple, clear description—not without a good deal of vividness of picture, and is more to be praised than nine parts in ten of all that our minor poets write:

"I watch the mowers, as they go Through the tall grass, a white-sleeved row.

* "The Vagabonds, and Other Poems. By John Townsend Trowbridge." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1869.
"Kŏnigsmark, The Legend of the Hounds, and Other Poems. By George H. Boker." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.

With even stroke their scythes they swing,
In tune their merry whetstones ring.
Behind the nimble youngsters run,
And toss the thick swaths in the sun.
The cattle graze, while, warm and still,
Slopes the broad pasture, basks the hill.
And bright, where summer breezes break,
The green wheat crinkles like a lake."

In his more ambitious efforts, Mr. Trowbridge is less successful, and gives evidence that he is rather by nature poetical than poet—a chief use of poetry.

Mr. Boker's name is better known in our literature than that of Mr. Trowbridge, and now for a long time his position has been settled and secure. The volume before us will not diminish his reputation as a writer skilled in versification, of poetical taste, and with a good eye for dramatic situations. "Königsmark," the leading poem of the collection, is a tragedy, founded on the tragical story of the wife of George I. of England while he was still a Hanoverian prince, which the reader may find in Thackeray's "Four Georges," related in much the same way as here. The only variation in which Mr. Boker has indulged is in making Königsmark a reputable, or rather a good, young man. He was in fact neither the one nor the other, but an adventurous profligate, and so long as our author had no expectation of seeing his drama accepted and put upon the stage—where virtue and vice have to be treated as in ethical writings for the youthful mind—it is difficult to see why he deserted the effective dramatic poem that might readily be made out of the story as it stands in history, for the familiar regulation drama with its jealous woman, persecuted lovers, and all the rest of it. There was good enough tragedy to be had from the sprightly Countess, not too good; her acquaintance in her childhood with the man not then corrupted, whom afterward she loved over-much; the dull, dumb, proud husband, hardly knowing his wife's infidelity; the malignant Von Platen and the spretæ injuria formæ, the midnight meeting of the lovers, and the bloody murder of one of them in the stone corridor the moment after he has left his mistress's lighted and perfumed room. Doing justice to the rather unaccountable figure of the husband, there is here the material for a dramatic poem that Browning might have delighted to write. And there is material for a good enough drama, a play fit for the theatre, if the Prince be kept out of sight, or if an invented Prince George be substituted for the old one. But as Mr. Boker handles the subject, the poem is lost, and we do not get the play, either. Still, "Königsmark" is a careful production.

The other poems in the book we do not like so well. Poor old Jubal Early, who as a general knew nothing, if he did not "know the country," and who even when he did was an incompetent raider, is vastly magnified in verse like this:

"O Early, mad Early, thou ruthless invader,
Where are the troopers who followed thy raid?
Look at their corses!
Soldiers and horses
Whiten and brighten with bones shining grimly,
On all the wide plains they rode over so trimly.
What has the raven said?
Where has the red fox preyed?
What is the high-sailing buzzard declaring
In Richmond's white upturned face of thy warfaring, Sheridan, Sheridan, Cavalry Sheridan?"

This same rather stilted treatment of the commonplace is to be seen in various other poems. Nor do we find ourselves over attracted and pleased by poems such as that addressed "Ad Criticum." Here is some of what is said to the critic, that gentleman being supposed to be speaking in the first four stanzas:

"Why harp upon a well-worn string
Whose note is flat and out of tune?
Why take the morning skylark's wing,
And sing his song at blazing noon?

"The world grows sage. The harmless tales
That took her in her infant years,
Now stretch her patience till it fails,
And weary her averted ears.

"What thing, in sooth, hast thou to tell,
Thou dreamer in a world awake?—
Dost thou not hear the factory-bell,
And feel the panting engine shake?

"What swiftest thought of art's desire
But droops with shame, and feebly lags
Behind the intellectual wire
That tells the price of corn and rags?

"I answer not; I marvel much;
I see no issue, save for ill,
In that which gives creative touch,
Yet lets the moral man stand still."

But poetry is not so to be despaired of, even though we do in these latter days—the telegraph having been invented—use it sometimes in the interest of the produce market and the paper market. Poetry is never in a bad way till all the poets are poor ones. And since William Shakespeare had his little dealings with his fellow-proprietors of the Globe Theatre, or whatever theatre it was, and followed up his delinquent Stratford neighbors with justices' warrants, "Hell's minion, Trade," as Mr. Boker calls trade and commerce, has never yet done any harm at all to the muses. This is not generally believed; but it is true. And there are always, let us thank their stars, some half-a-dozen or so of people who truly believe it, and who metrically act upon their belief.

Réflexions sur l'état actuel de l'Italie et sur son avenir. Par Christine Trivulce Belgiojoso. (Paris: 1869.)—In six chapters on the "Political and Material Condition of Italy," the "Influence of the Past," the "Character of the Italian," the "Spirit of Party," the "Duties" of the hour, and the "Results to be attained," the Princess Belgiojoso presents to her compatriots and the world at large a picture of her country, as it was, as it is, and as it ought to be, which well merits attention. It deserves it not on account of originality, power of delineation, or piquancy of any kind, but chiefly of that truthfulness which generally distinguishes the writings of those who, after having largely shared in the agitations, illusions, and sacrifices of an eventful period, review the field of long and ardent struggles and their results in the calmer hours of the evening of life, and can present the conclusions they reach—whatever they may be—without fear of being accused of infidelity to the cause. And the Princess Belgiojoso, who was a patriot before Mazzini, and a heroine in the times of Carlo Alberto, and who, after Novara, faithfully and regardless of sacrifice stood by Garibaldi and Cavour, has, more than many others, the right to be frank and outspoken. Another merit of her book is the total absence of all egotistic traits. It is entirely objective and generalizing in its character. It mainly aims to reproduce the present situation in its broader features—with its light and its shadows—without the slightest attempt at being or appearing either spirited or amusing. The reader would look in vain for personal reminiscences, anecdotes, or striking descriptions.

No nation of Europe has, in our century, seen its efforts crowned with so much success as the Italian, and yet the picture of Italy, so faithfully drawn in the book before us, cannot fail to produce a sad impression. It is true, the peninsula, from the Alps to the Strait, and the islands, are, with a slight exception, united and free; the foreigner and his satellites of Naples, Tuscany, Parma, and Modena have been driven from the land; the Quadrilateral, from the Zwingburg it was, has become a grand stronghold of defence; patriotic harangues are delivered where the Pellicos, the Maroncellis, the Bandieras listened to sentences that sent them to the dungeon or to the scaffold; a democratic constitution flourishes where the Inquisition and the court-martial, the spy and the sbirro, were omnipotent; schools replace convents, and railroads traverse defiles which the brigand lately infested—and yet, Italy is far from being happy, and her freedom, and even her unity, far from being secured.

On the contrary, discontent, doubt, and disharmony prevail almost in every sphere. There is a want of national power and self-consciousness which embitters the present and clouds the view of the future. Italy has not done, as was hoped, "da se." The French have given her Lombardy, and the Prussians the Quadrilateral and Venice. Rome is still held by the Pope, and guarded by foreign bayonets. The clergy have not ceased to conspire and work for reaction, and their influence over the mass of the people is greater than that of the free press. The provincial jealousies have not been extinguished. The existing order of things is assailed or deprecated by almost everybody. The Permanenti of Turin still grumble over the removal of the capital; Tuscan indolence regrets the days of provincial quiet and cheap living; Naples refuses to pay her taxes; Sicily defies all laws, and revels in brutal riots and revolts; Mazzini preaches insurrection, as if Metternich and Bomba still ruled the land; and Garibaldi places himself above the constitution, the Parliament, and the King, inaugurating, of his own motion, campaigns as disastrous to the country as his former ones were glorious. The youth, instead of working or learning, follow enthusiastic or unscrupulous demagogues, or spend their days in idleness and dissipation. The numberless universities, lyceums, academies, and other seats of learning, are deserted. The rich proprietors, unlike their ancestors, who displayed their magnificence in adorning their homes and enriching Italy with works of art, ruin their fortunes and impoverish their country by a foolish imitation of English, French, and Russian luxuriousness, the materials for which must be imported. The merchants and speculators vie with each other in defrauding the Government of its revenues and depreciating its currency. The peasantry, brutal and indolent in the southern provinces, and ground down by heartless farmers in the northern—where, moreover, the vines and the silk-worms are destroyed by undiscoverable diseases—pay their heavy taxes but scantily and reluctantly. The Government, constantly assailed by factions, tormented with complaints, and on the verge of bankruptcy, is both powerless and over-scrupulous. The chief safeguards of liberty, the national guard, the jury, and the ballot-box—owing to ignorance, indolence, and reactionary or demagogic intrigues—are shamefully neglected or abused.

The principal sources from which, according to our author, the evils of the present situation flow are, the indolence and idleness which infect all strata of society, the ignorance of the lower classes, and a restless impatience arising from overwrought and naturally unfulfilled expectations. These defects in the disposition of the Italian are partly the results of climatic influences and partly legacies of the so much gloomier past. Naturally indolent, and long kept in darkness and bonds, he learned to attribute all his miseries and the shame of his country to the governments that oppressed him, and in his aspirations after liberty to expect from deliverance a sudden and entire change for the better in all conditions of life and society, forgetting the fact that the mere breaking of chains makes no slaves free; that the happiness of a people, like that of an individual, is the fruit of training, labor, and self-rule; and that greatness is but gradually achieved. Disappointed in his hopes, he again accuses his rulers, and longs for new changes. The only remedy Princess Belgiojoso sees for these evils is the co-operation of all patriots in promoting education, industry, and the growth of a quickening sense of duty.

The Patriot's History of Ireland. By M. F. Cusack, author of "The Illustrated History of Ireland." (New York: L. Kehoe. 1869.)—The "patriot" for whom this history of Ireland is designed we take to be the "Fenian;" for the sole object of the work appears to be to "fire the Irish heart"—from Erin in the frontispiece, "chanting a song of hope for the future of Irish patriots," to the ubiquitous "Irish patriot" who, under various disguises, figures in nearly every wood-cut—now leaping upon the horse behind Sir Crystede; now fighting with another warrior in the battle of Clontarf; now under the name of St. Lawrence O'Toole praying for Ireland; now sitting in Parliament; and now "agitating peacefully" on the hustings. Everywhere it is the glory of Ireland, the purity and disinterestedness of the "Irish patriot," contrasted with the villany and treachery of the Saxons—the virtue of Catholics with the perfidy of Protestants. For instance, Martin Luther was "a wicked monk, who apostatized from his creed in order to marry" (p. 195). Probably the author did not mean to convey the impression that all these glories and excellences must be looked for in the mythical period. It is, however, a curious fact that more than half the book is occupied with the times before the Conquest under Henry II., and that the whole period since the reign of William and Mary is dismissed with eleven pages. The total absence of historical criticism is wonderful, even in a Fenian publication. For anything that appears here to the contrary, the five mythical invasions of Ireland, (1) "the aking by the Nemedians," (2) "the taking by the Fomorians," (3) "the taking by the Firbolgs," (4) "the taking by the Tuatha de Dananns," (5) "the last and final taking by the Milesians" (p. 14), are as authentic as the conquest of Strongbow or the Battle of the Boyne. And none but a very ignorant reader is reassured by the frequent repetition of such expressions as the following (p. 200): "All this, you must remember, is not my opinion or my view of the Reformation; it is a matter of HISTORY." We have nothing but honor for the ardent patriotism so characteristic of the Irish—nothing but respect for earnest religious conviction, wherever found. A learned and candid Irish Catholic could do his countrymen great service by teaching them the true glory of their history, and the real "wrongs of Ireland," just as Dr. Lingard's work is a valuable contribution to the history of England. But books like that before us turn the ignorance and excitability of the Irish people to the account of false patriotism and superstitious faith.

Moral Philosophy; or, The Science of Obligation. By James H. Fairchild, President of Oberlin College. (New York: Sheldon & Co. 1869.)—Mr. Mill, in his "Inaugural Address," when speaking of instruction in moral philosophy, says that he "could wish that it were more expository, less polemical, and, above all, less dogmatic;" and takes occasion incidentally to characterize "the old notion of education, that it consists in the dogmatic inculcation from authority of what the teacher deems true." In these words we find the criterion for books of the class of that before us, and a sufficient reason for ranking this with the majority of its kind; it is well enough adapted to teach Mr. Fairchild's opinions, and the First Part, (theoretical) contains an able and candid exposition of the theory of ethics maintained by him. But even this is rather a presentation of his own opinions than a guide to the formation of opinion; and the Second Part (practical ethics) is nothing if not dogmatic—except when it is polemical. Everywhere the author's views are pronounced ex cathedra; and arguments seem to be weighed solely with the aim of proving a particular proposition. Judged by Mr. Mill's standard, therefore, the whole school of text-books of which this is a specimen must be pronounced false in their fundamental principle. Looking, however, at the actual demands of the majority of teachers, who ask merely for a good statement of the views which they desire their pupils to hold, we cannot condemn the book before us. It is clear, compendious, well arranged, generally well argued, often quite felicitous in detail, never rising very high, seldom meeting the real difficulties that disturb an active mind in the present generation, not always up even to the level of the current discussions of disputed points; but on the whole excellently fitted to be used as a text-book in teaching the set of opinions which one would naturally look to find in the President of Oberlin College.

WIRT SIKES'S NEW BOOK.
ONE POOR GIRL:
THE STORY OF THOUSANDS.
By WIRT SIKES.

"It depicts the hard, the terrible experience of 'One Poor Girl' in this great city, in which, beyond all question, she is but the representative of numberless others. Poverty, vice, avarice, and remorseless lust are at various times ready to crush her to despair and suicide, although she is at last strangely rescued. The book is written with feeling and taste, but with the evident purpose to plead the cause of the wretched and defenceless."—The Evangelist.

EDINBURGH REVIEW.—"The BEST History of the Roman Republic."

LONDON TIMES.—"BY FAR THE BEST History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Commonwealth."

VOLUME I. OF THE

HISTORY OF ROME,

FROM THE EARLIEST TIME TO THE PERIOD OF ITS DECLINE.

By Dr. THEODOR MOMMSEN.

Reprinted from the Revised London Edition, and at less than half the price. To be completed in 4 vols. crown 8vo. Price of Volume I., $2 50.

Dr. Mommsen has long been known and appreciated through his researches into the languages, laws, and institutions of ancient Rome and Italy, as the most thoroughly versed scholar now living in these departments of historical investigation. To a wonderfully exact and exhaustive knowledge of these subjects, he unites great powers of generalization, a vigorous, spirited, and exceedingly graphic style and keen analytical powers, which give this history a degree of interest and a permanent value possessed by no other record of the decline and fall of the Roman Commonwealth.

ANCIENT STATES AND EMPIRES.

A WORK FOR COLLEGES AND SCHOOLS.

By John Lord, LL.D. Uniform with the "Old Roman World." 1 vol. crown 8vo, with map, $3.

The author has simply aimed in this work to present the most salient points—the most important events and characters of four thousand years, in a connected narrative, without theories or comments, and without cumbering the book with details of comparatively little interest.

The Week.

THE elections of last week may fairly be taken to show that on the whole the relative strength of the Republicans and Democrats is probably not as yet materially changed from what it was last year. The Republican party is a hard party to get out to the polls at any time but during the excitement of a Presidential election, and this for various reasons, moral and physical. Many of its members are no politicians; not very many are at all well drilled as partisans. Besides this, it is a fact that the Republican party, which is a rural party, has to walk in the aggregate, take the country through, some hundreds of thousands or millions more miles to deposit its ballots than the Democratic. In a country of "dirt roads," and an election month of bad weather, these are considerations of weight. But it is pretty clear that on the whole Grant's administration is generally approved. He could to-day, in spite of what mistakes he has made, be elected over Seymour and Blair by about the majority he got last November. Minnesota, Massachusetts, and Wisconsin go Republican—Wisconsin by rather more than last year's majority; the other two by a good deal less. Massachusetts, indeed, casts a lighter vote than she did two years ago, when, also as this year, the liquor question was before the people. New Jersey is Democratic, and a little more Democratic than she was when she last elected a legislature, for the anti-Republican majority on joint ballot is now 11 instead of 7. There also the vote was light. Here in New York it was very light; and the Democrats are seen, as the returns come in, to have carried everything—State ticket, Senate, and House—and to have defeated the constitution, and all the separately submitted clauses. In Illinois it may be—but we cannot now tell—that the constitutional convention is in the hands of the Democrats, for there was a good deal of scratching and of transferring votes for local and private reasons—notably for reasons relating to temperance. And in Chicago there are more Democrats than before in the city government; but they are there as "Reformers," all party lines having been disregarded by their supporters; and we do not know what harm they are likely to do in the convention.

In this State the result would have been different had the country vote not been so surprisingly small. It never before was so much behind the real strength of the party, and as it happened, the Republicans of this city did so well, and the Democrats so ill, proportionally, that a respectable country vote would have elected the whole Republican ticket and saved the Legislature. But the more we hear from the distant counties, the worse it is Sigel, however, runs ahead of his ticket, and the Republican leaders will probably take note that they may have a majority of the German voters at any time when they will overhaul their opinions on the subject of lager-bier drinking. Mr. Greeley will not run much, if any at all, ahead of the rest of the ticket. A belief among some of the lower orders of Democrats that he is peculiarly "the workingman's friend," and a man of singular honesty of character, and the friend of the Fenian, procured for him a large vote among the Democrats of this city. But in the country he did not so well. Why he did not is probably to be answered by saying that the farmers have not yet forgiven him for signing Jefferson Davis's bail-bond, and perhaps have never recovered the confidence in his strength of mind which they had before that event. It is related that the Hartford firm who published his "American Conflict," which had formerly been selling largely in the small towns that are the "book agents'" field, began to lose money on the work immediately after it was known that Mr. Greeley had become one of Davis's bondsmen. Before that, orders had been coming in at the rate of 500 a day; after that, so few came in that there was a loss of $50,000 on the publication. Besides the apathy of the Republicans, it is to be observed, as one of our contemporaries remarks, that this was a great year for "getting even," and numberless spites were gratified as well as much vengeance wreaked for past rascality. Thus, Mr. Younglove can name three or four men in his own camp who caused his defeat for senator. Mr. La Bau can do the same thing; so can Mr. Root, another senatorial candidate; while two city candidates for the Assembly attribute their defeat to Mr. Charles S. Spencer, whose "sainted father's old family Bible," which Mr. Spencer rescued from the flames at the peril of his life, in 1863, might as well, it would seem, have been left to perish by fire. From all we hear of him, our sorrow for the rout of the Republicans is not the sorrow of those without hope. Possibly he and the like of him may now be driven out of the party they have used and abused.

The Democrats, as we have said, not only have the State offices but both branches of the Legislature, and can now do what they like with us. They can, if they choose, give us a police force in this city and Brooklyn which will put a million and a half of people under the surveillance of men such as Sheriff O'Brien's deputies—robbers, murderers, and thieves; they can abolish the various Metropolitan Boards of Commissioners, which, although they have been the seats of more or less corruption, and have helped to demoralize the Republican party, have nevertheless interposed the power of the State at large between the decent men of the city and the plunderers who have made them a prey; they can "gerrymander" the districts both Congressional and Legislative, so that it will not be so easy for the Republicans again to get control of them; they can give us rum-shops open every hour in the day and night and every day in the week; they can make every ward in the city a paradise for repeaters; they can tax the whole State as they please, and compel every man in it to assist in paying the running expenses of Tammany—in short, they can do as they like. But whether they will go the whole length of their tether is another question. There are some indications that the leaders are disposed to be cautious, and though Governor Hoffman promised "local self-government" as the result of the victory of his party, Mr. Peter B. Sweeny may be of a different mind. Places in the Health Board and the others are convenient things to distribute among the clamorous, and probably Democratic Commissioners, appointed by the Governor, might be better than direct Democratic rule by the New York city rank and file.

Massachusetts is certainly carried by the Anti-Prohibitionists, and this, as we have said, on a lighter vote than was got out when, two years since, the Prohibitionists carried the State. It is plain, then, that the working of the law is not satisfactory to the Temperance men, and this discontent is not, we think, attributable to the hypocritical way in which the law has been enforced so much as to a belief that strict enforcement is impracticable. Governor Claflin's and Mr. William Spooner's attitude would seem to show that this is true; and we rather doubt if we shall again see Massachusetts oscillating between "no rum" and "free rum"—this year a License legislature, next a Prohibitionist. Still, the question has not been thoroughly discussed since Governor Andrew died; and he discussed it amid the howling of the Prohibitionists, and the howling, too, of the drinking men, who were more glad to have so honored a man on their side than willing to take his advice as to moderation. Since then it is in the old, blind, unscientific way that the matter has been handled, and we have no confident hope that we shall see a judicious, really effective License Law put on the statute-books. The railroad lobbying of last winter seems to have been visited at the polls this year upon some of the senators and representatives who were mixed up in it, and Needham—the senator who reported that, to be sure, there was a belief among outsiders that the lobby had some power to influence legislation, but that the lobby and the Legislature know how foolish and groundless such a belief was—has, we are pleased to learn, been left at home, where he ought to meditate on the estimable character of Mr. Bret Harte's "Truthful James."

The Tennessee Legislature has laid on the table the motion to declare Mr. Henry Cooper's election to the Senate null and void, and has done so on the ground that the United States Senate is the sole judge of the qualification of its members, and that such a State statute as that cited in the case of Mr. Cooper has been repeatedly set aside at Washington and disregarded.

Rumors of the approach of the decision on the constitutionality of the legal tender act, in the cases argued before the Court last winter, are again rife. We see no reason to change the opinion as to what the decision will be which we expressed more than a year ago; but we admit that no opinion on the subject is worth much, or indeed is anything better than a deduction from what is known of the general leanings of the judges on other questions of the same class. But it is quite safe to say that the opinion of Mr. Spalding, the framer of the act, that it was essentially a war measure, and cannot be held binding after the state of war is over, will not, as has been reported, influence the judgment of the Court. If the Court consulted him as to what the act meant, it would be equally bound to consult every other member who voted for it. This notion of the way courts of law ought to interpret acts of the legislature probably emanates from the gentlemen who think it would be a good thing to cut off the jurisdiction of the Court in the Yerger case, now actually before it. If Yerger has now the right to appeal—and this does not seem to be denied—and the decision of the Court would either save his life or his liberty—and the probability that it will is the sole ground on which the interference of Congress is likely to be invoked—to take it away from him by a special act between the hearing and the decision of his case would be about as monstrous an act of oppression as any legislative body ever perpetrated. We say nothing of the probable effect of such interferences with judicial decisions on the independence of the judiciary, and on the popular respect for it and confidence in it, though on these points a great deal might be said. It is worth while reminding the Republican promoters of such schemes, however, that whatever indulgence there may have been for these tricks with the Supreme Court during the excitement arising out of the war, people are now rather tired of them, and the only result of any importance they can possibly accomplish will be in the way of facilitating the accession of a Democratic President in 1872.

One or two papers have announced during the week that that now well-known gentleman—whom the Secretary of the Treasury sends to Europe to negotiate a great loan with that equally well-known person, the Frankfort or London banker, who so frequently offers to lend any amount of money to the United States at four per cent., or even less—has started once more on his travels. He seems this time, however, to have got off without the Secretary's knowledge, as Mr Boutwell denies that he despatched him, and even goes so far as to deny that the Frankfort or London banker has offered the four per cent. loan. We are glad of this denial, because it will relieve a good many people from the necessity of accounting for the willingness of these foreign bankers to lend money to the United States at four per cent., when any quantity of its bonds at seven or eight per cent. are to be had. Another puzzle from which the public, we are glad to say, have been relieved, is the whereabouts, name, and occupation of the persons engaged in the attempt to get the soldiers' and sailors' pension stopped, which both the Republican and Democratic parties have for several years so vigorously protested against in their platforms. The absence from these instruments this year of the customary solemn declaration that the pensions should be paid as usual, satisfies us, and we trust will satisfy everybody, that this nefarious scheme has been abandoned, its promoters being doubtless appalled by the unanimity with which they were met by our indomitable politicians.

We commented severely last June on the conduct of the Massachusetts Legislature in lending the credit of the State to the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad Company, upon certain conditions, to see to the exact fulfilment of which three commissioners were appointed; in afterwards legislating these commissioners out of office, and paying over the money without their approval, and without the fulfilment of the conditions; and in accepting from a committee a ridiculous report whitewashing a corrupt attempt to withhold certain evidence of the condition of the road from the commissioners. A correspondent in Boston thereupon wrote us a letter trying to persuade us that it was all right, and that the State had done a good thing, because although it had lent its credit to the corrupt and unprincipled gang who now have charge of the Erie Railroad, the gang in return bought "certain flats owned by the Commonwealth" at a very high price. There never was a particle of doubt as to the impression the transaction would make on the outside world. If anybody had any doubts about it, however, we hope they have been removed by the news that the State agent, Mr. George Walker, has been unable to raise a small loan in Europe. To appreciate the full gravity of his failure, too, it must be remembered that two years ago the credit of Massachusetts stood as high as that of any government in the world. The people of the Commonwealth have the consolation of knowing, however, that they have palmed off those "flats," at high prices, on the fine old house of Fisk, Gould, Eldridge & Co.

We hear nothing more of the prosecution of the investigation into the charges against General Butterfield, much less of his being brought to trial for them, and we do hear talk of the whole subject being dropped. We sincerely trust there is no foundation for this rumor. If the Administration allows such charges as have been made against General Butterfield to pass without notice, it will make itself an accessory after the fact to the performances of the Gold Ring. There should as we said last week, not only be enquiry, but public enquiry. Nobody will attach the least importance to an investigation conducted in private, and if there be no enquiry at all, it will be, in the present state of political morals, the greatest scandal of the last ten years, which is saying a great deal.

A subscriber, who has somewhat unaccountably remained ignorant of the leading incidents in Father Hyacinthe's career, writes to ask us to explain how he obtained his present prominence, and whether it is due solely to his revolt against his superiors. He first became eminent by his preaching, which is fine—indeed, places him perhaps at the head of the half-dozen great preachers the world contains. This led to his being appointed to deliver the Advent Sermons at Notre Dame, where he discoursed on questions of popular interest, and drew immense crowds—the fine ladies of the Faubourg St. Germain setting him down among their luxuries, like a box at the opera. But the sermons showed signs of liberality which greatly alarmed his superiors, and he at last started off in the general work of reform by appearing at a peace meeting last spring, and making a speech, to which we referred at the time as likely to cause trouble, inasmuch as it contained signs of undue respect for Protestants and Jews. Finally, the private rebukes of his superiors touching the liberalism of his tone, combined with the growing assumption of the Papacy in reference to modern civilization, drove him into writing the letter which led to his withdrawal from his convent and subsequent dismissal from all his charges. The incident would, however, perhaps not have made him famous if it had not occurred just at this juncture, when a large body of Catholics are greatly roused by the extravagance of the Ultramontane pretensions. He has unquestionably enjoyed, up to his departure from France, the hearty sympathy of such men as Montalembert and De Broglie; but it is very doubtful whether they are prepared for the rapidity of his later advance, and whether his free fraternization with Protestants here will not lessen his influence on his return home. He has, however, borne himself thus far with a great deal of dignity and discretion, and if he can keep off the platform till he gets away, will still retain a great deal of strength.

The agitation against free-trade got up by the body calling themselves "Revivers of British Industry" still continues in England, but their meetings are marked by a great deal of confusion and uproar, the audience being generally largely composed of obstreperous, noisy free-traders. The movement cannot be said to make any real progress, owing to the fact that nothing in the shape of proof has yet been produced in support of it. In fact, its sole basis is the prevalence of distress amongst the working classes, but great as this is, the free-traders have not had the least difficulty in showing that it was nearly twice as great in the years immediately preceding the abandonment of protection. There is no doubt that in many branches of industry the heavier orders are given to the Belgian and French markets, instead of the English, but the masters say that this is due entirely to their inability to count on their labor supply. What with strikes, trades unions, and other restrictions, manufacturers are either afraid to take large orders at all, or can only take them at prices which foreigners find no difficulty in going below. In fact, the salvation of British industry seems to depend on the possibility of discovering some more satisfactory mode of determining the rate of wages than the present one, or of including Continental and English workmen in the same unions, and thus putting all masters on the same level. But unless trades unions display more good sense than marks many of their performances now, the success of the latter plan would probably result in injuring Continental industry, without helping that of Great Britain.

The New York Tribune, four weeks ago (Oct. 11), published an "authoritative" statement "for the first time in America," that the French Emperor was afflicted with a painful disease of the bladder, and on one occasion, in order to get relief from the pain it caused him, had, without revealing his condition even to his medical advisers, secretly burnt his own back along the spine with a lighted candle. An "authoritative" statement on such a subject could of course hardly come from anybody but the Emperor himself, with whom the Tribune's correspondent is doubtless intimate, and we were doing our very best to believe it when our contemporary announced (Nov. 5) that the story had been "directly confirmed" by another story which had just appeared "in a Philadelphia paper," which had got it from a friend of Mr. George Wilkes, who got it in a private letter from Mr. Wilkes from Paris, who got it from a conversation with Dr. Brown-Séquard, who saw it in an article "in a Paris paper," supposed to have been written by a physician, "an able but dissolute man," formerly employed by the Emperor, but dismissed for his bad habits, and now engaged in earning an honest penny by publishing his professional secrets. An "authoritative" statement which can be "directly confirmed" in this way is certainly a very queer affair; but still, after reading this, nobody but a Paynim or atheist could any longer doubt, and we frankly accept the story about "the fungus of the bladder." But then what about the cauterization with the lighted candle? What does the dissolute physician say on this point? We long to believe this, too. Give us the bad man's exact words.

The interval between now and the 29th inst., the period fixed for the meeting of the Corps Législatif in France, will be passed as at present in speculations as to what additional reforms the Emperor will propose. The latest and most probable rumors represent his plans as containing nothing that the leaders consider to be of vital importance, omitting notably the abolition of Article 75 of the constitution, protecting Government functionaries from prosecution. In the meantime, M. Rouher, who is specially obnoxious to the Liberals, and whose overthrow was their greatest triumph, continues to hang about the palace, and many are haunted by the fear of his restoration. The appointment of Marshal Bazaine to the command of the Imperial Guard, too, has been looked on as a sign that the Government means mischief, Bazaine being passably ferocious, as his Mexican exploits testified; but it appears that he comes in in the regular way of promotion, standing next on the list to St. Jean d'Angely, who is very old and feeble, and retires. It is very improbable, indeed, that the Government will resort to violence unless in the last extremity. The Emperor's life is beyond doubt near its close, and the worst legacy he could leave his son and wife would be the memory of a second street butchery—always supposing that the troops could be got to use the Chassepot rifle on the people, which many who know the army deny. Rochefort has returned to Paris, the Emperor specially ordering him to be permitted to pass the frontier, and he is running for the Corps Législatif and receiving "ovations."

The way the newspapers are treating the Emperor is, in the meantime, brutal to the last degree. There has probably been nothing like it in the history of the press, and their comments on and accounts of his bodily infirmities have something Indian in their ferocious glee. The Réveil—the paper from which the Tribune, apparently without knowing it, got its "direct confirmation" of its "authoritative" statement—through Dr. Brown-Séquard, George Wilkes, a friend of George Wilkes, and a Philadelphia paper, about the Emperor's case—has been publishing some articles on the disease from a "Dr. X.," and dwells with apparent delight on the fact that according to the doctor the disease is the same as that of which Sainte-Beuve has just died. Twenty years ago this sort of thing could not have gone on so long without "a descent into the streets," to use the revolutionary lingo; but there appears no danger of that now. Universal suffrage seems to act as a kind of safety-valve, and then the leaders, and indeed all classes, have made, even under the empire, great advances in political intelligence. Probably, also, the greatly increased means of destruction now at the disposal of the Government exercise a steadying influence on Republican politicians.

The news of Victor Emanuel's dangerous condition is leading people to look for a new crisis in Italian affairs. The French Government is said to be apprehensive of a Mazzinist insurrection. The king's disappearance from the scene, however, would hardly produce much effect on politics. He is not in the least a politician, and the kind of esteem he has enjoyed as a loyal plucky fellow, of loose life, has not been of a kind to do much towards smoothing over sectional differences. The disorders in the finances still continue, partly owing to the complete financial incapacity of the Chambers, and to the total failure of Southern Italy to pay taxes. In addition to this the Piedmontese party, which was always opposed to the annexation of the little kingdom to Italy, is rendered fiercer in its discontent, not by the great increase of their burdens—for they do pay their taxes—but by the growing preponderance in affairs of the more volatile, lazy, and corrupt Neapolitans. But there is no likelihood of things being made worse than they are by Victor Emanuel's death. There is some chance of their being made better. According to the latest accounts, however, he is out of danger, which as regards the Œcumenical Council is unfortunate, as his death just before its meeting would have been singularly apropos, as an apparent fulfilment of the clerical predictions so often made, that he and the like of him would, for their sins against the Pope, come to a bad end.

OUR GREAT CITIES.

The restoration of the Democratic party to power in this State, for the first time in fifteen years; the failure, owing to the indifference and hostility of the country voters, and the cheating of New York politicians, of the attempt to reform the judiciary by the adoption of the judiciary article of the new constitution, to say nothing of the constitution itself; the strong prospect which the Democratic triumph opens up of the abolition of the State Commissions by which the Republican party has tried to provide for the good government of this city, or at least to mitigate the evils of the government provided for it by its own people, have set people thinking once more seriously on the "great city" question. Their interest in it, too, has been quickened by the recent revelations of the state of corruption into which municipal affairs have fallen in San Francisco, in Chicago, though Chicago is only a bantling compared to New York, and also in Philadelphia, though Philadelphia is not, as New York is, the receptacle for the dregs of the European immigration, and by the reflection, which every thinking man now makes, that should our material progress continue at the present rate, we shall in twenty years have ten times as many great cities as we have now, and the largest will be twice or three times as large as any we have now. The tendencies of trade and industry are all in that direction, and the drift of population to "great centres" is stimulated to the highest point by our modes of education. The common schools, the periodical literature, the pulpits, the free libraries, the diffusion of artistic taste, the railroads, the telegraphs, every invention which, by relieving people from the smaller and coarser cares, gives free play to their intellectual faculties, help to make the solitude of the country or the monotony of village life more and more repulsive.

For these and other reasons, we look on the attempts that one constantly meets with in the press to treat New York as something exceptional, which the rest of the country can afford to look on and laugh at, and which the State may, if the worst comes to the worst, cut off altogether, and leave to take care of itself, as based on a most extraordinary and mischievous delusion. The government of New York presents no difficulty which that of Boston and Philadelphia and Pittsburg and Buffalo and Chicago and St. Louis, and dozens of other great cities, the foundations of which are perhaps not yet laid, will not present within the lifetime of children already born. Moreover, there is no use in maundering about the effects of foreign immigration, or about the inattention of rich men to politics, or about the unhealthy craving of farmers' sons for the excitement of city life. The politician's concern is not with "what might have been," but what is. The actual facts of society form the elements of the problem he has to solve. Had the United States admitted no immigrants, its politics would doubtless have been purer than they are, but its population would only be a third of what it now is, its wealth less than a third, and its weight in the world would hardly have been perceptible, and some of the brightest names on its roll of worthies would be wanting. Who is there who is ready to say that he would, had he now the choice, surrender the greatness of the country in return for an obscure tranquillity? It would profit us little to have a boundless area of fertile land if we had no men to till it; to have rich mines, if we had no men to work them; to have great ideas, if we had not the material force necessary to carry them out. At any rate, there is now no choice left. America as it is, and is likely to be, and not America as it would have been if everything had been done differently, and each generation had known what was going to happen in the next, is what American citizens have to occupy themselves with at present.

To say, as many people say, therefore, that the democratic system of government contains no provision for the government of large cities, is—like saying that it cannot be carried on without rotation in office—tantamount to an admission that it is a total failure. No system of government is successful which is incompetent to deal with all the exigencies of the country or state of society in which it exists. A government in this age, and in this country, can no more confine itself to the charge of country districts, and decline all responsibility for cities, than it can declare that it exists only for the benefit of married couples, and refuse to provide protection for bachelors and single women. The influence of cities is now almost all-pervading. They draw to them the most energetic and enterprising of the population, the greatest talent as well as the greatest wealth, the soberest and steadiest and most intelligent, as well as the most ignorant and vicious. City ideas and city standards of morality spread through the country as surely, though perhaps not as rapidly, as city fashions in dress. The closeness with which farmers' daughters now copy the cut of city women's clothes is but one symptom of the process of moral and intellectual assimilation which is going on, and which is rapidly transforming vast tracts of our territory into mere suburbs of great towns. The condition of the judiciary in this State is a striking illustration of the fallacy of the notion that a real line of demarcation can be kept up very long between city and State morals and politics. There are just as bad judges on the country as on the city bench, and the sole reason, in our opinion, why there are not more of them bad is that they are not as yet exposed to the same temptations as their city brethren. Whenever city gamblers find it desirable to "own" country judges, they will certainly find no more difficulty in doing so than they now find in buying up country legislators. There is an idea now running through some men's minds, that if New York city and the river counties were only cut off, and made into a separate State, the rest of New York would live ever after in Arcadian purity and simplicity, as if no large cities were growing up in Western New York, or as if its Legislature would never have any charters to grant, or fat offices to distribute, or money to vote; as if Rochester and Syracuse and Buffalo would not in a very few years present the same phenomena as New York does now; or as if the Fisks and Goulds never crossed State lines, and were strictly domestic in their corruption.

Some persons get rid of all anxiety about the city question by cherishing the belief, for which there is not a particle of foundation, that things must sink to some undefined condition which they call the "lowest point" before there can be any improvement, and that, once there, a sudden change for the better will take place, and up we shall go as surely as we came down. Now, this is an almost childish hallucination. Sudden changes in great communities mean revolution, and we have no materials whatever for a revolution. There is about as much chance of our escaping from popular government in the broadest sense of the word, as of our retarding the roll of the seasons. The whole tendency of modern society is towards democracy. Not only is there no longer any hope for kings and aristocracies, but the very stuff out of which they were made—the loyalty, the reverence for birth and for rank, the inequality of conditions and of intellectual powers and attainments—is disappearing from the face of the earth. It is not rash to say that during the next thousand years the people, somehow or other, will govern. We have not among us, and very soon no European nation will have in it, even the makings of a Cæsar of the ordinary brute kind. The elements of a Cæsar—the standing army, the spirit of "militarism," the centralization, the general abstinence of the masses from participation in public life, the general want of political training—are unknown here. They will soon be unknown everywhere. What awaits the world is not a return to despotism or oligarchy, but democracy—good, or bad, or indifferent, orderly, educated, moral, and religious, or turbulent, ignorant, vicious, and materialistic. We shall have no sudden turns in our career; nothing extraordinary is going to happen us. We need look for no "saviour" of society or great political revivals. We shall not wake up some fine morning and find the knaves all hanging to lamp-posts, and the honest men filling their places, under the eyes of a grateful people—pure women infusing mercy into justice, and righteousness into politics—sages in all our council-boards, and saints swarming in our markets. That is not the way the world improves. "The shining table-lands" are only reached by constant "toil of heart and knees and hands."

The moral of all this is, of course, that while everything is done that can be done to improve the popular will, which must be, as it is now, the governing power in the last resort—and it certainly cannot be said that the existing agencies for this object are either few or inefficient—the teachings of reason and experience must be followed more and more in the work of administration. No matter how good legislation may be, the affairs of a great people cannot be successfully conducted with defective administrative machinery, and it would be difficult to exaggerate the defects of that with which we are entering on what we may call the great-city era of modern civilization. In the first place, it is folly to suppose that the evils, which as long as human nature is what it is, must always abound where population is densely massed on small areas, can be met by an elected magistracy, holding office for short terms. This is now admitted by all sensible men, and the refusal of the country districts to make any change because their elected judges are thus far satisfactory, is, if what we have been saying as to the present and future relations of city and country be anywhere near the truth, a singular piece of shortsightedness. Corrupt and dependent judges, and corrupt and dependent police magistrates, sooner or later make to crumble the very bases on which civil society rests. There is probably nothing which does more to shake the faith of the young and the ignorant, both in man and God—for few people believe in God very long after having ceased to believe in man. Judge Barrett, in the excellent paper which he read before the Social Science Association last week, on the administration of criminal justice in this city, put down the elective judiciary as the source of all its defects, and admitted that as long as this defect was untouched, the discussion of others was well-nigh useless.

In the second place, as long as we, by our system of filling places in the public service, offer a premium to all the rogues and adventurers of the country to engage in politics as a trade, as long as we supply public men with the means of hiring the services of such, and at the same time make their services essential for entry into public life, no improvement in the moral or intellectual culture of the community at large will make itself felt in our politics. The government will never reflect the people as long as the caucus stands between them and is armed with the power it now possesses. Not that there must not always be caucuses; but caucuses must not be allowed, like the Prætorian Guard at Rome, to put all the honors and places of trust of a great nation up to auction every two or four years, and make the very jails, what the jails of this State now are, the prey of men who, if justice were done, would take their places among the unhappy criminals whom they maltreat and corrupt.

THE EUROPEAN RADICALS.

In spite of the immense strides toward popular government which Europe has made during the last ten years, and the general admission of the Conservatives that the cause of privilege is hopelessly lost, liberalism can hardly be said to be in a satisfactory condition, owing to irreconcilable differences of opinion which begin to show themselves in its own ranks. As against despotism, or oligarchy, or religious intolerance, or political inequality, the liberals have been and would always be a very united body; but whenever they gain a decided advantage over the enemy, and the question what should be the next move comes up for discussion, dissensions are apt to break out. Signs of these dissensions, if not the dissensions themselves, already appear in England, France, and Spain, the three countries in which democracy has of late achieved the greatest successes. The Conservative party in England is already discussing seriously whether its very best course now will not be to give up deliberately, for a long period, all hope of regaining office, and sit down simply as an opposition, like the Whigs during the close of the last and the early part of the present century, and wait for the dissolution of the radical hosts, under Gladstone's lead, in its attempts to deal with the numerous and momentous problems which the late Reform vote and the abolition of the Irish Church have brought up for solution, and solution, too, which will not admit of postponement. An article advocating this plan of action, or rather of inaction, has appeared in the Quarterly Review, and is ascribed to Lord Salisbury, by far the ablest member of the party, whom an untimely fate has carried off to the House of Lords, just as the Commons were becoming sensible of his intellectual weight and brilliancy. The anticipation of the reviewer clearly is, either that the Liberals will break up before they get half through with the reforms now pressing on them, or that, if they succeed in making them, the country will be so sick of reformers and their ways by the time they are done that it will eagerly seek rest and tranquillity in the Conservative bosom.

It is impossible to deny that there is a great deal of shrewdness in this programme, or that he would not be a bold man who should predict that the motley army which now serves under Gladstone's banners can be held together long enough to make any final disposition of the land question, the Church question, the education question, and the army question.

Crossing over to France, we find the political situation in a more advanced stage, but one very similar in kind. What in a military sense may be called the élite of the radical party there, that is, the portion of it which is most restless, most excited, evinces most determination, and therefore holds, and naturally holds, the post of honor in the present struggle with the empire, is separated by a wide gulf from the moderates on the question of what ought to succeed the empire, or, in other words, cherishes an entirely different political ideal from the moderates, and in this ideal, we need hardly say, compromise of any kind with the existing order of things holds no place. Accordingly, the willingness evinced by the liberal deputies who signed the late address to the nation, discountenancing the idea of risking a physical collision with the Government by convening the Corps Législatif on the 26th of October, and indicating their confidence in the results of regular parliamentary warfare, has disgusted and exasperated the radical wing to such a degree that they have hustled, threatened, and refused to hear such men as Pelletan and Bancel at a public meeting, and summoned Jules Favre to undergo a sort of trial before a revolutionary committee—a humiliation to which, however, M. Favre declined to subject himself. They will not hear of the conversion of the empire into a constitutional monarchy, or of the substitution of another dynasty for the present one, or of any arrangement looking to the preservation of the present social order—the régime of inviolable property and of competition. Their dream of the future was shadowed forth, somewhat vaguely it is true, by Victor Hugo at the late Peace Conference at Lausanne, and though they all look to the approaching reign of perpetual peace, they agree with him in thinking that it will have to be inaugurated by an unusually bloody war, and do not trouble themselves with the keen question which M. de Mazade asks M. Hugo in the last number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, how he proposes to root out the hate and bitterness which this great war of pacification must necessarily leave behind in the hearts of the vanquished, because, if we have war, we must have vanquished as well as victors. We thus seem to have reached a point in French politics, also, at which the empire might, it would seem, by a policy of even moderate dexterity, divide the liberals into two warring camps, and draw to itself a goodly number of deserters from among the timid.

In Spain, the republicans, who are the equivalent of the French "Reds," have shown an extraordinary want of political ability, and have not only failed to take advantage of the tremendous mistakes of their opponents, but have committed mistakes of their own which are twice as great, if that be possible. Up to the meeting of the Constituent Cortes, they may be said to have had everything their own way, and held the winning cards. They got the question of the future form of government referred to an assembly chosen by universal suffrage, instead of being decided, as might readily have been the case, and as would only have accorded too well with recent Spanish usage, by the knots of military malcontents who drove out Isabella. They got themselves splendidly represented in the Cortes, the ablest orators being in their ranks. The constitution which was drawn up contained nearly all the cardinal doctrines of their political creed. It declared the form of government to be monarchical, it is true; but the long delay in finding a king made it certain that the king, when found, would be but a king in name; that the government would be a republic in all but the name; and that a little patience might even bring the name as well as reality. Just as the monarchists, however, were reaching the last degree of embarrassment, the republicans proceeded to help them out of their difficulties by a series of unconnected risings in the various large towns, not one of which was serious enough to give the troops much trouble, but all of which together have alarmed and disgusted business men and property owners generally, and roused once more that love of peace and quiet at any cost which has in all ages proved the best friend of monarchies and the worst foe of republics.

The state of things in the three countries is in fact fresh illustration of the correctness of the conclusion we have more than once ventured to put forth, that the general reform movement which has been going on in the western world ever since the French Revolution, is reaching the last limits of what may be called the political stage, and that the leaders in it are now engaged in deciding whether they will break completely with the past of the human race and attempt a reorganization of society on a new theoretic basis, or be content to let the individual work out his destiny under political equality, existing social traditions, and free competition. The value of the institutions of property and of marriage, the propriety of giving legal play to differences of capacity and temperament, are slowly but surely coming under question, and as they make their appearance in the arena, the historic reformers, as we may call the moderates, who will not advance without feeling the past under their feet, and who believe that human nature is stronger than constitutions or laws, begin to hesitate. The latter have, it must be admitted, the great body of the community at their back, and however much they may be worsted in the forum, find at the fireside abundant consolation for their defeats. The left wing of the radicals, who are mostly enthusiasts and speculators and men of the cities, always underestimate the vis inertiæ of the established order of things—the tenacity with which the body of every people cling to their old ways, and prejudices, and traditions, and the immeasurable gulf which separates the reformatory convention from the average householder, when it comes to the discussion of the distribution or accumulation of property, or the relations between husband and wife or parents and children. When the French "Red," for instance, talks of a redistribution of landed property on principles of pure justice, he takes no count of the four millions of French proprietors who are not only not open to conviction on this or any cognate subject, but would probably resist any interference with their rights—as they now exist—as long as there was a man amongst them able to shoulder a musket.

We may say, by way of summing up, that as long as reformers were occupied with political questions, they were on debatable ground, which has been fought over, in every age, with varying fortune by the two great parties which have existed in every political community since government began—the party of rest, and the party of advance—and one which men expect to fight, and expect to be beaten on occasionally. But in attempting to touch social questions with the finger of the law, they venture on ground which has hitherto been held sacred, and accordingly find arrayed in defence of it passions which neither political nor even religious controversies have ever been able to call forth, for they touch the home, perhaps the tenderest spot in man's moral constitution. "Pro aris et focis" was one of the earliest and most potent of battle-cries, even when all that those who used it had to fear was the temporary desolation of their hearths. Altars are no longer objects either of vigorous attack or of vigorous defence; but threaten men, however remotely, with the total abolition of the hearth as an institution, and they will find themselves face to face with an enemy whose very mercies are cruel.

SELF-MADE MEN AS PUBLIC BENEFACTORS.

The death of George Peabody takes from the world the most munificent benefactor it has ever known. For although other men have lived who have been perhaps as liberal with the goods with which fortune has provided them, still their fame has generally been confined to some corner of the earth, and never been spread abroad over its whole surface. But of Mr. Peabody it may certainly be said that no civilized country is unacquainted with his name—that his virtues have been sung in every quarter of the habitable globe. The fame which in other days was the reward of despoilers, conquerors, and devastators, of men who made it the business of their lives to overrun the earth with fire and slaughter, has in our time been reserved for one whose highest aim in life was to give where others had robbed, to heal where others had wounded, to restore what others had laid waste. Nor is it at all likely that Mr. Peabody's example will remain uncopied. The vast accumulations of property in the hands of individuals for which the present age is becoming famous, certainly afford, and are almost as certain to suggest, the opportunity of munificence to their possessors. Indeed, with the shining instances before us of Cornell, in this State, of Street, the founder of the New Haven School of Art, of Sheffield, the founder of the Scientific School, who can doubt that munificence has a fairer future to look forward to? Perhaps we are really coming upon that period of the world which has been so long sighed for, in which wealth shall be regarded by the wealthy simply as a means of beautifying and benefiting the earth and mankind—a reproduction of that earlier age when Roman Civilization, joining hand with Grecian Art, made the world that garden of delight which has been the envy and despair of after generations. To be sure, the picture, like all pictures, has another side. The spectacle of the careers of Fisk and Vanderbilt and Drew does not fill the mind with ecstatic visions of the future. But so long as men continue to make a distinction between their property and that of such men as Peabody and Cornell, so long there is hope that vulgar selfishness will not triumph completely over philanthropic generosity.

If for the next century or two the American people is to be greatly enriched, as seems more than probable, by the benefactions of self-made men, it is of the utmost importance that there should be some general agreement as to what sort of benefits it desires from them, and what it does not. If the Peabodys and Cornells of the future are to endow our schools and colleges, build our galleries and museums, in short, foster art and literature, it is of no little consequence that these self-made men should have some general conception of the actual need which their generosity is to supply. In the very nature of things, it is almost impossible for them to find out for themselves; for, being self-made, and having on that account very little connection with either the literary or the artistic world, the moment they make an attempt to endow a college, to establish a professorship, or to found a school, they find themselves completely at sea. They know, in the first place, very little of what has already been done, and next to nothing of what is wanted. The result is, in some cases, the establishment of an institution with a foundation quite insufficient for its necessities, which drags on a galvanized life, while preventing by its unnecessary existence the proper application of the funds on which it feeds; in others, the needless assistance of some old department, which, already vigorous in full action, could well dispense with the benefactor's bounty; in others, such minute designation of the channels in which the donor's munificence is to flow as to make the gift almost worthless.

One of the most striking instances of ill-advised endowments has been furnished by Mr. Peabody himself. If there is any department of education which might be safely let alone by benefactors, it is that of popular education; for it is a department whose importance is already recognized by every one—by every State, town, and county; by every lyceum orator, by every stump speaker, by every candidate for every office in the country. The "School System" of the United States is a system upon which more eulogiums have been showered than upon any institution—unless it be the suffrage—which we possess. There is small danger, then, that its shadow will ever diminish. Mr. Peabody might have rested assured that the Southern States would build up a school system for themselves, by taxation, just as the Northern States have, in time, without extraneous help. There is nothing for which taxes are more readily paid. And this will be so just as long as we have popular government, and just as long as it is generally understood that the main safeguard of such government is popular education. There is no need for individuals to assist in building an edifice which a whole nation is already lavishing its resources upon. And it is to be remembered too, though this is a secondary consideration, that Mr. Peabody's gift was unfortunate in another way—that of filling people with the delusive idea that the whole work had been done, while in reality his two millions were a mere drop in the bucket. The interest on this sum is but $140,000, an amount which will hardly supply with proper teachers and schools a large Southern city like Savannah or Charleston. But people look at the capital, and forget the narrowness of the income. They see that two millions have been given, and think the whole work has been done. No doubt Mr. Peabody's munificence has seriously impaired whatever nascent disposition towards self-support existed in the South before.

The same thing is to be said of the endowments of churches, which are such favorites with the philanthropic rich. Certainly if there is anything in the world which ought to be supported in a popular way, it is churches. They, like the common schools, have popular bodies interested in their support, and these bodies have, or ought to have, the welfare of their sect sufficiently at heart to pour out their abundance for it. If they have not—if they must apply to individuals for necessary support, then they have no raison d'être; from that moment they should cease to exist. Yet there is nothing more common than for self-made men to suppose that the best thing they can do for the world is to do the work which it is pre-eminently the work of congregations to perform. It is no uncommon thing to see a church whose congregation is too lazy to raise a salary fit to support a minister, richly endowed by some affectionate son of the church with money for an organ or a belfry, or some such equally unnecessary addition. Of course religious considerations of a personal nature sometimes enter into the motives which prompt these donations, and these considerations are of a kind which no argument could affect. Still we imagine that in any given instance of sectarian endowment, most members, if not of the sect endowed, at least of all the rest, will agree that the gift was not required, and should have been postponed until satisfactory evidence was furnished that the congregation was doing its duty in more elementary particulars.

There is, however, a department of education quite as important as the instruction afforded by the common schools and the churches—the higher education furnished by universities. For these very little popular aid is to be expected, or indeed desired. The people will never consent to a general tax for the purpose of instructing a small number of men in Yale or Harvard or the University of Michigan. It may be that, now and then, some very widely-known and popular professor will obtain a donation from a generous or careless legislature, as Agassiz did the other day from the Legislature of Massachusetts. But such things are not likely to happen often. And it would be a dangerous precedent for the universities as well as for the people. Once establish the custom, and the inevitable result would be that the people would demand some share in the government of the colleges, and thence would, in due course of time, spring a degradation of the university standard in order to meet popular demands. In a little while we should see the universities lowering themselves to the level of schools, in order that they might reap the same pecuniary benefit. For these reasons, we are very unlikely to see the day when the higher institutions of learning will have much popular support. The support they are to receive must come from individuals; by rich and benevolent men must our schools of art and science, our colleges and our universities, be built; as yet we are lamentably deficient in them. We have already referred to the noble examples of Street and Sheffield; but there must be thousands of Streets and Sheffields before we reach the point at which we can effectively compete with older countries.

The want of accurate knowledge on the part of benefactors is one of the most serious difficulties with which our universities have to contend. There is a popular impression, for example, that our best colleges, Yale and Harvard, are already so rich that a man can give to almost any object he pleases without doing harm. The impression is a most mistaken one, as those most intimately conversant with the affairs of the colleges we have named could testify. Harvard is supposed to be rolling in riches; yet within a year, a general subscription fund has been started by the alumni, with the intention of raising half a million dollars, not to build an ornamental fence, nor to gild the lightning-rod on the college buildings, nor to found a museum of palæontology, but to carry on the general business of the college, for the salaries of the professors and tutors, to buy books, to pay for necessary repairs. A professor in Harvard College has three-fifths the salary of a Massachusetts Justice of the Supreme Court, and within a year one of those justices has resigned on account of insufficient salary. Yale is still worse off. It must be evident from this that those who wish to benefit these institutions of learning ought to make a few enquiries before they begin. The natural desire of all men to connect their names with whatever they do causes most of the men who give to colleges to make special restriction of the applications of their funds, so that with the gift may be bound up their fame for all coming ages In this way arise multitudes of Jones, Brown, and Robinson professorships of every imaginable description, more than half of them ill supplied with funds and eking out a miserable existence as best they may. For instance, Mr. Jones, having fifty thousand dollars to give away, gives it to the college which educated him, on condition that she shall apply the fund to the establishment of the Jones professorship of natural history. The fifty thousand dollars will just support a professor, without supplying either a museum or specimens. So the professor borrows a room, and gets along as well as he can without any of the necessary implements of his profession. Next year comes along Brown; and, having another fifty thousand to give, establishes the Brown professorship of chemistry. And so in time we have the Robinson professorship of mineralogy. Here we have three professors established, without sufficient salary, forced to teach important branches of science without any of the appliances absolutely necessary for the purpose.

This is merely an example of the condition of half the colleges in the United States, and comes from the natural desire of man to connect his name with whatever he does, combined with the densest ignorance of what is really wanted. The remark of Mr. Eliot on this subject in his recent admirable inaugural address at Harvard applies to one college almost as well as to another. "The Corporation thankfully receive all gifts which may advance learning; but they believe that the interests of the university may be most effectually promoted by not restricting too narrowly the use to which a gift may be applied. Whenever the giver desires it, the Corporation will agree to keep any fund separately invested under the name of the giver, and to apply the whole proceeds of such investment to any object the giver may designate. By such special investment, however, the insurance which results from the absorption of a specific gift in the general funds is lost. A fund invested by itself may be impaired or lost by a single error of judgment in investing. The chance of such loss is small in any one generation, but appreciable in centuries. Such general designations as salaries, books, dormitories, public buildings, scholarships, graduate or undergraduate, scientific collections, and expenses of experimental laboratories, are of permanent significance and effect, while experience proves that too specific and minute directions concerning the application of funds must often fail of fulfilment, simply in consequence of the changing needs and habits of successive generations." To this advice might be added, for the benefit of intending benefactors, three short directions: 1st, Recollect that you yourself probably know little about the subject; 2d, Recollect that there are those who know all; 3d, Consult them.

A CONTRAST WORTH NOTICE.

"The banks quote money excessively stringent. Not only have they literally no surplus loanable funds, but many of them will be under the necessity of calling in their demand loans. . . . The low price of grain has brought the grain movement to a comparative stand, and all kinds of business are overcome by a stagnation which it is impossible to shake off" (Chicago Times, November 3).

"The city banks report that the pressure for discounts at the present time is without parallel since the organization of the banks" (New York Evening Post, November 6).

"The banks report a pressure from their mercantile customers exceeding anything experienced since 1860. They are unable to more than half supply the demand of the West for currency to move the crops. . . . The position of the mercantile interest of this city is assuming a critical aspect; and with it is involved the commercial interest of a large portion of the country" (New York Commercial Advertiser, November 6).

"The grain market was seriously depressed to-day by large receipts and pressure to sell" (Financial Chronicle, November 5).

"At this moment, but one new vessel is on the stocks in our great ship-yards. Six years ago, during this same month of September, thirty-two large ships were building in New York and Brooklyn" (New York Times, September 25).

"The price of wheat in Cincinnati is below the price of any time in twenty years" ("Veteran Observer" in New York Times).

"Acres of berries are kept unpicked, wagon-loads of the finest melons are left in the field or fed to cattle; apples, tomatoes, and other articles of the crop are left ungathered, because it does not pay" (New York Tribune, September 3).

"Two weeks ago, potatoes of the finest quality sold in Davenport at twenty-five cents per bushel. Considerable complaint is heard on all sides of dull times. Farmers are holding back large quantities of grain in hopes of better prices. Rents are considerably lower than last year" (Chicago Correspondence New York Evening Post, November 4).

"Potatoes are unusually abundant, and will not admit of transportation to market at present or prospective prices" (Cincinnati Price Current, November 1.)

"The ease in call loans at five to six per cent. continues unchanged. The stock market is strong, with a generally buoyant feeling. All prices are higher" (All the daily papers).

"According to the consolidation between New York Central and Hudson River, the stockholders of Central are to receive upon every one hundred shares of stock one hundred shares of consolidated stock, one hundred and seven shares of consolidated scrip, and $1 80 per share in cash. The stockholders in Hudson River receive one hundred shares of consolidated stock and eighty-five shares of consolidated scrip" (Financial Chronicle, November 6).

"Unveiling of the Vanderbilt Bronze, Tuesday, November 9. Programme of arrangements. List of the financial, commercial, legal, municipal, military, and civic dignitaries that will attend the ceremony, etc., etc., etc." (Half-column advertisement in all the daily papers).

"James Fisk, jr. What became of a Vermont peddler. Profitable combination of cotton, army contracts, gold and railroad stocks, etc., etc. . . . . His future career will be watched with interest by the whole American people, and whether his life be spared for a longer or shorter period, he can make his exit from the world with the proud satisfaction of having once made considerable stir in it" (First and last words of a four-column biography in the New York Herald, November 7).

It seems scarcely possible to add to the force of these simple statements in their naked contrast. Commerce in a critical condition, our mercantile marine decayed, money unobtainable to move the crops; but money is easy on call loans, and stocks are buoyant. Crops rotting in the field because they do not pay to bring to market, potatoes fed to hogs because they will not pay for transportation, business everywhere dull; but stocks are higher. Two hundred shares of consolidated stock, one hundred and ninety-two shares of consolidated scrip; and $1 80 in cash. And out of this solid foundation of ruined commerce and rotting crops, and "$1 80 in cash," rise the twin columns of biography: Vanderbilt in bronze, Fisk in type-metal. It is a picture of the times.

We do not intend to insult Mr. Vanderbilt by coupling him with Fisk, jr. There is enough contrast even as they stand grouped to do justice to both. The solidity of Mr. Vanderbilt's wealth is well represented by enduring bronze. Mr. Fisk's fortunes are typified in the Herald eulogy. But though unlike, they cannot stand apart. They are both creatures of the same circumstances, both products of the same soil. The sturdy yellow pine and the poisonous creeper both find their foothold in the same morass, both thrive by killing whatever grows near them. But without the morass both are impossible. Out of the morass of reckless extravagance, of paper money and national debt, of public and private corruption, have grown these twin colossi of wealth and power, who own millions of money, hundreds of miles of railroad, several legislatures, governors, and city administrations, numerous judges, sheriffs, and other paraphernalia to impress awe upon the unwary, and who dispose with more than imperial despotism of the lives, liberties, and property of a large portion of their fellow-citizens.

THE NEW RÉGIME AT HARVARD.

It has been so generally believed that Mr. Eliot's election to the Presidency of Harvard was—owing to his youth, his scientific tastes and training, and the avowed novelty of many of his views on education—a sign that the long-threatened revolution in university training had begun, that his inaugural address was looked for with a good deal of interest and even anxiety. It has now been issued in a pamphlet form, and we advise anybody who wants to inform himself as to what the new spirit which is taking possession of our colleges is, or at least ought to be, to get it and read it. It will probably disappoint a good many people, and notably those who expected to find in the author a "fine young radical," armed with a pickaxe and crow-bar, and rendered furious by the sight of anything standing upright, or growing, and whose idea of a university is an establishment like the fair of the American Institute, with a few halls attached for perpetual lyceum lectures open to both sexes. Mr. Eliot's notion of the functions of a university is substantially that expressed by Mr. John Stuart Mill, in his celebrated attack on Professor Sedgwick, and he consequently denies that the endless controversies "whether general education should be chiefly literary or chiefly scientific have any practical lesson for us to-day." "This university," he says, "recognizes no real antagonism between literature and science, and consents to no such narrow alternatives as mathematics or classics, science or metaphysics. We would have them all, and at their best. To observe keenly, to reason soundly, and to imagine vividly, are operations as essential as that of clear and forcible expression; and to develop one of these faculties, it is not necessary to repress and dwarf the others. A university is not closely concerned with the applications of knowledge until its general education branches into professional. Poetry and philosophy and science do indeed conspire to promote the material welfare of mankind, but science no more than poetry finds its best warrant in its utility. Truth and right are above utility in all realms of thought and action." The failure of universities to meet the requirements of the time is to be met, he thinks, not by giving any one branch a decided predominance, but by improving the methods of instruction, which—and in this men of all parties will heartily agree with him—are in a lamentably low state: witness, in the literary course, the almost total neglect of the English language, and the crass persistence with which the ancient languages and literature are forced upon boys who are all the while left almost completely ignorant of the history, life, and manners of the people who produced these languages and literature; witness, too, in the scientific courses, the reliance on books apart from actual experiment and observation. "The prevailing methods of teaching science indeed," Mr. Eliot says—and haud inexpertus loquitur—"the world over, are on the whole less intelligent than the methods of teaching language." He proclaims boldly, too, that the end of scientific teaching is not so much to load young brains with "facts"—which in nine cases out of ten, even if the student retains them, serve no purpose beyond making him an unmitigated bore, and giving him a false conceit of his place in the world—as "to develop and discipline those powers of mind by which science has been created and is daily nourished, the powers of observation, the inductive faculty, the sober imagination, the sincere and proportionate judgment."

There is, however, nothing more valuable and more significant in the address than a protest it contains against dogmatic teaching of philosophical subjects. "They are not established sciences; they are full of disputed matters, and open questions, and bottomless speculations. Exposition, not imposition, is the professor's part"—in other words, his business is not to tell the student what to think, but to furnish him with the materials of thought. "The worthy fruit of academic culture is an open mind, trained to careful thinking." Hitherto, the custom of American and English universities has been to teach philosophy very much as mathematics is taught, and hand the conclusions of a school, or it may be a small school, to the student with as much solemnity, and as much contempt for doubt, as the multiplication table or the rule of three. The venerable Dr. Spring of this city was, in his hot youth, we believe, tried before an ecclesiastical court for entertaining certain doctrines on the subject of "human ability" which we believe—though we speak with proper lay diffidence—the whole Presbyterian Church now either holds or permits. In his defence he stated his views, which, however, appeared so outrageously absurd to one member of the court, that he declared with a scornful laugh that what the culprit needed was to have his head put under a pump. Much of our teaching of the various philosophies to young men is now done in the spirit of this doubtless learned but somewhat prejudiced divine.

In pleading for variety in the university curriculum, for the supply of facilities to the student of choosing the teachers and subjects which experience has shown are best adapted to his special powers and intellectual needs, President Eliot strongly denounces the uniformity in instruction which is still too prevalent among American colleges, and says that "the civilization of a people may be inferred from the variety of its tools. As tools multiply, each is more ingeniously adapted to its own exclusive purpose. So with the men that make the state. For the individual, concentration and the highest development of his own peculiar faculty, is the only prudence. For the state, it is variety, not uniformity of intellectual product, which is needful." And àpropos of this, he makes some other remarks, to which we request our old friends, the War-Horses, now grazing in their home pastures, to listen with cocked ears and extended tails:

"As a people, we do not apply to mental activities the principle of division of labor; and we have but a halting faith in special training for high professional employments. The vulgar conceit that a Yankee can turn his hand to anything we insensibly carry into high places, where it is preposterous and criminal. We are accustomed to seeing men leap from farm and shop to court-room or pulpit, and we half believe that common men can safely use the seven-league boots of genius. What amount of knowledge and experience do we habitually demand of our lawgivers? What special training do we ordinarily think necessary for our diplomatists? In great emergencies, indeed, the nation has known where to turn. Only after years of bitter experience did we come to believe the value of the professional training of a soldier to be of value in war. This lack of faith in the prophecy of a national bent, and in the value of a discipline concentrated on a single object, amounts to a national danger."

We are only attempting here, by noticing a few of the principal points, to indicate the general drift of a discourse which everybody will find worthy of thoughtful perusal. Amongst its merits is its style, which, barring a slight abruptness, sometimes running into jerkiness, is one which students might well take for a model, and through the whole there runs the glow of an enthusiasm for culture in its highest sense, which warrants the hope of great things, not at Harvard only, but in the other universities of the country; for it is an enthusiasm which is sure to spread, and has already taken possession of a large number of the younger professors, and on the maintenance and diffusion of which we verily believe some of the highest interests of civilization depend for their safety, in the period of confusion and uncertainty through which the moral and intellectual man is now passing.

FRANCE.—THE EMPEROR'S SUCCESSORS.

PARIS, October 15, 1869.

IT seems astonishing to note how very little foreigners—even those who live in France—observe the enormous changes that are every day taking place in this country. If these modifications are to go on during the next ten years as they have been doing for the last ten, there will be not a type of the genuine Frenchman (as he used to be) extant in 1880. The women change less rapidly; but they will follow, and the boys of fifteen of to-day, when at five-and-twenty, will hardly take for wives the daughters of the cocodettes of our time, unless they have completely changed the manner of their ways. It need scarcely be remarked that the population of France has been pretty thoroughly Anglicized; and not the least curious part of the history is, that it has been mainly the work of Louis Napoleon personally. In order to escape from the exigencies of French (purely French) traditions, which must always have remained inimical to the Bonapartean establishment, the Emperor, by every means in his power, favored the introduction into this country of whatsoever was British, from habits, customs, and thought down to English nurses and big wash hand-basins. The consequence has been one he never expected, but which is easy to understand: the children who could barely speak plainly at the period of the coup d'état are young men now of twenty-four or five, who speak English more than they do French, and who have imbibed English notions of independence, political freedom, and political dignity.

With this generation Louis Napoleon must count, and he has much contributed to his own embarrassment. Besides, he all of a sudden finds himself between two hostile parties, which for a foreigner are well worth being studied: these two are the party of French tradition, and the party of English political ideas. The former, as I said, is entirely dying out; but it is not dead yet. There are thousands of men between the ages of thirty and fifty or fifty-five who still belong to it, and for the next ten years, if a chance were given to them, they would readily try their hands at the work of governing. The nineteen-twentieths of these, the followers of real French tradition, are naturally what are termed Royalists; they inhabit the provinces, and they retain vast influence still. The twentieth portion are Republicans, inhabit the great towns, and have very little influence indeed.

The so-called Royalists hold more or less to the Comte de Chambord, though they believe no longer in him; the party of English ideas are almost to a man Orleanists; though, as matters now stand, this term requires explanation. Five or six years ago, no party had fewer chances than the Orleanists. The ranks of the Opposition were filled by pure Royalists and pure Republicans, and it was by common consent agreed that Orleanism meant nothing at all, and could nevermore have a chance. But parliamentary eloquence rose again to honor, and, after the elections of 1863, the speeches of Thiers, Berryer, Favre, Simon, and others (and the fatal mistake of the Mexican expedition), gave a violent rebound to public opinion, and, through the passage of republican institutions, men began to see their way once more to constitutional monarchy. It is quite true what the Imperialist journalists have been saying all the time of the late elections, namely, that under the mantle of republicanism the two-thirds of the new deputies have meant the gradual but certain restoration of limited monarchy under a prince of the house of Orleans. This is quite true, and this is the peculiar form under which the larger number of Frenchmen now think they discern a safe, peaceful, honorable, and economical future for France. Many of the higher, nobler spirits in the nation (such as Edgar Quinet, for instance, and some few of his stamp) regard this as a deplorable error, and as the weakest of all backslidings, and (as did Lamartine in 1848) affirm that in a republic alone can there be any chance of morality and prosperity for a country which has now learnt such an incurable contempt for kings; but it is none the less certain that the larger part of the country would prefer a "quiet régime" less startling than the more timid affect to think a republic.

As it is probable that we are more nearly approaching the very eve of greater events in France than is generally supposed out of doors, it is perhaps not without interest to cast a glance over the individuals who may ere long play a prominent political part here. We will suppose what they call here "an incident"—there would be immediately in hostile juxtaposition the Empress and her son, and Prince Napoleon. Prince Napoleon is so very superior a man in every sense that it is quite possible he may inaugurate the republican régime in France, and many are they who believe that this would be the best of all possible solutions. But failing this, what then? People are beginning to say, The monarchy of the Orleans princes. Here again comes a question of the time—the moment of the change. If it comes (as seems most probable) within the next five years, there will be some trouble given by the Royalists, who would rather be associated with the determined Republicans than with the men of the July school. If the Comte de Chambord abdicates, well and good; then a very small remnant of men whose absence is better than their presence for any régime will sulk all alone in their country retirement; but if Henri V., as he will then be called, does not abdicate, strange as it may appear, there will be a considerable provincial force that will abstain from giving aid and support to the commonwealth.

Then again, in the Orleans family, who? For even with themselves it is an open question. If the right of legitimate succession were to be invoked, it would be the Comte de Paris of course; but in this case right is obsolete, and the question is one of expediency. If "right" were to be the guide, say the Royalists, our prince is indisputable; no one else has a right; but as right would be made inferior to expediency, any of the Orleans princes are equally eligible. Those who examine the matter impartially, opine either for the Duc d'Aumale or the Duc de Chartres, protesting that the Comte de Paris is not equal to the task that would be demanded of him. Then again, the Duc d'Aumale is chiefly a soldier, and France has absolutely nothing more to do with military men or military glory. The Duc d'Aumale is a very intelligent, sensible man, in the ripe prime of years and of health; but what is not military in him is literary, and I doubt whether the chronicler of the Condés would ever be brought to see that France has outlived all possibility of warlike achievements.

The Comte de Paris is what is commonly called an "excellent young man," but perhaps less thoroughly of his time than is supposed. He is, above all, as ill if not worse mated than the Emperor Napoleon; for his wife, in addition to being a Spaniard, with the narrow education and religious zeal of her nation, is a Bourbon, and might not be without an influence which the French have suffered too much from to bear it again. Of the Duc de Chartres much good is said on all sides, and in almost every sense.

Correspondence.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AND THE ANTI-SLAVERY MEN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: While well pleased with the article in the Nation of October 21 on the Anti-slavery Conflict, I wish to remark on one incidental sentence, and to do it in the interest of historical truth. I mean that one referring to the division of the Presbyterian Church in 1838—the only event to which in their connection the words of the writer of that article apply.

The allegation is that it was the slavery agitation which "rent asunder the great Presbyterian body." This is indeed the belief of many. Why it is so, I think can easily be explained on other ground than the truth of that which is the matter of belief. The following points will not be questioned by any who have given study to the case:

1. The division occurred (in 1838) before the agitation had assumed anything like its full proportions, and at the end of only the first decade of the labors of the Abolitionists. It was not till seven years later (in 1845) that it seemed necessary to the General Assembly of the Old School to give a new deliverance on the subject of slavery. That last preceding had been given in 1818.

2. In the discussions of the time within the Presbyterian Church, slavery does not appear as an alleged cause of difference. One who reads the doings and sayings in the church at that day does not find slavery entering, as beyond concealment and disguise it must have done had it been a great dividing cause. In the ecclesiastical acts relating to the division it is not mentioned.

3. The causes assigned for the division are sufficient and suitable. These are doctrinal differences, looseness in regard to governmental form, and differences of views as to the true mode of conducting church work. These causes had been existent and operative before—some of them long before—the slavery agitation arose.

4. The division was not upon the line where it should and would have been had slavery been the dividing cause. There was a New School party in the South which included some most ultra pro-slavery men. This continued to be an integral portion of the New School Church for twenty years after "the great Presbyterian body was rent asunder," ceasing to be so by secession, I think in 1857. And on the other side, there have always been some very decided anti-slavery men in the Old School Church.

Do not these things prove that it is not true in any proper sense that the slavery agitation "rent asunder the great Presbyterian body?" That, had there been no other causes preceding, slavery some years later would have effected a division, I believe and grant. This is shown by the fate of other bodies, and by the courses with reference to slavery since taken respectively by the Old and New School branches—courses explainable apart from the division of 1838 and the differences operative toward and in it, and yet themselves coming in afterward to increase the distance between the two branches. But, contrary to the inference from the fact that the abolition of slavery has helped toward the reunion now imminent, remains the historical truth that slavery was not the cause of division, was not even one of the causes. W. A. H.

[Our correspondent is technically in the right. The question of slavery was not one of the avowed issues on which the Presbyterian Church divided, and does not appear upon the record as such. But we still hold the opinion formed at the time in common with many attentive and deeply interested observers of that transaction, that this question was a prevailing though secret cause of that division. In a sense it is true, as our correspondent says, that the agitation had not "assumed anything like its full proportions." But if he thinks that it had not most deeply stirred the public mind, and caused profound disturbance in church as well as state, he is mistaken in his recollection or his information. There was no period in its history in which Abolitionism caused such agitation in the elements of society, political, religious, and social, as during those early years. The New York, Boston, and Utica mobs, with multitudes besides, occurred before 1838. The mail had been robbed in Charleston in the interests of slavery and justified at Washington. Amos Dresser had been flogged, Lovejoy murdered, the Pennsylvania Hall burnt, and the Right of Petition denied, before then.

The church as well as the state was keenly alive to the certain issue of the agitation of the slavery question if it were permitted to go on. In all its great divisions, it had begun to labor with such ministers and members as had implicated themselves with it, and with such effect that only two years later (1840) the secession from the American Anti-Slavery Society took place, carrying with it, we believe, every minister and nearly every church member belonging to the South. In the Presbyterian Church, the influence of this agitation was deeply felt, and the sure instinct of slaveholding truly foreboded the result if it could not be stayed. Many of the most brilliant and promising of its younger sons were tainted with the new heresy. Nearly, if not quite, all of the students at Lane Seminary, who left it because of the restrictions put upon their anti-slavery action, were Presbyterians. Lovejoy was a Presbyterian minister when he fell a martyr at Alton. The astute leaders of opinion in that church saw that strong measures should be taken to separate the precious from the vile. Hence, in large measure, as we believe, the separation of the Old School and the New. We are confident that abundant proof of this fact may be found in the contemporary utterance and action of single churches and presbyteries, though all mention of it is carefully excluded from the records of the General Assembly of 1838. In this opinion we are confirmed by a well-known gentleman, then a member of the Presbyterian Church, and for years afterwards of the New School division—a most acute and earnest spectator of the whole transaction, who assures us that it is his belief, not merely that the anti-slavery agitation was a main occasion of the division, but that, had it not been for that agitation, the division would never have taken place at all. This is but an opinion, it is true, but it is the opinion of an expert, as would be allowed did we feel free to mention his name. Our space will not admit of our giving more room to the discussion of this question, which can only be decided by a laborious investigation into the discussions and acts preceding and accompanying the division of 1838. This will be a part of the duty of the future historian of the anti-slavery movement.—Ed. Nation.]

LITERARY.

Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce that Professor Pumpelly's new book on Arizona, China, Japan, and Siberia will contain a chapter on Japanese art, by Mr. John La Farge, who is probably as well qualified to make such an essay as any one else in the country, his knowledge, taste, and the delicacy of his discrimination being very much trusted in by those familiar with his critical views in art and literature. The book will be supplied with a number of maps, and will be adorned with some curious fac-similes of Japanese wood-cuts, caricatures of one kind and another, and some realistic representations of birds and insects, of Japanese mechanics at work, and of other persons engaged in characteristic occupations. We do not know by what process these wood-cuts have been reproduced; but it would require an eye better skilled than ours to detect at first glance that they are not originals.———Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. have in press and will immediately publish these works, as well as some two or three "juveniles" which we do not mention: "A Search for Winter Sunbeams," by Mr. S. S. Cox, who was abroad last winter, and who wrote home some fairly good letters to the World, which, we suppose, now reappear; "Titania's Banquet, and other Poems," by Mr. George Hill; a reprint of Mr. S. Baring-Gould's "Origin and Development of Religious Belief;" the third volume of "The Physiology of Man," by the younger Dr. Austin Flint, who designs to show in this work "the existing state of physiological science as applied to the functions of the human body;" and a poem by Mr. William Allingham, illustrating thirty-six designs, printed in colors, by Richard Doyle.——Messrs. Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger announce a translation of a German romance by Otto Ruppius: "Two Hemispheres" is the title. Another publication by the same house will be "The Capture and Escape; or, Life among the Sioux," by Mrs. Sarah L. Latimer.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce "The Heart of the Continent," by Fitz Hugh Ludlow; "Old Horse Gray"—poetry, we suppose—by Mr. Edward Hopper; "The Holidays: Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide; Their Social Festivities, Carols," etc., by Mr. N. B. Warner, who has the aid of Mr. Darley's pencil; "Health by Good Living," by Dr. W. W. Hall, of Hall's Journal of Health; and, finally, a work on political science—by a publicist whom we do not know, Mr. E. Mulford—with the title, "The Nature and Foundation of Civil Order and Political Life in the United States."——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce "Askaros Kassis, the Copt," a romance of modern Egyptian Life," by Mr. Edwin De Leon; "Divisions of the Society of Friends," by Mr. Thomas H. Speakman; "The Professor's Wife," a work by Miss Annie L. Macgregor; "Magdalena," by E. Marlitt—another of the innumerable translations from the German; "The Lonely Ones," by Paul Heyse, who is well worth translating; "Puck, His Reminiscences, Adventures, and Observations," "related by himself and edited by 'Ouida;'" and "Marguerite, Baroness Lichtenstein," by the author of "Zelica."——Messrs. Roberts Brothers have, as usual, a very good list to offer for this month and next. They announce "Roman Imperialism," by Prof. J. R. Seeley; "The Earthly Paradise at Autumn Period," by William Morris; "The Autobiography of a Small Boy," by Percy Fitzgerald; "Little Max," with fifteen etchings, by R. Geissler; "Mauprat," a novel, by George Sand; "Wenderholme," by Philip G. Hamerton; "Cassimir Maerema," by Arthur Helps; "Spinoza: The Life of a Thinker," by Berthold Auerbach; The "Volkskalender" Stories, by Berthold Auerbach; "Cornelius O'Dowd's Opinions on Men, Women, and Other Things in General;" "Mrs. Oliphant's Historical Sketches of the Reign of George II.;" "Rossetti's Life of Shelley;" "Songs of a Wayfarer," by William Davies; "Freiligrath's Poems," edited by his daughter; and "Konewka's Illustrations to Goethe's Faust."

—The managers of the Boston Public Library announce that they will be pleased to receive from any source any magazine, paper, broadside, or print, illustrating the recent Humboldt anniversary as celebrated in this country or in Europe, and likewise any article in print referring to the Stowe-Byron controversy. The officers of this institution have for some years been in the habit of making similar collections. They have, for instance, fourteen folio volumes containing a complete record of Mr Lincoln's assassination; one volume containing the narrative of Mr. Edward Everett's death; one relating to the great fire in Portland; one to the observance of Decoration Day in May last; two giving the sentiment of the country as signified by the press on the morning after the election of President Grant; one concerning the great gale which visited Boston and so nearly destroyed the Coliseum; and one concerning the semi-centenary of the Odd Fellows in April of this year. It is intended that there shall be also a special collection of Frankliniana, and the management will gratefully acknowledge any assistance which may be rendered them in making the collection a complete one. It will, if possible, include every edition of Franklin's works, or of any one of them, every book written wholly or in part about him, and every magazine article dealing with him, all the portraits of him, every broadside, and, in short, every memento of this most distinguished of all the sons of Boston. It is further announced, and this especially concerns the clergy, that the library is now rich in every department that is of interest to the clerical book-lover. The possession of the Prince Library makes it strong in the theology of the fathers of New England; the Parker Library, got together by the late Theodore Parker, a multifarious reader of theological works, old and new, domestic and foreign, is curious and varied; the library of the late Chester Field, a "zealous collector of works relating to the Methodist Church," probably gives the Public Library better material for the history of Methodism than can elsewhere be found; and the general purchases made by the authorities have been large. Altogether, in this particular kind of literature, including all its branches, the Library is, relatively to other collections, and absolutely, rich. There is but one, even of strictly theological libraries, that exceeds it in the number of volumes; the Union Theological Library of this city has about 28,000 volumes, while the Boston Library has 15,000. One other thing we may add: the superintendent has recently caused to be issued "A Class List of Fiction," containing the titles of all the books to be described as coming under the head of Fiction which belong to the library. It will be found very useful by many other persons than those who use the books themselves, for it gives in almost all cases a full list of the works of the authors mentioned, and often some other information, as, for example, the real names of pseudonymous writers. Thus, after the name of the "Countess Dash" we find it stated that the true name and style of that novelist is Cisterne de Courtiras, Vicomtesse de Saint Mars. This list is, we believe, for sale for two cents, and is kept even with the times by the addition, in monthly bulletins at a cost of two cents each, of the titles of all the fictitious works that have been purchased during the month preceding. By-and-by a catalogue similar in character will be provided for the poetry in the Library and for the works in other departments.

—The Cornhill Magazine, which is seldom without some good thing, is just now publishing a noticeable series of articles, by Mr. Matthew Arnold, which many of our readers would like to see. They were called out by the appearance of Renan's "St. Paul," and their purpose is to deny the truth of the French critic's assertion that the influence of St. Paul is soon to cease. "After having been for three hundred years the Christian doctor par excellence, Paul," says Renan, "is now coming to the end of his reign." Protestantism has made Paul, the argument runs; Pauline doctrine and Protestantism are one and the same. Protestantism is touched with the pangs of death, and with its disappearance disappears its father and founder. To this conclusion as to the speedy decease of Protestantism Mr. Arnold does not say no. True enough, he says, "The Protestantism which has so long used and abused St. Paul is coming to an end. . . . Its fundamental ideas, sounding forth still every week from thousands of pulpits, have in them no significance, and no power for the progressive thought of humanity. But the reign of the real St. Paul is only beginning; his fundamental ideas, disengaged from the elaborate misconceptions with which Protestantism has overlaid them, will have an influence in the future greater than any which they have yet had—an influence proportioned to their correspondence with a number of the deepest and most permanent facts of human nature itself." Mr. Arnold then goes on to state the creeds of the two great divisions of Protestantism as it is in England—the Arminian division and the Calvinist; and so far as we are acquainted with the doctrines held in this country by the Congregationalists and by the Methodist Episcopalians, his statement is true for America also, and would be admitted to be so if submitted to the examination of competent theologians. Except, that we think we are not wrong in saying that the great body of communicants of the American churches we have mentioned hold their creeds with much more of mental reservation, or, rather, modification, than do their brethren in England. The old creed may—even as a rule—be preached in all its strictness; and very probably it would not be formally abandoned by any convocation that might be called together; but we should say that it is not really held in all its strictness by more than a minority of church-members, whether lay or clerical. So much for that point, on which we doubt if Mr. Arnold holds quite the right opinion. Knowledge of America is not his strongest point. After he has described Protestantism incidentally, saying some good things of Wesley and Calvin, Mr. Arnold proceeds to a consideration of the character of Paul—his national character, and his personal, so to speak; and here he gives us what seems to us good criticism—a view of Paul which, to our apprehension, goes deeper than Renan's, and, indeed, deeper than any other with which we have any acquaintance. Of the discrepancy between the apostle's religious belief and that of his followers in our day he is to speak hereafter. When the articles are finished, they will make a thin volume, which should properly be bound up with the author's "Culture and Anarchy," with which they have a certain connection. We may add that these essays and those, although not undisfigured by the consciousness of self, to which we owe so much of what is good and of what is bad in Mr. Arnold's writings, are both, on the whole, more earnest and manly than it is common with their author to be. Why, by the way, now that we are speaking of the magazine, cannot some of our magazines procure a design for their covers as tasteful and pretty and appropriate as that which adorns the Cornhill, and makes it a pleasure to look at? The Overland, with its grizzly bear standing across the track of a railroad, is not badly off in this respect, and Putnam's maize and sugar-cane will do; but we think of no other magazine that is not weak, or worse, as regards its designs.

—As many of our readers know, it is the uniform custom of the London Saturday Review not to correct any misstatements which it may happen to fall into. We may, we suppose, say "uniform custom," though we believe we do remember a sort of an apology that the editor once made to some bishop or other church dignitary. The reason for this rule we do not know, but the effect of it is to impart to the port and presence of our contemporary a majesticalness well calculated to strike awe into all beholders. As to the justice of its procedure in standing by all its sins and errors after it has been shown them, and in sending them down to the most remote posterity to the greater or less injury of this and that innocent person—that is another affair. We have been requested, in behalf of the writer of it, to give publicity in this country to the following letter. We may remark that there was a lifelong friendship between Herschel and Grahame. And it is interesting to see the aged astronomer, who now must be not far from eighty, coming out with so much vigor and energy in behalf of his friend's work:

"To the Editor of the Athenæum:

"Sir: I have to complain of a piece of literary injustice on the part of one of your contemporary journals, which, professing to be a review of politics, literature, science, and art, denies admittance, on appeal made to it, to a correction of its own misstatement on a point of considerable importance in historical literature. In the number of the Saturday Review for September 25, reviewing Mr. Doyle's 'Arnold Prize Essay,' entitled 'The American Colonies previous to the Declaration of Independence,' it is asserted that 'the history of these Colonies before the declaration of their independence is a subject no English historian has as yet taken up.' In justice to a dear and lamented friend—the late James Grahame, Esq., author of a work entitled 'The History of the North American Colonies till their Assumption of National Independence,' in four volumes (the two first of which, published by Messrs. Longman, appeared in 1827, and the complete work in 1836)—I considered it my duty to point out to the editor of the Saturday Review the incorrectness of the statement in question, but (as I have since been informed, I might have expected) without effect. May I hope, sir, that you will aid me by the insertion of this reclamation in your widely-circulated columns in preventing a work of acknowledged merit from being thus unceremoniously thrust into oblivion? That it deserves this character appears from the fact of an American edition (now before me), edited by no less a personage than the late Josiah Quincy, in conjunction with Mr. Justice Story, Messrs. James Savage, Jared Sparks, and W. H. Prescott. It was published in Boston in 1845, with a memoir of the author—the declared motive of the edition being 'that it scarcely comported with American feelings, interest, or self-respect to permit a work of so much laborious research and merit, written in so faithful a spirit, and relating to our own history, to want an American edition.'

"I am, sir, your obedient servant, J. F. W. Herschel."

—It is noteworthy that while the literatures of so many nations are dying out, we hear of the advent of a young literature in an ancient tongue, the Norwegian. The dialects spoken in Scandinavian countries—Sweden, Denmark ,Norway, Iceland, and the Faroë and Shetland Islands—are all derived from the ancient Norse, which is still preserved nearly pure in the Icelandic. When literary cultivation appeared in these countries, it came in Latin. If men wrote at all, they wrote in that tongue, and the so-called Latin period may be said to have extended down to the end of the last century. Snorro Sturleson's "Chronicle of the Kings of Norway," written in the thirteenth century in Icelandic, was only translated into Danish in 1594. Down to a much later period, the Eddas and Sagas of Icelandic literature, "that large utterance of the early gods," were to southern Scandinavians sealed books. When Holberg, the father of modern Danish literature, began writing in the early part of the last century, there was no national literature to speak of, and he said with bitterness that his country was "almost the only land on earth where people are found willing to make it a point of honor that they should be ignorant of their fathers' tongue." Then the Danes began to collect their national songs, and at a later period the Swedes followed their example. Of the latter works, Stadach and Mohnike have given us quantities in German; and Talvi, Keightly, the Howitts, and others, many in English. Norway was incorporated with Denmark in the fourteenth century, and from that period down to 1814 the history and literature of the two countries were so intimately united that it is almost impossible to separate them. For more than three centuries the sole scientific metropolis of the two nationalities was the University of Copenhagen. The written language of the two countries is identically the same, and the same language is spoken, but with dialectic differences. These differences exist in the various provinces of Norway, while in Denmark, particularly in the districts of the German frontier, they become greater every year, and depart more widely from the old standard. The foundation of the University of Christiania, in 1811, and the constitution of 1814, gave Norway a movement of independence. Previously, the Norwegian men of letters who graduated at Copenhagen were counted as Danes, and Tullin, Wessel, and Holberg, all Norwegians, were numbered among Danish authors. Indeed, Holberg and Tullin may be said not only to have founded modern Danish literature, but to have preserved it, by their fresh Norwegian idiom and style, from the deteriorating effects of foreign contact. The impetus given since 1814 has produced a new school, and since this semi-independence the names of a few poets have come to the surface. Among them are Wergeland, Schwach, Velhaven, Andreas, Munch, and Bierregard, author of a national hymn. To these must be added Ibsen, the charming Björnson Björnson, Holmboe, and Rudolph Keyser. Of these, Munch, Björnson, and Rudolph Keyser are known in this country through English translations. So new is this young national literature that the first attempt at a complete critical examination of its scientific and literary productions has just been made, and well made, at Christiania. We refer to "La Norvège Littéraire. Catalogue systématique et raisonné de tous les ouvrages de quelque valeur imprimés en Norvége ou composés par des auteurs Norvégiens au 19e siècle, accompagné de renvois, notes et explications littéraires, ainsi que de notices biographiques sur les auteurs. Précédé d'un introduction historique, par Paul Botten-Hansen, Bibliothécaire et Directeur de la Bibliothèque de l'Université Royale de Norvége, etc., etc. 8vo, pp. xii. and 272. Christiania. London: Trübner & Co." The proportion of two hundred and seventy-two pages of comment to twelve pages of catalogue shows the extent of Dr. Botten-Hansen's notes, literary comments, and biographical notices, which form a full history of the development of Norwegian literature from the period of her literary independence to the present day. At first blush, it would seem strange that a Norwegian should write of Norwegian literature in a foreign tongue, but it is eminently proper that this circular letter of introduction accrediting the new-comer to all the nations of the earth should be couched in the language of diplomacy.

—As important, perhaps, as any of the new English books possessing special interest for our clerical readers is an article in the last Quarterly, entitled "Islam." It is understood to be the work of Mr. Emanuel Deutsch, who made himself so well known some two years ago by a very learned and eloquent article on the Talmud—which, by the way, has been expanded, and is soon to appear as a book. "Islam" is a picture of the life of Mohammed, and also of the religion which he founded; and while, by reason of the fact that it does not directly touch upon Christian doctrine as its predecessor did, it will not make so much noise as that article made, it not the less is most able and eloquent, and, like its predecessor, may be said to dispose of one more of the enigmas which the East has offered to the hitherto baffled research of the Western scholar. Mr. Deutsch begins by giving us a description—very interesting and dramatically striking—of the man Mohammed, as he appeared in the earlier period of his life—kind, generous, brave, full of genuine religious fervor—before success in the world had exerted on him its deteriorating effect, and made him one more illustration of the melancholy truth so often observed, that the prosperity of the good is often the cause of their becoming bad. That such a change was wrought in Mohammed the authentic history of his later life makes it impossible to doubt. The work of personal portraiture having been well accomplished, the writer undertakes to tell us what it is exactly that the "religion of Abraham" was. In the Haggadah, says Mr. Deutsch, we have the basis of most of the dogma and morals of Islam. "Muslim" is Talmudic, and with it "Islam" itself; so is "Tahannoth," the name of the prayers for which Mohammed sought the solitude of Mount Hira; the prophet's vocabulary is in great part Talmudic, and still more so is the structure of many of his thoughts. There is to be more of this essay, and it will be eagerly awaited.

—A work of great present interest to clergymen of all denominations is a volume of essays of much ability written, to all appearance, by two learned German Roman Catholic theologians. They give a historical view of the rise of Catholic dogma, and take strong ground—though they take it without heat—against the claims of the Ultramontanists. "To us," they say, "the Catholic Church and the Papacy are by no means convertible terms." Again, the doctrine of Papal infallibility, they say, would eventually kill out all intellectual energy within the Church, and would also shatter "that dearest hope, which no Christian can banish from his breast, of a future reunion of the divided churches both of East and West. . . . In a word, we regret that doctrine and idea of the Church which has for years been commended by the organ of the Roman Jesuit as alone true." "The Pope and the Council" is the title of this work, and its authors write under the pseudonym of "Janus," which covers them both, and which may be supposed to refer also to their looking backward and forward in their survey of the Church's past and probable future. The book is well translated into English, and bears the imprint of Messrs. Rivingtons.

ROBERTSON'S AND BROOKE'S SERMONS.*

The Broad Church of England has been classified under two divisions. The first comprises those who, like the householder in the parable, bring forth from their treasure-house things new and old. They believe in the divine institution of the Church, in the inspiration of the Bible, in the essential truth of the Articles, and they believe at the same time in the free exercise of reason. They are modern men cherishing ancient credences; men living in full sympathy with the humanities of their age, and belonging to an institution that was founded and came to its full growth in bygone ages. They welcome science and philosophy, and they find God's revealed word in a collection of books thousands of years old. Their peculiarity is that they live in these different intellectual realms and climates at one and the same moment, conscious of no discord or discrepancies, fully believing that the old contains the new, that the new adopts and verifies the old, and that nothing but a method of interpretation is required to establish a perfect correspondence between the nineteenth century and the tenth or the first. The second division consists of those who, though remaining in the Church, signing the Articles and reading the word, are prepared to follow further the leading of the modern spirit, and, if necessary, to let the Bible go when it appears to stand in too sharp contradiction with philosophy and science. This latter division contains a number of accomplished scholars and critics. Of it were most of the writers of the famous volume of "Essays and Reviews." There is room here for analysis and discussion. In the first division there is none. The effort of those who are in this category must be to reconcile apparently discordant tendencies, to put new ideas into the old statements, and accommodate the old statements to the new ideas. Here is work for ingenuity, but none for criticism. Hence it comes that this section of the Church is distinguished for its preachers. The preacher is not called upon to be a theologian, a philosopher, or a critic. The less of any of these he is, the better for his popularity and success. His chief office is to edify, and the edifier is allowed to take large liberties with the exact sciences; he may lay on colors to produce effects which severe rules disapprove of. In fact, if he chooses, he may use great freedom with his books and formularies, may allegorize, spiritualize, transform, and transfigure to almost any extent, and yet be blameless. Stern veracity may quarrel with the seeming disingenuousness, but the preacher knows his privilege and uses it. He evades the point of difficulties or skilfully covers it over with flowers whose charm arrests the enquirer's attention and diverts his mind. As has been well said, when the soul asks bread he gives it not a stone but a gem, which so pleases the hungry soul that its hunger is forgotten.

Let us not be understood as casting an ugly reflection on preachers. Their business is edification, and their very devotion to their business makes them overlook the severe requirements that the instructor is under to convey none but exact knowledge. The preachers of the English Broad Church are earnest and enlightened men, actively abreast of their time, responsive to the spirit of the age, and even eager to take part in the warfare against ignorance, bigotry, assumption, whether personal, social, civil, or ecclesiastical. Their sympathies are with the people. They are interested in the laboring classes, in public education, in the immediate reform of old abuses. They preach obedience to the physical laws, and their sufficiency to ensure health; they are friends of social science; telling men to look to enlightenment for their social salvation. They have a profound faith in human nature, which they believe in educating and placing under better social conditions, as an indisputable preparation for the higher culture of religion. Their conception of the Supreme Being is noble. Their views of Providence are large and tender. Their theory of the future destiny of mankind is lofty and hopeful. Their ethics are pure, teaching that goodness is to be cultivated not from motives of hope or fear, but from motives of disinterestedness. The "enthusiasm of humanity" burns warmly in their bosoms; but for their attachment to the articles of the Creed and to the inspired authority of the Scriptures, they would be taken for men who committed themselves heartily to what is called the "genius of the century." It is this attachment that makes their position look anomalous, and their movement uncertain.

Of these preachers the best known is Frederick W. Robertson, whose sermons, after passing through several editions, now appear in a popular form. The present edition contains the five series of sermons before printed in separate volumes, and includes the lectures on the Epistles to the Corinthians. To say that they express the finest characteristics of the school is but saying why they are so popular. Robertson was a man of intellect, of fresh and various thoughts, highly cultivated, trained and eager. He was a good scholar, a vigorous thinker, a man capable of drawing nice distinctions. His heart was sound, his understanding firm, his conscientiousness unfailing; but he was enthusiastic in his religious feelings; a man of sentiment, poetical, fanciful, and a born preacher. Everything with him was done with a view to edifying. Wherever he quarried he was in search of spiritual ideas. Literature, science, history, art furnished him materials for sermons. He found moral significance in everything. The dryest text was juicy to him. He turned stones into bread. He was a brave man, too; he faced doubt; he did justice to scepticism and unbelief and denial; he dealt honestly with Romanist and with atheist, with Greek and Jew, as well as he could; and the ground of this honest dealing was his faith that truth was identical with itself under all the varieties of its symbolism. He poured the old wine into the new bottles and the new wine into the old bottles, in perfect confidence that no bottle would burst under the pressure of fermentation, and that no wine would be spilled in the hasty decanting from one vessel into another. He can find a great truth anywhere, and he can find an antique vase for every truth he discovers. The ages run together; there is nothing old and nothing new. No rationalist refines away the belief in prayer more deliberately than he does; but he will make it out that his view is the ancient one held by the priests and prophets. He legitimizes the doctrine of "absolution," and persuades you that there never was anything in the papal assumption of it. The reader is fascinated by the ingenuity, the brilliancy, the beauty, the swift legerdemain which shuffles meanings so deftly in and out; the boldness, the candor, the keenness, the charity, the seeming insight, are charming; but before long comes a sense of illusion and mystification; thoughtfulness pauses to ask if all this can be true; if the candor is quite candid or the fairness quite fair. The critical mind asks if there are then no distinctions; if there is not some trick about either the bottles or the wine; if everything is true, and everything is new and everything is old, and where we are to stop in the process of legitimizing old credences and myths and superstition. Why should we not all be Romanists at once? Nay, for the matter of that, why should we not all be pagans? The glamor becomes so painfully bewildering to some persons that they lay down the volume in a sort of despair.

The wealth of Mr. Robertson's mind, to say nothing of the beauty of his character or the devotion of his spotless life, makes his productions interesting, profitable, and quickening in spite of his method. His His friend and biographer, Mr. Stopford Brooke, preacher in St. James's Chapel, London, and honorary chaplain in ordinary to the Queen, is intellectually, at least, a far less eminent man. In his case, the allegorizing or spiritualizing method betrays its weakness. He, too, is manly, fresh, and pointed, but the prevailing quality in his sermons is fancifulness. He seems to be an imitator, and like imitators generally he exaggerates the worst peculiarities of his model. His interpretations of Scripture are more wonderful than Robertson's. He can not only give mystical meaning to what is written; he can infer meanings where nothing is written at all. He will find a whole philosophy in a text; he will bring a river out of a thimble. His sentimentality—we are afraid that is the name it deserves—is omniscient and omnipotent. He deduces modern education from the youth of Jesus, and draws the social problem respecting woman from the character of the Virgin Mary. So it be sentiment that makes the assertion, no assertion is extravagant. "God did not wish to live alone. He created the angels. He gave his own life to others long before man arose." Therefore "we should be gods and angels to one another." This is from a sermon on the text (mistranslated): "He maketh his angels spirits." In every discourse occur random assertions in regard to the youth and development of Jesus, the experiences of his mother, or some other matter that cannot be disputed, for the plain reason that no living soul knows anything about it. Sentiment is overworked in all departments. Thus it declaims: To doubt the existence of angelic beings is an impertinence. "It is a drop of dew in the lonely cup of a gentian which imagines itself to be all the water in the universe. It is the summer midge which has never left its forest pool, dreaming that it and its companions are the only living creatures in earth or air." Here again it reasons: "Jesus went home to common life, to subjection to his parents, and for eighteen years not a word or act betrayed his presence. It is a fact inexplicable on the mythical theory." The sermons are brilliant, but heated and excessive. The preacher is earnest and humane; he means to be simple, forcible, direct; he can on occasion speak with great plainness about the false ideas and mischievous usages of society; his moral standard is always high; his ideal of personal character is always elevated; he battles stoutly against worldliness, and against other worldliness; he is a warm friend of worthy principles and just reforms; he administers rebuke courageously to a rich and fashionable congregation, and gives many a fresh thought to jaded and stale minds. He does not play the priest or affect the oracle, but speaks like a living man to living men, conscientious in the use of his thirty minutes that are all he has to raise the dead in. We would like to admire him unreservedly, but we cannot, and for the reason that his method of drawing authority from doctrines and writings, whose obvious and universally received sense he sets aside by figurative interpretations, imparts an air of unreality, of ungenuineness, it is not unfair to say of affectation, to all his utterances, and especially to his most earnest ones. His views are generous, quickening, at times inspiring, but a suspicion of unsoundness in their foundations weakens confidence in their strength.

That such preachers as these two should be popular is not surprising. They are fresh, vivid, practical, and spiritual. They talk about actual men and actual society in a very pungent way, and all the while they are neither heretics nor "come-outers." Churchmen like them for allowing them to be churchmen and "live men" at the same time; others, who are not churchmen, like them because although churchmen they are live men themselves. Conservatives like them for their reverence toward instituted ordinances, rites, and creeds; radicals like them for their bravery in assailing ignorance and wrong. Even rationalists like them for their cordial adoption of rational ideas on every debatable subject of modern life. Mr. Robertson's sermons have been prodigious favorites with Unitarians, as being essentially Unitarian in doctrine, and making church and creed sound Unitarianist also. Thus, from both camps the disciples come pouring in. It is on the whole a good sign that they do; for such preaching is suggestive where it is not instructive, and to most people it must be instructive. It belongs to a period of compromise and transition: it cannot therefore be permanently valuable, but while it lasts it will deserve to last.

A BAD BOOK IN LINGUISTICS.*

This little work is written with much apparent profundity; but it seems to be one of a class, not quite unknown in German literature, in which a minimum of valuable truth is wrapped up in a maximum of sounding phraseology. Its author is well known amongst students of language as a man of great erudition and great industry, and his contributions to South African philology have been extensive and important. He has never kept himself within the strict limits of his special department; his enterprising mind and fondness for generalizing have exercised themselves in various and wide-reaching speculations and combinations; but here his success is far from being assured, and it is doubtful whether much of his work will stand criticism. In the discussion of a question like that of the origin of language, a great deal of clear thought, of sound logic tempered and guided by sober sense, and of cautious reserve, is required—qualities which, to say the least, are not the special characteristics of his mind. We do not feel tempted to yield our opinions either to his guidance or to that of his cousin and editor, Professor Häckel of Jena, who also has a good deal to say within the same covers. The latter gentleman, particularly, appears to be one of those headlong Darwinians who take the whole process of development by natural selection as already proved and unquestionable, and go on with the fullest and most provoking confidence to draw out its details. Thus, in a note (not of his own appending, but introduced by Dr. Bleek), he is kind enough to sketch the whole common genealogical tree of man and the monkeys and apes, showing us the gorilla, the chimpanzee, and their like, on a level at the ends of the topmost branches, and enabling us to read off the exact degree of our consanguinity with each individual group of the quadrumana, sharp-nosed or flat-nosed, tailed or tailless. Now we, for one, must confess that we have not a particle of prejudice against such kindred; we are democratic enough to think a parvenu quite as good as a man with innumerable quarterings, and to hold, with Mephistopheles, that "we are, after all—what we are," no matter how we came to be so, whether by a long and tedious climb upward from a miserable semi-simious state, or by a briefer slide downward from a condition of paradisaic purity and intuitive wisdom. In fact, we must allow the justness of the claim urged by our authors, that the former account of our position is the more flattering and gratifying of the two. Who would not belong to a race whose career is steadily upward rather than to one which has once made an awful lapse, and may probably enough repeat it? Further, we have great faith in the substantial truth of the central Darwinian idea, and would no more regard the analogies and correspondences of form among different kinds and races as meaningless sports of nature, than the fossils in the rocks, which used to be interpreted as such—and are still by many, from whose knowledge and spirit those of the scientific and half-scientific denouncers of Darwin are not perhaps so far removed as they imagine. But we cannot think the theory yet converted into a scientific fact; and those are perhaps the worst foes to its success who are over-hasty to take it and use it as a proved fact. Nor have we patience with men who, inspired by it, claim to be wise respecting man's grand and great-grand ancestors to a degree far beyond what is yet written in the book of science.

The eminent linguistic scholar Schleicher was also sorely infected with Darwinism, and sought to bring the science of language into relation with it in a couple of noted essays, which are far the weakest and most valueless of all his productions, though here referred to with high approval by his colleague Häckel; and it is part of Dr. Bleek's aim as well to connect the development of speech with this particular mode of the development of our race—although we hardly see how he would bring it about, since his theories seem to require only that man should have been, at some indefinite epoch in the past, a creature without language. But his course of exposition is not of the clearest; and, either by his own fault or his translator's, his expression is also often awkward and confusing, especially on the first pages. The introduction to his specific theory occupies two-thirds of the pamphlet (46 pages out of 69), and in the course of it he brings forward many views to which it is very difficult to yield assent. For example, he claims that the language of the mute animals bears to human speech nearly the same relation as the Chinese mode of printing from solid blocks bears to our own from movable types. Surely a most unfortunate and misleading comparison, and one which reduces indefinitely, we might almost say infinitely, the real difference of the two modes of communication. Animal speech is vastly further removed from ours than even the rudest picture-writing from our perfected alphabets, written and printed. Dr. Bleek's opinion on this point doubtless stands connected with his idea, dimly shadowed forth here and there, that articulate speech is distinguished from inarticulate by being broken up and mobilized—which seems to us wholly meaningless. Again, he claims that the personification of natural phenomena, and the development of a nature-religion, has "its origin in the sexual form of language"—that is to say, grows out of the classification which some languages (all those with which we are most familiar) make of objects as masculine or feminine; and he proceeds later to connect poetry and science with the same linguistic peculiarity. The extent to which he is under the dominion of this opinion may be gathered from the fact that on finding a worship of the sun and moon among certain American tribes, while the American tongues have no grammatical gender, he is ready at once to assume the derivation of a part of the culture or the speech of America from nations in the Old World who said he and she! Indeed, so arbitrary and unsound are his reasonings on matters of religious history, that when, in the sequel, he comes to make himself as offensive to "theologians" as he possibly can, they will feel justified in regarding his denunciation and contempt as of very small account.

When we arrive at last at the theory proper, we find it to be of a quite peculiar character. It is somewhat as follows: The earliest quasi-human beings uttered by mere instinct certain sounds to express certain feelings. They heard their fellows utter the same sounds. Being, like monkeys, of an imitative disposition, they could not help mocking these sounds. But, upon thus reproducing them, they were reminded of the feelings which had prompted their own original utterances. This gave them, side by side, a view of the feeling and its natural expression, an apprehension of a sign and something signified, and so brought before their consciousness the separateness and the connection of the two; it set the feeling outside of them as an object of contemplation, and gave them knowledge of that item of themselves. This was the first step in the process whereby man became man.

This theory is unnecessarily complicated. So far as there are involuntary utterances expressive of feeling (and their range is very limited), they did not need to be repeated by imitation before they could be associated with an idea of the feeling that led to them. Why could not that association follow upon their being heard simply from others' mouths, or even from one's own? Would not the most rudimentary man in posse, if he heard his fellow laugh or cry, understand what it meant without having first himself to haw-haw or boo-boo? Do not even the animals thus? When a gun goes off, all the shy birds near by take to flight without waiting to say "bang!" to themselves. The imitative factor is an intrusion, and may be left out of the account altogether. If the first man had not had a power of analytic apprehension, and a mastery over consciousness, very different from those of other beings, neither hearing nor imitation would have led him to anything. This power is man's characteristic, and where he received it, at whatever time and in whatever way, he became man. We object entirely to having his conversion into man treated as the result, rather than the cause, of his cultural development as man. When the process of language-making began, man was man in esse as well as in posse, ready to have his powers drawn out and educated—just as is every human being nowadays at the commencement of its existence. And the specific moving power to the working-out of speech was not the monkeyish tendency to imitation, but the human tendency to sociality, the desire of communication with one's fellows—an element which Dr. Bleek appears not to have taken at all into consideration.

He is, further, consistently in the wrong in his view of the relation of language to thought. He holds the extreme opinion as to the absolute necessity of a word to an idea, asserting that "no cognition can come into man's consciousness otherwise than in and through language," and more to the same purpose. Here is no place to enter upon the often-repeated discussion of this fundamental point; but we may say that we do not see what sound and telling argument can be urged upon Dr. Bleek's side. Like many another before him, he mistakes one kind and degree of indispensability for another. Because, on the grand scale, language is the necessary auxiliary of thought, indispensable to the development of the power of thinking, to the distinctness and variety and complexity of cognitions, to the full mastery of consciousness, therefore he would fain make thought absolutely impossible without speech, identifying the faculty with its instrument. He might just as reasonably assert that the human hand cannot act without a tool. With such a doctrine to start from, he cannot stop short of Müller's worst paradoxes, that an infant (in-fans, not speaking) is not a human being, and that deaf-mutes do not become possessed of reason until they learn to twist their fingers into imitations of spoken words.

Of course, we cannot believe that a man who goes so far astray upon points of so capital consequence is capable of casting valuable light upon the origin of language; and we are forced to regard the present essay as a failure. So far as we can discover, it does not add an item of valuable information or valuable thought to the discussion of the subject; and neither its substance, its style, nor its spirit furnishes reason for its translation into English.

In a note which the translator ill-advisedly adds on a slip at the end, Professor Häckel is made to remark: "The essay has received much praise in Germany, and I hope it will have the same powerful effect in America also." We, on our part, hope that somebody is guilty of misrepresentation here; but if this is really the main effect which the work is intended by its author and editors to produce, it doubly deserves to be disappointed.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR OCTOBER.

By far the most striking and readable of the long articles in the last North American is that of Mr. Henry Brooks Adams, who has by this and one or two similar essays made for himself an enviable reputation as a courageous politician in the best sense of the term, and as an excellently clear and forcible writer. Indeed he may be said to be at times a little too forcible, or rather to be a little too fond of hard hitting. But this is a fault which he comes by honestly, and one which perhaps may be expected to disappear, although we do not know, either, that it has been usual for age to abate the natural force of the members of Mr. Adams's family. The characterization of Attorney-General Hoar and of Secretary Boutwell is very telling, and is restrained and dignified in manner. And we take it to be perfectly true, although it is likely that a certain number of people will not at once believe it, and we may be sure that another certain number will affect to disbelieve it, and will take a tone of easy contempt in treating of it. Already, in fact, we observe that to some of our friends in Massachusetts, considerations of Mr. Adams's youthfulness are apparently held to be of great weight; and what that means in matters of this kind we all know. "Mr. Adams is young yet," to be sure, as the Springfield Republican reminds us; but there is every danger, we should say, that even when he is bent with age, like the old gentlemen who are shocked at his want of years, and at a little irreverence that there is in him, he will still have his own opinion in regard to "that type of narrow political morality which has obtained so general a control of America—the product of caucuses and party promotion," and which has not yet done us all the harm it is going to do us, both by the example it sets and by the acts it performs, but which, as we have faith to believe, has seen its best days.

Mr. Adams's essay has for its main purpose to show that, as regards appointments to office, we have subverted that principle of the Constitution which prohibits the absorption by one department of the government of the powers of any other. The Senate, he charges, has got into its hands a great share of the power of the Executive; and no one can doubt, we think, that this is indeed so. But we think, too, that in his desire to make us return to the fundamental principles of the government, to make us see how much violence we have done the true spirit of our institutions, Mr. Adams neglects to pay due attention or to give sufficient prominence to a fact that every one who calls himself, and is, "a practical man" will be likely to think a chief thing to be considered. And that is this, that in practice it was, we may say, inevitable that the theory of the Constitution should in this particular matter go by the board, because to carry it into practice has became an impossibility. Let a President throw himself ever so unreservedly on that popular feeling which, as an American, is ready to sustain any President who shall firmly declare that he will not permit offices to be parcelled out as spoils; let him even win against the Senate the victory which last spring, when the Tenure of Office act was under discussion, Grant tried hard and honestly, but possibly not with sufficient obstinacy, to win; let him get back into the hands of the Executive the power which has been taken away to be used by men like Fenton and Cameron, Pomeroy and Butler, for the building up of their own political fortunes; let him do this, and much as would thereby be done for the theory of our government—for carrying out on paper the intentions of its founders, what after all would be the practical difference? It is, so far as we can see, simply impossible that any one man could properly make all our appointments. Should he try ever so hard, Senators and Representatives would still be the President's advisers as to the fitness of candidates; they would still be men to be conciliated, the exercise of the advisory power would still have its corrupting influences, and we should still be where we are. Some supplementary device is still to seek after we have given back to the Executive the appointing power in its integrity. We are glad, let us say in taking leave of this article, that it came in Mr. Adams's way to make this remark: "Although much has been said against the President for the selection of personal friends and relatives for office, so far as this choice had any political meaning it was rather deserving of praise and support as the last remnant of the President's defeated purpose of rescuing the public service from the taint of political corruption." And then follows a word or two which suggest the improbability—practically infinite—of any one man's being able, unaided by some machinery not now in existence, thus to rescue the public service: "If a similar process of selection," says Mr. Adams, "had been carried with proper care and a wide acquaintance with men through all the public service, one principal source of corruption would have been greatly checked."

Mr. John Fiske's article, entitled "The Genesis of Language," is the result of independent research and independent thinking, and certainly does its author credit as an able thinker and writer. Any one who thinks it too much loaded with detail, and not compendious enough, should think of it as addressed to scholars and not to the general reader. It is rare, however, to find an article of such length on this subject containing so much that is sound—which, however, is not saying that it does not contain much that is unsound and should have been omitted. For example, the derivation of "woman" from an assumed Sanskrit word, "wêman" (meaning "weaver"), is a decided error, and there are more that are not dissimilar. To go to the Sanskrit directly in such a matter instead of looking first to the Germanic languages is to offend against one of the two most essential rules in comparative philology. It does honor to Mr. Fiske's sense and penetration that he sees in the imitative theory (Müller's bad joke, "bow-wow theory," ought to be let pass into oblivion), the sole acceptable explanation of the origin of speech. His suggestion of the separate origin of pronominal and a few other elements as the involuntary utterances accompanying gestures of pointing is worthy of consideration, but Mr. Fiske would admit that to accept it now would be premature. We are not yet so far along that we can deal with a question so recondite, and the resources of all existing languages must be ransacked for hints upon it before we venture on framing a theory. We may add that we feel like objecting to Mr. Fiske's use of the word "integration." Such a term is a dangerous thing to handle; involving so much, it can hardly be but that sometimes it will be employed, even by the most cautious, as a cover for unclearness of thought or for ignorance.

"The Writings of Mr. Rowland G. Hazard" is an article by Professor G. P. Fisher, and will make the reader acquainted with an author who is well worth knowing, but who has taken so little care for reputation as never to have reached his proper place in the public esteem. His life has been that of a manufacturer on a large scale, but the bent of his mind is towards metaphysical discussion, and this he has prosecuted with more than ordinary success. The nature and operation of the will in man appears to be his favorite subjects, and he maintains the freedom of it, aud opposes strongly the doctrine of the school of Mr. Mill, with whom he has had more or less of private discussion, and to whom he addresses his latest work. It consists of two letters on "Causation and Freedom of Willing," and we shall at another time have more to say concerning it. Mr. Hazard's way of writing is simple and easy, and is so much the style of a plain man desiring to make clear a difficult subject, that we should think any one who has not as yet given to matters of this kind all the attention he could wish, might very profitably get our author's books and study them. Mr. Hazard is also the author of a little work on "Finance and Hours of Labor" that it will be worth many people's while to take a look at; and during the war he did the State some service by a very good exposition of the resources of the country. It was translated abroad, at home it was read widely, and it was an efficient help in putting down the rebellion.

"The Coast of Egypt and the Suez Canal" is by Henry Mitchell, of the United States Coast Survey, and is a part of a forthcoming official report. So far as we make out, the author has not a superabundance of faith in the success of the canal as a commercial highway. It is other aspects of the work, however—aspects almost purely scientific—that Mr. Mitchell deals with, and with these less than with problems presented by the Egyptian coast, the artificial harbor of Port Saïd, and the delta of the Nile. "Paraguay and the Present War" is by Mr. S. G. Bulfinch, and perhaps is as authoritative and accurate as anything on that subject that we are likely to get for some little time. Mr. Porter Bliss is getting ready a book, we believe; and if he will deliver a plain tale, not disdaining details, and never minding the many opportunities he will surely have for eloquence, we shall before very long have a work of value.

We have been much interested in Mr. Lewis H. Morgan's paper on "The Indian Migrations." It is to be followed by another, and the two together are intended to present such evidence bearing on the movements of our aborigines, as may be drawn from a consideration of the physical conditions under which they live, and from their systems of consanguinity, their languages, and so forth. Mr. Morgan's enquiry will include the subject of the origin of the North and South American Indians, and probably no one is better fitted than he to give an opinion. In the article before us he points out, what many of us had forgotten, that it is not so very long since the Indian was a hunter without a horse, and that therefore the prairies were of little use to him as hunting-grounds; that the forest portions of the continent were also not his best habitat, and that, as he was not an agriculturist to any great extent—at least, in the region this side of Mexico—good fishing-places were the main necessity for him. The essay then proceeds to a survey of the continent, and marks out the seats of Indian occupation, and seems to indicate that Mr. Morgan will fix upon the neighborhood of Puget Sound and the Columbia River as the cradle of the copper-colored race, though as to where he will put its birthplace he makes no certain sign. There are other things given us by the author: notably an account, seemingly very reasonable and careful, of the Aztec civilization, about which so much has been said—so much too much, we may perhaps say. And there is what appears to us a very plausible theory as to the true character of the Mound Builders, so-called, who have seemed to be fairly installed in the position in our archæology which is occupied in Ireland by the famous round towers. They were, perhaps, Village Indians, says Mr. Morgan, who came from New Mexico and found that their system of house-building would not answer in their new home. They had been accustomed to use adobe brick in the construction of their buildings, and, for reasons of defence, to close in the story next the ground, and to enter the house—which, by the way, was an immense communal dwelling—by means of ladders reaching to the flat roof. Now, on reaching the region of the Ohio River, they would find that the frosts, and rains, and snows of that climate were destructive of the sun-baked bricks, and they would have to consider the question of how to build. To make out of poles and bark a house resting on the natural level of the ground would be to change altogether their mode of building—a thing not lightly to be done, especially as their house was also their fortress. They decided, then, to substitute for the first, closed story an embankment on which this house of poles and bark might be set up in safety; and it is thus that we have the mounds. This seems to us far from being an unreasonable supposition, and we sincerely trust it may be established as the true one. In the interest of future generations, it is to be hoped somebody may go out and deposit on top of some or all of them a judicious, plausible quantity of the "charcoal and ashes, the remnants of fire-pits," the discovery of which would, as Mr. Morgan says, strengthen his theory a good deal—enough, it is likely, to shut the mouths of many archæologists yet unborn.

All of the reviews in this number of the North American are to be called good, we believe, though we should not call very good the critical article on Freidrich Rückert. The review of "Kirk's Charles the Bold" is, however, excellent; that of Kinglake's last volume is more than fair; and so is that of Khéyam, albeit the English translation of the mystic is perhaps praised a little more than is necessary, clever as it is; excellent again are the remarks on Mr. Whitmore's "Andros," and those on Noeldeke's "Alttestamentliche Literatur,"—which some one should translate. The notice of Dr. Bushnell's and Mr. Mill's books about the woman question hardly satisfies the reader that the reviewer is speaking out his full mind; indeed, it perhaps suggests a doubt whether he himself quite knows it; but it is well done, speaks with accurate appreciation of both the authors under examination, and says a word or two—mild enough, certainly—about Dr. Bushnell's hazardous mode of expression—which we wish that forcible and eager writer would turn over in his mind. But the first of the reviews, that of Max Müller's "Chips from a German Work-Shop," is the best of them. We may go further, and say we doubt if we know anywhere so entirely good a book-review of the more comprehensive kind. The professor is described to us so that his place as a linguistic scholar is determined; his strength and his weakness are stated with precision, and the latter is proved by lucid and cogent argumentation; we are told the contents of the book in hand and the value of it is estimated, and we are made to see where it is good and where it comes short. All this is done in a pleasing style, which perhaps has for a fault that it is slightly monotonous, and that the regularity of its movement is apt to beguile one a little, so that now and then a distinct act of attention is required to keep fast hold of the sense. But when examined it is seen to be copious, clear, and correct; and it expresses a temper under complete control, and a mind full of knowledge, trained in reasoning, and of a judicial habit. At the end of the review proper, Professor Müller is very rightly and justly rebuked for his treatment of his brother scholars, and the spectacle is edifying. The essay is in many respects a model of composition, and to find a better example of the proper method of inflicting severe but not cruel chastisement on an offender richly deserving punishment would be indeed difficult. It is a sort of work in which not unusually chastiser and chastised appear equally undignified, and to be in positions equally undesirable.

HOMERIC STUDIES.*

Herr Schliemann is a homo novus in the field of literature. He is, also, in a rather strict sense of the word, what the Germans call, after the Greek, an Autodidakt, a self-taught man. As if to explain his sudden appearance among archæologists, he gives in the preface to his "Researches" a fugitive sketch of his life. A Mecklenburger by birth, he imbibed as a child, from the amusing narratives of his father, an inextinguishable fondness for the Homeric legends and the primeval Hellenic world. When ten years old, in 1832, he presented his father with a Latin elaboration on the Trojan war and the adventures of Odysseus and Agamemnon. Four years later, however, he was obliged to enter a retail grocery store, in which he remained upward of five years, selling herrings, butter, brandy, and milk, preparing potatoes for distillation, and doing similar unclassical things. He forgot what he had learned, but continued to cherish a desire for culture. The lifting of a heavy cask, which caused a bleeding from the lungs, finally compelled him to give up his situation. He went to Hamburg, and thence tried to get to South America, but the ship which took him out was wrecked on the coast of the island of Texel, and he had to beg his way to Amsterdam, where he succeeded, however, in finding mercantile employment and leisure for studies. With extraordinary avidity and zeal he now devoted himself to the study of modern languages, English, French, Dutch, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, and Russian, which he mastered in an almost incredibly short time. Having gone as commercial agent to St. Petersburg, he established himself there, acquired considerable wealth, and added the Swedish and Polish, and an extensive knowledge of modern and ancient Greek, to his stock of languages. He then travelled through Sweden, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Egypt, Northern Arabia, Syria, and Greece, and, finally, making the tour of the world, visited, among other countries, India, China, and Japan. In 1866, he made Paris his permanent abode, determined to devote the remainder of his life to literary and chiefly archæological research. The book before us is the fruit of diligent studies, as well as of a tour, made in the summer of 1867, through the Ionian Isles, the southern parts of Greece, and Troas.

Herr Schliemann evinces great familiarity with his subjects and, in general, ample Hellenic erudition, and by dint of combining ancient and modern descriptions—Greek poetry and German prose—in an attractive way has succeeded in producing a very readable archæological narrative—if we may use this expression. But he starts with so childlike a love for heroic Hellas, and so naïve a belief in his Homer—without stating the grounds on which this belief, so contrary to the opinions of many, is founded—that we must leave it to those who may in future, with his book in hand, examine the grounds traversed by him to pass judgment upon the critical value of his antiquarian observations and discoveries. Believing the author of the Iliad and Odyssey to have composed what we might call his historical descriptions with an accuracy for which we should in vain look in the "Gerusalemme Liberata," the "Henriade," or the "Lord of the Isles," he makes a perfect agreement with the details of those descriptions the criterion in determining all legend-hallowed localities. With the aid of this criterion he easily overthrows many more or less hypothetical results obtained by former antiquarians, while only an examination of the spots concerned could enable us to decide whether his own positive assertions are not equally liable to be refuted by the same kind of argument. Many a discrepancy between the Homeric narrative and things as he finds them he himself acknowledges, and, where necessary, explains. Thus, the Odyssey speaks of the immense grain crops of Ithaca, which now produces the fourth part only of what its inhabitants consume; it speaks of swine, cattle, goats, and sheep in that island, none of which are now bred there; it tells that the swine of Eumæus were fattened on acorns, which presupposes a former abundance of oaks, a species of trees now entirely wanting. He proves that the islet of Dascalion cannot be the Asteris of that epic; but this Homeric islet must have since been engulfed by the sea if it was where he is critically obliged to place it, west of the southern extremity of Ithaca. He finds, however, no difficulty in exactly identifying in the last-named island the harbor of Phorcys, where Odysseus was landed, while fast asleep, by the Phæacian mariners; the two steep cliffs at its entrance and the adjoining dark grotto of the nymphs, whose urns, "stone pitchers," and "stone looms" are still discernible, he says, in stalactites, as Homer saw them; the ruins of the Cyclopean residence of Odysseus, on the summit of Mount Aetos, with its crumbled walls and turrets, and cisterns; the rock-hewn road by which Odysseus and Telemachus "descended from the town to the fine field of Laertes;" the field, "all around open to view," on which Eumæus built his house and twelve enclosures for the swine, ten of which are still visible in Cyclopean remains; the "rough" and "rocky" path which led the returned King of Ithaca to the abode of that faithful swineherd, and both to the palace on the Eagle Mountain; or the Homeric capital "town" of the island, on the northern continuation of the Aetos, with its two ports, north and south of the isthmus on which that mountain rises. In the many virtues he discovers in the inhabitants of Ithaca our author easily recognizes some traits of character peculiar to the Ithacans of Homer, but his picture of those secluded and ignorant islanders, so free from vice and poverty in spite of a degraded clergy and a hundred and forty-nine days of rest in the year, is too flattering to be genuine. That the dogs of Ithaca, as he says he learned to his delight on a critical occasion, can still be managed by tricks which were effectual in the good old times of Odysseus, is more likely to be true.

The author's orthodox belief in the accuracy of the Homeric epics is even more conspicuous in his identification of localities belonging to the topographical sphere of the Iliad. In arguing with Frank Calvert in favor of Hissarlik as the seat of ancient Troy, against Forchhammer, Mauduit, Nicolaides, and others, who support the claims of Bunarbashi, he adduces as an evidence for his view the movements of the Greek and Trojan combatants in the first battle described in the Iliad, which could not have been executed within the time stated, if the distance between the camp of the assailants and the besieged city had been as great as the opposite supposition would make it. In determining the location and extent of the Greek naval camp, he makes use even of the statements in the epic narrative according to which a harangue of Agamemnon's, made on board the vessel of Odysseus, was heard in the tents of both Ajax and Achilles, that is, at both extremities of the encampment, and the latter hero could, from his tent, see Nestor, who was stationed at the opposite end. We must confess arguments of this kind are more apt to elicit smiles than convictions.

A Guide-Book of Florida and the South, for Tourists, Invalids, and Emigrants, with a map of the St. John River, by Daniel G. Brinton, A.M., M.D. (Philadelphia: George Maclean.)—This is one of four works relating to Florida which have been sent to us within the year, but it alone is designed for a hand-book, and will be republished from year to year. It treats incidentally of the chief places along the land route to Florida, such as Richmond, Aiken, Charleston, Savannah, and Atlanta. Into the preparation of it, a good deal of personal and professional knowledge has entered, and it is to be recommended for its arrangement and fulness and variety of information. The printer has not done his part so well as the editor, so that, in an important sentence on page 52, south stands instead of north, and on page 84, Greek is substituted for Creek, with singular effect. Dr. Brinton, however, seems to us to have adopted a wrong practice in reversing—with due notice, to be sure—the geographical right and left when applied to rivers. In the first place this presupposes a rather feeble intellect in the travellers for whose convenience in ascending the St. John River the change is made, and then it compels the addition of the words east and west in parenthesis, both when the common rule is violated and when, as in one instance, it is recurred to. For the rest, invalids will be grateful for medical advice on which they can depend, and persons with scientific tastes, for hints of what to see and to search for in a land that has furnished and is still furnishing important data to geogony and ethnology. Dr. Brinton gives also an epitome of the political history of Florida, and a list of the works referring to the State in whole or in part. In summing up the advantages of various districts for the invalid, the doctor, after pronouncing against the interior on account of its debilitating heat, chooses the south-east coast as having the most equable climate in the United States, and the neighborhood of Miami River and Key Biscayne as being most accessible, though as yet without proper accommodations. The range of the thermometer is here the least, and food is, as everywhere in Florida, abundant and diversified. The experience of army officers stationed at this point seems to sustain Dr. Brinton's conclusion; certainly it does for the large class of invalids whose disease is of the throat and lungs. The mineral springs, however, scattered through the peninsula in great numbers, are likely to attract not a few health-seekers as well as mere tourists.

Except for its accurate map of the St. John River, we should hardly prefer Brinton's "Guide-Book," so far as it describes East-Florida, to Mr. Ledyard Bill's "Winter in Florida" (New York: Wood & Holbrook, 1869), which is, in fact, a little later than the former; and it is a sign that Florida is getting on somewhat rapidly, that a new and good hotel at Jacksonville can be mentioned, and a new railroad, connecting St. Augustine with the St. John, be declared a settled undertaking. Mr. Bill usually confirms the "Guide-Book" in its estimate of routes and houses of entertainment, while his descriptions of places are sometimes more faithful, or shall we say more graphic, than Dr. Brinton's. Thus, we should not know from the latter that the "town" of Picolata is merely the settlement of a single family, and consists of "one beer-shop, one comfortable farm-dwelling, and a few rude stalls constructed and occupied for the use of the stage-lines to St. Augustine." Of the ride to the latter place, Mrs. Yelverton has spoken in extravagant and fanciful terms in her book called "St. Augustine" (New York: G. P. Putnam & Son, 1869), which Brinton mentions with the epithet "inaccurate." Mr. Bill says the lady will cause those who trust her a bitter disappointment, for "we found this ride of eighteen miles one of the most disagreeable and miserable we ever made, and through a tract of country entirely devoid of unusual attractions." He himself appears worthy of all confidence when entitled to a hearing, and he is never too positive in matters professional. He too gives a brief history that is readable of the Spanish, French, English, and American occupations of Florida, and in narrating what he saw, what is the capacity of the State, and what the temper of the people towards immigrants, talks like a person of sense and humor, with whom one might very well have liked to travel in company. We place him alongside of Brinton in value, and think no one can fail to read him with interest. Invalids, he thinks, need go no further south than Palatka, and he is certain that Green Cove will hereafter be their chief resort; but he was also favorably impressed with the enterprise at Lake Monroe, of which Brinton also speaks respectfully.

The fourth work is an official pamphlet by Hon. J. S. Adams, Commissioner of Emigration for the State of Florida, entitled "Florida and its Climate, Soil, and Productions" (Jacksonville, 1869). It tells, as may be supposed, all that is needful to be known, prior to examination, of a State which offers cheap lands, great facilities (actual or possible) of transportation, and products both of the temperate and tropic zones; in which the orange, lemon, fig, date, banana, olive, citron, guava, pomegranate, pineapple, and other noble fruits flourish and yield bountifully, in which the sugar-cane reaches maturity, and which so abounds in game, fish, and fowl as to be styled the sportsman's paradise—a State in which, it is boasted, "a sultry night, a death from sun-stroke, or a mad dog are three things unknown," and frosts very rare. Florida has, indeed, in very many respects a peculiar attractiveness, and inclines us to indulge in high expectations of its future. The mixture of races, begun so early in that extremity of the continent, was symbolical of what has since happened to the whole Union, though the State is still unsurpassed in heterogeneity, or, if surpassed at all, only by Louisiana. When to Spanish, French, English, Greek, Italian, Corsican, Minorcan, African, Indian, and American blood, we shall add, as Mr. Bill proposes for the cultivation of tea, Chinese, the world may safely be challenged to match the conglomerate. One thing seems tolerably sure—the immediate improvement and material prosperity of Florida. In no Southern State, we believe, is there less of rancor surviving the war, or greater security for Northerners desirous to settle there. In few States, perhaps, considering its population, have so many Northern men of the right sort settled in permanence as in Florida, while it is the first in its provision for education for white and black.

The American Freemason
Is the only thoroughly independent Masonic paper in America. It advocates the reforms which have become necessary in the Masonic Fraternity, and vindicates the rights of the brethren in their Lodges—rights which, by our Grand Lodges, in their subserviency to high-degree doctrines, have been violated until, to the present generation, they are almost unknown. WIRT SIKES'S NEW BOOK.
ONE POOR GIRL:
THE STORY OF THOUSANDS.
By Wirt Sikes.

"It depicts the hard, the terrible experience of 'One Poor Girl' in this great city, in which, beyond all question, she is but the representative of numberless others. Poverty, vice, avarice, and remorseless lust are at various times ready to crush her to despair and suicide, although she is at last strangely rescued. The book is written with feeling and taste, but with the evident purpose to plead the cause of the wretched and defenceless."—The Evangelist.
Elegantly printed on tinted paper, bound in extra cloth, and sold by all Booksellers. Price $1 50.

The Week.

A FACT that we venture to say no journalist ever expected to record is that the Ring of this city and county has been thoroughly beaten in brutal impudence by the Ring which controls Kings County and Brooklyn. Nothing could much exceed the barefaced character of the frauds committed there in the late election. To begin with, the Ring members of the Board of Supervisors, in appointing election officers, coolly filled the lists with a set of their own creatures, and would not so much as let the Republican Supervisors know their names. Indignant remonstrances in the Board's room, and indignation meetings outside, and even the protests of Democratic journals, had no effect whatever; the Ring had decided on keeping in their own hands at all costs the chance of plundering the city. When election morning came, the frauds began. For example, in a polling-booth in a given district of a given ward, there were present as election officers four canvassers—all Democrats, though, by rights, two should have been Republicans; two inspectors, neither of whom was a Republican; and two clerks, of whom the Republicans were allowed to have one. A continually replenished pitcher of lager, and two whiskey bottles never allowed to be long empty, were a prominent part of the furniture. At first, voting went on quietly enough—the liquor not having begun to have its effect perhaps; but by-and-by, the canvassers being in collusion with the men who were "selling tickets," the voters would come up to the ballot-boxes with only three or five tickets in their packages, nine being the full number, and a canvasser would say, "You are short of tickets;" the voter, unwilling to go back to the end of the queue, would gladly allow the canvasser to make up the deficiency, which he would do from a little pile behind the box. It is needless to say that the vote for the Ring candidates was rather more increased in this way than that for the Constitution or for the Judiciary clause. Then when the votes were all in and the polls closed, came the making out of false returns, the exclusion of citizens from the polling-place, and the out-and-out destruction of some returns. And after this, and when the canvassers were helped home, came still further falsifying in higher quarters, and all of so unblushing a kind that the Democratic District Attorney does a thing unexampled in the late history of Democratic officials in this vicinity, and comes out in a card declaring his intention to prosecute, and calling for witnesses to frauds, and follows up this with another, assuring an incredulous world that in the first card he really meant what he said.

We read the other day, in an "uncompromising Radical" paper of Philadelphia, in the course of some abuse of Mr. Moore, the collector of that port, for not having made the custom-house take a more active part in the State election, that it was true that "Mr. Moore was an honest and able man, but what had honesty and ability to do with the management of the custom-house?" This sounds like a joke, but was a perfectly serious expression of the feeling of one tribe of politicians. It of course suggests irresistibly the enquiry whether this tribe considers honesty or ability of any use anywhere; and it suggests the answer, too. But it would seem as if even in the custom-house, and the New York custom-house to boot, they had their uses. The "drawback frauds," of which we spoke some months ago, and by which the Government has lost about a million, are at last undergoing exposure, the leading depredators being now under examination. Their plan of operations was simple, yet, by reason of the number of persons needed to work it, complex. Petroleum, tobacco, and various other articles of domestic production pay a heavy internal revenue tax; but if afterwards exported, the owner has only to carry to the Treasury proof of the payment of the tax, and of the fact of exportation, to get the tax repaid to him, or what is called "a drawback." So a whole band of persons, some in the custom-house, some outside, entered into a conspiracy, by means of which forged internal revenue certificates, false manifests, and such other documents, were duly stamped, and certified by Government officers, and, being forwarded to the Treasury Department at Washington and there approved, the drawback was duly paid. Owing to the number of persons through whose hands all these papers had to pass, and to the fact that the names of the firms claiming drawbacks had to be constantly changed, in order not to excite suspicion, the number of conspirators was very large, one or two occupying high positions in the custom-house. There is no knowing how long the thing might have lasted if one of the rogues had not got out of temper and peached. The evidence reveals an amount of depravity among men passing for respectable which is really wonderful. Perjury of course played a large part in the performance, and it does not appear that any of the confederates had any more hesitation in proposing co-operation to a new man than in asking him to engage in a business speculation.

General Butterfield has resigned, and Mr. Folger, a late State Senator, who was re-elected this year, and ran far ahead of his ticket, and of whom everybody speaks well, has been appointed to take his place. We are glad not to see any semi-official eulogies on him appearing as if by concert in the morning papers. This almost invariably means either that there is something in the past to be covered up, or that the future is doubtful, and indicates that the worthy object has himself been round through the editorial offices, mentioning some of his principal claims to popular admiration. We suppose there will be no trial of General Butterfield, but if he is going back to his post in the army, we think the time has come for that court-martial which he demanded.

It has not been usual of late years that the death of noted Americans, who got their celebrity in the days before the Rebellion, has had any interest at all for any but Americans, nor even for any Americans outside of the little circle who surrounded the deceased as his personal friends. Amos Kendall is just dead, and it is true to say that no one much cares. But once he was a sort of Veiled Prophet; half believed to be all but superhuman; fully believed to be the life and soul of Jackson's administration in all its departments; a "power behind the throne;" a creature of mystery in all his incomings and outgoings; a man whom senators who had lived for years in Washington had never laid eyes on except in dreams; a being capable of enormous labors; almost omniscient, and for all practical purposes omnipotent. Even so hard-headed a person as Miss Harriet Martineau—who, however, had set her teeth before she left England and made up her mind to reverence "the statesmen of the Republic"—speaks of him with a sort of awe. As he now appears to us, he was a shrewd, laborious, and rather ill-tempered Yankee, who made a poor enough Postmaster-General, who has not left a word behind him that any man now remembers, and who devoted the closing years of a life which now has been long obscure to accumulating money—he having had the native shrewdness to believe in Professor Morse's great invention and to go shares with him.

Mr. Robert J. Walker is another of the once illustrious statesmen and "most remarkable men in our country, sir," whose name, like Amos Kendall's, used to be in all the papers. Like Kendall, he was a Northern man—born in Pennsylvania—who at an early period of his life went into the South, and there was led into captivity by the slaveholding rulers of his adopted home; a captivity from which, however, he emerged at the time of the Kansas troubles. Buchanan had made him one of the many governors of that Territory, and his experience had half-converted him from Democracy, and more than half-disgusted him with the "old public functionary," who had been an old friend of his, but whom he left to join Douglas. Mr. Walker went to Mississippi in 1826, when he was twenty-five years old, and in nine years afterwards, such was his success at the bar and in politics, he was sent to the United States Senate, and made an able senator. He married well, so far as concerned his political purposes, being allied with the Pennsylvania Baches and Franklins, and had general good luck as well as good ability. He was a friend and adviser of Jackson's, of Van Buren's, and of Tyler's after Tyler had apostatized from the Whig faith. Under Polk, he was Secretary of the Treasury, and was reputed a good one. During the war, after Buchanan and the Border Ruffians had converted him, he became a Republican, with leanings to the War Democrats; and since the war, if we remember, he has been nebulously before the people as a writer on the finances, and as a politician struggling with decay, who was inclined to get back by way of Andrew-Johnsonism to Democracy; but we confess that we have not watched him very closely. He was dead already. He belonged to a school of politicians as nearly defunct as possible, except perhaps in some few of the Southern States, where they may reappear if the Conservatives again get hold of the reins, and in such States as Kentucky, where "dead race-horses," as Mr. James Brooks calls them, are as common in politics as live ones on the Kentucky turf. It will, however, not be long before they will all pass away and be forgotten.

Rear-Admiral Stewart, just dead at the great age of ninety-one, was a man of a different stamp from these, and so was Major-General Wool, who died three days afterwards at the age of eighty-six. The old Admiral was one of the sea-fighters, and the old General one of the land-fighters, of that early time of our history which the boys of twenty years ago used to con in all the reading-books and geographies and histories. "The defeat of Sir George Provost at Plattsburgh," the "capture of the Cyane," the "Battle of Buena Vista," are now, we suppose, replaced by equally graphic wood-cuts and letterpress in praise of monitors and heavy guns; and Grant, Sheridan, Sherman, and Farragut, instead of Decatur, Greene, Wayne, Perry, Scott, and Taylor, are to instil patriotism into young America. But the old fights and captains served the purpose well, as Lee and Davis know. Both Stewart and Wool were good officers and gallant men, the latter having selected the ground on which the battle of Buena Vista was fought, and being famous as a good quartermaster and commissary for his troops, an excellent inspector-general, and recognized as the man to whose alertness and good judgment is due our retention of Fortress Monroe; while the former was an accomplished seaman, and never met Frenchman, Englishman, or Barbary pirate whom he did not outmanœuvre or else out-fight. He was a Pennsylvanian, and Wool a New Yorker. "Old Ironsides," as Stewart was proudly called by his countrymen in the days when he was giving them more than one "glorious victory," was best known of late years as having given to the world his reminiscences of a conversation which he had with Calhoun about forty years ago, and in which Calhoun avowed the purpose of the South to break up the Union. Neither Wool nor Stewart could be said to have ever been in politics, though once Stewart's Democratic friends wished to make him President. But other men more "available" in the South carried off the prize of the nomination. What with the death of Kendall, Walker, Stewart, Wool, and Pierce in this country, Peabody and Derby in England, and Sainte-Beuve in France, the autumn has been hard on the distinguished veterans. The premature winter—premature on both sides of the water—perhaps has had something to do with taking them away.

The attempt of some thirty women to study medicine at the Medical College in Philadelphia, last week, led to a most disgraceful scene at a clinical lecture—the momentary exposure of a patient causing the male students to fall to hissing, hooting, and howling, and they crowned their blackguardism by continuing their insults in the street after the ladies had left the building. Apart from the ruffianism of this performance, its most striking feature is its ludicrousness, for there is something very ludicrous in medical students setting up as the guardians of female delicacy in hospitals or operating rooms. If the women themselves can stand this sort of thing, why should the sweet, shrinking males complain? Of course, such an ordeal is an awful one for the women, considering that they are simply qualifying for the one profession for the pursuit of which in one branch or other few now deny their fitness. But they are gaining admission to all the great medical schools of the world. They have just been admitted to the school of the Edinburgh University by the vote of a large majority of the General Council—Professor Masson showing that in the examination which had already taken place they had done better than the men. They are also studying in the school of the University of Zürich (Switzerland), their numbers there having increased within four years from one to sixteen, and, it is said, without any inconvenience, and to the marked improvement of the discipline. So that female students in Philadelphia, as well as elsewhere, may be of good heart. We confess we think it would be better for both them and the men if they could study separately, to some extent at least, and we hope machinery for this purpose will yet be provided everywhere. In the meantime, there is nothing for it but patience, and we are glad to see that public indignation has cowed the Philadelphia purists into decency.

This occurrence brings forcibly to one's sympathizing consideration the case of the patients who are used in these clinical lectures, for whom it seems to us the world has too little consideration; doctors do not seem to have a particle. It must be bad enough, when almost worn out by a tedious and mysterious and "interesting" disease or injury, to have your bed suddenly surrounded by a large body of wild-looking young men, smelling strongly of tobacco, and to be carried into a theatre and laid out before them, simply as a "case," for which the best of them would feel ashamed of showing any tenderness, and then stripped, squeezed, turned over, and otherwise mauled for their edification. Take, for instance, the poor wretch over whom the late row took place. He is suffering from an apparently incurable fracture of the thigh. One may guess to what a point of exhaustion he must be reduced. He is taken into the theatre, and forthwith laid out before a great crowd of both sexes—the males, as the sequel proved, being perfect barbarians. He is lying there, bearing, as best he may, being lectured upon, and having his leg measured—getting, in fact, a kind of foretaste of a post-mortem examination under eyes hungry for a sight of his inside—when suddenly the majority of the audience begin yelling, and hallooing, and calling names, and the minority show signs of the utmost mortification and confusion, and the assembly breaks up in wild disorder. Imagine the effect on nerves broken by suffering! Are there no Berghs to look after the victims of the "clinics?" The World sent a reporter down since the disturbance to see how the women were getting on, and found them attending the lectures without further molestation from the men, but somewhat overpowered by the horrors of an operation.

The correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette tells a tale about General Butler and Mr. Jonas French, who was an officer of Butler's in New Orleans, and now is a Boston distiller. The Ways and Means Committee discovered some months ago, or thought they did, that a good deal of the rum made in Massachusetts, and put in bond for exportation, was exported, sure enough, and the "drawback" paid to the manufacturer; but that it was simply taken round to some point in the provinces and then run in over the line again. So a bill was introduced and passed—a good specimen of our hand-to-mouth tariff legislation—which forbade peremptorily all exportation of spirits in bond. "Then came a bill," says the correspondent, "in which Butler took a very deep interest"—a bill, namely, "for the relief of certain exporters of rum." It was designed to grant a little time—sixty days—to those manufacturers who, before the first bill was passed, had contracted to deliver quantities of rum. This was fair enough. But at once Butler goes, as an attorney, before Commissioner Rollins, and, in behalf of his client, French, claims that under the bill French could not only export what at the moment he had in bond, but that he could go on for the whole sixty days manufacturing and exporting. Commissioner Rollins said no to Butler's persuasions, and said no also to his threats; so the member from Massachusetts goes into the House, and one day, "rising hurriedly," says the correspondent, he asked leave to offer a bill to correct a "clerical error" in the bill of relief above-mentioned. The clerical error to be corrected was the substitution of and for or, and the effect of the correction was to make the bill ordain that for sixty days there might be exportation of rum manufactured or contracted for, and Mr. Jonas French went on his way rejoicing. Apropos to this, it is worth mention that the great fight between Generals Butler and Schenck, which has been long pending, is positively announced, by competent persons, as likely to come off this winter. The occasional remarks which General Butler has let drop as to the pain caused him by General Schenck's course in going to California this summer at the public expense—the fact being that General Schenck, as his friends declare, has been all the time in Europe at a cost of much money to himself—are taken as an indication that quarter will be neither asked nor given.

Edward Ketchum, who was convicted of forgery nearly four years ago, and for whose release more than one effort has been made by means of petitions signed by many leading citizens of New York, has at last been discharged on the expiration of his sentence, and has been restored to his civil and political rights by a pardon. His behavior in prison was exemplary, and those who knew him well believe he was when he committed the crime the victim of an hallucination—of which we shall only say, that it is a proposition which may be affirmed of all persons who commit crimes, and we therefore object to its too frequent and public use on his behalf. He has now a chance to win back, if not his old position in society, certainly a very respectable one, as he is still young, and every one will wish him God-speed. But we think, in view of several recent events, it will not be out of place to request his friends not to make him an object of any public testimonial or demonstration, or any expression of esteem or admiration which they do not accord to young men who have never done anything wrong. The practice of selecting notorious offenders against society for "ovations," simply because they did not run away from the police, or did not do quite as much mischief as they might have done, is getting to be a little too common. As an indication of the kind of thing we mean, we may mention a compliment paid by the Evening Post to Ketchum's family, inasmuch as, although wealthy, "it was creditable to them that no attempt was made by them to obtain his release except by honorable means;" that is, that they did not bribe Governor Fenton to pardon him. If this be "creditable" to the family, it is also creditable to Ketchum himself that he did not break jail or murder a warden, and so on.

The New York Times has a special dispatch from its correspondent in St. Petersburg announcing another "triple alliance," this time between Russia, Austria, and France—it is to be presumed against Prussia—and involving the maintenance of a certain armed force. Although not introduced with the comic solemnity with which the Tribune proclaimed its celebrated "triple alliance" between England, France, and Spain against the United States, there are nearly as many reasons for disbelieving the one story as the other. All stories of this kind are to be judged by reference to the general political situation. Nobody possessing even an imperfect knowledge of English politics would have given credence to a report of an alliance between England and Spain against the United States; so, also, few who have paid even slight attention to Austrian and Prussian politics during the past year will credit a report of an alliance for any practical purpose between Russia and Austria as against Prussia.

In the first place, there is at this moment nothing of the kind better established than that there has been during the past three months a marked renewal of cordiality between the Austrian and Prussian Governments, of which the visit of the Crown Prince to Vienna has been one of the signs. Moreover, the internal difficulties of Austria are such as to make all thought of foreign complication seem positively wild. It is certain now that the constitution of the Reichsrath will have to be altered, owing to the growing and dangerous discontent of the Slavonic provinces, of which the insurrection in Dalmatia is one of the symptoms. The Reichsrath was formed in 1860, on the supposition that Hungary would surrender her autonomy. Her successful refusal has deranged the whole plan, and roused so much agitation in Bohemia and Galicia and Croatia, that some arrangements will have to be made for putting them on an equality with her, without breaking the empire up into a mere federation. The members of the Reichsrath are at present chosen by the provincial diets—that of Hungary, of course, excepted—and it is now proposed to bring the provinces closer to the central government by direct popular election; but the very mention of it has raised a storm of opposition from the Slaves. What will be done, nobody knows. Lastly, there is no greater obstacle to Russian progress in Eastern Europe, and especially to the Panslavic movement, than a liberal and strong Austria, while, unless the world has for a great many years been laboring under a monstrous delusion, a united Germany would suit Russia perfectly well if she could have European Turkey.

In Prussia the signs are equally pacific. Bismarck is rusticating on his estates; there is a deficit in the revenue—a new thing for Prussia—and the King's last speech is as peaceable as possible; the King of Saxony, in another speech, accepts the situation; and the talk of a movement on the part of Baden for admission to the North German Confederation has blown over. The Emperor of Austria, too, has gone to Egypt to be present at the opening of the Suez Canal, and France is struggling in the throes of internal reform, conducted with halting steps by an invalid ruler. In short, it is a good many years since there was less likelihood of European trouble; and if Russia has proposed an alliance to anybody with hostile intent or thoughts, she must be acting under the influence of a mania—which is not likely. European sovereigns do not play at war now as they did half a century ago.

The opening of the Suez Canal promises to be one of the greatest ceremonials of the century; but already the "economists and calculators" are doing their best to mar the occasion, by asking if it will pay. It has cost, it seems, about eighty million dollars, and has taken ten years to dig, but it is now doubtful whether it will be of much service to commerce. Travellers will prefer the railway which runs between the same points; sailing vessels can only go one way on the Red Sea during half the year, and steam vessels will only carry the lighter and more costly goods—though it must be said these constitute a very large proportion of European traffic with the East; and then the much-talked-of railroad from Europe to Hindostan, along the valley of the Euphrates, and through Persia, will doubtless one day be made. Nevertheless, Lesseps is among the lucky as well as deserving men of the age. The ascendancy he has achieved for French influence in Egypt would, thirty years ago, have made war imminent between France and England, and some European papers maintain that the Sultan's snappishness towards the Khedive is the result of English instigation, and will end yet in something serious.

THE TARIFF IN FRANCE.

THERE is an article in the last number of the (Oct. 15) Revue des Deux Mondes, which may be cordially commended to the perusal both of American protectionists and free-traders. The latter may learn something from it as to the best manner of dealing with a public strongly inclined to protection, and long accustomed to it, and but slenderly acquainted with the principles of political economy, and the former can hardly help profiting by the reflections of a French protectionist on the origin, history, and doom of tariffs in one of the most tariff-ridden countries in the world, the one, indeed, we may say, which invented tariffs, and might almost be said to have once had a distinct tariff for every square league of its soil.

The cause of free-trade in France has, as everybody knows who is at all familiar with the literature of political economy, some of the ablest Frenchmen amongst its champions. It has an active and well-managed Economical Society constantly working for it, and a periodical of great repute—the Journal des Economistes—for its organ. It has, moreover, the government on its side—and the government in France is no small force—and the itinerant lecturers on political economy which the government has of late been sending through the provinces to enlighten the working classes, as well as the professors of political economy in the universities, all preach its doctrines. Moreover, France can boast of having produced some of the earliest discoveries of the free-trade theory, and it was never preached with more force and eloquence than by the great Turgot, before Adam Smith had even been heard of out of Edinburgh. In more recent days, too, it has had an apostle of extraordinary ability and eloquence in the person of Bastiat. Nevertheless, the free-trade cause in France is in a weakly condition, and there is every likelihood that one of the first results of the resumption by the legislature of the control of the tariff, which rightly belongs to it, will be the reversal of the free-trade policy entered upon by the commercial treaty concluded by the Emperor with England ten years ago.

Now, the causes of this state of things are not far to seek. In the first place, Bastiat, in spite of the remarkable power and clearness of his expositions of free-trade doctrines, not only greatly diminished their influence on the public, but helped to close the ears of the public to free-trade preaching by his violence, and by his love of treating protection as robbery, and talking of protectionists as highwaymen. Even if this sort of talk had not been absurd it would have been highly impolitic. It irritated thousands to the last degree, and hardened the hearts of a great many more. It was also highly impolitic to push home on Frenchmen the argument about the propriety of each nation confining itself to the production of things in which it possesses incontestable natural and other advantages over other countries, because this in their case would apparently have involved their giving up everything but the manufacture of jewelry, drawing-room knick-knacks, and a few other articles, chiefly of the nature of luxuries.

But the worst mistake of all was committed in 1859. The withdrawal from the legislature of the control of the tariff was unquestionably one of the most outrageous features of the Imperial régime, as it placed the most important branch of taxation, and the very existence of immense industries employing a vast body of capital, in the irresponsible hands of the executive. But in that year a commercial treaty with England was concluded in a most provoking way. M. Chevalier, as he himself told the story last spring, in an appendix to Mr. Bonamy Price's book on the currency, negotiated it with Mr. Cobden with the greatest secrecy, concealing their meetings and their visits to the Tuileries carefully from the public, and crowing with triumph that the treaty should have been ratified without either the persons whose fortunes it affected or the nation at large getting wind of it. The free-trade cause was thus associated at one stroke both with the abuses of arbitrary power and with the concession of undoubted advantages to a foreign commercial and political rival.

Turning to the prospects of protection in France, the views of M. Alby, the writer of the article in question, will be found unusually interesting, from the fact that he has up to a certain point complete faith in protection, and is anything but an admirer of free-traders. He believes that the protection of native industry is not only a legitimate exercise of the powers of government, but often a very wise one; that the manufacturing industry of all countries owes its existence to protection; and that it is ridiculous to ask each country to confine its labors to branches of production in which it has from the outset a clear natural advantage over foreigners. Of this theory we shall only say that, inasmuch as every modern country has, as a matter of fact, resorted to protection in one form or another, it is impossible to disprove it by arguments drawn from experience; but it leaves unanswered a very puzzling question, with which, so far as we know, no protectionist writer has ever attempted to deal: Is it true that, if the plan of giving a monopoly of certain markets to the producers of certain commodities had never been resorted to, no advance in civilization would have been made since the fall of the Roman Empire? Would nobody have invented or discovered, or spun or woven? Would, in short, the faculty in man which has carried the race forward from the savage state, and produced Greek and Roman civilization, have lain perfectly dormant in modern times?

M. Alby holds that protection, as generally practised, is a form of mutual insurance against the foreigner, by which all the producers of a country, between whom and the consumers he holds there is no real distinction, agree to buy of each other only, and for a time this produces a decided effect. But in process of time, he admits, it inevitably proves illusory, as all prices get up to the same level, and each interest finds itself no better off than it was before. To make protection really effective, it can only be applied to a small number of commodities. There is no more use in protecting a dealer, if all those of whom he buys are protected too, than in trying to fill with water a bucket with a hole in the bottom. Had protection been ever scientifically applied, the leading and plainly most valuable interests of a country, and only two or three of these, would have been selected for favor, and the others left to shift for themselves. Had, too, a scientific attempt ever been made to adjust protection, so that as against the foreigner all industries would share it equally, we should know something about its real value as an instrument of human progress. As it is, we know little or nothing. The reasoning of the protectionists, on such facts as we have, would need a change in the constitution of the human mind to make it conclusive. It amounts to nothing more than an assertion that certain facts in certain countries were coexistent with or followed certain other facts, which is an argument which was reduced to absurdity some years ago, in England, by a Dr. Clarke, who maintained that, inasmuch as British industry had grown as the national debt grew, it was the debt which was the cause of England's industrial greatness.

In France, however, the tariff has grown up, not on a preconceived plan, but piecemeal, under the worrying and intriguing of each interest which wanted to be protected. M. Alby describes the process as follows, and most Americans will find something in the picture that seems very familiar:

"One day, one commodity has been protected; another day, another, sometimes by out-and-out prohibition, at others by duties so high as to be really prohibitory, and at others so low as to be ineffective, and this without any system or concert, and without any certainty as to the result. It was not a serious study of the economical conditions of the market which regulated the question, but complaints, more or less justifiable, more or less noisy, from the different industries, the influence of leading manufacturers, the good-will of the ministry of the day, the pressure of the Chambers, the fluctuations of politics. No account was made of distributive justice or equality. Take the case of the linen manufacture; it received a protection of twenty per cent. in its very infancy, while the woollen manufacture, which was powerful and well established centuries back, was covered by total prohibition."

M. Alby well remarks, there is nothing more difficult than to protect national industry effectively, and there is nothing which so many brute efforts are made to do. Under the present system, many persons think they are protected highly who are not protected at all; and others, who fancy that protection is indispensable to them, could do perfectly well without it, so little is there really known of the conditions of the problem. For instance, he says, he asked two different cloth manufacturers—whom he knew to be absolute prohibitionists, and who believed it would be impossible for them to bear up against English competition—to calculate as exactly as possible the proportion in which the duties on wool, on the value of their machinery, and on dye-stuffs, entered into the selling price of their goods." The replies from both were exactly the same. Each fixed the proportion at 30 to 35 per cent., and both were astonished by the result." The fact was that, owing to the protection accorded to the wool-growers, the iron-masters, and the duties on dye-stuffs, the cloth manufacturers had no real protection at all, but never suspected it. M. Alby thinks, therefore, that whatever may be the immediate course of the legislature, protection will before long have to be definitively abandoned in France, as unnecessary and ineffective.

THE FUTURE OF PROHIBITION.

The overwhelming defeat of the Prohibitionists in Massachusetts, Maine, and Minnesota, together with the continued German defection from the Republican ranks in New York, must give the leaders of the "National Anti-Dramshop Party" unpleasant food for reflection. Of course we do not mean to confound the question of license in New York with that voted upon in the other States we have named. The questions are, indeed, different in the minds of intelligent people, but we doubt very much whether the mass of voters drew many refined distinctions on the subject. Probably most of those who voted saw on the one side the natural right of man to liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and on the other an ascetic party of moralists determined to interfere with these rights; and voters in New York were confirmed in this feeling, no doubt, by the knowledge that some of the most prominent Republicans, while giving themselves out to be desirous of victory merely on national grounds or grounds of general public interest, were really at heart hoping to use their triumph for the furtherance of the cause of prohibition. Throughout the canvass it was very apparent that Republicans were on delicate ground, and the difficulties of their position were used with great advantage by their adversaries. It was very obvious that whatever doubts might exist as to the policy of the Republicans, there was no doubt whatever that whoever voted for the Democrats voted for "free rum." In Massachusetts, where the question was nominally also between Republicans and Democrats, but actually between prohibition and anti-prohibition, the total rout of the partisans of the former has given renewed evidence of the fact that a clear majority of the dominant party are opposed to prohibition. The Worcester Convention, it is true, went the other way; no discussion of the liquor question was allowed, and Mr. Sumner was put up to make a great speech on "national issues." But when it came to voting, the tables were completely turned. "National issues" disappeared from the scene, the Fifteenth Amendment was as clean forgot as the Eleventh or Twelfth, the negro, the payment of the debt, the very existence of the nation itself, every thought that had been supremely agitating the mind of the country for the last ten years, was in a moment as completely obliterated and dismissed as if it had never existed. Everything centred about the question whether the next Legislature was to be prohibitory or license. The result shows that the Prohibitionists are in a woful plight in their stronghold of strongholds. In Maine and Minnesota the attempt of the party to organize itself and procure some share of the governing power has proved a complete failure. It is not six months since the National Anti-Dramshop party surveyed the field and portioned out its work; it is not three weeks since Mr. Wendell Phillips said, "The three questions of the hour are labor reform, the emancipation of woman, and prohibition." Certainly as to the last he was right.

But the conflict is by no means over. It has been raging too long and too fiercely, and too many strong wills and acute intellects have occupied themselves with it. And indeed the matter is in itself too important to be decided by one popular election. What the Prohibitionists are in the habit of declaring as to the frightful results of intemperance is so sadly true that the welfare of every family in the United States may be said to be at stake in the settlement of the question. And it is to be remembered also that those who demand the absolute cessation of the sales of intoxicating liquors have placed themselves of late years on ground which is much firmer in the eyes of some people than that formerly held by them. They have in a great measure abandoned their old moral argument that a law on the subject was necessary in order to "abolish sin," and employ now as their chief weapon the argument that a prohibitory law is essential to the protection of society. Drunkenness, they say, is the natural parent of violence and crime. The riot, debauchery, and thriftlessness which it begets—these may be matters of which the State should take no cognizance; but if society may not protect itself against lawlessness, it has no rights whatever; and it can be shown, with the greatest ease, that drunkenness produces every kind of lawlessness. This specious argument has the great advantage of being in appearance strictly utilitarian—addressed to the facts of the case—and it is used with great assiduity by the Prohibitionists in every canvass. No one need delude himself with the idea that they will now abandon it. They are in a minority, and in a defeated minority, but they bide their time. Let their successful rivals make a false step, and they will find victory turn to ashes in their grasp.

The great question is, How will the Anti-Prohibitionist victory be used? and in determining this the chief field of experiment will be Massachusetts. The general impression seems to be that it will be used badly, partly because such victories have always heretofore been used badly, and partly because of the general distrust which pervades all classes as to beneficial legislation of any kind. So many proofs are given us from year to year of the total untrustworthiness of the political class in every State of the Union, that most people shrug their shoulders when they hear politicians' promises of better days to come. It has come to be regarded in Massachusetts as part of the natural order of things that in odd years the Legislature passes a prohibitory statute, in even years a license law; that each in its turn proves to be such a worthless piece of legislation that the people cannot endure it, and that its authors must, year by year, be hurled for a twelvemonth into the pit of obscurity from which, a twelvemonth earlier, they had emerged. And those who take this view are borne out by the past liquor legislation in Massachusetts. Every license Legislature has passed a law which was merely a cover for unrestricted drinking, either because it was badly enforced, or because it was not intended to do anything more than open the dram-shops. On the other hand, every prohibitory statute, of late years at least, has been so enforced as to involve its authors and supporters in hopeless ridicule. Not even the state police, specially created to strike terror into the hearts of the liquor dealers, has had any appreciable effect on the trade. They have enforced the law where they thought the influence of the Republican party would not be affected; where they were afraid of this, the most reckless publicity failed to attract their attention. If we judged from the past alone, we might certainly infer that the future was not full of hope.

But, from another point of view, there seems some reason for hope that we are not far from seeing the end of this wearisome and demoralizing agitation. It is true that the next Massachusetts legislature is not likely to be in the mass much better than that of last year or the year before, though here and there one or two shining exceptions stand out from the dull level of its general mediocrity; yet there is some evidence that the public at large will not suffer the addition of another frivolous statute to the long list of fatuous enactments which have disgraced the State. In the last few years, side by side with the indifference and apathy of large numbers of persons, has grown up a more intelligent and earnest interest on the subject in the minds of those who must in the long run decide it. The convincing proof of this was the appearance of Governor Andrew on the field. If he had lived, and returned to political life, the recent history of Massachusetts might have been somewhat different. And he is only a rather more signal instance than others we might mention. Clergymen, editors, and all reformers cease at last to look upon the question as an idle or foolish one, and may be expected in the future, we imagine, to devote their attention to the practical consideration of the evil and its remedy. What the evil is we know well enough. The remedy which is wanted is stringent legislation, which will give the public assurance that the sale of liquor is in capable and honest hands, and that the moment the sale becomes in any case a nuisance, the right to sell will be taken away. The only way to reach this end is to give the arrangement of all details into thoroughly trustworthy hands—in other words, to take it out of the hands of politicians. In the case of the last license law passed in Massachusetts, an attempt was made to vest the licensing power in a board to be appointed by the Supreme Court; but this excellent plan was prevented by the politicians. The matter was arranged so that license commissioners should be chosen by the people directly. The result was that the nomination of commissioners fell at once into the hands of the managers of the party caucuses; and so in some portions of the State strict license boards were chosen, while in others anybody was licensed who applied, and the scandal became so great that a prohibitory Legislature the year afterwards was the consequence. This preposterous example will not, we trust, be followed now. The politicians are not to be trusted in the exercise of judicial discretion, such as is called for in this matter. The only way in which a fair trial can be given to the principle is by establishing in some way a board composed of men of ability and character, who will give the subject their undivided attention, and make a "license" not a stigma of reproach, but a badge of respectability. Governor Andrew used to say that if he could have the "State Constabulary" for a year, he would so enforce the liquor law that those who wished to drink would have to emigrate, and we have no doubt he would have done it. If Massachusetts only had now another Andrew who could enforce a license law in the way it ought to be enforced, we should be in a fair way to see the last of one at least of Mr. Phillips's "three great questions." In Massachusetts the problem, one way or another, is to be solved, and the country looks to her for its solution.

"THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOLS."

Judging from what has happened in Cincinnati, and what is happening in New York, and what we see signs of in various other places, the common-school system, which may fairly be called the corner-stone of American polity, is in some danger, if not of destruction, of the loss of much of its value, owing to the angry passions which have been roused by the question known as "the Bible in the schools." It would naturally seem to an enlightened pagan, to "the two Hindoos," for instance, who are now said to be travelling in this country, that the propriety of reading a few passages from the sacred book of the Christians every morning in the schools of a community of which the vast majority of the people are Christians, and that book a repertory of the sublimest moral maxims, and of tales which, whether true or false, are inexpressibly beautiful and touching, could hardly throw the parents of the children, and their friends and neighbors, into the wildest excitement, and threaten to break up the whole State machinery of education.

But, then, if we took the pagan apart, and explained to him that not only had the Christians never come to any general agreement as to the source from which children should receive their religious instruction, whether from their family or the State, but that the sacred book had through a series of events, called the Protestant Reformation, been converted from a storehouse of doctrine, reproof, and instruction, into a kind of party ensign or standard round which the thickest of the sectarian battle had raged for two centuries, it would all become quite plain to him. The cause of the trouble we are now witnessing about "the Bible in the schools," really lies in the fact not that the Catholics think that any harm would result to their children from hearing passages of Scripture read to them—they would never think of objecting to the citation of the same words or ideas from any other source—but that the reading of the Bible by laymen, without note or comment, has become, in their eyes, a sign or test of Protestantism—a spiritual biting of the thumb at their church by its enemies. Since the great split in the church in the sixteenth century, the distinctive mark of Protestantism, as everybody knows, has been, not an acknowledgment of the right of each man to put his own construction on the language of the Bible—this no Protestant sect has ever acknowledged—but of the right and duty of each man to read it as much as he pleased, and a solemn belief that from such reading much spiritual benefit is sure to accrue. The Catholic conviction has been, on the other hand, that from such unauthorized reading by unlearned persons there must result much injury both to morals and doctrine, and at all events the loss of that unity which may be said to be of the essence of Catholicism.

In the battle which has raged since the Reformation, the mass of the combatants have ceased, as is not uncommon in such cases, to think much about the origin of the quarrel, and a great deal about the ensign under which the fighting has gone on. Hence the Catholics have got into a way of talking, and indeed of thinking, about the Bible as if it were a prolific fountain of wickedness; and the Protestants, on the other hand, as if there were a mystic virtue in the mere paper and binding of the book. A layman reading a Bible seems to a devout Catholic to have the devil behind him directing him and interpreting to him; the Protestant, on the other hand, tells stories of men whose lives were saved in battle by having a New Testament in their breast-pocket, to receive and stop the hostile ball or sabre-thrust; and a lodge of Irish Orangemen never open one of their meetings, and begin cursing their fellow-citizens, and uttering threats and denunciations against them, without reading a chapter of the Scriptures, with, considering the circumstances, an amusing solemnity.

Now, what is the duty of the State with regard to education, if it have any duty at all? Is it not to take facts as it finds them, and get the children of the community educated—if not in the way the majority think best, in the only way possible? Catholics, with their feelings about the Bible and about state schools, are facts, and have to be dealt with as facts. If it be true that a Catholic boy who is taught to read and write is less likely to commit crimes, and more likely to prove a good citizen, than if he did not know how to read or write, and he refuses to be taught if we insist on reading the Scriptures to him every morning, is it not our duty to teach him to read and write at any rate, and to give up reading the Scriptures to him? The Bible read to persons who think you are reading it to them as an act of hostility, cannot possibly do them any good, for they will not listen to it; and it cannot afford any pleasure to the Almighty to have his word read as an act of vis major, and for the torment or annoyance, or to the moral or mental detriment, of a large body of his creatures. Nor can any good result from the mere reading of the Bible without reference to its effect on the audience. No Protestant feels about a chapter of it as a Catholic feels about the mass: that you get all the benefit of it by merely being within hearing of it, whether you understand it or not. This would literally be bibliolatry, with which Protestants are often charged, but to which they have never, to our knowledge, pleaded guilty.

Then comes the other question, and perhaps the more important one—suppose we succeed in reading the Bible in the schools, are we sufficiently sure of the good effects of our reading even on Protestant children to warrant us in keeping the Catholics in a constant state of irritation, and furnishing them with a constant incentive to intrigue and agitate for the overthrow of our whole educational system, and for the appropriation of large sums of the public money for the sole and separate use of their own sectarian schools—a consummation they have nearly reached in this State? Is it well ascertained that the official reading of the Bible in school-hours, and as part of the school exercises, and as the forerunner of an irksome and weary day, is a good mode either of increasing children's reverence for it or fixing its teachings in their memory? Is not the experience of every country dead against the mixing up of secular and religious instruction, as tending to make the latter mischievous without improving the former? Do any countries turn out such an amount of atheism and materialism as those in which the religious instruction of children plays the largest part in their school life, and is most completely taken out of the hands of parents—we mean the Catholic countries of Europe? Is there, in the matter of religious teaching, any possible substitute for the home, the church, and the Sunday-school; and does anybody know of boy or girl who ever acquired a religious impression of the least value or permanence anywhere else?

We believe there is only one answer to be made to these questions, and if there be but one, and the Bible-reading in the schools be a real cause of offence to Catholics, Jews, or even infidels, and be calculated to drive them away from the schools, toward the expenses of which they contribute, or to endanger the school system, the part of wisdom and the part of Christian charity, let us say, would seem to be to give it up without fighting over it, and running the risk of making a concession which should be a means of conciliation, wear the appearance of a trophy won in battle. They greatly mistake the character, needs, and capacity of the Catholic organization who flatter themselves that Protestants have only to persist and the storm will blow over. The Catholic Church exists to prevent such storms from blowing over, to stop all compromises on a certain class of questions, of which this is the chief. The mere keeping alive of the controversy is a piece of church work, to which a whole army of men is devoted; nay, there is nothing probably they less desire than the abandonment of the Bible reading, for its continuance paves the way for that better thing for them, the establishment, with state funds, of schools of their own.

Moreover, zealous Protestants need not fear that they will be held accountable by the Almighty for not reading the Bible to people who do not want to listen to it. Unless we are greatly mistaken, each person is responsible—first of all, for his own reading, and, secondly, for the persuasion, simply, of such others as come under his influence. Nor need they feel too great a weight of care about the children of Catholics, Jews, and infidels. In this they imitate some of the worst weaknesses of His Holiness the Pope, who, not so long since, thought proper to rob a poor Jew of his son. When the Creator of the universe permits the existence of so many of these people on the globe, allows them to marry and have offspring, and enjoy a reasonable amount of such happiness as the world has to bestow, we may be sure he will not be hard on the rest of us for teaching their children the rudiments of knowledge, without insisting on their listening to our reading of the Word. There is, also, one would say, enough in the consideration of our own shortcomings to make us at least tolerant—for we are bound to say that we are acquainted with but few Protestants whose character would not need a touch or two to bring it to perfection. Of course we do not mean to say that Protestant concessions on this point will cause Catholics to give up their efforts to procure an apportionment of State funds for religious schools of their own, though we trust the time will never come when Protestants will not resist the appropriation of public money for any such purpose by every means in their power. With regard to this, there must be no wavering; but it will always make a difference whether we oppose it as the champions of impartial secular education or education with a good Protestant tincture in it. p.463

THE VANDERBILT MEMORIAL.

All of Mr. Vanderbilt's acts have been in a sense private acts; which consideration has not, however, exempted all of them from public criticism—some of it, certainly, not gracious. The fact is that many of "the Commodore's" acts have touched the public, more or less nearly, in a spot which is tender. When a gentleman's hand is discovered to be pretty regularly in the general pocket, he will inevitably find himself the subject of public remarks; and this though it be his own proper good that he seeks, and seeks with energy and industry and admirable consistency. So, then, though he may have paid for it himself, and has set it up on his own railroad station, got by his own hand, we do not apologize for saying an abusive word or two about the "Vanderbilt Memorial Bronze," which henceforth charms the eye at the Hudson River Railroad Depot in St. John's Park.

There is about it in general and in particulars a curious appropriateness, a fitness to the exploits and fame it is to celebrate; this at least the artist may claim as an advantage that his work has over most modern sculpture of the memorial or any other kind. It crowns with monumental incongruousness one of the most vulgar-looking of all staring brick buildings. The brute utilitarianism—not without its own perfection—which is expressed by the big brick-and-mortar freight-depot, is made the more obvious by the attempt—abortive though it be—to crown the ignoble substructure with something noble and fine. But it merely suggests the noble and fine, without being such in any degree; and the attempt makes ridiculous what before was at worst only disagreeable. Thus unfortunate in its position and general effect, our bronze is equally so in its detail; and if it is not on that account less happy in its appropriateness, it certainly is not therefore more to be admired. Audaciously or ignorantly, it disregards all laws—of harmony, of grace, of perspective, or of anything else. "The Commodore" himself, larger than life, stands in a niche in the centre of the work. The figure, stiff and without dignity, is dressed in the fur-lined or fur-lapelled overcoat, which is understood to be the usual wear of the original. At either side, extending for a rod or two, is a sheet of bronze, filled up, in what may be called the higgledy-piggledy manner of grouping, with the simulacra in bronze of various objects, representing symbolically facts and events in Mr. Vanderbilt's career. There is the image of the humble boat in which, in the years when he was poor but honest, he carried passengers from the Battery over to Staten Island. There, near it, under a head of steam that she never knew in life, is one of the vessels of the Pacific Mail line, in which, in later years, he transported many more passengers, with much less comfort and much less safety, from this city to the Isthmus and California. There, also, may be seen the vessel which he magnificently gave the Federal Government when the rebellion broke out, and when it was rather more unprofitable to keep a vessel in her dock than it was to give her away to anybody who would take her. There, too, are the figures of bee-hives, which ingeniously typify the industry and devotion to business of a man who never served the country at large, nor the State, nor the city, in any public office; nor ever spent the time which is money in advancing the cause of any charity; nor in promoting education, which the self-made man may despise; nor in fostering the arts, which can always wait. There are the railroads and the river-boats, which are witnesses to an energy and a business sagacity which before now have bought whole legislatures, debauched courts, crushed out rivals, richer or poorer, as the unmoral, unsentimental forces of nature grind down whatever opposes their blind force, and which have given Mr. Fisk and other gentlemen a lesson, which even they have not yet wholly mastered, in watering stock to the discomfiture of small stockholders of all ages and both sexes. In short, there, in the glory of brass, are portrayed, in a fashion quite good enough, the trophies of a lineal successor of the mediæval baron that we read about, who may have been illiterate indeed; and who was not humanitarian; and not finished in his morals; and not, for his manners, the delight of the refined society of his neighborhood; nor yet beloved by his dependents; but who knew how to take advantage of lines of travel; who had a keen eye for roads, and had the heart and hand to levy contribution on all who passed by his way.

Perhaps some of our readers may have had the fortune to go to California or to Europe in steamships of which Mr. Vanderbilt had the control. They know, then, with how much respect the travelling public ought to recollect him. The accommodations on board the vessels, the food that was served, the condition as to seaworthiness of the ships themselves, and the efficiency of the officers and crews, the way in which the traveller was cared for whenever, by act of Providence, one of the steamers was wrecked or delayed, will be fresh in the memory of everybody who, by seafaring, has ever contributed of his substance to increase Mr. Vanderbilt's store. Others of our readers have perhaps put their earnings into the stock of the recently consolidated Central and Hudson River Railroad; or have paid passage-money on those well-managed roads; or have tramped a mile or two through the snow at midnight to "make connection," and thus assist the Commodore in "fighting" some other "big railroad man" who wanted a certain part of the public all to himself, and probably may have needed to have it for the sake of saving a road which the Commodore wished to capture. And no doubt others may have been "cornered" by "the old man" in Wall Street; or have gone with him before certain of our judges with whom he has acquaintance; or have ridden on ferry-boats with well-armed friends of his, to the number of fifty or sixty, who were crossing the water to levy war on the Erie cash-boxes and Mr. Daniel Drew; or have called on him with subscription papers at the beginning of hard winters; or in some other way have personally had a taste of the qualities in him which Bishop Janes! and Mr. A. O. Hall, and Mr. Horace Greeley now ask us to honor.

Are any of us honoring them? Courage, tenacity, a capacity "to toil terribly," energy—these are of course sure to secure a certain amount of what may be called respect, whether they are found in the butcher or in the noble dirty-white animal which follows at the butcher's heel. But are not some of us honoring them as we see them employed in the careers of our "kings of the street," and "railroad men," and "giants of the stock exchange," and "king pins of the gold room?" Uncharitable judges have charged the Board of Brokers—who, yesterday was a week, had a burlesque "unveiling"—with only pretending to laugh at Mr. Vanderbilt, whom, say these censors, every one of them envies and admires, and would imitate if he could. But there is something essentially laughable in the spectacle of a man's putting out his own cash to pay for civic honors to himself. Read of such things in the dull annals of the later Roman empire—how his fellow-citizens came to the most noble So-and-so, and gravely informed him that it had been voted that a statue of him should be set up in the Market Place, and how the distinguished man as gravely made answer that the honor alone was enough—was too much, and that he must beg to bear, himself, the money charges of erecting the memorial—thus read in musty history, the thing provokes a smile; and how else should it be when we have before us in the flesh the public-spirited citizen who is willing to pay such homage to virtue? Nevertheless, the censors we have mentioned are not, we imagine, so far in the wrong in their view of the brokers' character and views; and should we go too far if we widened the scope of the charge, and made it cover not the Wall-street men alone, but the whole people? Do we not as a people, if not admire, at least not execrate, nor even practically at all visit with condemnation, the acts of men like Drew and Vanderbilt, and, to go a step lower, the Fisks and Goulds? Perhaps those who live in great commercial centres lay too much stress on the evidence which seems to make in this direction. Yet it was in a country of hay-fields, and small shops, and fishing smacks, and little congregations of a hundred or two hundred souls that Butler was sent to Congress. And he was sent because he was "smart."

There is too much truth in the statement that the tendency to-day in this country is to count up our list of peculiarly American virtues as consisting of audacity, push, unscrupulousness, and brazen disregard of others' rights or others' good opinion; that we make no sufficient objection to a display of unmitigated and immitigable selfishness, if only it be a splendid display—if only it be crowned by success, by the acquisition of wealth or power. Yet we are not going to say that this is all the truth; or at all events, that as yet there is more than a tendency among us to this condition of mind; nor that other tendencies are not developing which will in good part neutralize this one. That, after all, is our best hope—to set in motion as soon as possible as many as possible nobler tendencies of thought, and feeling, and better ways of looking at life. Prevention is better than cure—is in fact, if one may say so, the only perfect cure. Meantime the negative mode of procedure—that of scoffing at the so-called successful men—has its uses too.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, October 28, 1869.

LORD DERBY died last Saturday, and I must devote a few words to the memory of a man who, with all his shortcomings, enjoyed to the last a singular degree of popularity. Both parties regret his loss, and there is not a paper without some words of regret for the gallant old statesman whom we have lost. People are popular for widely different reasons, but the popularity of Lord Derby is a rather curious phenomenon. He was not popular on account of engaging manners, for to say the truth he had more than an average share of the haughtiness of the genuine aristocrat. He kept his followers at a distance, though retaining their esteem. Nor did he win popularity by consistent advocacy of any uniform policy. He began life as an ardent Whig, and ended it as the Conservative leader; and though a staunch Conservative, he was a consenting party to the ingenious devices by which Mr. Disraeli tricked the Tories into passing a democratic measure. Neither was he popular from exhibiting any true genius for statesmanship. His last words in the House of Lords were a pathetic protest against the irresistible advance of the reforming spirit; his ignorance of finance and of political economy was proverbial; and in short, though a dashing skirmisher, he had no pretensions to be a political general. Yet Lord Derby was popular, and for reasons which have really some weight. His antagonists admired his gallantry, and no one doubted his chivalrous sense of honor. He was a straightforward, hard-hitting debater, who met his enemies face to face, and never struck a foul blow; he had the humorous vein which always pleases the public fancy, as was illustrated by his well-known retort to the Duke of Argyll, when he struck out a proverbial saying, "It amuses him and it doesn't hurt me;" and it must be reckoned amongst his claims to general favor that he kept race-horses, and, which is more to his credit, presented the singular phenomenon—daily growing more singular—of an honest man on the turf. It must be added to his graces that he was a good classical scholar, and so kept up a tradition which is gradually dying out amongst English statesmen. A few men still venture upon classical quotations in Parliament, and Parliament always tries to prove that it can construe them by hearty applause; but the device is growing somewhat old-fashioned. In short, Lord Derby was a good type of the results of that kind of education which is imparted to the English nobility at Eton in the practice of field sports and in political contests. He was brave, honorable, ignorant, and generous; a scholar and a gentleman, and, if not exactly a statesman, a vigorous player in the game of politics. We liked his pluck, his eloquence, and his dash. It will be well if the new school of politicians are as disinterested and free from all taint of corruption and time-serving; but, as Becky Sharp observed that she would have been a good woman on ten thousand a year, they will perhaps say that they too would have been honorable if they had been earls with large landed estates, and placed far above all dependence on office, either for money or influence.

His death will have little political significance. His time had gone by, and age had tamed his rhetorical fire. When I last heard him speak, the performance was rather painful than exciting; it was evidently beyond his power to do more than rise at intervals from a dead monotony to some likeness of his former self. The elevation of Lord Stanley to the House of Peers will not, I think, produce any great effect. There has long been a very queer contrast between him and his father. "If my father knew anything," he is reported to have said, "he would be a very able man." The difference between them was the inverse of that which ordinarily exists. The old man long retained the fire and restlessness of youth; the young one was always grave and self-possessed, and distinguished by cold common sense, without any sparks of what we call genius. Great expectations were entertained at one time of Lord Stanley's abilities; but I fear they are not likely to be realized. He has shown the failings more conspicuously than the virtues of his temperament. It is no secret that he has but little sympathy with the hot-headed members of his party; and it might be hoped that he would act as a useful restraint upon them—holding them back from an obstructive policy, though continuing within the limits which his birth and family connections had imposed upon him. The result has been different. He has hesitated enough to excite the distrust of his followers, but not enough to refrain from accompanying them into their worst follies. Mr. Disraeli used him to give a certain air of respectability to his proposals, and I fear that his character for statesmanship has rather suffered in the process. He has defended measures which it was obvious that he did not approve in his heart, and has shown that the coolness of his head could not prevent him from sacrificing as much as genuine bigots to party necessities. He will be more independent in his present position; and has undoubted merits as a good administrator and a man of solid information; but he does not seem to have the power of exciting the sympathies or conciliating the confidence of any party; and I doubt whether he will rise to be more than a useful minister or a sensible critic of hostile measures. There is a certain chilliness about him which damps any rising enthusiasm.

Meanwhile, we are now at a period when men's opinions change rapidly, and those who die are rapidly forgotten. Great questions are coming up every day, which excite an interest in political affairs such as has not been equalled for years. Next session promises to be most unusually exciting. There is plenty of room for the "coming man," though we have not as yet determined who is to appear in the character. Our present leaders have their hands full, and cabinet councils at an unnatural time of year testify that they are preparing for the coming campaign. The Irish land question will, of course, occupy a prominent place, and there are abundant indications which indicate already its extreme difficulty. There is, indeed, this difficulty at the bottom of it all, whether any conceivable concession will do much to conciliate Ireland. Last Sunday, as I was crossing Hyde Park, I plunged into the middle of the Fenian demonstration for obtaining the release of the prisoners. I cannot, however, give you any accurate report of the speeches, nor even any account of the success of the meeting. There was a procession, with a variety of flags—the stars and stripes amongst others—and a few excited orators on chairs and benches. But the Fenian element was utterly swallowed up by the spectators. It was a fine day, and huge masses of Cockneys fairly swamped the genuine Irish. Everybody seemed to be cracking walnuts and smoking pipes, and generally having a very good time in the best possible humor; no policemen or soldiers were visible; and, in short, I seemed to be present at a popular picnic instead of a rebellious demonstration. I had not the good or ill luck to penetrate to the kernel of the crowd, or discover any new lights upon the subject.

But, if Fenianism in London is a very inoffensive kind of phenomenon, Fenianism, and the feelings which it represents, are very serious in their native country. Mr. Gladstone's letter, explaining the impossibility of releasing the prisoners—and, I may add, expressing the unanimous opinion of the English—has been received with a chorus of derision by the Irish papers. Indeed, their articles have been so seditious that the Pall Mall Gazette—which, it is true, has a leaning towards strong government—has been demanding their prosecution. You are, I fancy, tolerably familiar with the characteristics of Irish eloquence, and will not care for new illustrations. It is enough to express their general line of argument, which is simply that this is the last occasion on which Irishmen will appeal to their oppressors by constitutional means, and that the next messages will be conveyed to us by means of powder and shot. How much of this is mere bluster, and how far it corresponds to the general feeling of the country, I do not know. There can, however, be little doubt of the prevalence of a very uncomfortable state of mind. I heard, a day or two ago, of a very intelligent Irish gentleman in the neighborhood of Dublin who refused an invitation to spend Christmas in England, on the ground that he could not leave the ladies of his family alone at so critical a time. He said that the feeling resembled that which preceded the rebellion in 1798, and looked forward to very unsettled times, if not to an actual outbreak. I lay no stress upon this, but the uneasiness of Irish feeling is obvious. Agrarian outrages continue, and in parts of the country the houses of the gentry are provided with revolvers and rifles, and prepared to stand a siege or at least repulse an attack. However exaggerated these statements may be, it is obvious, I think, that the Irish people are very generally disaffected; that the disestablishment of the church is taken as a concession to fear, and not an act of spontaneous justice; and that there is a strong desire to try a further application of the same remedy. The party of "irreconcilables" is as strong there as in France. The immediate question is, of course, the land; and we can only ask whether it is possible for English ministers to propose, in a House of Commons consisting in large part of landed proprietors, any measure which will have any chance of success and at the same time any chance of appeasing Irish agitators. It will undoubtedly be said, and with much truth, that whatever is granted, short of taking ourselves off entirely, more will be asked; and this reflection will be made by a large party into a sufficient pretext for doing nothing at all. The Liberal school will maintain that we must do justice, improve the position of the people as much as possible, and trust to time to efface hostilities gradually. Meanwhile, the immediate prospect is unpleasant.

The Temple controversy continues. Dr. Pusey raves at Dr. Temple's heresy. The Dean of Ripon (a well-known Evangelical, Dr. McNeile) declares that Dr. Temple is bad, but that Dr. Pusey is as bad as two Dr. Temples. The first, he says, gives us a cup openly marked poison; the second an equally poisonous cup, marked syrup. It is a good and joyful thing to see brethren dwelling together in unity.

FRANCE.—THE BEAUMONT DUELS.

PARIS, October 29, 1869.

SEVERAL small incidents have created here within the last fortnight a somewhat lively sensation, and are tending to prove the unity of public feeling upon certain points of social interest. The one that has made the most sensation is the duel of Prince Metternich with the Comte de Beaumont. This is only the continuation of a scandal that has now lasted nearly a month, and divided public attention with politics and the Pantin murder. About the same moment when the corpses of the unfortunate Kinck family were discovered in the Chemin Vert, there came vaguely news of a duel that had been fought between the Comte de Beaumont and the Vicomte de Halley Claparède, in which it was said the latter had been dangerously wounded. Little by little the whole tale was unwound and became matter of notoriety and comment, and it was known that the lovely Madame de Beaumont was the cause of the duel fought by her husband, and which first duel was in a few days followed by a second one with M. de Maugny, who was also wounded.

In order to make the foreign reader understand the real importance of what has happened, it will be necessary to go back a few years, and give a short description of the state of French society and its various modifications. Up to the fall of the Orleans monarchy in February, 1848, society in Paris had been, according to the tradition of two centuries, above all, intellectual, and, according to the habits since the Restoration of 1815, remarkably simple, and even severe, as to both manners and morals. When 1848 had thrown down everything, "society," you may say, ceased to be. People went into the country, shut themselves up, believed they were ruined, and in no way whatever did they give signs of any desire for amusement. When the empire came (with certainly the reverse of a good reputation in the way of morality), what lay before it socially was a blank. The Orleanists, Legitimists, and Republicans of fair standing joined together in this respect, and only congregated amongst themselves. Salon life, upon a large scale, was dead, and what outlived was bitterly hostile to the empire. Louis Napoleon married, and, as far as French society went, married ill. A Spaniard, utterly unintellectual, and, relatively even uneducated, seemed a terrible anomaly to people who still hold to the notions of the grand siècle in this respect. It was found impossible to create a social "world" in Paris; almost impossible to find a "household" for the Empress. The foreigner was had recourse to; and at Compiègne the invitations were chiefly accepted by English, Spanish, Italian, and Polish people, with a large make-weight of Mexicans, Chilians, Brazilians, and other outlanders. There were few or no Russians or Germans.

After the war of 1859, the Emperor, wishing to imitate his uncle in all smaller details, begged for the Prince de Metternich as ambassador, and his request was granted. From this moment dates what is now known under the name of la grande cocodetterie; the inauguration of whatever was noisy, vulgar, silly, vain, obtrusive, and tasteless in the domain of fashion and art. Then came Worth, with his five and six thousand dollar dresses, and Thérèse with her indecent songs, and Offenbach with his travesties of everything elevated or noble in the past, whether of history or poetry. Then came the reign of Madame de Metternich and the few women who had no objection to associate themselves in the sort of amusements she introduced. Of all that followed it is not easy to speak, for the details would be indelicate even under the most guarded pen. Suffice it to say that the words cocodès and cocodettes became synonymous in the minds of the Paris population with the kind of persons who are not generally spoken of in respectable houses. At race-courses and theatres the cocodettes were frequently insulted, and people of good breeding and good principles got to say, "What an example does all this give to one's children!" But the worst was to come: the higher and better portion of French society, which had held firm against the empire, came to a sort of social compromise, never went to court or to Compiègne, but fraternized with those who did. In this way many young women whose mothers and aunts lived only in their family coterie, became more or less the fellow-pleasure-seekers of the cocodettes. The fairest of all was Jeanne de Beaumont, as she was called, sister to the wife of Marshal McMahon, born Mlle. de Castries. She married, about three years back, the young Comte de Beaumont, formerly an officer in the army. A handsomer couple never were seen; he, tall, dark, with a most manly bearing and expression; she, slight and fair, delicate-featured, and graceful as a fawn. "Est elle ravissante cette Jeanne de Beaumont?" were the words that you heard upon her passage, wheresoever she passed.

The most severe never thought harshly of Madame de Beaumont, but said what a sad pity it was that so perfectly charming a creature should be so frequently in the society of women (and men) of the species she frequented. However, it was urged in excuse that "good" society in France was really too dull, and that the "fast" set were, at all events, amusing. M. de Beaumont (as he has proved) was not a man to support the faintest breath upon his wife's fair fame, but his attachment to her was strong, and as she was high-spirited as an English girl, he did not oppose her desire for amusement. One day, however (these are the facts given to publicity), Madame de Beaumont's correspondence with several of the most famous cocodès being found by her husband, he disapproved of the tone in which they ventured to address his wife. Hence one duel, and then two and three duels, and, it is now asserted, a fourth. Hitherto, M. de Beaumont has severely wounded all his adversaries, and very nearly killed Prince Metternich, having cut the artery of his arm. The entire public sides with Comte de Beaumont in all this, both from the extreme disfavor into which latterly the grande cocodetterie has fallen, and (in the last episode) the exceeding discredit which, in every sense, hangs to the name of Metternich. But the particular moment in which all this has occurred gives to it its particular importance. At the very period of time when the Empress is offending public feeling by her strange flitting to the East, and when the bad examples given by the rich and influential of this world are said to have had their share in turning the brain of the wretched murderer of the Kinck family (making him believe that money was omnipotent), at this identical hour breaks out the Beaumont drama, and the repute of a family much respected and of the most charming of Parisian beauties is tarnished by their contact with the very worst of the leaders of the cocodetterie. It is for this reason that the several duels of M. de Beaumont have had a greater retentissement than they would otherwise have had. People see another link in the chain of social degradation, and say, "There! see to what the empire has brought French society!"

Correspondence.

THE WOMAN'S PARLIAMENT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: A writer in the Nation of Oct. 28 says: "A regular and permanent parliament is to be organized by women, having committees to prosecute distinct investigations," and adds that, "as it cannot legislate, it will be simply a debating club, and, therefore, a little ridiculous."

If distinct branches of investigation are to be prosecuted, it will not be simply a debating club; and, even as such, it would not be ridiculous, debate being necessary when reform is intended. He asserts that all arguments upon the subject of woman's rights are exhausted, and that those who advocate the emancipation of woman have got to the point where one party cries, "I say it is," and the other replies, "I say it is not." Here the reader asks, "What is it that is, or that is not? Is it the emancipation of woman?" The writer explains thus, "Take, for instance, the question, Would a woman make a good lawyer?" thus running the question into one of woman's capacity for a particular profession which has no particular connection with a right to vote. He adds: "The world craves facts, and will not budge an inch further till it gets them;" in which statement the woman's parliament will heartily concur, its organization being for the purpose of showing that woman's suffrage should be a fact.

He states that the advocates of woman's rights are trying to overthrow the relations of the sexes, and to break up the ties of home. Will he explain how society can be thus revolutionized by the simple fact that women will be admitted to vote for their representatives?

He says: "The success of co-operative housekeeping would, if managed by women, produce more effect on the public mind than forty parliaments sitting for half a century each." Women might succeed in co-operative housekeeping for a century, yet not obtain the right of suffrage, even if they demanded it. The parliament has its own work to do—that of enlightening both men and women upon the subject; and it would be well if there were a parliament in every State, and a debating club in every village, in the country, to show men that they are treating women with injustice, and to arouse women to the consciousness of the state of subjection in which they are living.

One reason why the writer doubts whether women should obtain political rights is, that "there runs through many of their public utterances an undertone of comedy, which makes a painful impression in view of the seriousness of the work in which they profess to be engaged." If, in the Woman's Parliament, it should be said that, as woollen and cotton goods, and boots and shoes are not so well made now as thirty years ago, men should therefore not be allowed to vote, there might seem to be an undertone of comedy in the remark. Yet it is gravely suggested that suffrage should not be accorded to woman, because "they say cookery has greatly declined. Doctors differ; another "they" says that cookery has improved. Let the fact be brought to the test, and let every woman who can make a good loaf of bread, and can cook a beefsteak well, be allowed to vote. Let those who cannot be left to the present "aimlessness and listlessness of their lives." Will this satisfy their critic?

If the arguments put forth against women's emancipation often awaken in them a sense of comedy, it is more than balanced by the deep undertone of tragedy felt by them on reading a sentence like the following, quoted from an article upon "France," in the same number of the Nation:

"Human thought is not compressible absolutely. All that the hard hand of power can achieve is to block up the nobler issues of its nobler currents. It can be forbidden a whole generation to live publicly—that is, to enjoy the invigorating, healthy life of a free community, to which every public event is a natural portion of existence. But the mental energies that would take part in public action and public thought cannot be annulled; the only plan is to give them some food. Instead of healthily, they are *un*healthily fed, and in that work the Jesuit is a master."

Jesuits may forbid a generation to enjoy the healthy life of a free community; but all men forbid it to all women; and having done so from generation to generation, demand that they shall, out of their low subjection, rise to the highest rank as lawyers and merchants, in order to prove that they have capacity for freedom.

"Politics," Dr. Arnold said, "are the most natural and grandest occupation of the human mind. Deprive a nation of them, and the public thought is rapidly degraded." Women having always been deprived of this grandest occupation of the human mind, every careless writer fancies he may laugh at her efforts to participate in this natural occupation, instead of honoring such efforts, as he should do, even if there be reiteration and declamation in her earnest appeals to whatsoever there may be of justice in the mind of man, her present master. X.

[If several weeks had not elapsed since the article to which the above is a reply appeared, we would let "X.'s" letter pass without comment. But most of our readers will probably not remember with sufficient distinctness what it was the Nation said to understand how completely wide of the mark our correspondent's observations go. It is, however, nearly enough to say that the article in question did not treat of the efforts now making to secure the suffrage for women; it treated of the efforts now making to abolish what Mr. Mill calls "the subjection of women," and to put them on a footing of complete equality with men both in rights and duties, both in the household and in the forum; and the "subjection of women" being a part of the very framework of modern society, as Mr. Mill shows, to abolish it is to "revolutionize society." This, "X." will excuse us for repeating, is exactly what the champions of women's rights seek, and what in our opinion they have to seek, if they move in the matter at all. Woman's suffrage is merely a means—one of many—of attaining their end. "X." will pardon us, also, for observing that it is nowhere "gravely suggested" in the Nation "that suffrage should not be accorded to women because they say cookery has greatly declined." What was "gravely suggested" was that the general belief that the art of cookery had declined was producing an effect on the public mind prejudicial to the theory of woman's fitness for the various employments and occupations now monopolized by men. The suffrage, let us add, is not as constantly in our minds as it seems to be in "X.'s." We do not believe female voting will bring on the millennium, or convert women into saints or sages. We are too familiar with the spectacle of rascally male voters to indulge in any illusions on the subject; but we are deeply interested in all attempts to give women something to do and to live for besides marriage, and therefore are anxious to have them choose the wisest methods of bringing about whatever social changes are necessary to this end.—Ed. Nation.]

THE ADVOCATES OF THE WOMAN'S CAUSE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Every cause has its champions, but those of the woman's cause are the oddest. It is interesting and amusing to notice the perfect naïveté with which many of them trace effects to causes. One writes an article on "Imprisonment for Insanity," telling of a woman whose cruel husband placed her in an asylum when her mind was unimpaired. The narrator draws the conclusion that such things occur because women can't vote. Another draws a picture of the "Social Evil and the National Health," and affirms that if women had the ballot they would be healthier. To all cases of ill-treatment of women they tack on this moral: Let women vote, and evils—social, physical, political, and moral—will be abolished this sphere. They trace certain effects to existing states of society with which they have no more connection than pork has with pig-iron. Now, it is this kind of advocacy which is one of the greatest weights upon the cause in this country. What it wants is educated, intelligent, thinking supporters. It needs men and women who can reason as well as assert. But if such a one offer his support, no matter how loyal he may be to the principles, if he does not fall in heartily with those who rant rather than reason, those who call themselves the leaders turn upon him, and undo all his work by personal abuse. The cause has no more efficient champion than Wm. Lloyd Garrison; yet how quickly the Revolution forgets this when he dares to say a word against that paper and its method of work. It is to be hoped that the new journal which is talked of will be an organ of a higher order than the one now existing. It is to be hoped that it will contain logic as well as assertion; that its articles will be candid discussions, not personal attacks; that reason will take the place of extravagant prophecies, and that common sense will find some place. It should be devoted to such a class of advocates as would take thoughtful views of the subject, and present them to thinking people. Soon the cause would gain the kind of support which it finds in England, and which makes it so strong there. But as long as men and women who can think clearly, and to the point, are kept in the background because they are "too conservative," and those who resort to wild theories and denunciation rather than discussion are placed in the front rank, the cause is in poor hands to be successful. K.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Mr. Carleton announces that he is about to publish "Strange Visitors," which contains communications from the spirits of thirty-six such famous authors as Irving, Thackeray, Byron, Humboldt, Charlotte Brontë, Mrs. Browning, Willis, and Humboldt. "A sensational spiritual book" it is described as being, which means, doubtless, that some book-maker has concocted it out of his own fond imaginations, and that it is meant for sale on steamboats and in the back-country.——Mr. E. Mulford is the author of the work mentioned by us last week under an incorrect title. It is really entitled "The Nation: The Foundation of Civil Order and Political Life in the United States," and Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, as already announced, are to publish it. Mr. Mulford, we are given to understand, is a graduate of Yale and an Episcopalian clergyman, resident in Connecticut. He is at present without a parish, by reason of continued ill-health for some years, and has devoted himself to his favorite branch of study; but he has not, so far as we learn, ever published anything. This work, if—as we sincerely hope it may—it should worthily fill the field its author has chosen, will do good service, for the people are not many, even among those who make most noise about the rights of man, and of woman, and the duties of governments, who know anything whatever about such subjects. There is a large class among us who seem to think that to quote the Declaration of Independence is to solve all questions of government, from settling the Alabama claims or the tenure of judicial office down to the grading of a city street. These, let us hope, Mr. Mulford may do some good, even though it should be necessary to catch them young and teach them while yet they are in high schools and colleges.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers will republish "The Pope and the Council," by "Janus," of which we spoke last week in these "Notes." The same firm's "Midsummer-Night's Dream," in Konewka's beautiful silhouettes, is delayed till December 1. Messrs. Roberts Brothers also announce Dr. Hedge's new book, "The Primeval World of Hebrew Tradition."

—"Carl Benson," writing in the Turf, Field, and Farm, tells about one of Tennyson's poems a story which we suppose based on good information, and accurate as well as true. The poet dreamed once that he was riding in company with two friends of his, members of the Sterling Club, across a bare, bleak, and desolate heath. By-and-by they came upon an inn which was in ruins. There a ragged hostler took the horses, and a shaky, seedy waiter led them into a parlor drearier and dismaller than even the worst of English country taverns. "Now that we are here," said one of the party, "we must call for something to drink, for the good of the house. Waiter, bring us some ale." To this order the shabby waiter responded solemnly in the negative: "As much smoking as you please, but no drinking;" and he added the reason: "This is hell." At this unexpected and startling announcement Mr. Tennyson awoke, and keeping in mind his "vision when the night was late," he produced "The Vision of Sin," which is perhaps fully as good as all but a dozen or so of his pages, and we do not know that the vigorous stanzas embodying the tavern part of it are not as good as any of the rest. The philosophizing and moralizing part is good too, however, being in the ornate style disused latterly by Mr. Tennyson in favor of the elaborately simple style, and disused rather too much, perhaps.

—Oxford slang is the subject of an essay in the November Macmillan's, which contains half a dozen or more samples of the slang in vogue for the moment among the undergraduates in the university. It is not the regular university slang; that may rather be described as a collection of useful technical terms—"smalls" and "greats" and "plough" being legitimately enough used in university parlance to express things peculiar to the university life. The slang the writer treats of is that which is used by the young men as young men, and which, unlike the mere slang of the place, influences the slang of non-university mankind. Trivial and foolish enough it seems when examined in cold blood at this distance; but if the sight of it shall induce any poor youth to retrace the steps he may have already taken in the downward career of educating himself into inanity, the present writer feels that he will not have written in vain. It appears that when our jocose Oxonian sees that something unusual has happened, that something is worthy of particular remark, he immediately "troubles" his neighbor for that thing. Thus, if the weather is very warm, he says to his friend, "Oh, I'll trouble you for the heat." It is with the same astonishing fatuousness, though apparently with less, that when he sees you with a meerschaum singularly good or singularly bad, he says: "I'll trouble you for your pipe." If you have just received a legacy, or made a good book on the Derby, or come well through an examination, or had any other piece of good fortune, you have been "in the swim." This originally was piscatorial and local—"the swim" being the part of the stream where fish abound and where one has but to drop a hook to catch something. To be "out of it"—which is not to be "out of the swim," as might be supposed—is to have had bad luck. To "bosh" a man is to balk or annoy him in any way. You "bosh" a man when you keep a sober face at the end of his funny story; you "bosh" his chance of sleep by playing some loud musical instrument in the room next his chamber. When you "have a crib on" to do so and so—as to have "a crib on to go to the Derby"—you have arranged a comfortable, quiet party for that purpose. A man's "crib" is his sanctum, his private quarters, into which he admits only whom he pleases, and to have a crib on a thing is, therefore, to take care that no outsider is let in. Thus it is with the genesis of most slang: it is very apt to be bold metaphor indiscriminately applied. It is when it is indiscriminately applied and the persons who employ it are "funny by formula," that it becomes so nauseating—almost nauseating—as it is pretty sure to be.

—One of the acknowledged social uses of co-operation is to inspire mutual trust among men, and the want of this confidence is, perhaps, the chief obstacle to the extension of the co-operative principle. In less civilized countries than Western Europe and the United States, there appears to be a larger degree of faith in human nature, and we find co-operation, as in the Russian artel, of long date, and not a merely recent expedient. In China it is very widely employed among all classes, and the details of its application among the common people have a very direct interest for us, who are now absorbing a Little, which may some day become a Lesser, China. These are given in a very lucid notice, "Sur les Petites Sociétés d'Argent en Chine," by G. Eug. Simon, French Consul at Ningpo, which is made the leading article in the (Shanghai) "Journal of the North China Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society" for December, 1868—a publication, let us remark, which is always learned and, however late in reaching this country, always interesting. It would be difficult, without tables, to describe the workings of the Hoeï-Tsien, whose principal object is, says M. Simon, to avoid the burden of fixed, interest-bearing debts, and which contrive to procure at once all the capital that a man needs, while permitting him to repay it by degrees with merely nominal interest, or even without any. They are formed by the action of some necessitous person, who summons others of the same lot in life and general wants to a little feast, at which he explains his desire for assistance—to borrow, we will say, one hundred taëls. His associates number ten, say; the society will then probably last for eleven years, during which each one will in turn receive the same loan, and from the beginning will have paid at each annual reunion a sum representing interest and some portion of the principal, graduated according to the order in which he enjoys the loan. Each beneficiary in turn bears the expense of the annual meal, which naturally is not an extravagant one. There are certain sureties placed to cover the loan, but there is seldom a failure to meet one's payments, and, as M. Simon remarks, before the society is formed it has abundant opportunity to examine the enterprise which calls for the loan, and to decline assistance if not satisfied. In the Sou-Tcheou Association, to give a partial example, at the first meeting the founder collects his hundred taëls in the following proportion: No. 2 gives him 15.5; No. 3, 14.5; No. 4, 13.5; No. 5, 12.5; No. 6, 11.5; No. 7, 8.5; No. 8, 7.5; No. 9, 6.5; No. 10, 5.5; No. 11, 4.5. The second beneficiary collects the same amounts from the same members, except, of course, that No. 1 furnishes the 15.5 previously contributed by No. 2. When No. 3 is to have the loan, No. 2 assumes his (smaller) quota; No. 3 afterwards assumes that of No. 4, No. 4 that of No. 5, No. 5 that of No. 6, etc., No. 11 alone paying a constant quota ten times in the eleven years. The repartitions remain the same throughout, and foot up one hundred; but it is evident that all the members are not taxed alike. Other societies mentioned by M. Simon (he enumerates seven different ones) are more equitable in their adjustment. We may take some comfort in the thought that such a system of co-operation is among the habits of our trans-Pacific emigrants.

—The dean and chapter of Exeter have disregarded the wild advice that has been so plentifully administered to them, and have accepted as the bishop of that diocese Dr. Temple, the divine whose orthodoxy has been denied by some and doubted by more of his fellow-clergymen because of his having been an "Essayist and Reviewer." Many of our readers will be interested in seeing what is the specific evidence of heterodoxy that is urged against the new bishop. Dr. Pusey, in an unfortunate moment, and in an unfortunate mood far too frequent in him, has written a letter, in which—after denouncing Dr. Temple in a fashion which has an almost unaccountable charm for polemics, even though they may be of high ability and the best character—he cites from Dr. Temple's essay the passages which seem to him poisonously heretical. These are two. One occurs in the course of an argument designed to show that the moment of Christ's coming was most opportune; that he came just at the period in history when his advent produced the greatest possible effect: "But the one Example of all examples," he says, "came in the 'fulness of time,' just when the world was fitted to feel the power of his presence. Had this revelation been delayed till now, assuredly it would have been hard for us to recognize his divinity, for the faculty of faith has turned inwards and cannot now accept any outer manifestations of the truth of God. Our vision of the Son of God is now aided by the eyes of the Apostles, and by that aid we can recognize the exact image of the Father." This, Dr. Pusey says, "involves a denial of miracles!" The other passage relied upon by Dr. Temple's opponents is one in which he argues that the Bible is all the more suited to the nature and needs of man in that it is "not drawn up in precise statements of faith or detailed precepts of conduct;" and, further, he says that conscience, faithfully enlightened by all the means in our power, must be held to be the supreme interpreter of the Scriptures, which were given us "to evoke the voice of conscience," and not to silence it. Accepting that principle, says Dr. Pusey, the Atonement may come to be rejected, or the doctrine of future punishment may be taken wholly out of religious beliefs. Possibly; but still it is Protestant doctrine and long has been, and we must make the best of it.

—It is no wonder that Dr. Pusey's attack has defeated his intention. The "Evangelicals"—who are not famous in England for wisdom, and whom the mere name of "broad" or "high" terrifies out of all sense or reason—say to themselves that Dr. Temple may be "broad;" that he did at any rate contribute an essay to a dreadfully "broad" book; but that, after all, if it is a question between Temple and Pusey, they will take Temple by odds. At all events, he is not the Pope of Rome, nor the Scarlet Woman, nor the Man of Sin. He meantime has behaved himself with great good sense ever since the disturbance began, and has, we should suppose, made friends. But his accession will not diminish the Ritualist willingness to see church and state separated.

—There is no hope, we suppose, that there will be any end of the controversy about Byron and Mrs. Leigh till after Mrs. Stowe has printed her volume, and after that, also, has undergone its due amount of discussion pro and con.; but the latest of Mrs. Stowe's adverse critics, in his latest appearance before the public, has brought forward evidence that will have the effect of making most people wait with patience for what more may be forthcoming on Lady Byron's side, for he so much strengthens the case for Lord Byron and Mrs. Leigh that we may say that there is a general disbelief that their defence can be invalidated. The Quarterly Review, containing the seven letters from Lady Byron to her sister-in-law, with which our readers are familiar, has gone into a second edition, and thus an opportunity has been given the reviewer to make some reply to criticisms which have been made upon his article since its first appearance. It is true, he says in his postscript, that there was a remarkable fitness to the case as it stood, in the letters which he quoted. They seemed to touch the nodus exactly, and this has been made the ground for illiberal insinuations—as that the letters were forged, we suppose. But has it not occurred, he asks, to the critics who have insinuated this charge, that this fitness, at which they affect surprise, is one of the natural and inevitable results of truth? The letters, he adds, have long been known to be in existence; he had seen them, and they are now in legitimate custody, and their authenticity is vouched for by two noblemen, whose names can be given if necessary. The Pall Mall Gazette does give them, and they are the Earl of Chichester and Lord William Godolphin Osborne. Furthermore, the reviewer states that he is now, as he was not before, in a position to assert that when Lord Broughton, acting in behalf of Byron, sent in to Mr. Wilmot Horton, acting in behalf of Lady Byron, a list of all the conceivable offences one or more of which might have caused the separation, he did specifically put down the crime now alleged to have caused it, and received a definite answer to the effect that it was not the cause. Then, again, he points out that Lady Byron had said that insanity would have palliated the criminality or viciousness of which she complained, and which had determined her to leave her husband. But the insanity of one, the reviewer says, could not have been accepted as palliative of the crime of two. Here he seems not very strong. His better ground is that Lady Byron and Mrs. Leigh remained friends; and, likewise, that Lady Byron's agent, acting in her name, specifically declared, as we may say, what Lady Byron's treatment of Mrs. Leigh had also declared by implication—namely, that she had no fault to find with her. May not this curious list of "all conceivable crimes" have given Lady Byron a hint for the charge which she afterwards made—made when, as many think—and they, some of them, her personal friends—she was liable to hallucination?

—Meantime, we should add that Dr. Lushington, who is the depositary of what may perhaps be called Lady Byron's earlier and truer secret history of the separation, has not said one word on the subject. This is not because he is so old as to have lost the use of his faculties, nor because he has ceased to take an interest in contemporary events, for he is reported as being still active-minded. Nor does he shun conversation on the subject; only he declines to say anything as regards his own connection with the affair. This is regarded, and perhaps not improperly, as confirmation of Mrs. Stowe's charge. But it is, of course, not necessarily so to be regarded. Lord Byron was not Dr. Lushington's client, and Lady Byron was. It is not his business, he may argue, no matter what Lady Byron may have said to him, to come out, and—as he may probably put it—contradict his client's later statements for the sake of vindicating the name and fame of a man for whom not unlikely the aged lawyer has no respect on moral grounds, and not so very much on any other. Nor need we call it probable that, supposing the charge of incest to be as old as 1816, he would think it best to say so—having been bound as he was to secrecy. In either case, be the charge against Byron true or false, in keeping silence he keeps inviolate the rules of professional etiquette and honor. His silence may imply that confirmation would be given if he spoke; or it may imply a foresight that the true state of the case would be safe enough to come out under discussion; or it may imply a belief that he can do Lady Byron no good by proving her the familiar friend, or the pretended familiar friend, of a person whom she knew so guilty. For our part, we incline to the belief that considerations of professional and personal honor will prevent Dr. Lushington's saying anything.

MR. JAMES'S "SECRET OF SWEDENBORG."*

We regard this as one of the more remarkable books of the day. It is an elaborate, earnest essay, endeavoring to reconcile philosophy and theology, in much the same line of thought which the author followed in his books entitled "Christianity the Logic of Creation," and "Substance and Shadow," but, as it seems to us, is much more clear and satisfactory.

Mr. James tells us that "this essay comprises an article which appeared in the North American Review for July, 1867, and a large amount of additional matter. He states that "he had not space in the Review to do more than enter upon a theme previously so unwrought," and modestly apologizes for not having time to treat it more exhaustively. Yet it seems to us he has so thoroughly and so copiously stated and restated and argued his subject as to leave nothing to be added.

The author commences with the statement that the fundamental problem of philosophy is the problem of creation. Does our existence really infer a divine and infinite being, or does it not? Being in itself cannot, of course, undergo increase or diminution, nor can it create what has absolute being in itself. God can create only what is devoid of being in itself, and the flat opposite to the Creator—what appears to have being, but is really only a phenomenal existence. "How, then, shall the infinite Creator give his finite creature projection, endow him with veritable selfhood or identity, and yet experience no compromise of his own individuality?" Mr. James shows the inadequacy of modern philosophy to solve the problem. Kant did nothing towards it by his old recipe of Idealism—the invention of a noumenal world, or the world of "things-in-themselves." Kant did not, any more than the philosophy which went before him, discriminate satisfactorily the objective or absolute or creative element in knowledge from its subjective or merely contingent and constitutional element. "He saw that things were phenomenal; but as he did not see that this infirmity attached itself to them wholly on their subjective or constitutional side, while on their objective or creative side they were infinite and absolute, he was bound to lapse into mere idealism or scepticism, unrelieved by aught but the dream of a noumenal background." "The sum of the Hegelian dialectic is to confound existence with being."

* "The Secret of Swedenborg. Being an Elucidation of his Doctrine of the Divine Natural Humanity. By Henry James." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1869. Pp. 243.

Swedenborg's ontology puts a new face on the whole matter. Nor has the human or moral creation any more objective reality than nature. It is purely conscious and subjective, not a finality. There can be no infinite unrepresented by a finite. But this finite is only representative—only a shadow or reflection of absolute being which is God. Our human consciousness is, however, the projected material on which the Divine Being works, as the sculptor shapes his clay and inspires it with his idea. And the true idea of creation is spiritual; it is a redemptive process, "exhibiting such a sheer immersion and obscuration of creative substance in created form as will ensure the eventual transfiguration of that form with all divine perfection." This, according to Mr. James, is the doctrine which Swedenborg teaches, and which he illustrates by his spiritual visions and his unfolding of the spiritual sense of the Scriptures. "Swedenborg," he says, "rectifies the basis of philosophy—affirming an absolute as well as an empirical element in consciousness, an infinite as well as a finite element in knowledge. He provides a real or objective, no less than a phenomenal or subjective, element in existence; an element of unconditional being as well as of conditional seeming; a creative element, in short, no less than a constitutive one.

This discrimination furnishes the key to Swedenborg's ontology, his doctrine of the Lord, or Maximus Homo, or Divine Humanity, which Mr. James interprets to mean simply the incarnation or active presence of the divine love and wisdom, or the Christian life, in human society. Mr. James rescues this doctrine from the charge of Pantheism by showing that being in God is not, as Hegel has it, a logical evolution of not-being or the creature; that the creature is not continuous, as it were, from the Creator—has not an absolute or objective, but only a phenomenal and subjective existence. Nature and man are a ground in the sphere of consciousness on which the redemptive or spiritually creative work of the Divine Being takes place; and this redemptive work is not to be limited by our ideas of time and space, which have no absolute existence; still less is it a supernatural work, but is coeval with the creative wisdom and love, the essence of which is objective—not loving itself, but going forth into its creatures and forever communicating itself to them. "Our natural creation without our subsequent redemption would be a great blemish upon the divine name." "The male and female man, the homo and the vir, constitute the machinery of that redemption—the one representing the universal or created element, the other the individual or creative one, and their marriage constituting human society or fellowship, in which the redemption of our nature is complete." The one is a descending, the other an ascending movement of the divine life in man. One is nature, the other history. "History resolves itself into the existence of the church on earth; and the existence of the church means the purgation of human nature by divine power;" or as the author says in another place, "the only church which Christ avouches is a living society, brotherhood, or fellowship of all mankind, which will disallow all distinction or privilege among men but that which grows out of the largeness and the zeal of the social spirit in their bosom."

In the historic order, however, it was necessary that the church should exist as a basis, in religious forms, of this universal fellowship, and that it should have a quasi authority. It has been of great service in keeping alive the sense of moral and religious obligation, but as a visible or ritual economy its worth has been only representative, preparing the way for the development of the social sentiment, in a Christian fraternity. Its assumption that good and evil in man are absolute and final has no foundation. The worst sinners are those who appropriate their goodness as belonging to themselves and not to God. Nor does it consist with Swedenborg's or his commentator's system that evil in man should be an absolute reality. To appropriate good and evil to one's self as finalities, and as constituting a ground of God's acceptance or displeasure, is what Swedenborg says is typified by Adam and Eve eating of the tree of good and evil. The moral consciousness is but a means towards the divine life in the soul. Morality is the badge of human nature, or what man has only in common with others, and not in distinction from them. And heaven and hell, as states of the soul or of society, have consequently no absolute but only a relative existence.

The necessity of revelation is insisted upon. By revelation is not meant knowledge. "It is concerned with truths which are utterly beyond the original compass of the intellect to devise, however perfectly it may come afterwards to reflect them." This view of revelation seems to follow logically upon the doctrine already stated, that man in himself, or, as Swedenborg says, the natural man, is nothing except as the divine love and wisdom flows into him. The author considers the biblical accounts of the birth, life, and resurrection of Christ as essential as the historical basis of the doctrine of the divine humanity; yet interprets the incarnation in the broadest and freest sense, as meaning the presence of the Christian spirit in human society. "Christianity itself may be styled a formal proclamation of the exhaustion of religion as a ceremonial, and its revival as a life." "The human mind, or natural and historic order, is itself only a process of revelation of the creative name."

It is difficult, in so brief a space, to give a very thorough abstract, even, of this book, or do justice to its statements and arguments. We do not feel sure that we have even sketched an outline of its main features.

The reader is struck with the earnestness as well as the liberality of the author's philosophical and theological views—all drawn, as he tells us, from Swedenborg's writings. Whether Mr. James's doctrine is purely Swedenborg's, or in fact his own liberal interpretation of Swedenborg, is more than we can venture to conclude. Certainly, we find Swedenborg very plainly asserting doctrines which seem to us very narrow, and by no means according with the generous and broad estimate Mr. James makes of his theology—although, to be sure, there are numerous passages to be found in the writings of the great seer, the liberality of which it is difficult to make consistent with those we allude to. For instance, in his "Divine Providence," he says that "after death a man is no longer in a state to be reformed or regenerated. He remains such as his life or ruling love has been" (Sec. 17); that "the adult who does not come into essential liberty and rationality in the world can never come into them after death, for then whatever is the state of his life which has been acquired in the world, such it remains to eternity" (Sec. 99); that Socinianism and Arianism are profanation; and they who believe those doctrines "are let down into hell among those who deny God. These are meant by those who blaspheme the Holy Ghost, who will not be forgiven either in this world or in that which is to come" (Sec. 231, p. 155); that Idolaters and Mohammedans are saved, while Unitarians are not (255); that Socinians are excommunicated from the church (256). These and other passages that might be cited from Swedenborg's writings Mr. James would surely find it difficult to explain away or to reconcile with the doctrine which he himself continually presents, that Christianity is a life, and not a dogma; and with the extremely liberal views of evil and of hell given in Chapter XV. of his book.

And here we cannot avoid noticing the remarkable fact that Mr. James, who claims to derive all his doctrine from Swedenborg, should be in utter opposition to the Swedenborgian Church—he denouncing this Church as the most narrow and sectarian of all organizations, and the churchmen in turn excommunicating him as a heretic. This his readers would do well to bear in mind. We, for our part, should suppose it not impossible that so profound a thinker, and so earnest an expounder of Swedenborg, might prove the leader of a new movement in his Church.

In the appendix to this book, the reader will be edified and amused by some racy talk about the Church of the New Jerusalem. In dealing with all that he considers Pharisaic and sectarian, Mr. James always warms into wit and eloquence. In Note A, from page 207 to 214, we have an admirable specimen of his power in a vein somewhat different from the lofty and abstract style to which he confines himself in the body of the book.

The Last Athenian. Translated from the Swedish of Victor Rydberg, by William Widgery Thomas, jr., late United States Consul at Gothenburg, Sweden. (Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers. 1869.)—Mr. Thomas's translation of this work is prefaced by a note addressed to him by Miss Bremer, and written a few days before her death, in which she describes it as "the best and most genial historical novel ever written in the Swedish language"—which it very possibly may be. But we have not found it very interesting or very suggestive reading. To make a historical novel worthy of much attention, a great deal more is necessary than a knowledge, however accurate, of what one may call the local color of the period which is described. With such knowledge Mr. Rydberg appears to be supplied; but to our thinking it would come into play more advantageously if he were to employ it in some other field than novel-writing. For such writing, he has not any great natural vocation. True, he tells his story fluently; he is never at a loss for reflections on matters theological and philosophical, which, if neither original nor profound, are not the less on that account lively and readable; and he writes conversations of which neither the matter nor the manner is less than pleasing, but which have the curious defect of failing to interest the reader in the interlocutors.

Mr. Rydberg is describing the last struggles between paganism and the Christianity of the Church; and he does it from the point of view of one who, if he is found in the religious ranks at all, is probably in the extreme liberal wing of Protestantism, and has more sympathy with the conquered pagan than with the conquering Church. He draws some not very edifying pictures of the cruelty, the rapacity, and the hypocrisy of the Christians of the fourth century; and if he does not succeed in awaking any warm sympathy for those whose cause he espouses, it is not, one feels, because he does not wish us to give it; and perhaps it may not be because we think we ought to withhold it from them; but, as we have already said, simply because in his hands they remain nothing more than abstractions. Very probably, Mr. Rydberg might write essays on subjects connected with and suggested by his present theme which would be very good reading. To us it seems doubtful whether it is worth any writer's while to try to build upon them historical novels, which, as novels, should have any qualities to be admired. To the novelist, the "times that try men's souls" ought not to be of so much importance as the fact that men's souls are tried, and the individual results of such trials; and in selecting historical themes and characters, he is necessarily beset by difficulties which have always proved nearly insurmountable. In fact, where is there a fine historical novel which is not inferior by much to all of the really great novels; and where is there one which is not surpassed by the other works of its author, supposing him to have written other works? The rule seems to be that the further you depart from history in historical novels the better novel you have. And a corollary from this rule would seem to be that you would do best to let history alone entirely when you sit down to novel-writing.

Die Stellung des Menschen in der Natur, im Vergangenheit, Gegenwart und Zukunft; oder, Woher kommen wir? Wer sind wir? Wohin gehen wir? Von Dr. Louis Büchner. No. I. (Man's Place in Nature, in the Past, Present, and Future; or, Whence came we? Who are we? Whither are we tending? New York: B. Westermann & Co.)—The author, best known to the public by his excellent work, "Kraft und Stoff" ("Force and Matter"), which has lately reached a tenth edition, endeavors in this book to solve the "question of all questions"—that of our origin—which has so zealously engaged the minds of the learned for the last thirty years, and which has given rise to so many scientific theories and controversies. As in his previous works, so in this one, Dr. Büchner relies not on speculation, but on facts, such as have been elicited by the researches of Huxley, D. Page, Darwin, Schaafhausen, Häckel, etc., etc. Philosophical views regarding the true position of man in nature are nearly as old as our history, but the reason why they have not universally gained ground in earlier centuries is because they were deficient in the necessary empirical proofs. The brochure before us opens with an account of the seventeen skeletons found in the year 1852 in the French country-town of Aurignac, and minutely described at that time by the learned palæontologist Bartet, whose investigations proved that these skeletons, together with a number of stone implements found in the same place, were at least more than six thousand years old, and probably vastly older. Notwithstanding the fact that already, in the years 1833 and 1834, similar discoveries had been made in the so-called Belgian Heights by Spring and Schmerling ("Recherches sur les ossements fossiles, découverts dans les cavernes de la Province de Liége"), there was a general reluctance to believe in the existence of prehistoric mankind until numerous later discoveries in Germany, Holland, America, Switzerland, etc., left no room for doubt. The difference between this fossil race and our own must have been palpably greater than that between a Caucasian and an Australian bushman, and man has evidently undergone a very slow mental and physical development from the not impossible original of an ape or a gorilla. Of this question Dr. Büchner will speak in the second number of his work; the whole will consist of three numbers, and we hope as soon as it is completed to bring it again to the attention of our readers, and more particularly.

Think and Act. A Series of Articles on Men and Women, Work and Wages. By Virginia Penny. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1 vol.)—Miss Virginia Penny has earned the sober gratitude of women and of men interested in the lot of women by the labors of many years in the hardest and the least remunerative fields of service. She is no orator, politician, or manager, but a delving, drudging worker. With a patience that only the most profound faith could have sustained, and an industry that only a deep enthusiasm could have kept from flagging, she has devoted herself to the task of collecting and assorting facts bearing on the subject of women's work and wages. What work women did or could do; the amount of training demanded for it; the number of hours daily that must be devoted to it; the conditions and circumstances attending on its performance; its effect on health, spirits, and disposition; the average amount of its remunerations; the prospect it opened; in short, every particular that was interesting or important in a practical point of view she endeavored to ascertain. A portion of the vast amount of information thus obtained has been already published in a volume that has no doubt attracted less attention than it deserved, and met with a sale utterly insignificant as compared with that of volumes we might name, written in a much less worthy spirit in the same general cause.

Miss Penny's views on the whole question of woman's rights are of the broadest and strongest. She claims as much as anybody claims. She thinks laws should be made for the protection of their persons and property. She advocates the opening to them of all occupations. She insists on fair wages being paid them for their labor. She asks for them the privileges of the ballot-box, and trial by their own peers. In a word, she wishes to see them possessing equal rights with men—domestic, social, educational, industrial, civil, and religious. But she has a very keen perception of the difficulties that stand in the way of these desires, and of the vast work that is to be done by women themselves before they are likely to be gratified. Her present volume embodies the results of deep reflection and extensive reading on the subjects she treats. It consists of ninety-five short essays, in a space of three hundred and seventy-two pages. They are not especially brilliant or attractive in style, but they are interesting; and better than all—we are afraid some will say worst of all—they are sober, wise, and important.

Too Bright to Last. A Novel. (Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1869.)—Georgina Sackville, the heroine of this novel, is sent into Wales on a visit o her uncle, in order to get her out of the way of a lover whose attentions her mother is not willing to encourage. But even in Wales Georgie is fated to get into mischief. She falls in love with a middle-aged Welsh farmer, who has neither wealth nor good looks to recommend him, nor much else that we can see, except that, being in the hands of a novelist fatally given over to a cheap kind of romantic sentimentality, he has a well-thumbed volume of the "Faerie Queene," a "rare old copy of Falconer's Shipwreck," and a dog named "Dolce," which name he pronounces with an unimpeachable accent. He lives in an old farm-house called Pant-y-dwr, which, with its inmates, is described with a good deal of that sort of feeble realism which in one's better moments leads one to think with sorrow of the hard and ill-requited toil which the exigencies of the modern novel force upon its producers. It must have been easier work in the days when, with plenty of romantic names, and a facility for unlimited sentimentalizing, the novelist was well-nigh equipped, and had not to go painfully hunting up new and undescribed localities, and picking up here and there stray scraps of inadequate information, in order to bring his book at all up to the requirements of the market. This hard-handed farmer, who "drinks tea out of his saucer," and has a female servant who swears "by George," the heroine loves and marries, after undergoing two years of steady opposition at the hands of her friends. Then she goes to live with him on his farm, and for a little while becomes the brightness of his life, though not without finding her own by times a trifle dull. Very soon, however, she gets a bad pain in her side, and returns to her mother, where, in the course of a scene with her old lover, she drops down in a swoon, and dies untimely. So far as we can see, there is nothing about the novel which should have made it worth any publisher's while to reprint it. Not only is its plot slight and trivial, but its style is far from good, and its characters, without exception, thoroughly conventional.

German Tales. By Berthold Auerbach. With an introduction by Charles C. Shackford. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1869.)—Auerbach's reputation, which, so far as the American public is concerned, was made by the publication of "On the Heights," seems to us to have been not at enhanced by the subsequent translations from his works. The first series of "Village Tales" contained, it is true, some interesting and careful pictures of peasant life, and gave the reader a fair specimen of their author's earlier manner—a manner which is by many still thought to be his best. We ought not, either, to forget to mention with praise the pleasant story, "Edelweiss," an excellent translation of which, by Miss Ellen Frothingham, was issued by Roberts Brothers early in the present year. But good as both of these were, it is probable that they attracted readers less on the ground of their own merits than for the reason that they are by the author of "On the Heights." Even that novel, worthy as it is of very high praise, did not owe all the attention it excited solely to its own excellence, but gained a certain notoriety from the quarrels of its rival publishers. From whatever reason it was taken up, however, we suppose it found very few readers who were not well pleased with it.

The stories of the present collection will probably be found uninteresting by most readers. They are, however, full of that homely wisdom, which is one of Auerbach's most marked characteristics, and which forms such a singular contrast to the half sentimental sort of transcendentalism which also distinguishes him. All his life, apparently, he has had the same ideals of character and the same ethical problems before him. There is a strong family likeness between Dr. Richard, Dr. Gunther, and the physician in "Edelweiss;" the Countess Bella finds her prototype in Annele of the Lion; and as for Erich, we get him both in the "Lunterbacher" of the "Village Tales" and in the Rudolph of the present series. It is, perhaps, a mistake of the printer, but it looks to us as though Mr. Shackford, who was the translator of the Boston edition of the "Villa on the Rhine," had himself made the odd but very accountable blunder of calling Rudolph "Eric," on occasion of translating a speech which inevitably recalls the latter hero.

One Poor Girl: The Story of Thousands. By Wirt Sikes. (J. B. Lippincott & Co.)—We are at a loss to know how much of this story is truth and how much is fiction. The author assures us in the preface that it is true in the incidents and particulars; fictitious only in the arrangement of its events. But whether the incidents and particulars are true of this one girl, or are simply gathered up from many lives and personified in one, is a question. The "arrangement of events" may be an arrangement of such a miscellany of events as makes the story valueless as illustrating the experience of individual women. What thoughtful people want now is fact, not fiction—fact as it is found in its natural association, not fact as artificially arranged for effect on the emotions. That the precise story of Susie Garland is the story of thousands it would on some accounts be very pleasant to think; for then the lot of thousands would be happier than it is now. Thousands of poor girls are exposed, provoked, tempted, persecuted, led through scenes of suffering, and thrust into haunts of shame; but thousands are not fortunate enough to be watched over by a good providence in the shape of a noble young gentleman, of artistic capacity, who steps in at the right moment, and finally takes the poor child to his bosom, for better, for worse. The story is harrowing and unhealthy, and the excessive coloring and scenic grouping make the painful realities in it seem unreal, so that it may be seriously doubted if the cause which we imagine he may have meant to serve will be in any respect the gainer by Mr. Sikes's labors.

Soimême: A Story of a Wilful Life. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.) Aspasia. By C. Holland. (Philadelphia and New York: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.)—We notice these books together because they are issued by the same publishers, and are likely to reach the same destination in the Sunday-school libraries. Beyond this, and the fact that they are both autobiographies of young women, they have nothing in common. "Soimême" is not the best sort of a story, but to read it could do harm to nobody, since its style is pure and its moral and its moral tone alike are good. "Aspasia," however, is certain, if read at all by young people in whom the critical sense is yet undeveloped, to be positively injurious. It is full of stupidity and conceit, its style is beneath criticism, and altogether it is as disagreeable a specimen of the so-called religious novel as it has lately been our fortune to meet. Fancy a heroine who remarks that she don't think she loves the man she is about to marry because "an occasional unguarded expression in his conversation and his letters, and the general tone and spirit which seemed to underlie his whole life, had fastened the conviction on my mind that the substratum of his character was exceedingly porous, and that it needed to be broken up by the ploughshare of grace before much real good could be expected from him;" and who afterwards, when her father has failed in business, and contrary to her expectation, her unregenerate lover has proved constant, addresses him in this fashion: "'Morgan Goodspeed, do you offer me your heart and hand without reserve, and prompted only by the purest emotions of love?'

"'I certainly do,' he replied; 'and I think my constancy of purpose, as evinced during the past three years, is a sufficient guarantee of my sincerity.'

"'It is,' I replied, 'and I accept you.'"

Even this is better than a great deal that is to be found in it.

Manual of the German Language. By W. Grauert, A.M. Two parts in one. (New York: E. Steiger. 1869.)—This hand-book, which endeavors "to avoid the defects of both the synthetic and the purely analytic methods by an organic development of the forms of words and sentences," and, within a small compass to offer abundant material for translating exercises and conversational purposes, requires the completing and correcting hand of a competent teacher to be usefully employed in schools. Otherwise, it would, on account of its careless execution, omissions, and not a few errors, prove a very fallacious guide. These defects present themselves on the very first pages. The first paragraph gives the "Pronunciation" of "Vowels" without a preceding alphabet, and is followed by words for exercise, composed, of course, in great part of the unmentioned and thus unknown consonants. Then comes a list of "Consonants," embracing only those the pronunciation of which differs from that of the corresponding English letters. This is not only variously defective in its explanations, but also entirely omits to explain or even to mention the sz among its compounds. The first rule "on the accent," "All derivative words have the accent on the root syllable," is illustrated by one word, Gedanke, without an accent, and without the mention of the root. The first word of the first "Reading Exercise" is printed plainly, though intended to be spaced (italicized). Among the first rules we find, "The Nominative and Accusative Singular are alike in all nouns, excepting those in e that are of the masculine gender," which is not correct; witness der Graf, den Grafen, der Prinz, den Prinzen. On page 13, we read, "Except . . . the compounds of Muth, which are feminine," which is very lamely expressed if the comma be a misprint, and, if not, a false rule; for we say der Hochmuth, der Freimuth, der Gleichmuth, etc. Obviously, then, the book demands a careful revision.

A Manual of Elementary Chemistry, Theoretical and Practical. By George Fownes, F.R.S. From the tenth revised and corrected English edition. Edited by Robert Bridges, M.D. (Philadelphia: Lea. 1869.)—This is not a book suitable for a beginner; but as a compend of the chief facts of descriptive chemistry, in one volume, it will be found convenient. The general accuracy of the English edition is sufficiently ensured by the names of the editors, Drs. Bruce, Jones, and Watts; yet in a matter of importance it is a thing of course that we should prefer original authorities. In a reprint, the chance of errors in the numbers is considerably increased. Perhaps as good a test of the amount of care bestowed upon numbers in such a book as can easily be applied is to look out a hundred things in the index. We have done this, and have found eight referred to the wrong page. The facts inserted have been selected with ordinary good judgment, and, in the organic part, with somewhat unusual skill. The account of the physical forces is not so good, and several matters of prime importance to the chemist are not mentioned; such as Ohm's law (without the knowledge of which a battery cannot be intelligently used), and Thomsen's researches into the heat of combination (which frequently enable us to predict the occurrence or non-occurrence of a reaction). The classification of the metals which is adopted involves the separation of elements very much alike, not merely by putting them into different classes, but by separating these different classes by the interpolation of other classes of metals of quite another nature. Thus, thallium is here removed from the alkaline metals by all the metals of the earths, by zinc, cadmium, copper, and mercury. Between cadmium and iridium (metals intimately related) come thallium, gold, all the platinum metals, tin, titanium, lead, and the iron metals. This is most confusing to a person who wishes to refer to the book, and it might have been avoided by dividing the elements, first of all, into artiads and perissads.

Dr. Bridges has done very little more than read the proof-sheets. He has added fewer than a dozen unimportant notes, and has not done what little was necessary to bring the work up to the date of his reprint. We do not see, therefore, why his name should appear upon the title-page, when those of the two gentlemen to whom the book owes its value (in large measure) do not.

The Young Pupil's Arithmetic, Objectively or Synthetically Arranged. By D. H. Cruttenden, A.M. Fourth edition. (New York: Bradstreet. 1869.)—The Objective or Synthetic Arithmetic; in which the Science is Learned from the Art. By D. H. Cruttenden. First course. (New York: 1869.) Second course: The Subjective or Analytic Arithmetic; in which the Science is Applied to the Art. By D. H. Cruttenden. "Science is knowledge, subjectively or analytically arranged" (Bacon). (New York: 1869.)—The best of these arithmetics is the primary one, of which a good use might be made; but they are all full of crotchets. For example, the youngest children are to be taught the Roman numerals immediately after the names of the numbers and before they have learned the decimal notation. In both addition and multiplication, the zero table (that is, nothing and nothing are nothing, and nothing times nothing are nothing, etc.) is given first of all, although these formula have no meaning except as extensions to non-number of the relations of numbers. The author's peculiar views of the philosophy of language crop out everywhere. Thus, for frustum he prints frustrum—a form which may have been in use in the Middle Ages, but which suggests the prism's being frustrated. The books are also full of etymological definitions, of which the following are fair specimens:

DEFINITE. e, belonging; (i) t, to that which; fin is bounded, fenced, limited; de, out, exactly.

SUBJECTIVE. ive, state of, condition of; t, that which; jec, has been put or cast; sub, under, down. That is, something used as a basis or foundation. See objective, in Dict.

The first dozen pages of arithmetic No. 3 contain more than fifty such definitions. Indeed, these dozen pages before the first rule contain nothing but definitions and divisions, and will, we venture to say, put the pupil into an ive-t-jec-sub, or state of being cast down. We must not be understood as saying that any arithmetical term is allowed to go without any other explanation than such etymological ones. But the regular definitions are sometimes a little curious. Thus, we are aware that the words subjective and objective have been used in various and contradictory senses; but is not the meaning of subjective, explained in the following definitions, something new?

"SUBJECTIVE arithmetic presents, first, the science of arithmetic, and, second, the different modes of using the science.

The SECONDARY COURSE begins with the science and knowledge of a subject; hence it is called the SUBJECTIVE Course.

Elements of Anatomy: Designed for Academies and High Schools. By Elias Loomis, LL.D. (New York: Harper. 1869.)—Scientific accuracy and precision of statement, together with logical connection and the absence of merely amusing and trivial matter, are the characteristics of this treatise. It is a book from which a boy may derive some solid advantage. Its appearance, too, is unstudied but tasteful.

The Week.

THE principal topic of the week has been the desirableness and probability of a return to specie payments. A decision of the Supreme Court has already shown coin contracts to be legal, and there is a widespread belief that a solution of the greenback difficulty will be precipitated by another decision of the Court in cases now before it, declaring the Legal-tender Act unconstitutional, or, at all events, simply justifiable as a war measure, and making all debts payable in coin, except where the parties to the contract clearly contemplated payment in greenbacks. Mr. Spaulding's "History of the Legal Tender Paper Money" has drawn from Attorney-General Hoar an expression of opinion that the issue of the legal tenders ought to have been regarded as a war measure, and the irredeemable currency laid aside when the war was over, just as the volunteers were laid aside; but whether he says this as a lawyer, or as a citizen simply, we do not know. What Mr. Boutwell's opinion about the matter is we are unable to say. Of course he wants to get back to specie payments like everybody else, but seems still to adhere to the idea that the road to it lies through continued bond-buying, a conversion of the public debt at lower rates of interest, and we know not what beside; but it must be admitted that this is a long road.

There are three purely human ways of getting back to specie payments. One is to collect gold enough in the Treasury to pay off every greenback now outstanding; but, pending this process, gold would rise tremendously in price, owing to the withdrawal of so large an amount from circulation; the prices of other commodities and duties on imports would rise with it, and the resulting public clamor would surpass anything seen in these latter days. Moreover—let not this be forgotten—returning to specie payments in this way, say within a year, would mean neither more nor less than the discharge by the Government of about $350,000,000 of its debt at one stroke. Another is the contraction of the greenback circulation by the destruction of a certain quantity of them by the Government as fast as they come into its hands. This might be done slowly, and would also be tantamount to the payment of a certain portion of the debt; and it would result at last in raising the purchasing power of greenbacks very close to the gold level. It would also, at last, bring the amount of greenbacks outstanding down to a point at which the Government might offer to redeem with a comparatively small sum of gold in its possession. This plan has been already tried, however, and broke down under clamor. It of course lowered prices in greenbacks—that is, raised the purchasing power of greenbacks—but it also raised the value of outstanding debts, and was therefore violently opposed by debtors; it lowered the (apparent) value of goods of all kinds, and was therefore opposed by large holders; and it produced a generally depressing effect on the imagination of all persons with accumulated wealth, by making them seem to themselves poorer than they thought they were; and it therefore had to be abandoned. The third plan is the total repudiation of the greenbacks, which would be a revolting swindle, and cause a frightful convulsion, but would bring gold back pretty fast. A civilized people will not do without a currency, and, if it have nothing else, will buy gold and silver for that purpose, which, let us observe, is exactly what we shall have to do to get back to specie payments, except that faith in the ability of the Government to redeem, if called on, would keep a large amount of greenbacks in circulation, and thus save us the necessity of purchasing a similar amount of coin.

There is still another method of getting back to specie payments, which we approach with a certain awe, and which may be called the Neo-Platonic method, from its resemblance to the miracles worked by certain thaumaturgists of that school. Its most prominent apostles have been, we believe, Messrs. Sumner and Greeley. It consists in returning to specie payments by willing them, or, as they concisely express it: "The way to resume, is to resume." Some of the profane have endeavored to hold this up to ridicule by comparing it to the doctrine that "the way to fly is to fly." All we need say about these scoffers is to express the hope that they may not be cut off before they have become conscious of the unseemliness of their conduct. Mr. Sumner and Mr. Greeley, we are sure, forgive them and pity them; but human forgiveness is hardly enough.

The adoption of the Judiciary Clause of the recently proposed Constitution for this State, while all the rest of that instrument was defeated, we attribute directly to the address made to the people by the members of the bar. More than half the voters—probably it would be safe to say, more than two-thirds of them—had not read a word of the Constitution, and were in utter ignorance of anything more than that the Democratic Convention had condemned it; that it was good regular Republicanism to vote for it; and that it took away the disqualification in the case of negroes. But a number of respected lawyers of both parties expressed their decided opinion that the Judiciary Clause ought to be adopted. Now, the men of ordinary intelligence are few who will not take a lawyer's advice in matters of this kind, or who will think that anybody's advice but a lawyer's carries any weight at all. In spite, therefore, of the Democratic order of the day, and in spite of a piece of rascality on the part of some corrupt Republican wire-puller in this city, by which many voters were cheated at the polls and could find no ballots to cast in favor of that clause, it is adopted by a clear majority of several thousands, and this though the Democratic majority in the State is 20,000 and more. This ought to be a lesson to the bar, which must see that all it needs is courage and concert in order to terrify the most unscrupulous unjust judge on the bench—unless, indeed, he may be the representative of the thieves of one of our police-court districts, and even in such cases there would be hope, while in many others there would be certainty of success. Another thing to be observed in the returns is that General Sigel ran more than 9,000 votes ahead of his ticket, and this he did not so much, we are well assured, because he was a German, as because he was in favor of the German fashion of imbibing lager beer. Most of his 9,000 votes in excess of the other candidates represent Germans, who have been and are only Democrats temporarily, and whom the Republicans can have at any time.

As amusing a thing as has occurred for a long while in connection with the New York Custom-House is the "resignation" of Mr. J. T. Blatchford, the Deputy Collector. This gentleman is accused of participation in the drawback frauds, and on hearing of them a fortnight ago he took to flight, and has been ever since, and is now, a fugitive from justice. But knowing the ways of the place, or feeling satisfied that the authorities would not be hard on a poor fellow in trouble, he appears to have felt satisfied that his place could not, or would not, be filled up till he formally resigned it; so he sent in his resignation last Monday through a friend, and it has been accepted. It is very good of him to resign, and very creditable to him that before he left he did not rob and murder Mr. Grinnell, his superior officer. But then if he had, he would have been dismissed. The Tribune and other papers say that there are also suspicions of frauds in the Weighmaster's department, and indeed, if there be any corner of the concern in which nobody supposes there is fraud, we shall be glad to hear of it.

The Committee of Investigation appointed to enquire into the alleged frauds in the Methodist Book Concern have, after sitting for forty days, rendered their report, and acquit everybody of malpractice except those connected with the bindery, in which, they say, there has been "great mismanagement" and "serious losses." The Christian Advocate, however, commenting on the investigation, describes the mode of conducting it in terms which deprive the report of most of its value. The committee seem to have fallen into the error so common amongst clergymen and simple-minded laymen, that if one wants to get at the exact truth of a matter, he had better avoid the procedure of courts of law, and ask such questions as occur to himself of such witnesses as he desires to examine. The result was that the committee "sat as an inquest—without formal presentation of charges or complaints—carefully ignoring the existence of parties, and, therefore, refusing to allow the person implicated the privilege of a formal defence." A decision arrived at under these circumstances can hardly have much weight with the public, and it cannot be too strongly impressed on persons charged with the conduct of such enquiries that the system of attack and defence, examination and cross-examination, pursued in courts of law, is not a device for the confusion of the unwary, but is acknowledged, after an experience of a thousand years, to be the best mode of getting at truth, through oral testimony, that the wit of man has ever devised; and that the rules of evidence, as observed in courts of law, are deductions from principles in human nature whose soundness has been tested by almost endless observation. The committee ought to have followed the rules of legal procedure throughout. On the Advocate's account of their course, we do not feel that we know more about the fraud than we knew before, and it is most unfortunate that over a matter of such grave concern, not simply to the Methodist denomination, but to the American people, any doubt should be left hanging. In fact, few people will now regard the enquiry as anything better than a "whitewashing" operation.

Just north of the dividing line between Dakota and Minnesota, at the foot of Lake Winipeg and on both sides of the Red River of the North, is what is called the Red River country, or Prince Rupert's Land. Its inhabitants are a few Scotch, English, and Irish settlers, and with these a much greater number—perhaps some two or three thousands—of half-breeds. These latter are of mixed French and Indian blood, and for generations they have lived by trapping and hunting, their largest game being a sort of buffalo called the forest buffalo, smaller than ours and ranging in smaller herds. The whites are traders and agriculturists, the climate and soil both being favorable to agriculture, and the country needing only a market to be of considerable value as a farming district. Within the year, the Hudson Bay Company have for a consideration transferred this Territory of the Northwest to the Dominion, and of course without saying with your leave or by your leave to the settlers. And of course, too, the Home Government gave itself small concern about the opinions of a few thousand remote colonists. That is not the British official way of treating colonists, who in British eyes are perhaps one degree less respectable than the "natives" and "foreigners" into which classes respectively, as has been wittily said, the true-born Briton is apt to place all un-British people, colored and white, outside of his native island. The Red River people, however, have views of their own as regards their political rights, and declare that they will not put up with a government composed of old hangers-on of the Hudson Bay Company, and Canadian politicians, and that they will have local self-government, with representatives and an executive of their own, and a system of common schools endowed with public lands. In pursuance of this policy, a body of them marched on McDougall, who had just entered the territory as Governor, and as they were coming in insurrectionary guise, McDougall rapidly retraced his steps, and is now supposed to be on our side of the line and to be breathing war. Of this, however, there would seem to be no danger and no need. Nothing can be done in the way of campaigning till spring, and then the trouble of fighting the hunters—if they choose fighting—with a British flying column would be immense, costly, and bloody. But the winter will give all parties time to cool down, and the affair will in all probability have a peaceable ending. The Scotch, English, and Irish settlers are understood to be not unfavorable to the contemplated government by the Dominion's agents, but the French and half-breeds are otherwise minded.

Elsewhere, also, the Dominion finds troubled waters. Newfoundland has rejected confederation. Nova Scotia hates it worse the longer it lasts, and is petitioning for liberation from the bond. The Premier of the Dominion cabinet is assailed as a noted "corruptionist," and as being incompetent for any public office by reason of a vice which periodically unfits him for all work. Business is dull, and the number of bankrupts increases, while labor leaves the country for the United States. The Government at Washington is understood to have no notion of renewing the reciprocity treaty, and the Canadian advocates of independence and annexation are hoping that the American Congress will stand firm, for they see that commercial distress makes for their side. Meantime, it is reported that the Canadian political leaders have been told by John Bright that if they can get ready to cut the British connection in five or six months, instead of five or six years, as had been suggested to him by one of them, the English ministry will like it all the better. That Mr. Bright speaks the general mind of his colleagues on this point is inferred from various notorious facts, as the withdrawal of troops from the Provinces; the saying of Mr. Gladstone that the guarantee of the debt to the Hudson's Bay Company was the last English guarantee that Canada need expect; and—quite as significant as any other—the speeches of the Governor-General, who openly advises Canada to stand alone. Then there is not a province of the Dominion in which there are not newspapers openly advocating independence, though they say nothing about independence as a halfway-house to annexation, which it most likely would speedily turn out to be. It would seem as if the Dominion might well wonder "what it was begun for, if so soon 'twas to be done for." There never has been a much more rickety political structure raised, and so most discerning people have seen from the beginning, for it was the child of the greed of Canadian professional politicians, than whom there are few worse, and of British ignorance both of the Colonies and the United States, which was then expected to go to pieces momently and leave a free field for the "Kingdom of Canada"—as in those days it was proposed to call it.

Some worthless person recently set a-going in an equally worthless paper the report that the Nation was shortly to be merged in the Sunday Leader of this city, the principal organ of the Tammany Ring, and edited, we believe, by our well-known Mayor, Mr. Oakey Hall. To New Yorkers the story is sufficiently ludicrous to let it pass without notice; but as we have received enquiries about it from one or two subscribers in other parts of the country, it is perhaps as well to say that the Nation will not be merged in the Leader at present, nor at any time without six months' notice to its readers, and a handsome consideration from the treasury of the Ring to its present proprietors. Perhaps we may also insist on a paving contract, but we shall decide nothing hastily. The only possible foundation for the story we can think of is our having broken with the Papacy last year, for non-payment of our stipend as the American organ of the Propaganda—a fact which we frankly revealed at the time, when detected by a subscriber in the covert advocacy of Popish doctrines.

The Government, after having kept the Spanish gun-boats under surveillance for two months or more, has at last seized them, as we ventured some weeks ago to predict it would do. They have been libelled, too, by the District Attorney, on the ground that they are intended to be used against Peru, with which Spain is technically at war, though a shot has not been fired in the quarrel for two years, and a revolution has occurred in Spain in the interval; and no officer of this Government believes, we venture to assert, or has ever believed, that they are to be used against Peru. They are well known to be intended to be used against Cuba, and this is the reason why they were seized; but there is no mention of it made, of course, in the libel, because Cuba is only known at present to the United States Government and courts as a Spanish island. There has been a proposition made, however, to insert Cuba in the libel, as a "colony, district, or people," to use the words of the statute, with which the United States are at peace. This would, however, be simply an indirect, sneaking way of recognizing Cuban belligerency, instead of doing it openly by proclamation, and would be a much grosser offence against international usage. We doubt if this little dodge will find favor with the Attorney-General.

The question who is to be King of Spain does not seem to make much progress. The majority of the Cortes have had a caucus over the matter, at which Prim and other ministers made a frank offer of the young Duke of Genoa, now at Harrow under Matthew Arnold's care; but his youth seemed to constitute in the eyes of a large number of the deputies an insuperable objection to him, and he failed to get what the constitution requires—a full majority of the Cortes, and what Victor Emanuel requires, a full two-thirds. Prim made an explanation of the difficulties attending the work of selection. Montpensier is a Bourbon, and Marshal Serrano is said to have sworn publicly that no Bourbon should ever again reign in Spain. Prince Napoleon is all France has to offer, and he is a Bonaparte, which for Spaniards includes all that is bad. England has only Protestants, and Prussia the same. Portugal has refused; and the princes of the other Catholic States, except Italy, are objectionable on moral, mental, or religious grounds, and there remains only the House of Savoy, which is Catholic and liberal, and has already done much for constitutional freedom.

There is probably nothing in the situation in Spain more discouraging than the finances. M. Figuerola, who has just gone out of office, and we believe come back again, submitted his budget before he went, and it is a gloomy document. The deficit for the financial year, which is hereafter to end on the 31st of December, three months later than usual, is simply $25,000,000 (gold). He proposes to make ends meet next year by cutting down the salaries of the priests 30 per cent. and the pensions of all pensioners 20 per cent., and "other expenses of the Treasury" proportionately. The revenue has increased, it is reported, during the past year $63,000,000, which, considering the state of the country and the disturbances in Cuba, is something wonderful; but neither this nor the reduction of salaries will suffice to fill up the gap. So all the remaining crown and ecclesiastical lands are to be sold, and the army to be reduced from 85,000 to 70,000 men. This is very fair, and it is a pity that such a programme should not end here. But it is also proposed to tax the interest on the public debt 20 per cent., which, particularly as this burden will mostly fall on innocent foreigners, who compose the vast majority of the unfortunate creditors of Spain, will simply be a swindle of the first order. Italy talked, two years ago, of resorting to this mode of raising the wind, but there was sense enough and decency enough left in the Chambers to avoid it, and the result is that Italian credit is better than it was at one time. Austria has also done it, to her vast detriment. The effect of this cheating has been such that no foreign loan stands a chance on the European money markets which does not contain a stipulation that the interest shall be free from all government taxes. The Portuguese are now trying to sell a three per cent. bond in London at 31, but although the interest will thus be between nine and ten per cent., they have to give a guarantee on this point. Calling a forcible reduction of interest a "tax" does not deceive money-lenders as to its real nature. A private debtor might just as well reduce the interest due on his debts, and call it a drawback for charitable and religious purposes.

There is talk of a split amongst the French Liberals, and not only talk, but there is a split, though perhaps not a formal one, the "Irreconcilables" forming themselves more and more into a distinct party, with no policy apparently beyond making the Emperor as uncomfortable as possible. They have returned Rochefort in Paris, who stands at the head now of a new sect of "Nonjurors," who refuse to take the oath of fidelity to the constitution as a qualification for any public office. Rochefort gets over the difficulty by taking the oath, and announcing his intention of not keeping it; but how Ledru Rollin—who is also once more talked of for public life—will manage, does not appear. The plan of the "Nonjurors," of which Louis Blanc, Felix Pyat, and one or two others are said to be the authors, is to return nonjuring deputies, and have them insist on their right to their seats under the sovereign authority of the people electing them. There is an absurdity in this somewhat like the claim of the Confederates during the rebellion to the character of belligerents and the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus at one and the same time. But in spite of the "Irreconcilables," it is plain that the great body of the French Liberals have made great advances in political training, see the folly of street fighting, and are determined to fight the battle with the Empire out with the tongue and pen. One of the last good stories about the Court is that the Government has demanded and received from Sainte-Beuve's executors all his private papers, for the purpose of getting at his correspondence with his intimate friend, the Princess Mathilde, who hated the Empress, and is believed to have made her and her doings at Court the subject of savage satire and even pencil caricatures in her private letters.

The French Protectionists are, in the meantime, hard at work for the abrogation of the treaty with England. M. Pouyer-Quertier, the great manufacturer, who is at the head of the movement, has been getting up a gigantic demonstration at Rouen, the principal seat of the cotton manufacture. In one of his speeches he heaped ridicule on the wine interest of Bordeaux, which stands firmly by the treaty, by showing, from official sources, that whereas a Frenchman drank 100 quarts of wine in a year, and a Prussian 57, and a Spaniard 32, an Englishman drank only one quart, and indeed, according to more recent statistics, only one pint. The wine interest, however, is not to be disposed of with a laugh or a good story. It holds half of France firmly in its grip, and having got a taste of cheap clothing and tools, and of foreign markets, is not likely to give them up without a struggle.

Of the nature and extent of the movement in Dalmatia, owing to the character of the country and the literary and political isolation of the wild mountaineers who are engaged in it, but little is known. The ostensible cause of the insurrection is hostility to the military conscription; and though it was odd that this should cause an outbreak for the first time, and odd, too, that the Dalmatians, who have a natural fondness for soldiering, and have, under the generic name of "Croats," supplied Austria hitherto with some of her best troops, as well as sailors, should suddenly become so enamored of peaceful pursuits. This explanation was at first generally accepted; but the sympathetic disturbances in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Turkish provinces peopled by the same race, and the fact that the insurgents appear to be well-armed and supplied with ammunition, are now taken to indicate a Panslavic origin for the rising. The Austrian troops, owing to the nature of the country, have hitherto met with nothing but checks, and heavy reinforcements continue to go forward; and the worst of it is, that the expenses have to be paid with borrowed money.

THE WAY THE INCOME TAX OUGHT TO BE COLLECTED.

As the meeting of Congress draws near, the question of the continuance or discontinuance of the income tax begins to attract more and more of the public attention. It is more and more evident, too, as the discussion about it proceeds, not that the popular feeling is opposed to the tax, but that it is rapidly becoming an object of determined hostility to a large number of politicians.

The objections to it are two in number: that it is oppressive and inquisitorial, and that it gives rise to a great deal of fraud. As regards the first, it must be admitted that all direct taxes have the disadvantage of being presented to the taxpayer undisguisedly as taxes, and nothing else. They are neither mixed up with the price of commodities nor put in the guise of encouragement to native industry. They offer, in fact, not the slightest room for deception, either on the part of the government or of the citizen, and they do call the attention of the latter, in a brusque and abrupt way, once a year to the cost of being governed. Now, as a good deal of the hardship of paying taxes at all—certainly to persons possessing more than $1,000 a year, the only class which the income tax reaches—lies in the impression the taxes make on the imagination, it is a strong objection to a tax that it impresses the imagination powerfully. Five per cent. of a man's income taken from him in the shape of additions to the price of his food or clothing or house-rent would not trouble him nearly as much as the same amount demanded from him in a round sum once a year by the collector of the revenue. But, then, we have yet to see any reliable testimony that the present income tax troubles the popular imagination. We hear no complaint of it from anybody, except from the advocates of some other mode of raising the same amount of money. Those whose sole desire with regard to taxation is to have the total amount cut down, have, as far as our knowledge goes, no more objection to the income tax than to any other tax, while a great many of them have less, inasmuch as they believe that a greater proportion of the amount taken from the taxpayer reaches the Treasury than of any other Government due. The collectors do not report any unusual unwillingness to pay it; perhaps fewer deliberate attempts are on the whole made to evade it than any other; and the corruption and abuses which mark its collection have thus far been much inferior, both in number and gravity, to those of the custom-house or other branches of the internal revenue. In fact, we do not know where to look either for any real sign of special popular hostility to it, or for any special reason for popular hostility to it.

The second objection, based on the amount of fraud to which the tax gives rise, has just this amount of foundation: that the income tax tempts a greater number of people to evasions and concealments, and, in the present condition of our revenue service, makes a greater amount of concealment and evasion possible than any other. But, in practice, it is quite safe to say there have been more frauds, more downright lying, cheating, and stealing done in the custom-house and in the collection of other branches of the internal revenue—the whiskey tax, for instance—in one year, than in the income tax during the whole number of years it has been in operation. In using its yield as a test of public morality, it must be borne in mind that the most moral and upright man makes, consciously or unconsciously, a distinction between evading a tax which has been plumply and plainly demanded of him by the collector and one for which the collector never applies. Between two such taxes, man, as he ought to be, would see no difference, and the receipts in one case would be as large as in the other; between them, man, as he is, does see a difference, has always seen a difference, and has shown it in his conduct. Therefore, as a matter of fact, whatever has been done by way of evading the income tax, even if the loss to the Government had been the same in quantity, would not indicate the same amount of immorality as the evasions of other direct taxes or of custom duties. In both of the latter, cheating means prepared and deliberate cheating, including every degree of falsehood, from simple equivocation to downright perjury, on the part both of officer and taxpayer.

If this be true, it points to the real and great defect of the income tax, which is, that too much of the work of collecting it is left to the taxpayer, too little done by the Government. More of it, indeed, is left to the taxpayer than is left in any country in which it or anything like it has been tried, more than human nature will stand, or ought to be expected to stand; and all this in the teeth of the notorious fact that the very constitution of society here renders it more difficult of collection than in any European country. In the first place, our population is nomad, to a degree unknown in any other; that is, the proportion of it which every year changes its place of abode, and which lives in hotels and boarding-houses, is larger than in any other country; and this flux and reflux, and want of settled domicile, not only increases the collector's difficulties, but diminishes the taxpayer's own sense of the moral obligation of the tax, if it does not, indeed, banish all thought of it from his mind. In the next place, there is probably no country in the world where the number of annuitants, or persons living on fixed incomes, bears so small a proportion to the number of those whose gains are uncertain, and vary from year to year. The injustice of levying at the same rate on the income of the man whose receipts depend on his health and strength, and on that of him who draws his revenue from invested capital, has long been a subject of bitter complaint in England; but to this injustice another is added here—or, if not added, is very glaring and oppressive here—that of levying at the same rate on the receipts drawn from a well-established business and those drawn from speculative undertakings, the result of which is still doubtful. The number of persons whom this inequality affects here is greater than a European would think possible. The general result is that the proportion of our people who find it difficult to estimate their incomes, either in accordance with the literal requirements of the law, or their own sense of what is fair—and this last standard will always affect the returns of a large number—is among us very great.

Now the remedy for all this seems plain enough. The state of society here being what it is renders necessary, if possible, more perfect and efficient collecting machinery than in Europe. The habits of the people require that less of the work of assessment should be left to them than is left in Europe, while, on the other hand, the stronger and more pervading sense of interest in and devotion to the Government would render the proper kind of assessment and collection more productive here than it has ever proved anywhere. The multiplicity and rapidity of the changes of fortune and changes of places of abode, and the general indifference to the relation between means and style of living, to which Europeans attach so much importance, which are marked characteristics of American society, not only require that our assessors should be men of unusual skill, sagacity, tact, discretion, and judgment, but that they should be permanent officers, entirely devoted to their duties and thoroughly acquainted with the people of their district, and competent, therefore, not only to detect discrepancies in returns, but extract proper explanations of them. No returns should be left to the taxpayer's own judgment or honesty or memory. The list of questions now suggested to the assessor should not be idle forms merely; they should be asked; and the assessor should be a man of such training and manners as to enable him to ask them inoffensively and to judge of the correctness of the replies, and should know enough of individuals resident within his district to decide whether further scrutiny was necessary, and, if so, how much. A glaring difference, for instance, between a man's style of living and his income as returned by himself, he should always be called on to account for, and account for satisfactorily: and the failure of a man keeping up an expensive establishment to return any income whatever—of which there are many cases in New York—should be made the subject of thorough examination. Of course, this process would keep assessors busy, and it would need assessors of a very high order; but it would enormously increase the revenue, particularly in the large cities, both by frightening dishonest men and enlightening honest ones.

As matters stand, the wonder is that the tax, especially in large cities, is as productive as it is. The assessors are, in the first place, appointed without the smallest reference to their fitness for their duties, and they are removed before they acquire familiarity with them. Nearly every assessor in this city, for instance, was changed last April, just as the work of the year was beginning; and the same was doubtless the case everywhere else; and the income tax, which is a full third of the internal revenue, was raised under the supervision of raw hands, who knew little of their duties and nothing of the taxpayers of the district. The consequence was, of course, that not the least pains was or could be taken to verify returns or in any way test their accuracy. Imagine a private firm conducting its business in this way, and imagine the state of mind of a Secretary of the Treasury who believes that this is the proper way to conduct the national business.

THE WAY IT OUGHT NOT TO BE COLLECTED.

The remedy for this state of things was of course obvious. Every man in the country knows what it is as well as he knows what ought to be done when the cashier of a bank is found to be dishonest or deficient in arithmetic. The Special Commissioner of Revenue has pointed out plainly in his reports that the mode of officering the revenue service was a source of enormous loss to the Government, which he estimated at twenty-five per cent. The assessors in this city, where the duties are unusually onerous, were not only not selected for their fitness, or retained in office for the sake of their experience, but were not even required to give attention to their duties. A large number of them—we will not say all—had other business of their own, to which they devoted by far the larger part of their working hours. We remember one case, in which a person enquiring for the assessor of a rich and populous up-town district in order to get his decision on a point of some importance, was informed that he was there only one hour in the morning and one hour in the afternoon, the rest being spent in his own office down-town, and his work being done by that peculiar class of helpless and unhappy-looking people called "deputies."

However, when it was found that the income tax was not yielding in the large cities what it ought to yield, one might suppose that means were at once taken to improve the machinery of collection. Nothing of the kind; the machinery was just left as it was, the only effect on it of Grant's accession being to aggravate its faults. The tax was, it was admitted, "inquisitorial," and therefore likely to be unpopular. It is as much as any ordinary man can bear to submit any detailed account of his private affairs to an official of any kind, much less to an official of the kind one usually finds in the subordinate positions of the national service. So, by way of making this inquisitorial feature of the tax not only more effective but less offensive, and thus bringing recalcitrant and dishonest taxpayers up to the mark, the newspaper reporters were set to work. The assessors' books were thrown open to them, and they were encouraged, if not invited, to lay every man's returns in black and white before his neighbors, so that he might be tempted by the fear of their tongues, or the desire of imposing on them, to rate his income as high as possible. For individual feelings, for the "natural and inalienable right" of everybody to keep his affairs to himself, unless called upon to reveal them in a judicial controversy—a right, too, which a government should not only respect but encourage—there was no regard whatever; for the demoralizing effects on manners and morals of converting the whole community into a horde of spies or detectives, and of multiplying the gossips and busybodies, whose numbers and activity make them already one of the scourges of civilized society, there was no regard whatever. There was at first some little murmuring and hesitation about the practice, both on the part of the press and the public, but the public was speedily reconciled to it by the papers at first judiciously confining their revelations to the large incomes. Men of large incomes are few; those who want to know how much they have are many; away, therefore, with their delicacy; let the people have a look at their cheque-books.

Last year, however, one paper reduced the system to perfection by publishing everybody's income return as it stood on the assessors' books. In other words, the work of verifying and rectifying the assessment was handed over bodily to the editor of the newspaper, who took his pay for the work in the increased sale thus secured for his valuable sheet, and encouraged the public to regard as a scoundrel any man whose income did not appear in the list, or did not accord with his neighbor's notion of what it ought to be. The mistakes in the list were of course innumerable. Men's names and the figures of their returns were printed wrongly, and hundreds of men had of course special reasons to give for seeming discrepancies between their means as indicated by their style of living and as indicated by their sworn returns. But those who felt themselves wronged had only one remedy, and that was a letter to the editor, to be also published in the valuable sheet, thus still further increasing its sales; and the poor devils were cordially invited by the editorial Rhadamanthus to step up briskly to his bar and give an account of themselves. In other words, the business of the United States assessors, in this district at least, the most important in the Union, was all but completely transferred to private individuals, who undertook, for a few thousand dollars, to blackguard the weak and timid into paying more than they ought to pay, and to frighten the fraudulent into paying as much as they ought to pay. The process was enough to bring tears into the eyes or blushes to the cheeks of anybody who had correct ideas of how the work of government ought to be done, of the purposes for which the Almighty endowed man with his reason and judgment, and who reflected that the country contains ample materials for as scientific, able, and honest administration as exists or could be devised anywhere.

The great newspaper supplement to the Treasury Department, it appears, however, has not been found sufficient. We are informed, we do not know how correctly, that the retention of the income tax, as a means of enabling him to continue his bond-buying, forms part of Mr. Boutwell's policy for the coming financial year. We presume, therefore, that it was in preparation for an announcement of this fact that the word went out a few weeks ago that the Treasury, by way of making the collection of the tax more efficient hereafter, was about to send out detectives to look into the income returns of last year, and investigate all suspicious differences between men's apparent and returned revenue. Now this would be a perfectly legitimate operation if, after all possible pains had been taken to render the ordinary machinery of the assessor's office efficient, the public was believed to be still evading its duty. But considering that no pains have been taken to render it efficient—that the assessors' offices are filled by political hacks, who hold office from day to day, and do not even make a profession of fitness for their work—the appearance of detectives on the scene to help them is insult added to injury.

The duty of taxpayers with regard to these detectives is obvious. As long as they confine their operations to picking up gossip or poring over the assessors' books, there is, of course, nothing to be said. But if they come to any private citizen, either to make enquiries about his last year's income, on which he has already paid his tax, or to get information about the means of neighbors who have paid theirs, the duty of that citizen—a duty he owes to private and public morality, and to the cause of administrative reform—will be to show him the door, with such expressions of indignation as religion and self-respect will permit. If the machinery for the collection of the tax cannot be improved, the tax itself ought certainly to be abolished as soon as the exigencies of the revenue will permit.

WHAT LABOR REFORM MEANS.

The thirteen thousand votes cast at the late Massachusetts election for the "Labor Reform" party, and the respectable number of delegates elected by it to the Massachusetts Legislature, suggest to any one at all interested in the investigation of political problems a good many interesting questions. This is the first election since the formation of the National Labor Reform League in which the new party has had any opportunity to show its strength, and if one judged simply from the platform and the recorded vote, one would be led to suppose a very strange state of things as existing in Massachusetts, the like of which it might not be unfair to imagine would soon show itself in other parts of the country. We say a very strange state of things, for it would certainly be strange to find that thirteen thousand voters in any State of the Union were in favor of making the establishment of the principles enunciated in Mr. Chamberlain's platform the basis of action for an independent party. If there are thirteen thousand men in Massachusetts who spring into political life at the sound of such a slogan as was raised by the Labor Reformers in October, what numbers must there not be in Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, and the thirty or forty remaining States, all ready to spring to arms at the same war-cry! The platform of the Massachusetts Labor Reform party, declaring for repudiation and the eight-hour delusion, and seeming not wholly averse to a general distribution of real and personal property among the laboring population, commanded thirteen thousand votes in a single State. How much does it command in the country at large?

The recent history of "labor reform" in Massachusetts is as follows: A year since, at the municipal election in Boston, some crack-brained enthusiast determined to see whether "the great heart of the people" could not be stirred on the labor question by the nomination of a "workingman's ticket," and accordingly one was put in the field, bearing the name, if we remember right, of the same Mr. Chamberlain who ran this year for Governor, as candidate for Mayor. The platform was as curious a political production as we remember of late years to have seen. One of the planks was "the immediate abolishment of all industrial corporations which refuse to adopt the co-operative principle." The appearance of this ticket caused a good deal of merriment in Massachusetts at the time, and some people thought it must be a local device for the purpose of splitting the votes of one of the regular parties. But it was not. It was the result of a genuine political movement, which certainly at the time met with the most signal defeat. Nobody voted for the "Workingman's Candidates," except those who had been engaged in nominating them, and the whole affair would have been probably entirely forgotten, had it not been for the sudden reappearance this fall of a much more effective workingman's movement in the hands of the Labor Reform party. In order to understand the reason of this it is necessary to recall some of the proceedings of the Massachusetts Legislature of last Winter. Hardly had that Legislature assembled, when there came before it as petitioners a society known as the "Knights of St. Crispin," who, representing themselves as a charitable organization, desired to be incorporated in order that they might hold property. This seemed a harmless request, but it was necessary to examine into the nature of the society before granting it. On examination of the articles and by-laws it appeared that the "Knights of St. Crispin" were a boot and shoe-making fraternity, intending to extend over the whole country, having subordinate "lodges" in the various States, provided with mysterious officers, known as the "S. K., K., F. S., R. S., C. S., T., U., A. U., I. S., O. S.," three trustees, and an unlimited number of members. All this seemed harmless enough, as did most of the other provisions; and with the exception of a remarkable want of grammar in the construction of their sentences, the Knights of St. Crispin would have seemed to the Legislature an eminently deserving body, had it not been for one unfortunate article, which was this:

"ARTICLE IX. No member shall take any person to work at any part or parts of the boot and shoe trade who has never worked at any branch of the trade at least twelve calendar months, without the permission of the lodge of which he is a member; provided, that this shall not be construed to prevent a father learning his own son."

The peculiarity of this article was that it would establish an hereditary caste of boot and shoe makers, into the mysteries of which no outsider would ever be allowed to penetrate. It would prevent all apprenticeship, except by permission of the various lodges, but as fathers might still teach their children the trade, the "Knights of St. Crispin" would be the means of introducing into modern industrial pursuits one of the most odious kinds of aristocracy ever known—aristocracy not designed, as most aristocracies are, to exclude a particular portion of the rich, but intended to shut out from the means of daily sustenance those very down-trodden classes whose elevation and support were its chief pretence. Such an organization as this it was wholly impossible to charter, and it was so represented to the applicants. They were asked the meaning of Article IX., and they said with great naïveté that the labor market was already stocked to overflowing, that the supply was always "too great," and the only way to check the evil was to create an artificial society—in other words, to prevent any more people from learning the trade. But the Legislature was obdurate. The charter was refused.

And now began the labor reform agitation. We do not say, of course, that the agitation would not have taken place had not the St. Crispin charter been refused; but unquestionably the refusal of the Legislature precipitated matters. To the constant causes of discontent furnished by high prices, high rents, high taxes, and low wages, was added a new and distinctly political grievance—the refusal of the dominant political party to grant a workingmen's petition. From that moment until the day of the election it was evident that something striking was to take place. A ticket was at length nominated, filled with utterly unknown names, and announcing principles which not even the Democrats had had the hardihood to publish. To every one's amazement, thirteen thousand men gathered to its support. On an examination of the vote, it seems that the St. Crispin organization did not throw the whole of it, but in some cases voted the regular tickets. In certain portions of the State, however, and especially in that portion best known to the world as "Butler's district," comprising such towns as Salem, Lynn, Marblehead, and many other "shoe towns," the labor ticket was enthusiastically supported. Twenty or thirty labor members were returned to the Legislature, and the impression that a new party had at last come upon the scene rendered complete.

To laugh this vote away by saying that it is simply the work of discontented shoemakers seems to us very idle. Suppose it was the work of discontented shoemakers, is it any better for Massachusetts, or the country at large, that so many thousand men should feel themselves bound to vote for such a platform as that set up by these labor reformers, because they are discontented shoemakers? A vote that can be called out on such a barren pretext as that which existed in the present case, is such an ignorant vote as to be a serious danger to any republic. That a perfectly just refusal on the part of a Republican legislature to allow caste to be established in a democratic society should be made the ground of such a platform out of pure spite, does not incline one to think hopefully of the future. But suppose the St. Crispins were not chargeable with the result, or only in part. Then it is worse, for, as we began by saying, we see in that case no conceivable reason why the same manœuvres may not be repeated in every State of the Union, and why it is not established that a very dangerous party, capable of exercising an enormous influence for evil on the future of the country, has not sprung up almost without our knowing it. If the laboring population of the country can really be induced, without any cause whatever, to band itself together against the rest of the community, we have reached a serious pass. But we prefer to believe that the chief cause of the Massachusetts agitation was the St. Crispin affair, and if so, a most serious responsibility will rest on the next Legislature of that State. Undoubtedly the application will be renewed, and undoubtedly the presence of the Labor Reform members will add great strength to the petitioners' cause. Unless Massachusetts has strength enough to resist their importunity, the country at large will have to thank that State for introducing one of the most dangerous innovations into legislation which modern times have known; an innovation compared to which eight-hour laws would prove child's play.

Once but grant the St. Crispins a charter in one State, and we shall have them incorporated in every other in a remarkably short space of time. And this done, there is no reason in the world why similar organizations in other trades should not obtain legal recognition, or why the "guilds" of mediæval times should not be reproduced with all their evils augmented and none of their good retained. For it was never the object of those organizations to do more than protect themselves against aggression. They did not make the nefarious attempt to erect themselves into close and hereditary corporations which is now made in Massachusetts. They never excluded apprentices. And if this is what the trades organizations of our day require, they ought to be taught by some means that what they require will never be granted.

MEN AND THINGS IN WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, November 20, 1869.

THE diplomatic corps, as a body, is no doubt infinitely bored by being obliged to live in the city of Washington. There is nothing surprising in this, but it is a little curious that the national pride of Americans, apt as it is to be sensitive about most parts of the national domain, would scarcely be stirred to resent the most outspoken avowal by a foreigner that he found Washington intolerably tedious. There is, however, a certain difference in the way of looking at the shortcomings of the capital. Americans commonly regard it as a centre of corruption and intrigue; foreigners only know that it is dull. This is its unpardonable sin. There is not a theatre, except by courtesy; there is no art, no music, no park, no drive, no club. Good dinners are rare indeed, and good wines are, for the most part, held firmly in diplomatic hands. But this is after all only the least difficulty; for, although these wants interfere greatly with a foreigner's personal enjoyment, they do not necessarily narrow his range of influence and information. The worst annoyance of all is that society itself exists only in disjointed fragments, and that there is no established centre of intelligence and social activity. If a diplomat wishes to mix with congressmen and senators, or with the persons of note who are incessantly passing through Washington, it is ten to one but that he must hunt them to their separate retreats, and after cornering one in a lobby, or running another to earth in his office, or his bed-chamber, or at his favorite bar-room, each and every one stands at bay when approached, as though he had something to lose in this rare contact with a gentleman, and nothing, at his time of life, to learn or to hope from cultivated society.

The diplomat is not the only sufferer from this condition of things. The Washington lobby, a difficult and somewhat dirty subject, alarming to timid people and annoying to every one, may perhaps call for a separate notice, as it is too serious for a parenthesis; but it is quite true that as the lobby is an institution which always must exist, and, what is more to the purpose, always, when decently constituted, ought to exist, unless the Government proposes to govern without reference to the people governed; so, if the Washington lobby is a disgrace to the country, the reason is to be partly found in this same disintegration of society which shuts the door of influence to what is sound and respectable at the capital, and leaves it open to what is low and blackguard. There is no room for social influences to act, but low agencies can act anywhere, and the Government is practically rolled in the kennel because it has no weapon to drive its tormentors away. As a mere suggestion, and not with any wish to insist on the idea, it might do good to enquire whether the leading lawyers and editors, the merchants and manufacturers, the political leaders, and all respectable and well-to-do citizens whose business or whose pleasure leads them frequently to Washington, might not find it to their advantage if they would combine and establish there a cosmopolitan club, if only to assert a social influence which might assist their private purposes. Once supply an arena on which society and politics can meet on equal terms; where senators and cabinet ministers, congressmen, diplomats, judges, lawyers, editors, the more respectable reporters, protectionists, free-traders, planters and spinners, clergy and laymen, can meet face to face and learn to know each other, and one may perhaps decide the question whether what is respectable may not after all prove strong enough to make itself respected and put blackguards under a ban. A lobby put to this test might at all events be externally improved and taught to be decent. Meanwhile, the fact remains beyond dispute that Washington as it stands is somewhat disreputable, and, what is with many persons a greater fault, it is abominably dull. Or, as a quotation is occasionally useful to convey an idea in stronger language than seems altogether proper in a directer form, readers of Mr. Disraeli's novels may remember how, when the enthusiastic Tancred, fresh from the Holy Sepulchre, arrived at the residence of the Queen of the Ansarey and complimented her majesty's prime minister on his large experience as a traveller, he was startled at hearing the following response: "The Prince of England has expressed himself with extreme exactitude and with flattering grace," replied Keferinis. "I have indeed visited all the Syrian cities except Jerusalem, which no one wishes to see, and which," he added, in a very sweet, calm tone, "is unquestionably a place fit only for hogs."

The diplomat, however, though planted in a position which may offer peculiar advantages to hogs, has still advantages of his own which an American critic habitually underrates. Granting that the diplomatic service has at no time held any monopoly of wisdom, and that some of the class have even been suspected of dulness by their contemporaries, it is still true that their education has made them trained and formidable critics. Now and then, too, there appears at Washington some foreigner of exceptionable force; some Dane, or Russian, or Turk, very quiet, very gentlemanly, very agreeable in conversation, extraordinarily quick to find an opponent's weak point and to work on it; a man who has few prejudices, political, religious, or social, and so much knowledge of the world as to appear to have no prejudices at all. Such a man has ideas of his own, in regard to which he does not "take the public into his confidence," as Mr. Disraeli said was done by Mr. Reverdy Johnson. He manipulates the Chairmen of Foreign Affairs and measures his strength with the Secretary of State. He studies the system of government, and rates it according to rules of his own; and finally he goes away to repeat the experience at some new court, after failing perhaps in the object of his mission, but carrying in his head a definite and final opinion as to the value of the American political system. Perfectly impartial, as he may easily be, in regard to men and institutions, he has yet one great prejudice which is always found to be the basis of his reasoning. He absolutely disbelieves in theories of society and government. In Washington, however, he has found not only the central administration of one of the most powerful nations in the world, but behind this a theory of government.

It must be remembered that Europeans have been pestered to death with these theories, and France, which is the home of all diplomats, whatever their allegiance may be, has tried almost every known system, and has found them all fail. To establish a firm equilibrium between the powers necessary for government; between the representative assembly and the representative chief; or, as Americans would say, between the law-making and the law-executing authorities—the legislature and the executive, has been the dream of Europe for a century past. Hitherto, every experiment has failed. Either the legislature has swallowed the executive, or the executive has suppressed the legislature, and each result has in its turn proved intolerable. There is scarcely a government in Western Europe which is not incessantly shifting its basis and redistributing its powers. The diplomat, to whom this story has become inexpressibly tedious, discovers at Washington that the American Government was very carefully constructed to meet this precise difficulty by means of a system of balances which he is expected to accept as perfect. This is much to ask of a man whose life has been passed in learning the instability of all balances, and the impossibility, or at least the non-existence, of an exact equilibrium; but the suggestion has at all events the advantage of lending a spice of interest to a residence otherwise dull, and it affords a certain amusement to a clever foreigner to feel sure that he has the word to this prodigious charade which is performed under his eyes on a stage where he sits among the actors like a fine gentleman of Shakespeare's day. It is not surprising that he is a sharp critic when one reflects how profoundly ignorant he must believe the performers to be. To him the drama and its development appear almost as certain as a mathematical formula; the characters seem as familiar as the heroes of Corneille; the nation that, during an indefinite series of generations, throws itself alternately from the corrupt arms of a single man to the still more corrupt embrace of a number of men, is a sight as well known as a Greek chorus to a school-boy. President and senate; dictator or oligarchy; which is first to suppress the other? With a drama so put on the stage, neither diplomats nor any other persons have a right to think Washington dull. It is true the play is somewhat long and the number of acts is unconscionable, but a similar tragedy when performed in Rome was longer still, yet not without interest to the bystander.

Granting that this diplomatic creed is quite a mistake, and that there is no reason why power may not be distributed in such a way as to remain within fairly understood bounds, there is still a great critical advantage in using so sharp an instrument as this, provided it is used with skill. In old times, when the government was framed, the same style of speculation was universal in America. Hamilton and Madison, and all the other framers of constitutions, were incessantly recurring to it. But the popular bugbear of that day was the sword of the military chieftain; and with the gradual disappearance of all cause of alarm on this score, the public ceased troubling itself about balances of power. The diplomat himself acknowledges that all fear of usurpation by the executive has passed away; but this does not embarrass him in the least, since his theory only excludes the idea of stability, and it necessarily follows that if the executive does not encroach on the legislature, the legislature does and must encroach on the executive. He starts, therefore, with a perfectly clear and, right or wrong, a thoroughly philosophical standard, by which to measure men and events, and also with a sublime and absolute impartiality towards every shade of active party interest, since there is not even a political faction which acts with any reference to his favorite dogma. All are on the same plane in regard to his eye, and all substances are soluble in the single acid which he uses. There is some excuse for thinking such a critic formidable.

A little illustration will serve to show how his system works. Supposing the precedent to be established that a mere act of Congress may put a State—like Virginia, for example—out of the Union, and keep it out during will, this proves, indeed, that the central government is rapidly gaining power—a fact which no one questions; but it does not show which branch of the central government is to profit by it. Power must lodge somewhere, and, except in the executive and the legislature, there is no place where this new power can lodge. One of the two must eventually absorb it, and the stronger will be the successful one. At the beginning of a new administration it is advisable to know how much strength it has. A foreigner would ask whether the President is likely to advocate any distinct policy of his own; whether he will not deem it prudent to let the Senate guide his foreign relations, and the House dictate his financial opinions; whether he has not already abandoned his executive patronage to Congress, and allowed his hands to be fettered in regard to removing these officers whom Congress has appointed; whether he has adopted the rule of evading responsibility and throwing it upon the legislature; whether he acts as a leader, or follows as an agent; whether he represents the people, or whether Congress is the true representative. If these questions are met by the reply that Congress does not stand very high in esteem; that its "rings" and selfish combinations of interests, its inability to manage the great power it has gained, and its absolute want of members gifted with any power of control, threaten the ultimate loss of its strength, the response is, that if personal qualities are to turn the scale, it may prove that absurd or ignorant legislation may be less mischievous than administrative mistakes, appointments that shock the moral sense, or even than voluntary social contact with notorious rogues; petty blunders which incessantly lower the tone of administration, unless redeemed by some bold assertion of large principles, and some courageous acceptance of high responsibilities. And, if met here by the suggestion that the new administration will, in fact, adopt this latter course, the diplomat diplomatically rejoins: "C'est ce que nous allons voir!"

ON THE POSITION OF WOMEN IN ITALY.

I. LEGHORN, Nov. 1.

IT has been justly asserted that consciousness of equality is an essential condition of good manners. The question then arises, What is to be considered the proper footing for beings who are not equals, who were made irreparably unequal by nature, and who, consequently, cannot have such a consciousness? The inequalities of talent, health, and beauty, however severely they may make themselves felt in a man's career or in a woman's private life, are prudently and generously ignored in society. The poor in spirit meet those that are less blessed avowedly on terms of perfect equality; and if the ugly woman does not always treat her beautiful sister in-Eve as her equal, this is due to the frailty of human nature rather than to any fault in the laws of society. Talent and beauty not being gifts in man's giving, society has instinctively enacted that their absence should not be resented nor their presence too persistently acknowledged. Demonstrative hero-worship, as well as demonstrative courtship, is apt to be rude (implicitly, at least) when practised in the presence of mortals, however legitimate both may be elsewhere. But there are inequalities which affect society so forcibly that they cannot possibly be ignored or forgotten. Such are the inequalities of age and sex. Both are irremediable. The youth, it is true, becomes an old man, and the ratio of two different ages decreases in time, while their algebraic difference remains the same. But the difference of sex can neither be philosophized away nor even attenuated by time. In fact, Time would lose his reputation of a gentleman if he had any tendency to effect this. As the primordial fons et origo mali, the difference of sex is the most irrepressible of all social facts. It crops out everywhere. It spoils and mocks all political theories, all social or socialistic schemes. The most thorough-going disciple of Fourier, after having scratched out everything from the palimpsest of history, would find it lurking in the very watermarks of his long-sought tabula rasa, resisting his erasions as nothing else had resisted them, and thus crossing his neatest delineations and spoiling his grandest designs.

What, then, is to be done with it? How is this fact to be viewed and dealt with by intelligent human beings? Do our ideas of liberty and equality apply to one-half of mankind only, or, at most, to each half separately? Love, being limited, even in Mormondom, cannot exhaust the question. It is interpersonal, not intersexual. Where, then, shall we find rules for a modus vivendi between sex and sex? Patriarchal slavery has been tried and found wanting. Of "strong-minded" fastness, too, we have a fair experience. The former resulted in fear, the latter generates dislike; both lead to estrangement between sex and sex. But we know a priori that, between these extremes there must lie a medium-line somewhere, where the maximum of freedom coincides with the minimum of indecorum. And we also know that the exact site and direction of this line cannot be found either by intuition or a priori reasoning, but must be found experimentally.

As yet, very little has been accomplished in this respect. The great woman question is constantly under discussion, but the sociologists (a hybrid word may well pass here) who have engaged in its discussion do not appear to be animated with the true spirit of modern science. They stand before the corked bottle, disputing about the quality of its contents. It may contain beer, or it may contain wine. The arguments adduced in favor of either supposition are often clever and profound, and an immense deal of ink and oratory is bestowed on the subject. But would it not be simpler to uncork the bottle and taste what is in it? For, after all, it may be neither wine nor beer, but soothing syrup or nitro-glycerine. And that is precisely the reason why all practical experiments are deprecated by the advocates of the status quo. They are afraid of disturbing the eternal order of things; which implies that they can have no faith in the existence of an eternal order, and also that they overestimate their own power and responsibility in these matters.

One of the first advocates of women's rights was Hippel, a contemporary and compatriot of Kant, who wrote, about seventy years ago, a very sensible book on the "civic equalization of women with men." But, although the contest has long since been transferred from German to Anglo-Saxon ground, it is now as much as ever a querelle allemande. There was a time when the emancipation of the Jews could be opposed on the ground that they might monopolize all the wealth and state power of the nation; and there are still Tory-minded squires on earth who would oppose national education because book-reading peasants might abandon the plough. Selfishness and fear inspire these champions; and fear, we know, is eloquent, and contagious too. What has Hope to say amid such croakers? Her arguments sound weak and flat, because, after all, she knows as little about the future as her opponent. But in this ignorance lies her strength, and not to make the most of it would be bad fencing. The advocates of women's rights forget that they have nothing else to do but to insist on their own and everybody else's ignorance as to women's mission, and women's capacities, and as to the possible consequences of women's emancipation. No other plea or argument holds good.

To enlighten ourselves on this dark subject, we should begin by allowing women the same educational opportunities which we enjoy ourselves, and then fearlessly throw open the professional careers to them. This may open a new era in history, or it may lead to nothing. At all events, there would be an end to all grievances, and, what is more important, we men and women should, for the first time in our lives, have a chance of learning the real extent of women's capacities, about which we now can have but hazy ideas, incapable alike of being proved or disproved. To those who persist in thinking that this experiment would unhinge the world—that modesty and decorum would vanish from our homes, and that our babes would be left dying in their cradles while their mothers were solving quadratic equations—one might calmly reply that, if such a state of things could be brought on by human agency, the sooner mankind died off from this planet the better.

But if it is idle to discuss what would or might happen, if women did what they do not do, and were what they are not at present, it is by no means uninteresting to observe and analyze their actual doings and their present status in different countries. We may at once discard all that refers to political rights, no magna charta having yet been granted anywhere to the other sex. But the social and legal status of women is well worth studying, as it affords a fair measure for a nation's moral and intellectual development.

Of the legal status of women in any country we may form an estimate by studying the laws on marriage and on married women's property. Without entering deeply into the matter, we can see at a glance that, in this respect, women are better off in countries where the Roman Catholic religion is supposed to be the national religion, than in Protestant countries. Long before the institution of civil marriage in Italy and Austria, the married women of these countries enjoyed all the legal advantages of their French sisters; and if a similar state of things may be found in some provinces of Northern Germany, this can be traced to the influence of the French law at the time of the Napoleonic invasion. In England a married woman can hardly be said to have the right of holding property. A tinkering legislation has granted her the optional privilege of making special settlements, contrary to the spirit of the Anglican Church; but if she neglects doing this, the husband has the benefit of the doubt. The same state of things exists in the four north-eastern provinces of Prussia, and (I think) in the Scandinavian countries. Such a similarity of law and custom in all the pre-eminently Protestant countries on one side, and in all the so-called Roman Catholic countries on the other, cannot be a mere accident, and must be capable of being explained by the spirit and customs of the two churches.

Now, the Roman Church has always been tyrannical, but it uses metaphysical fetters rather than physical ones. It chains the mind, but pays a liberal indemnity to the body. If you will only sign the compact with old Mephistopheles, you may do whatever else you like, and you are sure to have a pleasant time of it. Having made marriage indissoluble, and having thus enslaved the woman to her church as well as to her husband, the church could well afford being liberal towards her. It allowed her an amount of freedom and independence unheard of in partibus infidelium, and, what is more, it gave her—not as an optional boon, but as her due, whether she made a settlement or not—the inalienable right of holding property, just as if she were femme sole. It might be said that if the priest is liberal towards his fair penitent, it is because he courts reciprocity, and that the married woman's property is so jealously protected because the church is the heir-apparent of many of her pious daughters. But whatever the motives which first prompted the establishment of these rules and maxims, the facts remain the same. Roman Catholic women gain liberty, and lose no property, by marrying; and, if their marriage is metaphysically indissoluble, it is the more easily dissolved practically.

In Protestant countries, on the other hand, the sacramental ground on which marriage rested having been destroyed, marriage became dissoluble de jure, and would, in the natural course of things, have been sublimated into a purely civil compact, had not the Reformed Church tried to save its semi-sacramental character, first, by stereotyping the emotional paraphernalia with which the marriage ceremony is naturally surrounded, and which are very dear to northern hearts, and, secondly, by slyly introducing into it the patriarchal element under the form of community of property. The Protestant churches never sought to influence the private life of families, and never cared to force their wedges into every house-door; consequently they had no special reasons for propitiating and bribing womankind, whom they have always treated with cold severity and often with gross injustice.

The English (and, it may be hoped, the German) marriage laws are now expected to undergo a revision. In Italy and Austria marriage has recently become what it has long been in France, a civil compact, so that henceforth ecclesiastical views and laws can have no official value or importance in this matter. We may assume at once that within a very short time marriage will have altogether ceased to affect the legal status of a woman, and to interfere with the exercise of her rights as an individual.

But here the prospects of equality end at present. On descending from the legal into the social sphere we find nothing but disparity, exclusion, and oppression. Not that the advantages are always on the side of the men. In England, for instance, the whole realm of domestic life seems given over to the petticoats, who wonder why men go to their clubs when there is no room for them (certainly no privacy) in their own houses. In Germany, on the other hand, women have to suffer (though they do not know it) a good deal from the selfishness and egotism of their pedantic husbands and brothers. But France, with her lady students and bachelières-ès-lettres, with her postmistresses and vivandières, seems far ahead of her northern neighbors, and her women deserve credit for having gone so far with so much grace and dignity. A French woman would appear well in any public career, because she is not shy and does not mind publicity. What is more, she is not conscious of being bold, her boldness not being the result of conquered shyness. It is quite certain that of all blue-stockings the bas bleu is the pleasantest, the least awkward, the least hard-minded specimen. French heroines, too, stand well on their pedestal. A British Joan of Arc or a German Charlotte Corday are unreal entities, difficult to realize.

But what shall we say of the social position of women in Italy?

Filicaja has ascribed all the woes of Italy to her dono fatale di bellezza. One would naturally expect that in a country which has so long been the world's sweetheart and pet child, and whose beauty and gentleness must have imparted something soft—partly childish, partly feminine—to the character of her population (men included), the social position of women would be lower still than it is in countries where men are more manly, equally selfish, and less vicious.

We shall see how far this is true, and we will endeavor to show why it is not true to a still greater extent.

Correspondence.

MR. HENRY C. LEA AND THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In the October number of the Quarterly Review there is a somewhat elaborate notice of my "Historical Sketch of Sacerdotal Celibacy." While making my acknowledgments to the reviewer for the generally favorable tone in which it has pleased him to speak of my labors, I must beg leave to protest against his assumption that I have intentionally omitted to own my obligations to my predecessors: "We should have liked Mr. Lea better if he had dealt more handsomely by former writers and more frankly by his readers." This is the last charge that I should have anticipated against myself, as I have always made it a point to cite my authority for every fact, at the risk of overburdening my pages with foot-notes.

As a justification of this somewhat personal allegation, the reviewer appears to rely upon my not having alluded in my preface to the "Introduction of Compulsory Celibacy," by the brothers Theiner, and on the absence of references in my text to Milman's "Latin Christianity," he having observed but one citation of that work.

Oddly enough, on the next page, he withdraws the imputation as regards my treatment of the brothers Theiner by assuming—justly—my ignorance of the language in which their work is written. In fact, I am not only unacquainted with German, but I did not even know of the existence of their book until I saw it referred to in a review of my own volume in the Nation of June 27, 1867.

It may seem singular that I should be thus unfamiliar with the labors of my predecessors, but it is the result of my manner of working. At an early period in my historical studies, I found the danger of trusting to second-hand authorities. For years, therefore, my effort has been to accumulate around me all the authorities requisite for independent research. I have thus paid little attention to the labors of others, and have made it a rule never to trust a citation or a reference where I had the means of consulting the original authority, so that I could myself judge of the spirit as well as the letter of the matter referred to.

This may likewise serve to explain the paucity of my references to the "History of Latin Christianity," which are, I believe, only two or three in number. I have so profound an admiration of the vast learning, the admirable impartiality, the Christian spirit, and the literary skill which render that work one of the glories of English historical literature, that I know of no book to which I would more eagerly acknowledge obligation. Every statement made on the authority of Dean Milman, I feel sure, has been credited to him; yet possibly his book may have suggested trains of thought which could not fairly be ascribed to him. I have a vague impression, for instance, that a passage of his set me seriously to work to investigate the influence of Manichæism on orthodox asceticism—an investigation which earned for me the rebuke of a sapient critic in the Saturday Review. To have quoted Dean Milman in this or any similar connection, however, would manifestly have been to attribute to him opinions which possibly he did not share.

I have so much respect for his memory that I feel especially sensitive at even an implication of want of frankness towards him. It is, therefore, a peculiar pleasure to me to know that he entertained no impressions of the kind. In 1860, I had ventured to point out some errors which I had observed in his work, by which he assured me that he had profited in subsequent editions; and shortly after the publication of my book, in acknowledging a copy of it which I sent him, he says:

"I have now read the greater part of your volume, which has been forwarded to me in the country. From the acuteness and accuracy of your corrections of my book, I might have expected careful and extensive reading. But I must acknowledge that I hardly expected to receive, from your side of the Atlantic, a book which so completely exhausts a most important question in ecclesiastical history. Indeed, I hardly supposed that your libraries would furnish such a range of original authorities as you have had at your command. It is an admirable and singularly well-timed book. Full, comprehensive, as far as I can judge (and I may hold myself to have the right to form a judgment), and in its fair and candid tone as remarkable as in the care and industry with which it has been prepared. I must say that I feel great satisfaction and not a little pride in finding that my conclusions, in the 'History of Latin Christianity,' so entirely concur with yours. I find no point on which we do not coincide in general principles, and in the facts which lead to the establishment of those principles. You have the advantage of concentrating all your labors on one great point—my history embraced so wide a range that each separate branch of it was necessarily somewhat vague and incomplete. Allow me to add this—and in my view I can add no higher praise—that for at least half the volume I could not discover what your special religious views and tenets may be. . . . At all events, the United States may be proud of one who combines German industry with strong practical English good sense, justice, and honesty."

This surely is not the tone of one who conceived that he had been dealt with unfairly.

If your space and your readers' patience permitted, I should like to go over the various minor criticisms in which the reviewer indulges—apparently for the purpose of discharging his duty to the "ungentle craft" by showing that a critic necessarily knows more than his author. Some of his points are well taken; in others he is mistaken; but all are of so trivial a character that I should esteem myself fortunate if, in a work which treats of the minutest details of church history in almost every European country from the Christian era to the present time, I had made no more serious blunders. Unluckily, I cannot claim such virtual freedom from error, and I could point out to my reviewer several mistakes of greater moment than any which his vigilance has detected.

MR. JAMES AND THE SWEDENBORGIANS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your notice in the Nation, for Nov. 13, of Mr. Henry James's "Secret of Swedenborg," you say that the Swedenborgian "churchmen" excommunicate Mr. James as a heretic. The language you use conveys the impression that they arrogate to themselves an authority over the souls of other men to which they, to my certain knowledge, lay no claim.

It is indeed true, that a considerable number of the receivers of the doctrines taught by Swedenborg have formed themselves into church organizations, and it is also true that they have thereby incurred the hostility and contempt of Mr. James. But as these organizations are purely voluntary associations they deal only with their own members, and even them they do not pretend to admit into or exclude from the Lord's Church. That is a matter over which they are fully aware they have no control. They sometimes expel a disorderly member for the same reason that a well-regulated club expels members whose conduct interferes with the welfare and comfort of the other members; but as Mr. James has never joined any of these organizations, he cannot even be expelled from membership in them, much less be excommunicated in the ordinary acceptation of that term.

It would, of course, be strange if there were a warm feeling of friendship between Mr. James and those whom he so bitterly abuses, and so far as this feeling is lacking, he may be said to be excommunicated from sympathy with them. And so far as they think he mistakes and misrepresents the teachings of Swedenborg, it may be said that they regard him as a heretic. But they are not agreed in the opinion they hold of him, and have never formally condemned him.

The difference between Mr. James and Swedenborgians in general is this: He, like them, professes to accept Swedenborg as a teacher of truth, but while they regard this truth as of such importance to the world that it should be promulgated by organized and persistent efforts, he desires to have it taught only by means of such occasional literary productions as the book of his which you have noticed. They believe, too, in the value and utility to themselves and to their families of meetings for religious worship and instruction, and of the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, all of which he seems to look upon as of no account. It is very much as if a company of men desiring to erect a beacon for the benefit of mariners should build a light-house, provide it with a lantern and a keeper, and labor assiduously to supply it with oil and keep it in repair, instead of contenting themselves with letting off an occasional rocket. If, in the performance of this task, they adopt rules and regulations for their own government, and solicit help on the ground that they are doing a good work, they could hardly be called unreasonable. The question is, whether what they are undertaking is worth the trouble. Mr. James admits that it is, for he calls upon the whole world to study the works of Swedenborg. How can the world get those works to study unless somebody takes the pains to translate and publish them? Mr. James himself could never have written his works about Swedenborg had it not been for the patient labors of the very people he reviles as bigots. Nor will those books reach one-tenth the number of persons that are reached by the publications and missionaries of the Swedenborgian church organizations.

I ask the insertion of this explanation in justice to a small but earnest and devoted band of men who are working for what they believe to be the good of their fellow-men, but who are often misrepresented and ridiculed because their motives and position are not understood.

THE EFFECT OF MR. PEABODY'S SOUTHERN SCHOOL FUND.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your issue of November 11 appeared an article on "Self-made Men as Public Benefactors," to the greater part of which I think your readers must heartily subscribe. Will you allow me, however, to express my surprise at that portion of the article alluding to the connection of the public-school system of the South with the late George Peabody's munificent donation for its encouragement and assistance, and to endeavor to rectify a mistake which may arise in the minds of many in regard to the intention and use of this fund? The writer of that article has been strangely misinformed as to the object of, and immediate good accomplished by, the gift, and more particularly concerning the effect this assistance has had upon the people among whom the fund has been and is to be distributed. A detailed account of the condition of the South at the close of the war is unnecessary. Educational matters presented, indeed, a discouraging aspect. The prejudice against common schools was strong, and taxes could with difficulty be collected, on account of the impoverished condition of the people, especially for the inauguration of a comparatively new enterprise like that of public education. The Peabody fund came at this season of darkness and despondence. Dr. Sears, a man of large experience and sound judgment, was appointed by the trustees as their executive officer. That no delusive hopes might be raised among the Southern people, he took special pains to inform them by letter and in person that the fund was designed for those communities or associations, and those only, which would make an effort to help themselves. This information he accompanied by addresses in various places on the subject of popular education, calculated to arouse the public interest and stimulate the people to take the preliminary steps, that they might receive the aid offered on that condition. Especially did he advise and promise aid for the establishment of normal schools throughout the different States. In no case was the intention expressed or implied of incurring in any city or town all the expenses attendant upon the introduction of free schools. In accordance with this plan but little help has been given to cities, but the greater part of the amount thus far expended has been used to assist country districts to organize common schools for both whites and blacks, for either race as the necessity seemed to require. Normal schools which, without such encouragement, would have struggled for years for an existence, have been enabled to gain a sure footing, and are accomplishing, in a most efficient manner, the training of teachers for the grammar and primary grades of instruction. And, instead of creating a feeling of apathy and dependence among the people, the contrary is true, viz., that the interests of public education have received an impetus, the influence of which will be felt for years to come, and that the people are gradually becoming more anxious and better able to help themselves. COOKERY AND THE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The comment upon a letter addressed to you in the Nation, November 18, is that your "correspondent's observations go completely wide of the mark." As the letter (in the Nation, October 28) to which your correspondent replies begins by objecting to the Woman's Parliament, because "nearly as much has been done for the cause of woman, as the advocates of woman's rights understand it, as can be done by talk simply," and ends by mentioning "all these things [change in usages, want of capacity in persons living in subjection, unhealthiness of factory girls, etc.] as points that are weighing against the woman's rights movement," it seems strange that the reader could be completely mistaken in supposing some allusion to be made to suffrage, that being the right most directly claimed by Mill and other advocates of women's rights.

As one of "these things weighing against the movement" is the supposed fact that "cookery has declined" in consequence of other occupations having been opened to women, there seems to be a suggestion that cooking and voting are to be weighed in the balance. The reason why the "subjection of woman" is considered necessary to the continuance of home-life and present social usages is still left unexplained.

The comment goes on to say: "We do not believe female voting will bring on the millennium, or convert women into saints or sages." There is not, probably, a person in the United States so foolish as to believe it will. Women are not dreaming of apotheosis when they ask for equal political rights with the men (many of them "rascally voters") who now govern them without their consent. This is a moderate claim, being a just one, yet it is waived aside with patronizing wishes that they may choose wise methods of finding "something to do." "Poor captives, we sincerely hope you will acquire the art of carving the bones of your rations into pretty chains and crosses." X.

[We have no desire to lay more stress on the "cookery" argument than it will bear, and assure our correspondent in the most solemn manner that there is in our minds no necessary connection between good cookery and voting, or bad cookery and disfranchisement. All we say, or meant to say, about it is that the decline of cookery—the one art of which women may be said to have retained all but undisputed possession—does help to prejudice in the minds of a large portion of the community their claims to be admitted to all callings on a footing of equality with men, because the only clear proof of the right to do things which the world has ever accepted or will ever accept is the capacity to do them. The suffrage will do women no good if they, in acquiring it, do not acquire also additional strength and skill of all kinds; nay, it will do them harm, for it will give man an additional reason for tyrannizing over them. Bad cooks, for instance, would, if enfranchised, be driven like sheep to the polls by brutal husbands and employers, while good cooks would be waited on tenderly to the polls by grateful, admiring husbands and trembling and anxious employers, and their political opinions listened to with respect—as those of persons of proved capacity.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Some forty or more of the politico-economical essays by "A. Curiosibhoy," which have been appearing in the World, all of which have been very clear and many of which have been clever, are to be put into book-form, and will be widely circulated.——Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Co. announce T. A. Trollope's novel, "The Garstangs of Garstang Grange;" "A Marriage in High Life," by Mrs. Grey; "Hans Breitmann in Church," by Mr. C. G. Leland; and "The Family Doom," by Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth. This last-mentioned author has in preparation "Wives and Widows; or, The Broken Life."——As a cyclopædia is not a work to be invested in lightly, and without examination, there are probably a good many persons who will be obliged to Mr. T. Ellwood Zell for the specimen copy of his "Popular Encyclopædia" which he announces for sale at a merely nominal price. It comprises forty pages, ranging anywhere from the first to the six hundredth, and conveys a perfectly fair idea of the quality of the entire work as issued thus far. It should be the means of extending widely the support of a very laudable and costly enterprise, which for comprehensiveness and accuracy of execution will merit all the favor which it is likely to receive.——Messrs. Milton Bradley & Co., of Springfield, Mass., propose to add one more to the list of magazines for children. At the beginning of the coming year they will publish the first number of "Work and Play," which is to be devoted especially to the "occupations and amusements of The Home." What these are in the opinion of the publishers, the prospectus proceeds to state. For Sunday there will be curious Bible questions and Bible enigmas. For week-days there will be instruction in croquet, acting charades, puzzles, rebuses, and tableaux vivants. Then there is to be a Kindergarten department, and "Our Little Artist's Department," which will contain popular lessons in drawing; finally, there are to be stories and sketches in plenty.

—The editor of the Historical Magazine is a law unto himself as regards the time when his periodical shall appear, and it is only now that we get the numbers for last June and July. He is a law unto himself in other matters too, and we take it that in all the country there is no magazine or journal of any kind which is at once more honest and more independent than the one he edits. These are not so common characteristics of the press in any country that it is not often in order to make public recognition of their existence in such journals as do exhibit them. We are not, we need hardly say, always in accord with the Historical Magazine. We are somewhat deficient in sympathy with its mode of looking at the late war, for instance, and its perturbation of soul when it lights upon laudations of Massachusetts. But no doubt it is doing a very good work in the way of historical criticism, and surely there is need enough that such work should be done; and we may all rightly be thankful to the men who do it, even though they are of tempers not the sweetest, and do not merit the praise that a good French critic suggests as the one that the historical student, to be a good one, must deserve, namely, that he be a man who cannot find it in him to desire that any historical fact should be otherwise than it is. "Not to desire or admire" is what our zealous editor of the Historical Magazine has never learned. But to come to the thing for the sake of which we began this note. The number for July states that when Judge Campbell of South Carolina was in Washington, endeavoring to arrange terms for the peaceable separation of his State from the Union, President Lincoln drew up a proclamation in which his assent was given. Shortly after the breaking out of the war the manuscript of this document was taken from Mr. Lincoln's private office by "a gentleman having free access" to it, and was by him deposited "with a high official" of the State of South Carolina. The proclamation announced that the Executive of the United States, rather than plunge the country into civil war, acquiesced in the dismemberment of the Union. Accompanying this, the story goes on to say, was the "proof" of an editorial article, a column long, with corrections supposed to be by the President's hand, in which the words of the proclamation were cited, the justice of the act of the Executive was vindicated, and the approval of the American people challenged for it. But just in the nick of time came the repulse of the Star of the West in Charleston Harbor, and the Northern heart was "fired" as well as the Southern, which it was intended to fire. But the "gentleman" and "the high official" ought to produce the papers. The Evening Express of this city, which first published the statement now given by the Magazine, vouches for the veracity of the former.

—Education in Pennsylvania, both popular and collegiate, seems to have received a new impulse. The common-school system there, which was so long in taking root, and which has really only been about fifteen years in full operation, is admitted on all hands to have worked marvels. Pennsylvania, compared in political tone and material enterprise with what she was in 1854, when her present voters and business men were boys going to school, is hardly the same State. Perhaps no State in the Union better exemplifies the value of the free-school system as an economic force and a moral and political renovator. The friends of education in the State and elsewhere will look with interest for Prof. Wickersham's next annual report. The expenditures last year were $6,200,268, being upwards of a million dollars more than the year before, and a larger sum, if we mistake not, than has yet been expended by any State in the Union for free education. More especially noteworthy in Pennsylvania just now is the increased interest manifested in collegiate education. New institutions are starting up, and old ones are broadening their bases. If these new ones are only to increase the already too long list of "one-horse colleges" which curse that State, the addition will be no benefit; but it is only just to say that they give encouraging promise of doing something more. The "Lehigh University" at Bethlehem, erected by Asa Packer's munificent gift of a half a million of dollars, has been opened for students, though it can hardly yet be said to be in "the full tide of successful experiment." Its course of study, as set forth in the prospectus, shows a proper sense of what a university ought to be, and its president, Dr. Coppée, is a man of many accomplishments. Seven professors and four instructors, however, for the less than a half a hundred students with which the school begins, and the ample and costly buildings—Packer Hall, 205 feet in length, with depth and flanks in proportion—are not the certain prophecies they may seem to some to be of large and early future success. If, however, Mr. Packer will add another half-million to his gift—as perhaps he will—the institution may justify the highest hopes of its most sanguine friends. The governorship of Pennsylvania is a small honor in comparison with that which would come from the foundation of a great university. But perhaps the most promising of all the educational movements now going on in Pennsylvania is that of leading Philadelphians to give new life to the university of that city. It is proposed for this purpose to raise half a million of dollars by voluntary subscription; to sell the buildings now occupied, and erect new ones on a large and elegant scale outside of the city; to erect an observatory, procure a fine library, and, in short, to do all that is necessary to be done; to give to the city and the State an institution of learning worthy of their traditions and great wealth and power. Already one hundred and fifty thousand dollars have been subscribed, and Mr. Stillé, the new provost, and others interested, are hopeful of raising the rest.

—Another Pennsylvania institution of learning, Swarthmore College, so called from the residence of George Fox in England, has just been opened for pupils, and formally inaugurated. It has been built by and is under the care of the so-called "Hicksite" Society of Friends; it is about ten miles southwest of Philadelphia, and in that plain Quaker region is quite a pleasing specimen of modern architecture. It opens with 180 pupils, of both sexes, who are to recite together, to live under the same roof, and eat at the same table. It is a bold experiment, in full keeping with the spirit of the age, but it is commenced under the most favorable auspices. No difficulty will probably be experienced for the first year or two, while the pupils are comparatively children; but when the Freshmen become Seniors, and the boys and girls become ladies and gentlemen, then will come the crucial test. The President of Swarthmore is Mr. Edward Parrish, a man of science, whose writings on practical pharmacy have made him well known on both sides of the water. Mr. Magill, late sub-master of the Boston Latin School, is the chief of the faculty. Among the professors and care-takers are women of liberal accomplishments, and who are, in the best sense of the word, ladies. The inaugural exercises as reported were impressive. The President's address reads well. It is sensible and unpretending. Mr. Dorsey's assurance that Swarthmore should be made, "in all respects, equal to the first colleges in the land," was doubtless meant well, but showed that he had hardly measured the difficulty of the undertaking. To build a big college edifice is an easy thing; to make a great institution of learning is quite another matter. Let us say here that the planting on the lawn of an oak grown from an acorn said to have been brought from Swarthmore, in England, was a little bit of sentimentality which does not remind us strongly of the simple austerity of the typical Friend; and the presence on the ground of the photographic camera, all ready to hand the planting group down to posterity, was not in the very best taste.

—King's College, in Bristol, a town of Southwestern Virginia, was not very long ago the Bristol High School, and so it ought to be yet, but the Legislature has been prevailed upon to do what all our legislatures are only too ready to do, and now we have a new institution chartered to deal out degrees, and to be a pretentious, worthless college, the fruitful mother of humbug, instead of an honest and respectable grammar-school. It is a comfort, perhaps, to be assured as we are that "exercises in spelling and reading, composition and declamation, form a part of the regular course of instruction," and that "in no case will a diploma be conferred without a due acquaintance with the English language." It is comfortable, too, to know that "it is not proposed at this institution to make study easy; but rather to make students to agonize in thought." In order to bring about this end, "we treat a young man's head as something different from a piece of sponge." "Our aim is to avoid the fossil," also, on the one hand, as well as the sponge on the other. When we add that in Bristol "the citizens are generally church-going," and that the college buildings are "situated on an eminence south of the town beyond the din and bustle of trade," we have said enough. It would be too hard a thing to say that these sham colleges are worse than no schools at all; for the school is all but impossibly bad that is not better than none; but why, if we have poor schools, need we make them worse and ourselves ridiculous by giving them names that do not belong to them? It is a peculiarly American vice.

—Mr. A. J. Bloor writes to us to say that the essay of his of which we spoke the other day as a "huge pamphlet," is not so large as we said, but that it contains rather less than one-half of the 126 pages that we said it contained. We were already familiar with the essay in question, and at the time of our writing about it did not then read it, but looked at the end of the book for the number of the last page, which we found to be 126. It escaped our notice that Mr. Bloor's "Architectural and Art Societies, etc.," was not the only paper bound up in the pamphlet. So it is true that sixty-odd, instead of a hundred and twenty-odd, is the number of Mr. Bloor's pages. As to another statement made by Mr. Bloor, to the effect that several good judges have praised his book, and must have thought that it does contain matter of "special and everyday interest," which we said it perhaps did not—we can only say that we do not find our opinion greatly changed. We took a peculiar interest in Mr. Bloor's subject, but, putting ourselves in the place of people less specially awake to its importance, we came to the conclusion that much as some few persons care for art societies, the persons are very few who do so care; that, in short, the general and everyday interest in them is extremely small.

—We ventured, some months ago, when Dr. Livingstone's fate was still uncertain, to express the hope that he was carrying out an intention already given to the public, and would ultimately emerge upon the scene of Mr. Baker's discoveries, and settle the remaining questions as to the sources of the Nile. A letter of his to Sir Roderick Murchison, under date of July, 1868, has just been published, and amply confirms our surmises. He had ascended the Valley of the Loangwa—a northern tributary of the Zambesi—to the great table-land at its head, and found himself in a country of relatively small but interesting lakes, with a trend to the north and west. Here he encountered a river, the Chambeze, flowing northward, and into and out of four lakes, changing its name as often as it reappeared, and, from its direction, likely to empty into Lake Tanganyika, or else to pass not far to the west of it. One native account of it was that it emptied directly into a certain Lake Chowambe, which Livingstone conjectures to be the Albert N'yanza of Baker; another, that it reached Chowambe after passing through Tanganyika. The flooded state of this elevated plateau prevented the Doctor from at once putting the truth of the matter past doubt, and his letter closes without the much-to-be-desired information. It leaves us, however, quite confident that if health and life are spared him, he will explore the debatable ground to the west and northwest of Tanganyika, including the southern border of the Albert N'yanza. He advances, under correction, the opinion that the Nile sources must now be reckoned as beginning from nearly the 12th degree of south latitude—that is to say, about on a line with the northern limit of Lake Nyassa, or nine degrees further south than Mr. Baker had estimated, but agreeing pretty accurately with the position assigned to them by Ptolemy.

—The death is announced of Guglielmo Libri, an Italian scholar, whose reputation as a mathematician is high among mathematicians, but whom the unlearned world may remember only for the misfortunes or faults which, now some twenty years ago, brought him to conspicuous ruin. While in the prime of young manhood, Libri passed through the experience which has formed a part of the lives of so many of the generation of Italians which is just about to pass away; being exiled, in 1831, as a political offender, he betook himself to France, where he was already well known. When he was but twenty years old he had been made a professor of mathematics at Pisa; but not feeling fit for the place he went to Paris to pursue his studies further, and there he made the acquaintance of many of the leading men of science in Paris. On his second advent, then, he found an easy way open to him, and being a man of social capabilities he was soon a great favorite. He had a way of making enemies, however, as well as warm friends, his rashness and courage being in excess of his discretion, and his pride in his race having more than once come into collision with French vanity or French pride. For example, in his "History of the Mathematical Sciences in Italy," he patriotically claimed for his own countrymen several scientific achievements to which the French lay claim. Moreover, Guizot, who was a great patron of his, rather imprudently created two offices—the Inspector-Generalship of Public Instruction and that of the State Libraries—and gave them both to Libri. His new appointments provoked envy, and his conduct in office was not of the wisest—so far as worldly wisdom, and worldly wisdom in France, is wisdom. In his zeal he enraged many careless functionaries, and thus added to the number of his secret enemies. These were all obscure men, except Arago, whose enmity, says the London Times, "had something professional and personal, as well as political, in it." By-and-by, somebody sent in against him charges that he had been stealing books from the national libraries. Guizot paid no attention to this accusation; either he did not believe it, which is altogether likely, or he may have thought that if it were true, it was an exhibition of that mania for collecting books which has brought more than one eminently respectable man to thefts which none of them, who was never found out, ever repented. Is there a case recorded where stolen books have been restored to their rightful owners, as "conscience money" so often is? Besides, Guizot knew that Libri had just made an offer to give his private library to the country, on the one condition that it should be known as "The Libri Collection." At all events, he did nothing with the charges. But soon Louis Philippe fled; Guizot went into private life; and Guizot's and the King's enemies and successors in power were all Libri's political enemies, and some of them hated him bitterly for private reasons. Arago and certain others pushed the old charges, and after—as Libri's friends say—having driven him out of the country by threats of personal violence, they had him tried and condemned, by default, to ten years' imprisonment. Libri may, perhaps, have done ill not to stand his trial; or it may have been better that he went away, for it is probable that he might have been found guilty at all hazards; but there is no doubt that his condemnation shortened his life, and made these latter years of it bitter. There were two parties about evenly divided as regards him, the one asserting his guilt, and the other, containing some of the best and ablest men in France, firmly believing him perfectly innocent. Certain it is that his prosecutors said hosts of things against him that he disproved completely. They made oath that he had stolen books which, on examination, were found in their places on the shelves; that he had stolen others which, as it turned out, had for years been in foreign collections; that he had taken still others which it was proved had been stolen by other people. Then, too, the residence of the accused man was entered by persons without warrant or authority, who took in and took out what they pleased. Evidence like this and witnesses like these are no foundation for the judgment that was rendered; and the trial, whatever may have been Libri's faults, was a disgraceful one. However, Libri was ruined; and though he convinced many that he was a man most cruelly and unjustly treated, he never quite held up his head again, and, in any case, his fate is one of the saddest and most impressive in recent literary history.

THE ENGLISH DOCTRINE OF IDEAS.*

JAMES MILL'S "Analysis of the Human Mind" has long been known as one of the most original and characteristic productions of English thought. It now appears in a second edition, enlarged by many long notes by the author's disciples, who are to-day the most eminent representatives of the English school. These notes are chiefly of interest as forming the clearest exposition of the present state of opinion in that school, and of the changes which it has undergone since 1829.

It is a timely publication, because the peculiarities of the English mind are so sharply cut in James Mill that it will help to awaken that numerous class of general readers who have become impregnated with the ideas of Stuart Mill's logic into self-consciousness in reference to the intellectual habit which they have contracted. A philosophy or method of thinking which is held in control—the mind rising above it, and understanding its limitations—is a valuable instrument; but a method in which one is simply immersed, without seeing how things can be otherwise rationally regarded, is a sheer restriction of the mental powers. In this point of view, it is a fact of interest to the adherent of the English school that it is not a particularly learned body, and that its more modern leaders at least have not generally been remarkable for an interior understanding of opposing systems, nor even for a wide acquaintance with results the most analogous to their own which have been obtained in other countries. It is a familiar logical maxim that nothing can be comprehended without comparing it with other things; and this is so true in regard to philosophies that a great German metaphysician has said that whoever has reached a thorough comprehension of a philosophical system has outgrown it. Accordingly, we think that we discern in English philosophers an unconsciousness of their own peculiarities, and a tendency to describe them in language much too wide; in consequence of which the student has to gather the essential characters of their thought by a comparison with different systems, and cannot derive any real understanding of them from anything which lies wholly within their horizon alone.

This somewhat insular group of thinkers are now often called Positivists. If this means that they are the philosophers of exact experience, it is too much to say of them; if it means that they are followers of M. Comte, it is too little. They seem to us to be what remains of that sacra schola invictissimorum nominalium, of which the English Ockham was the "venerable beginner." Many pages of this "Analysis" might, if somewhat changed in language, easily be mistaken for Ockham's.

The chief methodical characteristic of their thought is "analysis." And what is analysis? The application of Ockham's razor—that is to say, the principle of reducing the expression of the nature of things and of the mind to its simplest terms by lopping off everything which looks like a metaphysical superfluity. By mental analysis the English mean the separation of a compound idea or sensation into its constituent ideas or sensations. Thus, they would say that the sensation of white had no distinct existence; it is merely the concurrence of the three sensations of blue, red, and yellow. So, James Mill says that virtue is the habit of associating with the actions from which men derive advantage the pleasures which result from them. It is plain that such analysis reduces the number of distinct constituents of human nature. The same thinkers reason in a manner entirely analogous when they are not dealing with the mind at all; and in general their method may be described as simplifying existing hypotheses and then endeavoring to show that known facts may be accounted for by these simplified hypotheses. In this way, a highly elegant and instructive system has been created; but it is not pre-eminently scientific. It might be scientific if these philosophers occupied themselves with subjecting their modified theories to the test of exact experience in every possible way, and spent their time in a systematic course of observations and measurements, as some German psychologists have done. But that is not their business; they are writers. Their energies are occupied in adjusting their theories to the facts, and not in ascertaining the certainty of their theories. This cannot be said to hold good fully in the case of Mr. Bain; his books are largely occupied with correcting and limiting theories; but so far he appears quite different from the English school generally, to which, however, he certainly belongs. Desultory experience is what they all build on, and on that basis no true science can be reared.

James Mill's psychological theory is this: All that is in the mind is sensations, and copies of sensations; and whatever order there is in these copies is merely a reproduction of the order which there was in their originals. To have a feeling (a sensation, or the copy of one), and to know that we have it, and what its characters are; or to have two feelings, and to know their mutual relations and agreements, are not two things, but one and the same thing. These principles are held to be sufficient to explain all the phenomena of mind.

The beauty of this theory appears when we consider that it is as much as to say simply that ideas in consciousness are concrete images of things in existence. For a thing to exist, and for it to have all its characters; or for two things to exist, and for them to have all their relations of existence to each other, are not two facts, but one. A book which thoroughly follows out such a hypothesis is a great contribution to human knowledge, even if the hypothesis does not satisfy the facts. For it clears up our conceptions greatly to understand precisely how far a simple, single supposition like this will go, and where it will fail.

The theory is of the most markedly English character. Though it is a single supposition which cannot logically be broken, yet we may say that its chief points are these three:

1. Every idea is the mere copy of a sensation.
2. Whatever is in the mind is known.
3. The order of ideas is a mere reproduction of the order of sensations.

That every idea is the copy of a sensation has always been recognized as the chief point of English psychology. Hume expresses it in the clearest language, saying that the difference between an idea and a sensation is, that the former is faint and the latter lively. This involves the opinion that all our ideas are singular, or devoid of generality; that is, that just as every existing thing either has or has not each conceivable quality, so every idea is an idea of the presence or absence of every quality. As Berkeley says, my idea of a man "must be either of a white or a black or a tawny, a straight or a crooked, a tall or a low or a middle-sized man." Accordingly, it is obvious that one of the difficulties in the way of these philosophers is to explain our seeming to attach a general meaning to words; for if we have nothing in our minds but sensations and ideas, both of which are singular, we cannot really take a word in a general sense. So, if I compare a red book and a red cushion, there is, according to them, no general sensation red which enters into both these images, nor is there any idea of a general respect, color, in which they agree; and their similarity can consist in nothing whatsoever, except that they have the same general name attached to them; and there is no possible reason for their being associated together under one name (which these philosophers can consistently give) than one at which James Mill hints, and which follows from his principles—namely, that the corresponding sensations have been frequently associated together in experience. This was perfectly appreciated in the days when nominalism was actively discussed, but now the nominalists do not seem to look it in the face. We will, therefore, put some passages from the present work in juxtaposition, to show that James Mill did feel, obscurely perhaps, this difficulty. "Every color is an individual color, every size an individual size, every shape an individual shape. But things have no individual color in common, no individual shape in common, no individual size in common; that is to say, they have neither shape, color, nor size in common" (vol. i., p. 249). He here speaks of things; but as things are only sensations or ideas with him, all this holds good of ideas. "It is easy to see, among the principles of association, what particular principle it is which is mainly concerned in classification. . . . That principle is resemblance." "Having the sensation . . . . what happens in recognizing that it is similar to a former sensation? Besides the sensation, in this case, there is an idea. The idea of the former sensation is called up by, that is, is associated with, the new sensation. As having a sensation, and a sensation, and knowing them, that is, distinguishing them, are the same thing; and having an idea, and an idea, is knowing them; so, having an idea and a sensation, and distinguishing the one from the other, are the same thing. But to know that I have the idea and the sensation, in this case, is not all. I observe that the sensation is like the idea. What is this observation of likeness? Is it anything but that distinguishing of one feeling from another which we have recognized to be the same thing as having two feelings? As change of sensation is sensation; as change from a sensation to an idea differs from change to a sensation in nothing but this, that the second feeling in the latter change is an idea, not a sensation; and as the passing from one feeling to another is distinguishing, the whole difficulty seems to be resolved, for undoubtedly the distinguishing differences and similarities is the same thing—a similarity being nothing but a slight difference" (vol. ii., p. 15). Evidently, if a similarity is a difference, the line of demarcation between the two is to be drawn where our language happens to draw it. But to ascertain why two similar sensations are associated under one name, we must recur to his general law of association, which is given in these words: "Our ideas spring up or exist in the order in which the sensations existed, of which they are the copies. This is the general law of the 'Association of Ideas'" (vol. i., p. 78). "Resemblance only remains as an alleged principle of association, and it is necessary to enquire whether it is included in the laws which have been above expounded. I believe it will be found that we are accustomed to see like things together. When we see a tree, we generally see more trees than one; when we see an ox, we generally see more oxen than one; a sheep, more sheep than one; a man, more men than one. From this observation, I think we may refer resemblance to the law of frequency, of which it seems to form only a particular case" (vol. i., p. 111). This is what he says upon the subject of similarity. As an attempt at analyzing that idea, it is a complete failure, and with it the whole system falls. Stuart Mill is gravely mistaken in supposing that his father's rejection of resemblance as a guiding principle of association was an unimportant part of his theory. Association by resemblance stood in the way of his doctrine that the order of ideas is nothing but the order of sensations, and to grant the mind a power of giving an inwardly determined order to its ideas would be to grant that there is something in the mind besides sensations and their copies. Moreover, upon nominalistic principles similarity can consist in nothing but the association of two ideas with one name, and therefore James Mill must say, with Ockham, that such association is without any reason or cause, or must explain it as he attempts to do. The doctrine that an idea is the copy of a sensation has obviously not been derived from exact observation. It has been adopted because it has been thought that it must be so; in fact, because it was a corollary from the notion (which its authors could not free themselves from) that ideas were in consciousness just as things are in existence. It thus forms a striking illustration of Wundt's remark that the chief difference between modern attempts to put psychology upon a basis like that of the physical sciences and earlier speculative systems, is that speculations are now put forth as results of scientific research, while formerly facts of observation were frequently represented as deductions of pure thought.

The same thing may be said of the doctrine that to feel and to be aware of the feeling are the same thing. James Mill plainly cannot conceive of the opposite supposition. With him, therefore, it is a mere result of defective reading. It is not only not supported by exact observation, but it is directly refuted in that way.

The English school are accustomed to claim the doctrine of the association of ideas as their own discovery, but Hamilton has proved that it is not only given by Aristotle, but that, as to its main features, the knowledge of it by the English was derived from him. This, therefore, does not constitute a valid claim to the scientific character; yet it is the only claim they have. At present, the doctrine has received a transformation at the hands of Wundt of the most fundamental description. He has solved the perplexing questions concerning the principles of association by showing that every train of thought is essentially inferential in its character, and is, therefore, regulated by the principles of inference.* But this conception is also found in Aristotle.

The "Analysis" is written in an unusually forcible, perspicuous, and agreeable style—a character which belongs to most of the English philosophers more or less, but to none in a higher degree than to James Mill. One wishes that such a master of language had a doctrine to enunciate which would test his powers more than this simple English psychology. The fewer elements a hypothesis involves, the less complication and consequent obscurity will appear in its development.

* This idea is fully explained in his very important and agreeably written "Vorlesungen über die Menschen- und Thierseelen."

THE MAGAZINES FOR DECEMBER.

THE magazines of the month are each the last number of a volume, and in the case of each special pains seems to have been taken to make the last number a good one, and as still greater pains will be taken to begin the year with a flourish of trumpets our magazine literature is just now at its highest average level. And, on the whole, if it is seen to be not particularly weighty it is nevertheless not so bad, whether relatively or absolutely considered. Perhaps as compared with English periodical literature ours wears the air of being written for young people rather than older, and for women rather than men. But one can see, too, that it improves from year to year, and that here, as well as abroad, it tends more and more to become the recognized means of expression for the freshest and even the most important thought of the time. Here in America the masculine mind is still so largely occupied with politics and trade that the daily press is far stronger and more masculine than the more literary monthly press, but it is plain that we are in the way of improvement. Take the Overland Monthly, for instance, our latest contribution to the world of magazines, strike out the poetry, which often, sighing softly, seems to suggest the absence of desired woman from the society of the Pacific coast, and we have a man's magazine, not too thoughtful, perhaps, but not too sentimental either, and in general vigorous and healthy. And if the Eastern magazines are as yet too feminine in tone, nevertheless we are to remember the class of "Ladies' Books" and journals of the fashions which they have driven from the prominent places of the field and have to a great extent superseded.

The Galaxy for December has the usual merit of the Galaxy, and is lively and of current interest. Mr. Albert S. Evans contributes an article entitled "On the Red Desert," which details in a readable way, though with fun of a rather stereotyped kind of levity, the experiences of a pair of travellers in a far Western wilderness, where to lose a trail is to lose one's life by thirst and hunger, and to keep the right course is perhaps to be massacred by the Indians, and where water is felt to be a prime necessity of life and a luxury beyond telling.

Dr. Draper's "Breath of Life" is a discourse upon the constitution of the atmosphere as a physical force, and physiologically as the air we breathe. There is in the way in which it is written a sort of generality which prevents it from going into the best class of the writing that popularizes the learning of scientific men; but it is interesting, and sometimes, in spite of the manner of their presentation, the facts themselves make a vivid impression. The connection between an excessive proportion of ozone in the air and the epidemic influenza or catarrh which often lays up half the people of a village appears to us newly stated. It is to an excess of the same element in the air of the pine barrens that Dr. Draper seems inclined to attribute the freedom of the piny woods from malarial diseases, and it is thus perhaps that the barrens with their antiseptic air are favorable to consumptives.

"A November Afternoon" is one of the painful stories that we suppose Mrs. Harding Davis will go on producing till she ceases to write at all. She gives us a happy ending, to be sure, in this case; but throughout the tale there is nothing but the irritating of inflamed nerves, the display of a miserable self-torture. There should be no doubt that clever and well meaning as this writer is she does to her readers the harm that any one must do who encourages self-indulgence in morbid feeling, and also the negative harm, less directly perceptible, of making us accustomed to the sight of grief and pain more or less causeless and resultless and unedifying. This "November Afternoon" is not without its author's characteristic power; but it is an unreasonable, ill-constructed thing too—perhaps not essentially worse in this respect than all the rest of Mrs. Davis's works, but more obviously worse. If you will at any hazard have your personages about all raw, with the skin off them that they may exhibit hypernatural sensitiveness, you evidently have from the beginning foregone a certain amount of strict naturalness and lost irretrievably the chance of making them quite human, or very pleasing and profitable as companions. Feebler by much, but showing slight traces of being tarred with the same stick, is Mr. Edgar Fawcett's story of "A Marriage and a Theory." It aims, however, to teach the wholesome lesson that the husbands of old maids and the wives of old maids' favorite male friends are respectively a little better and a little worse than nature.

Mr. Grant White begins in this number of the Galaxy a series of articles on journalism which promise well. We think we agree with him almost entirely in what he says in this one, but perhaps he would not agree with us in believing that on the whole journalism in the United States every day gets honester and in every way more respectable. There was a time when we had here some papers more ponderously decorous than is now the fashion, but side by side with them we had an influential press of intolerable scurrility and weakness. We are not so fearfully polite as we used to be in the palmy days of the National Intelligencer, but we are persuaded that never before did the country generally so clearly know and so thoroughly appreciate the honest and the dishonest portions of the press. Where now are our Jefferson Bricks? They exist, but their old places of power know less and less of them. To particularize—and we wish Mr. White could feel at liberty to do a little more of this—what now is the influence of the New York Herald? The Englishman is very stupid with an hereditary stupidity, and an hereditary desire to "misunderstand American institutions," who to-day attaches the importance to the opinions, or rather the expressions, of that journal which his father was attaching to them thirty years ago. But, as we say, we feel like agreeing with Mr. White in most of what he says. He perhaps permits himself to cherish an unattainable ideal of the excellence of the journalist; still ideals of that kind have their virtues and uses as well as the kind that many have thought preferable. Or is it that the pitch of perfection which he desires is not unattainable? Absolute impartiality, he says, is the highest conceivable attainment in journalism: "If we could be sure that any one newspaper gave us an absolutely faithful report of all the events of the day, uncolored by party bias or personal feeling; if we could be sure that in its discussion of these events no other end was sought than truth regardless of consequences to parties, to schools, to corporations, to individuals, and, last, not least, to the interests of the owners and editors of the paper itself, we should all buy that paper." But would we? We fear the owners and editors of such "a second sun to our day" would have to put themselves to the immediate making of a set of subscribers who should be without personal feeling or party bias, and who should seek no other end than truth, and who should be regardless of consequences to church, school, party, corporation, or individual. And this not because the average reader demands that he be pleased at the expense of honesty in the pleaser; but in the nature of things he must deceive himself more or less, and be partial. Impartial journalism means nothing less than impartial humanity; impartial subscriber as well as editor. The absolutely honest editor would stand a poor chance of recognition as such. What good is it to a man who sees all things green that I give him white light to see by? Suppose, now, that there be in existence at the very present moment this absolutely impartial journal! who would know it except the conductors of the same, and perhaps one or two other perspicacious persons?

"The Cardinal D'Andrea" is a brief account of the last days of the Cardinal, by his private Secretary. The writer says roundly that Cardinal Antonelli caused D'Andrea to be murdered—by poison, as we make it out—on account of his liberalism. We do not know how much dependence is to be placed on the word of the Secretary, who is anonymous, but there are not a great number of people outside of the pale of the Church who would not say that very possibly the Cardinal-Minister may be quite capable of the act laid to his charge. The Secretary makes out no case, however, and good as his opportunities may have been, it is little more than giving the dignity of print to a street rumor. Mr. Anthony Trollope's "Josephine de Montmorenci" is another of his "Editor's Tales," and the things in it may very likely have happened as related. But that much one says of Mr. Trollope's acknowledged fictions. Of this story, however, we may say what after all would not be said of the novels, that there is nothing of it unless it is a narrative of facts, and that it is both dull and unpleasing. The Galaxy poetry for December is not particularly noticeable. "H. H." has a piece, "The Old Gate," which is sentimental, but is quieter and less passionate, and more on the level of sharable sentiment, than is usually the case in the work of this clever and poetical writer. "Latter Spring" is by Rose Terry, and is less definite in the execution than in the conception. But this is all the better, for the idea is not much, and in the details of the execution there is something good.

Putnam's, we see, is hereafter to be published by an association of which it is announced that Mr. W. C. Bryant is a member, and Mr. P. G. Hamerton and Mr. Karl Blind are announced as being among its contributors. The latest number contains four articles that are of more interest than the rest of the magazine—namely, "The Sovereignty of the Seas," by Mr. A. A. Low; "The Unestablished Church;" "Dumb Guides to the Pole," by Professor T. B. Maury; and a translated article, entitled "Contemporary French Literature," which is by Élie Reclus, and completes an article begun last month. There is a little French padding, too, in the shape of "Recollections of Childhood," by Father Hyacinthe, written when he was sixteen years old. They are verses not without natural feeling, but intrinsically are not worth reproducing. Mr. Low, in his article, argues in favor of the United States Government's granting subsidies in the English fashion to American lines of ocean steamers, and seems to make out a case. It is worth while, however, to remember that we have before now subsidized American vessels, and have seen the money sunk in the sea by the carelessness and mismanagement of the recipients of our assistance. Moreover, the English device of subsidizing is an old one, adopted in the infancy of steam navigation, and it is well to remember that, at present, England inclines to disuse it. "The Unestablished Church" is less marred than the same author's preceding article on the same subject, by a sarcasm so fine-drawn as to be without the effect which it was intended to produce. It is not only more satisfactory in this respect, but is more cogent in its statement of the case against our New York Roman Catholics, and exposes very well the disingenuousness of the Catholic World, which never fights fairly, and which affects a tone of fairness that is even more distasteful to candid readers than the cool assumption and dogmatic disregard of facts which characterize so much Romanist writing. It deceives some people, we suppose; but there are not many people who have any strong belief that, inside or outside the order of Paulists, our American Catholicism is going to be ever so much more liberal than the Syllabus. Apart from its being "wrote sarcastakul" to a somewhat unpleasing degree, "The Unestablished Church" is good reading; and in these days when there are signs that we are to have a systematic attack made upon our common-school system—on the very foundation of our form of government—it is worthy of wide perusal. It would do good if it did no more than call careful attention to such utterances as these. Here are two of the principal errors, of the damnable errors, of our time, as his Holiness the Pope has solemnly said and as a large majority of our American Romanists are perfectly willing to say after him. It is deadly to believe and maintain:

"47. That the most advantageous conditions of civil society require that popular schools, open without distinction to all children of the people, and public establishments destined to teach young people letters and good discipline, and to impart to them education, should be freed from all ecclesiastical authority and interference, and should be fully subjected to the civil and political power for the teaching of matters and opinions common to the times.

"48. That this manner of instructing youth, which consists in separating it from the Catholic faith and from the power of the Church, and in teaching it above all a knowledge of natural things and the objects of social life, may be perfectly approved by Catholics."

Then comes the Tablet, and asserts the same thing positively:

"Education itself is the business of the spiritual society alone, and not of secular society. The instruction of children and youth is included in the Sacrament of Orders, and the State usurps the functions of the spiritual society when it turns educator. . . The organization of the schools, their entire internal arrangement and management, the choice and regulation of studies, and the selection, appointment, and dismissal of teachers, belong exclusively to the spiritual authority."

And even more outspoken is the Catholic Telegraph, of Cincinnati:

"The secular school system is a social cancer, presaging the death of national morality, devouring the little sense of religion that Protestantism instils into its believers. The sooner it is destroyed, the better. It will be a glorious day for Catholics in this country when, under the blows of justice and morality, our school system will be shivered to pieces. Until then, modern Paganism will triumph."

It is not at all too soon for Protestants of all sects, who all without exception believe in republican institutions, and believe that a good Roman Catholic is not a good citizen of a republican State, to consider whether our common schools had not better be so thoroughly secularized that there shall be no excuse for Roman Catholic agitation in favor of separate denominational schools. As the Tablet and the Telegraph say, the common school is the enemy of the Roman Catholic chapel; "it is the greatest enemy," says the Bishop of Newark, "of the Catholic religion and of all dogmatic truth."

M. Reclus's remarks on Mr. Swinburne's M. Baudelaire will not greatly please some of our native admirers of those two gentlemen. It is well done, however, and is worth several pages of screeching:

"His intellect," says M. Reclus, "quaint and refined, but poor and sterile, blossomed into its Fleurs de Mal only by inoculating itself with several diseases, and nourishing itself on poisons. He was a sort of perverted Byron, broken loose from the rhetoric classes, and loudly proclaiming the holiness of revels, with appetite whetted for Sardanapalian debauchery. But he had not sufficiently taken into account the extreme delicacy of his health. Too many cigars, and too much brandy, some sleepless nights in which he endeavored to outdo Paulus, sufficed to ruin the stomach and make an incurable dyspeptic of the poet. In the meantime he felt it necessary to create for himself a name, a 'Satanic name,' calculated to make the bourgeois turn pale. To comply with the desires of an inexhaustible pride, he had at his disposal only mediocre talent, but he made up the difference by throwing in his honor. Not being strong enough to immolate other people to a ferocious vanity, he offered his own life for its rations. Unable to be illustrious, he resolved at least to conquer notoriety; unable to attain the glory of Victor Hugo, he would have rivalled Lacenaire if his nerves had not been too feeble; he would willingly have run the gauntlet of the Cour d'assises; to be looked down upon by forty centuries, he would not have disdained to mount a scaffold. Imitating the beggar, who earns a living by displaying his sous, he climbs on the stage, ratatoos on his drum, and exclaims, shaking his rattle: 'Gentlemen and ladies, I have the honor to inform you that in my person you contemplate the most complete specimen of a scoundrel that exists. I am infamous and ignoble, the dirtiest kind of poltroon. Be kind enough to believe me; but I console myself for my own vileness in despising yours, and by hating the human race.' Baudelaire passed all his life in calumniating himself, in lavishing the most villanous lies concerning his character, in the hope that, being taken up by public scorn, he should pass as a terrible fiend. In spite of all, the unfortunate only obtained an ephemeral success of curiosity; people set him down as eccentric, and forgot all about him, and scarcely an idle tongue repeated the news when it was announced that he had died in a maison de santé."

"Dumb Guides to the Pole" continues the examination of Captain Bent's theory of a northeast passage to an open polar sea, and considers the evidence of its correctness which is afforded by the habits of birds of passage. The more we hear of this theory the more we incline to accept it as correct, and to believe that the Arctic mystery is not very far from a solution. This article is less zealous than its predecessor. "The Lady Cinella" turns out to be given over to animal magnetism; "Keene Delights" is about the Adirondacks, and is readable; "The Foci of the Social Ellipses" is rather strong in its statements and too much troubled by "the cause," which is, perhaps, less urgent than many people think. The poetry is of no value, though Mrs. Stoddard's is not bad as versification.

Mr. Parton has never written any better than in his discussion in this month's Atlantic of the evils of rotation in office. It is not often that it is possible to give him praise so nearly unreserved as we are able to give him in this instance. He makes a very clear and telling exposition of the folly of our present system of hiring public servants. But he may as well keep on hammering. The average farmer, whom he says he has hunted for in vain, is extant, he may depend, and it will be hard to make him see that a salary of six or seven thousand a year is not enough for Chief-Justice Chase, for example, who has no hard work to do, but only has to sit still and listen to lawyers' talk. And then there are our innocent city friends. One of them in Boston we hear asking if the latter half of Mr. Parton's article and the former are not in direct contradiction; because if it is true that the United States pays so little to its officials, how is it that there is such a press of candidates? Does any one imagine that the pressure would not be as great or greater if the uniform rate of pay for Federal officers were one dollar and a quarter a day? The rush would be fiercer, probably, and the individuals making it would be worse in character, and their unfitness and dishonesty would be greater, it is likely, than at present. As usual, Mr. Parton is good at statement, but unreserved praise we never expect to give him in this life. Here is a scrap of his philosophy—the same which underlies all his teaching, and makes it the hopelessly vulgar thing it is:

"In the United States a man is a fool who does not sacrifice to the acquisition of wealth everything except health and honor; since wealth alone gives a platform upon which a happiness can be established."

The other articles in the December Atlantic are fairly good. "The Dead Level" is some lively abuse of the present age by Mr. F. Sheldon, of whom we have rather a better opinion than to believe that he is much more than half in earnest. "Mr. Bruce" is a pleasantly told story, but it is slight and it is improbable. The one sister might have forgotten Mr. Bruce so entirely as she did, but that two should have done so is not so easy to understand. "The Foe in the Household" is brought to an end, and even to the end is a clever and new but sorrowful story—one that it is not good to read; "John" is about the Chinaman in California, and is very civil to him; "The Increase of Human Life" we commend to Mr. Sheldon's perusal; "Under the Midnight Sun" is by Dr. Hayes, and is not exciting; and no more is Mr. Bayard Taylor's "Vineyard," nor Mr. Hale's "Brick Moon." The literary notices are good, particularly the first three of them.

The Rev. Mr. G. B. Bacon opens the December Hours at Home with an article on "The Spiritual Muse," that is to say, on the songs and hymns of the Spiritualists, and expends on those productions, no one of which was ever by any chance other than foolish and worthless, more than is very profitable of cheap wit and fun-making. "The Childhood of Joseph Addison Alexander" tells of a prodigy of boyish ability and learning, but is so enthusiastic in its expressions that, as usual, one doubts and wishes that biographies were revised by enemies after the friends had written them. This, now, is a statement that has a eulogistic look: "It is impossible to point to the time when he did not know his letters." Perhaps 1492 would do. He hardly had his alphabet on his tongue's end at the moment of his birth, we suppose. "Twenty Minutes Under the Knife" is by Mr. Mortimer Thomson ("Doesticks"), and relates actual experience. It is a little unnecessarily brutal; but is not very badly so. Mr. P. A. Perrin writes instructively and not intemperately of Father Hyacinthe and "The Throes of Catholicism." Prof. Wells contributes the solid article of the number in an essay on Roumania and its people; and Dr. Sanford B. Hunt in his talk about "Comfort in its Relations to Physical Culture" is interesting, and, as we have been accustomed to think, sensible. But he makes some bold remarks, for which he is solely responsible, as to the relative beauty of Raphael's Madonna and dozens of American women that we may meet in Broadway. Some of our Massachusetts prohibitionists who hate wine and lager beer will not be pleased to be told that Dr. Graham with his ice-water and bran bread is responsible for a good deal of the recent consumption in New England, and that New England is a region whose climate demands a full and generous diet. Besides these articles there are others by Professor Schele de Vere, Mr. R. H. Stoddard, Dr. Bushnell, and others. Dr. Bushnell first asserts that the ideas and expression of the Scriptures are so imaginative that they can only be apprehended by the imagination, but cannot be well apprehended by the mere understanding, which, no doubt, is in a measure true. Then in his impassioned way he goes on to assert that all words are faded metaphors, and that no exact formulation of religious truth is possible, if only for the reason that words themselves are so highly metaphorical. That is to say, that metaphors cannot become wholly faded out—which for all practical purposes is untrue. That the Bible is a gift to our imaginations is beyond a doubt, but that as a rule of conduct, say, it is plain enough for the most unfigurative mind, is also beyond a doubt.

Lippincott's has for its one good article Mr. G. T. Lanigan's "Coming Crisis in Canada." He declares that England is quite ready, and even anxious, for separation; that Sir John Young, the commissioner who freed her from the Ionian Isles, was made Governor-General in order that he might gently shove Canada up to the point of determining on independence; that from one-quarter to one-third of the newspapers of the Dominion are in favor of it; that the politicians of the Administration are secretly willing to take the step, and only wait for public opinion to pronounce itself; finally, that he (Mr. Lanigan) believes that before this time next year "the maiden flag of a new Anglo-Saxon republic of infinite possibilities shall have been given to the American winds." In "An Actuary's Story" Mr. Edmund Kirke comes up again into magazine literature, whence he had for some time disappeared. "Shall he be Educated?" praises the negro's thirst for schooling, and supports the praise with statistics that look very well; there are two short stories by women, both with good feeling in them, and not too much else. There is some out and-out bad poetry; there is a sketch of travel in the East; and there is a curious piece about the "Yam-Eaters"—who are the Mississippians. The writer shows that he has received the full weight of the impression that the dreary pine regions of the South make on the stranger, and that he has considerable power of reproducing it on his reader. But he is master of a singular gift of eloquence. This is what he has to say to the Mississippi at Vicksburg:

"He rolls his vast flood southward, as if forgetting the Hill City, to a point due westward; then doubles grandly backward, then eastward; flows in a slow and solemn march toward the soldiers' cemetery beneath the hill, where he turns again southward, chafing his mighty flank as if in affection, almost against the serried graves, and chanting an eternal requiem to the asserters of his freedom; hews his giant highway in the hillside; then sweeps before the city in the pride of his greatness.

"I stand upon the brow of the ancient East. Across the partitioning flood of the Mississippi it scowls down at the youthful West, and wrinkles its ugly, sallow brow in the impotent rage of senility at beholding the ample and placid forehead of the young giant across the river. The East clutches again for a moment the sceptre of barrenness which had been wrenched from its gripe, and in its expiring moments creates its ugliest and most monstrous—Vicksburg."

The "Vicar of Bullhampton" proceeds, and now we have got the regular allowance of two sweethearts for the hero, and two lovers for the heroine, and the heroine is going to marry the one she is not fond of, and the hero is going to marry the unsuspecting girl he is not so fond of either, but with whom he has become entangled—all in the inveterate manner of Mr. Trollope. The wonder is how he continues to keep his public, and indeed there is a rumor that money was lost by the publishers of his last novel.

The Week.

IN the South on Monday last began the elections in Mississippi and Texas, in both of which States the contest has been very hot and very personal. The Dent party in Mississippi got out a most virulent little pamphlet showing up the inconsistencies of the Alcorn candidates, and, of course, there are plenty of them to show up in the cases of men who have been undergoing the amount of political instruction which the Mississippians have received during the last four years from their various teachers. Dent, on the other hand, was attacked as everything that was personally as well as politically bad. In Texas, Hamilton, a plausible renegade, and a man of no standing among his acquaintances, though he was a most shining Republican in the days of the Andrew Johnson heats, was run against General Edmund Davis, and in this campaign, too, the fighting has been of the severest kind, and largely personal. "General Davis caught Jack Hamilton at Rusk," says one of our Texas exchanges, "and scalped him cleaner than a whistle." "At New Braunfels," says the same paper, "McAnderson was told in his teeth that he lied, and on Wednesday night he was told again that he lied. We will point out some of these lies," etc., etc. "After Hamilton's defeat," says another editor, who has more good-will for Davis than command of Scripture or natural history, "he will be compelled to exclaim, 'Rabbits burrow in the ground and birds build their nests in the air, but I have nowhere to lay my head.'" Another gentleman informs the world how Hamilton's son-in-law importuned him to commit forgery in order to screen him—the son-in-law—from prosecution as a fraudulent assessor.

In Virginia we have what looks like a total demoralization of the Republican party. It has been called together in convention, not for the purpose of making nominations or anything of that kind, but to condole with itself over the loss of the State, and, as now appears, in order that a certain set of men, headed by a Mr. Porter, might get control of it by using the prejudices of the negro delegates. The sessions were of the stormiest kind, and the regular upshot of them was the adoption of an address which makes the reader think that every Virginia Radical Republican's head is impervious to sense, and the party completely blind to the changes in political opinion, or else that some of them are knaves, such as have had too much to do with the Republican party in every Southern State, and the rest are wild men. After a secession of some thirty members, about a hundred and twenty demanded of Congress the setting aside of the late election and the continued exclusion of the State from Congressional representation. No one says that there is not some danger, and has not been some hardship for Virginia Unionists, but they are crazy if they think that the day for Congressional interference with their State is not gone by. The minority of the convention made a temperate setting forth of grievances, but advise the admission of the State. Such is the facility of the negro, and his openness to personal influence, that the seceding thirty were afterwards joined by thirty or forty more, and now the party would seem to be about half for and half against the policy of exclusion. But the latter half is the gaining one.

In Tennessee, the Senter Legislature has of course rejected the Fifteenth Amendment, and is already ill-spoken of for corruption. In Alabama, the Amendment has been adopted. In South Carolina, a colored member of the Legislature has moved that belligerent rights be accorded to the Cuban insurgents, and there was to be a great debate upon the subject on a day named. Anybody can predict the character of it. In the North, we hear of two or three Cuban petitions that are carried about, but little interest is aroused and the popular heart continues to beat regularly, and to trust in Mr. Fish and Mr. Hoar to save us from putting ourselves in a false position. As for affairs in Cuba, no Cuban army turns up yet, no Cuban government, no battles—nothing but desultory murderings and more systematic burnings of plantations. Where is the Cuban army or government?

The utter baselessness of the charge that the Spanish gunboats were intended for use against Peru begins to dawn on the public mind, and we hear no more of the sapient suggestion that they should be libelled as being intended for use against "a people, district, or colony"—to wit, the Cuban insurgents, with which the United States are at peace. It seems to have been forgotten by the originators of this grand idea that the "people, district, or colony" have to be recognized belligerents before we can tell whether the United States are at peace with them or not, and as yet this Government knows nothing of anybody capable of waging lawful war in the island of Cuba except the Spaniards. There is little doubt that, after a short detention, the gunboats will be released, there being absolutely no case against them. There has been a document extracted from the archives of the Department of State within the last few days which, indeed, ought to stop the proceedings at once, being neither more nor less than an elaborate argument, from the pen of Señor Garcia, the Peruvian Minister, addressed last winter to the Secretary, showing that there was no war between Spain and Peru, that a formal treaty was not necessary to the restoration of peace—a prolonged cessation of hostilities, without any intention of renewing them, being all that was needed to prove that peace existed; his object being to get the Government to release and deliver to him two iron-clad gunboats which Peru had shortly before bought from persons to whom the United States had sold them. The argument fits the present case better than if it had been made for it, and, indeed, makes it look a little ridiculous.

The Philadelphia Morning Post, a furious Radical paper, three weeks ago rated Mr. Moore, the Collector of the Port in Philadelphia, very severely for not having used the Custom-house more thoroughly in the late election. "People who say," said it, "that it is enough if a man in Mr. Moore's position attends to his duty and transacts the public business honestly, do not understand what they talk of. What is the use of appointing Republican officials if they do not help Republican principles?" (The italics are the Post's.) "If honesty and even ability be enough, then an honest Democrat might as well be in Mr. Moore's place, and all his clerks might as well be Democrats," etc., etc. Two days later (Nov. 8), a correspondent having written in defence of Mr. Moore, the organ made answer, and said:

"A correspondent has written to us that Collector Moore is a respectable and upright citizen. We did not say that he was not. To gratify our correspondent, we now say that he is. But what have his respectability and honesty to do with the administration of the Custom-house, or his services to the party? Our charge is that the Custom-house was a spiked Republican gun in the late canvass, and therefore a Democratic gain, and talk about 'respectability' is merely an evasion."

In commenting on this (Nov. 18), we accidentally misquoted one sentence by substituting "ability" for "his respectability," and drew attention to the whole as a specimen of the way in which "one tribe of politicians"—not Democrats either, but "moral" Republican politicians—regard qualifications for the public service. The conclusions we drew were as plainly complimentary to Mr. Moore as it was possible to make them without saying outright, "Mr. Moore we consider a good man." In fact, nobody who has ever taken the trouble to read anything that has ever appeared in the Nation on the subject of civil service reform could doubt what our opinion would be of a collector who occupied himself exclusively, as it appears Mr. Moore did, with the honest and faithful collection of the public revenue. But the Philadelphia Bulletin seems to have got it into its head that we had in some way reflected on Mr. Moore, and makes a little defence of him against us, which has not unnaturally given some people the impression that we had attacked him.

It would seem that the people of Prince Rupert's Land are more numerous and more united than was at first said. They number about twenty thousand, and the latest news from the Red River—which comes to us through anti-Canadian Minnesota, to be sure—represents them nearly all, of no matter what nationality, as being in favor of resisting the Dominion. They demand the submission of the question of annexation to a popular vote; the right of electing their own legislature; of passing bills over the gubernatorial veto; of establishing a homestead and pre-emption law; and, finally, of maintaining an Indian policy similar to that which now obtains, and which appears to be well adapted to the needs of the district, for there is never trouble with the aborigines. The settlers hold Fort Garry with a force of six hundred men, and have appointed a provisional governor. Many of the Scotch and English inhabitants are said to be passively in favor of the insurgent authority, though they do not commit themselves. On the other hand, Canadian militia companies are offering themselves to the Dominion government to suppress the rebellion. As the road to the scene of the war that perhaps is to be, is many months long, and as the winter is coming, we may guess that it is the officers of militia and not the men of the rank and file that are so free with offers of service. The Canadian militia law binds pretty much the whole able-bodied male population, but the officers are generally young fellows with little or nothing to do, who amuse themselves with exercise, athletic or otherwise, and with imitating the gentlemen of the regular forces who may be stationed among them. Sir John Young will hardly do anything to bring on bloodshed, and it will be a wonder if he does not think the demands of the rebels, or whatever we are to call them, highly reasonable, American as they are.

Meantime, of course, there is some tall talk on our side of the line, although generally the press has been sensible. But the temptation of encouraging a rebellion, joined to the temptation of possible "territorial expansion," is of course too much for the heads of some of us, and that there will not be found speechmakers to address us on these topics is past hoping. No man could be fitter for such an occasion than Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, a type of much, or most, that is bad in American politics. Our readers may recollect him as the man who made the most foul-mouthed and disgusting speech that a civilized assembly ever listened to; and some of them will recollect their pleasure when the gentleman's constituents refused to re-elect him. "Minnesota should be heard at this crisis," Mr. Donnelly says, and what she ought to say is that our Government sympathizes in the liveliest way with all resistance to oppression; that Grant must not permit the red-coated soldiers of England to cross our territory; that the shores of the Red River should be thrown open to unrestrained American settlement, and that before the year is out we may see the stars and stripes floating over Vancouver's Island and Puget Sound.

To what this leads—the unchecked desire to make this the greatest of all countries by making it the biggest—we may see in the San Domingo matter. It is generally understood that two distinguished officers of the regular army have been sent to that island to negotiate a transfer of it, and possibly of the Haytien Republic also, to this government. Why, who can tell? It may probably be true that we should be the better for a naval port in those waters, but it was supposed that we got that when we bargained for St. Thomas; and, at any rate, it is not as giving us a naval port that large classes of people desire San Domingo. They want the land, or think they do; and that the people are as good-for-nothing a set as ever lived to extort forced loans from foreign traders and cut each other's throats, is a matter that they care nothing about. That we should have a San Domingo Ring in Washington, and another in the island, and a new horde of ignorant voters further to corrupt our politics, gives our manifest-destiny men no concern. The only amusing part of the business is, that while Salnave is talking of turning over Hayti to us, and Baez of disposing of the Dominican part of the island, and our Congressmen are getting their speeches ready to fire off next week, neither Baez nor Salnave controls much more than the ground he stands on. Salnave has lost his last vessel, his officers are deserting him, and he gives out word that he has undermined Port au Prince, and will blow it up before he will surrender. Baez, for his part, has to fear that General Vil Lubin, who is becoming master of Hayti, will turn his attention to Dominica by-and-by, in which case Baez, with a good half of his subjects disaffected, will have both civil and foreign war on his hands, when, no doubt, the United States will be a very convenient ally.

We have received too late for publication a letter from Mr. E. M. Gallaudet, denying, on the strength of long personal acquaintance, that the late Mr. Amos Kendall was "ill-tempered," as we said he was, and adding that he gave large sums of money in his latter years to divers churches and charitable institutions. We regret having said he was "ill-tempered," for it was a generalization from rather a slight basis, and we ought to have mentioned his donations to religious bodies as a set-off to what we said about his cumulative turn, though we honestly confess we think very little of donations as indications of character.

An attempt was made in the Tribune office last week to assassinate, in the cowardliest way, Mr. A. D. Richardson, a well-known and able contributor to the periodical literature of the day, and he still, at the present writing, lies in a critical condition. The assassin is a Mr. McFarland, whose drunkenness and cruel treatment of his wife had led to her procuring a divorce from him, and for some time previously placing herself, though, as it appears, with a scrupulous avoidance of all cause of scandal, to some extent under Mr. Richardson's protection —he making no secret of his intention to marry her as soon as the divorce was procured. We know nothing of Mr. Richardson's share in bringing about the separation except from the newspapers, but conclude from the warm expressions of sympathy which reach him from a large number of friends that his course has been in all respects not only unexceptionable but praiseworthy. There is now a general cry of horror and indignation from the press, and loud calls for the infliction of condign punishment on McFarland. But, then, it is not improper to ask, why, considering the indulgence with which juries and the public have for some time past treated all murders and attempts to murder, in cases where it could be shown that a woman's reputation or a man's claim on her affection was concerned, should it be considered so wonderful that a man, whose mind has been deranged by drink and misfortune, should come to the conclusion that he was justified in killing anybody whom he suspected of alienating his wife's affections from him? The country swarms with half-crazed husbands and lovers, who read the law reports, and who see that nobody is ever punished for any outrage if he can only show that his feelings about some woman led him to commit it, and they are naturally enough kept by these examples in a state of constant tigerish preparation for crime. We have no desire to palliate what McFarland has done on this score or any other, and hope he will get his deserts; but we must say that it is rather hard on him that his victim's happening to be a well-known literary man should lead to his having measure meted out to him which the behavior of the public in other similar and very atrocious cases warranted him in not expecting. A notorious murderer of the same class as McFarland, but a far worse man, is now high in the service of the Government, and has recently received warm expressions of admiration from several editors whom we will not name. It is difficult to see how the Tribune can justify the way in which it has worked the affair up into a "sensation," and tried to make Mr. Richardson out a hero or martyr.

A striking illustration of the way a man is sometimes brought to grief by fondness for moral reflections is to be found in the letter of the New York Tribune's London correspondent (Nov. 24), describing Mr. Peabody's funeral. Being in Westminster Abbey, he felt bound to philosophize on the surrounding tombs, and, seeing the well-known Howe tablet, he gave vent to his feelings in this wise: "Immediately opposite the grave was the memorial tablet, inscribed as raised by 'the citizens of Massachusetts' to Sir William Howe, who led in the siege of Boston, and offered to the colonies that amnesty on condition of laying down their arms which not all the darkness of their prospects at the time could induce them to accept." Had he stopped at the word "Howe," he might have escaped under cover of a slip of the pen or misprint; but the fates would have it otherwise, and the editor here, apparently being very unfriendly to him, never revises his letters. The "citizens of Massachusetts" have faults, and have been guilty of some follies, but they were never such imbeciles as to put up a memorial tablet to a general whose military career consisted principally of a feeble and inglorious attempt to subjugate them. The tablet, as nearly all intelligent Americans who have ever heard of it or seen it know, is to George Augustus Lord Howe, who fell at Ticonderoga in 1758, fighting for the citizens of Massachusetts in the old French war.

The New York Times was not satisfied with us for doubting its St. Petersburg correspondent's story about the projected triple alliance between Russia, France, and Austria. Yet all we said was that few people who had paid much attention of late to European politics would believe it, and we said this in as modest a way as seemed to us consistent with strength of conviction. We may add with humility that we continue to be of that opinion still. The proposed alliance is to be hostile in its nature, as is proved by the stipulation it is to contain for the maintenance of a certain armed force by the three powers for a certain fixed period, and the leaking out of such news would make a regular panic on the exchange at Paris, Berlin, and London. But thus far there is not a sign of even tremulousness among the brokers. Moreover, all the general reasons for thinking there is nothing in it seem to us to have increased in strength within the last fortnight, both in force and numbers. The Times, after rebuking us in a manner that made us writhe piteously, now cites the Pall Mall Gazette against us. We have read what that journal says with attention, and still remain unshaken. The Gazette is very well informed, but it has certain weaknesses, one of which is periodically recurring fits of the blues about England's relations to the Continental powers. It is suffering from one of them just at present, and finds no difficulty in stringing together materials for a dismal account of the things the great military monarchies are going to do to her, and the sad plight she will find herself in after they have done certain other things to one another. At the same time, we have no doubt whatever that the Times' correspondent is trustworthy and well-informed, nor that he has some foundation for his story, but we have known very knowing men to be taken in on such points before now, and prefer ourselves to trust to the force of circumstances rather than to anybody's information. We advise the Times to make an entry in its diary on this matter under March 2, 1870, and again June 2, 1870, and on those days come back to it, and castigate us. We shall not flinch.

Mr. Edmund Ashworth, who made such a damaging attack on "the Revivers of British Industry" some time ago, has come back to the charge. He shows that the imports of French silk into England have risen from $15,658,490 (counting the pound sterling at five dollars) in 1860, to $51,073,500 in 1868. The export of British silk goods to France in the same period fell off nearly $550,000. How, he asks, does this happen? The raw material is about the same price in London as at Lyons; the English manufacturers have cheaper coal, mills, and machinery. How, then, is it that Coventry, Spitalfields, and Macclesfield cannot compete with Lyons? Mr. Ashworth says it is owing to the derangement introduced into business by the trades unions. He cites cases showing that they drove the manufacture of gros-de-Naples from Coventry and Macclesfield to Lancashire; another, in which they drove the manufacture of jet cords from the same places to Lancashire; another, in which they prevented the revival of this same manufacture in the same places; another, in which they drove a fancy velvet trade to Germany; another, in which they prevented the establishment of the manufacture of figured poplins in Macclesfield. He shows that every ship-building firm on the Thames has, owing to the same causes, failed or closed since 1851, except one, which employs only 200 men instead of 1,200. A considerable portion of this is gone to the Clyde, but France is taking a great deal of it, particularly the orders of foreign governments. Mr. Ashworth warns the trades unionists that if they continue their interference with the relations of masters and workmen in the present style, there will soon be not much left of British industrial supremacy. The curious feature in this controversy is that both the English and French protectionists say they are losing horribly by the treaty; which raises the puzzling question, What has become of the money? Who gets it? It is not lost in the Channel.

The session of the French Chambers was opened on Monday in due course by the Emperor in person. There was nothing very striking in the Imperial speech, as telegraphed, and the reforms it announces as forthcoming have long been known; but some of them are important. The mayors of communes, for instance, are henceforth to be elected instead of appointed by the Government, which will stimulate local interest in politics, and deprive the Government of one of its most useful and subservient tools. "Fresh prerogatives" are, it is said, to be granted to the councils-general of departments. It is difficult to know what this means, but if it be a concession to recent popular demands, it means the enlargement of the field of discussion so as to embrace politics, and the release of the councils from total dependence on the "initiative" of the prefects. The other reforms promised are of less importance (though of hardly less utility), as they are not things on which the Imperialists have ever made much of a stand.

The Empire may be said to have gained a good deal during the crisis of the last few weeks, owing to its steady abstinence from repressive measures—a piece of wisdom of which the Emperor himself is said to be entitled to all the credit. The violence of the Radical press has worked its own cure by frightening and disgusting the public. Rochefort himself has even become tiresome and ridiculous—a good deal of his popularity and success having been due to his skill in saying cutting things without bringing himself within the meshes of the law. Now that he is allowed to say what he pleases, he is found to be simply a smart reviler, with neither knowledge nor force behind his hate, and the public has begun to laugh at instead of with him. A remarkable article on French politics has appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes, from the pen of Ernest Renan, in which, while admitting that the Bonaparte dynasty has acquired absolutely no hold on the French heart, and has committed innumerable mistakes—that, in short, there are no such persons in France as Bonapartist "legitimists"—he nevertheless argues strongly in support of the possibility and probability of France's finding repose, constitutional liberty, and peace under the present Emperor or his son. He likewise makes some very striking suggestions as to the effect of universal suffrage in depriving Paris of the political supremacy it has so long enjoyed, and making it impossible hereafter for the mob of the capital, even if successful in overthrowing the Government, to impose its will on the provinces.

GOING BACK IN RECONSTRUCTION.

THERE are rumors from Washington and other quarters of a desire or intention on the part of a certain section of zealous Republicans this winter to take severe measures with regard to Georgia—in short, to put her completely back under military rule, by way of punishing her for the crimes, disorders, and general spirit of disobedience to the law by which she is said to be afflicted. Georgia, as our readers may remember, is neither in nor out of the Union. Indeed, her condition is perhaps the most singular in which any political community ever found itself. She fulfilled all the conditions of admission which Congress prescribed by an act passed for the purpose, June 25, 1868; General Meade officially certified the fulfilment of some of these conditions; the fulfilment of the remaining one—the ratification of the Fifteenth Constitutional Amendment—was duly proclaimed by the President, and the Georgia Representatives were therefore duly admitted to the House. It only remained to admit her Senators, but they were refused admission because, in the interval, the Legislature had expelled its colored members, its right to be the sole judge of the qualifications of its members having been formally acknowledged in a telegraphic despatch to General Meade signed by the members both of the Judiciary and Reconstruction Committees of the House. The Senate, therefore, deliberately disregarded the act of June 25, and refused to admit the Georgia Senators on the conditions therein prescribed, and by mere resolution prescribed other and fresh conditions, one of which was that the Legislature should lay aside its claim to judge in all cases of the qualifications of its members. No reasoning in support of this extraordinary performance was ever produced. Mr. Stewart, of Nevada, wrote the majority report of the Judiciary Committee, but nobody but himself would sign it, which was not surprising, as it was simply a piece of wild declamation. Messrs. Conkling and Frelinghuysen, however, adhered to its conclusion, which was that the Georgia Senators ought not to be admitted, taking their stand apparently on the discretionary power of the Senate in judging of the qualifications of its members, while Mr. Trumbull made a minority report, containing an argument on the other side, which has never been answered, and is, as it seems to us, unanswerable. Since then matters have remained unchanged. Georgia is in the Union to all intents and purposes, except that she has no representatives in the Senate. Legally, there is not the smallest flaw in her claim to be considered a State in the Union any more than in the claim of New York.

It is now proposed, however, it is said, to put her out of the Union in fact as well as in form, by placing her under "military government," the reason being that the people of the State are saucy and turbulent, and that the revenue and police officers find it difficult to discharge their duties properly, and that, in short, life and property are not as secure as they ought to be. It is quite safe to say, however, that the condition of the State in these respects is no worse than either North or South Carolina or Tennessee, and is probably not one-quarter as bad as that of Texas is likely to be for the next fifteen or twenty years. Indeed, the only reason that exists for not dealing with North Carolina and Tennessee as it is proposed to deal with Georgia, is that in these States negroes were not excluded from the Legislature before the State had been formally and completely admitted to the Union. It is, however, hardly necessary to argue against the right of Congress to expel a State from the Union and put it under martial law because a majority for the time being is not satisfied with the local administration of justice. Those who believe Georgia is in the Union do not need to be convinced that she cannot be put out of it in this way.

But those who do not believe she is in it, and who now propose to put her back under military government, would do well to explain to us what they mean by "military government," and in what respect such a government would differ from that now in existence. It is all very well to talk of giving General Terry "absolute control" of the State, but what is meant by his "absolute control?" Real military government—that is, a government of military officers, with a force of soldiers and police at their disposal sufficient to make the roads safe, bring robbers and murderers to justice, enforce the collection of the taxes, and drive rogues and vagabonds into honest industry—would, as we have often said, have been, in our opinion, an excellent thing for the South for four or five years after the war. Both blacks and whites would have profited by it enormously. But no such government was ever instituted at the South. The government the Reconstruction Acts set up, for all social purposes, differed from civil government only in name. The Governor of the State was called a general, and the State a district, but in all else things went on as before. Sheriffs hunted down malefactors, civil courts tried them under the laws and constitution. Indeed, the only marked way in which the Reconstruction Acts affected the machinery of civil government, was by the exclusion of most of the intelligent, educated men in the State from all share in working it. The Union men who took office and went into politics were by no means the best of their class, and they were reinforced by persons from the North, to a large number of whom doubtless injustice was done by Southern and Democratic papers, but who certainly, as a body, were not persons whose advent was any gain to the South. The fact is, that the state of things we established at the South, pending the reconstruction of the States, has probably been one of the worst ever witnessed. To call it a military government would be an insult to the army. No soldier would, if left to himself, tolerate it for a moment; and that its results have not been worse than they have been reflects the highest credit both on whites and blacks, and especially on the blacks. It has consisted, as everybody who has seen it knows perfectly well, in the committal to the most ignorant, the poorest, and least reputable of a great community of the administration of its justice and of its finances, and indeed of the work of legislating for the exigencies of ten millions of people emerging suddenly from a bloody civil war and a social revolution. No such experiment could succeed, or will ever succeed. The Almighty decreed that it should not when he gave man his reason, and provided that it should regulate human affairs. That the disorders of every kind which afflict Southern society should be great is no wonder; the wonder is that they are not greater; and to talk of punishing them, and removing them, by remanding a State back to this state of things, is like remanding a man to the bar-room to cure him of drunkenness. As long as we keep up a government at the South which men of intelligence and character and wealth at the South despise and detest, and which has not even that lowest of all governmental claims to respect—brute force at command—instead of putting an end to turbulence, we sow the seeds of it.

We do not blame the authors of the Reconstruction policy for the results of their policy. It was just and expedient that the prime movers in the rebellion should be excluded from all share in the management of affairs while the basis of society at the South, and the relations of the revolted States to the Union, were undergoing revision. But to persist in keeping up this abnormal state of things, and, above all, to thrust back into it any State which has even partially made its way out of it, would be the height of folly and wickedness. Congress may be fairly defied to make society at the South either sober, orderly, industrious, or law-abiding. It may pass what acts it pleases, and things will remain as they are till the individuals of which Southern society is composed are improved; and the work of improving them does not fall either to General Terry or the Reconstruction Committees. Providence has reserved that for laws whose operation began with the creation of man, and will only cease with his extinction.

THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL AND THE PROTESTANTS.

THE ludicrous attempt of the Rev. Dr. Cumming, of London (of all men), to get a hearing before the Œcumenical Council on behalf of the Protestant world, though its first result was a smart snub for the Doctor, seems to have made some impression on the Papal mind. The Holy Father has addressed a second letter to Archbishop Manning, informing him that, although enquiring and disputatious heretics will not be allowed to take part in the discussions of the Council, all access to the sources of truth is by no means to be denied them. They may come to Rome, if they please, during the sittings of the Council; nay, they are invited to do so, in order that they may, while there, have the benefit of arguing their beliefs with eminent divines, who will always be ready to reason with them and refute them, and thus, if it be possible, open their eyes to the error of their ways.

In the Protestant world, in the meantime, the excitement about the Council seems to grow as the day of meeting draws near. Amongst both Protestants and liberal Catholics on the Continent, and especially in Germany and France, there is a good deal of alarm lest the action of the Council should introduce confusion into the relations of church and state—a not unreasonable fear, considering the strong hold which the church still retains on the peasantry, and the reaction in her favor which, according to the best observers, has taken place among the bourgeoisie of the French country towns—a class which, thirty or forty years ago, was all but infidel. This anxiety is not unnaturally intensified by the fact which has just been brought to light, that the prelates of what is called the "Latin world"—that is, of countries speaking languages derived from the Latin—will outnumber three to one the prelates of the Teutonic nations in the Council. In other words, the clergy of those countries whose political and social training is most defective will have an enormous preponderance. Their social ideal is, in most respects, so different from that of men bred in Anglo-Saxon or German communities that it is not unreasonable to fear from them as thoroughgoing a support of the Syllabus as the Papal authorities may desire. Should they have their way, the Catholics of the German world would be placed in a position of great embarrassment.

On the other hand, there are great numbers of Protestants who secretly cherish the belief that some great gains to Protestantism, properly so called, would probably accrue from the excesses of the Council, and therefore hope, rather than fear, that the more violent and ignorant men may have their way in it; and Dr. Merle D'Aubigné, as well as others of the evangelical school, are in favor of some counter-organization of the Protestant world, or, at all events, counter-movement, by way of preparation to profit by the Council's mistakes, or foil its strategy—by way of showing, in short, that there is arrayed against it a force of living men, holding distinct beliefs and cherishing distinct aims, and not simply airy and impalpable entities like "progress" or "the spirit of the age."

We think there is ample warrant for the belief, however, that whatever the Catholic Church may lose by the excesses of the Council, Protestantism is not likely to gain much, if it gains anything. The growth of Protestantism by means of converts from Catholicism ceased, as everybody knows, two centuries ago, and there is not the least likelihood that it will ever be renewed. Catholicism since then has suffered enormous losses on the European Continent. A man of education in France, Germany, or Italy, who, though born and bred in the Church, retains any faith in it, is one of the rarest of animals; nevertheless, Protestantism finds few or no recruits amongst such. When a man withdraws his confidence from the Catholic Church in our day, he does not, as men in the sixteenth century did, feel the need of belonging to some other religious organization—of having at his command a teacher and sacraments and religious sympathy or fellowship. For all these things he finds substitutes in literature, in art, in philosophical speculation or social enjoyment, or philanthropic efforts or political agitation. He looks on the men who fell on the battle-fields of the religious wars in defence of the right to listen to long sermons from preachers of their own choosing, to take the sacraments in both kinds, and to read the Bible as much as they pleased, with admiration indeed, but it is the admiration one feels for Galahad or Lancelot; his sympathy with them is poetic sympathy, and he lingers over their story as one lingers over a picture or a relic. If the men who totally disbelieve in the Church, deny her authority, and laugh at her doctrines could be marshalled now into a new religious organization, the Reformation as a blow against the Papacy would sink into comparative insignificance. But no such marshalling of dissidents is any longer possible. They are no longer known by their creed or garb or manners, but by their staying away from all public worship. We suspect whatever damage the Council does the Church will show itself, therefore, not in a swelling of the Protestant ranks, but in swelling the ranks of that immense body of men and women whose attitude toward religion is one neither of faith nor fervor nor obedience, but of suspense or indifference. Most of them still hope that something to take the place of their old faith will yet make its appearance in the spiritual void into which they are marching; but many more are fully satisfied with the visible world and its joys, and have lost all curiosity about its secret.

On the other hand, there is no denying that no matter what indiscretions the Council may commit, Catholicism will continue to make, as it is now making, heavy gains—not enough, doubtless, to make up for all its moral losses, but to keep up for ages to come a great show of material strength. It owes and will owe most of these gains to the fact that we are passing, in the moral and intellectual world, through what it is the fashion to call a "transition period." The frequency with which the phrase is used, as a clumsy mode of accounting for things difficult to explain, or defending things difficult to defend, has made it somewhat of a laughing-stock to thinking men. All periods are in a certain sense—indeed, in most senses—"transition periods;" but there is this that is peculiar about the present one, and which makes it a transition period par excellence—that the world may be said to be throwing off the authority of one set of ideas without acknowledging the authority of any other. From blind confidence in a certain set of guides, men are passing, not into confidence in a new set, but into an absolute disbelief in the need of any guides whatever. The result is what Matthew Arnold calls "anarchy," and other people call "progress," and which, whatever it be, is marked by such an amount of vigorous speculation as was never seen before, upon all the bases of social and political life, marriage, property, family, the tests and sanctions of morality—nay, the very existence of morals; and one of the striking features of this speculation is that it is carried on, not like the philosophizing of all former periods by a few thinkers in their closets, doling out their sermons to select circles of disciples or admirers, but by a vast multitude of both sexes, and all conditions and degrees of mental and moral culture. On every stump in our day we find somebody with a plan of social regeneration, and at the basis of nearly every plan lies the doctrine that the past must be broken with utterly and irretrievably, and that experience is a sorry guide, and that immediately in front of us lies the promised land.

It is in the confusion thus created; the rapid growth in many quarters of deep contempt not simply for authority but for the elaborated conclusions of human reason; the widespread inclination to launch mankind on the unknown sea of the future on little a priori rafts composed of prayers, short poems, moral apothegms, platform addresses, preambles and resolutions, intuitions and sentimental secretions—that the Church of Rome now makes most of her gains. Amidst this general rocking to and fro she stands firm; within her borders there is calm; she alone professes to know things for a certainty; she is sure that the bases of civil society, as at present constituted, are the right bases. Within her jurisdiction, marriage and property and family are eternal; man's origin and destiny are fixed and ascertained. She thus supplies one of the great demands of the age—rest, not from religious doubt only, but from social disturbances and disorganization. There are thousands on thousands of men in every country, who, though they may not be drawn to her bosom by religious yearnings, seek in it refuge from the communist, the woman's rights champion, the intuitional democrat, the twaddling agitator of every kind and degree; men to whom the world, as the reformer hopes to see it or is trying to make it, would be utterly repulsive, and who cannot believe that movements headed or propelled by such multitudes of half-taught and undisciplined people can end in anything but ruin. To this class she opens wide her doors, and they are crowding in, sure of a welcome, and of tender regard for their most respectable prejudices and their dearest interests. The Pope is greatly troubled by the general license of speech and thought, and well he may be; but it does not work him mischief wholly and solely. Probably there is no platform tirade against the rule of authority and things as they are which does not incline one person to fly to the Catholic altar, or make one already there cling to it more firmly, for every one in whom it rouses a spirit of contempt for the past or wild and unreasonable expectation as to the future.

THE NEW UNITED STATES JUDGES.

The recent history of the Supreme Court of the United States furnishes an excellent illustration of the manner in which, in a mixed government like ours, the political balance of various departments is in the long run maintained. Thirty years ago the Supreme Court, and indeed the judiciary generally, stood as high in the general estimation of the public as it is given to mortal authority ever to stand. No doubt of its purity lurked in men's mind; no political bias was believed to influence its decisions; it was looked upon by the common consent of all parties as the one great landmark, the one great bulwark of society which was sure to withstand all storms, and to secure the nation whose laws it administered in the blessings of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. But this impression was not destined long to continue. From the moment that the popular mind had become fully convinced that the great question of the hour was the question of slavery, it became evident that the prestige of the judiciary had received a severe shock. A court, it seemed, which had been reverenced for impartiality and justice, was unable to apprehend the utter injustice of compulsory servitude. Judges who had been held up to the people as models of wisdom rendered decisions whose folly the most uninstructed could discern at a glance. A co-ordinate department of the entire government was in the hands and at the beck of a fraction of the people.

We do not say that this change of feeling was right, but merely that it took place. The Supreme Court, from having been the most honored, became in a few short years the most despised of American institutions. The Court had not changed. The fatal Dred Scott decision, which finished the work in popular eyes, might have been rendered with as great unanimity in Washington's time as in Buchanan's; but in Washington's time the people cared nothing about the matter, while in Buchanan's time they cared deeply. But however that might have been, the prestige of the Court was gone. Then came the war, and the fierce passions which it excited served to increase the contempt in which all judicial processes were beginning to be held. The raising of armies, the levying of taxes, the summary arrest of the seditious, the recognition of the existence of a civil war—all these things became in the mind of the dominant party necessities; and in the way of all these stood that terrible obstacle, the Supreme Court. From day to day no one could tell what decisions it might not render. It might declare the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional, and plunge the whole country into ruin; it might decide that conscription was unlawful, and prevent the raising of armies; it might declare the very war itself unconstitutional. Against all such chances the people were obliged to prepare themselves. And they made their preparations in two ways. They resolved silently that the decisions of the Court should not stand in their way, whatever they might be; and they began, by means of Presidential appointments, to change the complexion of the bench itself. Whenever a Democratic judge resigned or died, a Republican judge was put in his place. And so the Court sank lower than ever in public estimation. What would have happened if it had really rendered any important unpopular decision during the war, it is hard to say. Perhaps we may infer the consequences from what took place after the war was ended. Then began those fierce struggles over the Reconstruction Acts which have only just been brought to a close, and in which the very existence of the Court was for a time threatened. Would the Supreme Court declare those acts unconstitutional? What was to be done if it did? There was introduced into Congress a bill designed to degrade still further, and to bring into greater contempt than ever, the unfortunate Court—a bill making a two-thirds majority necessary in adjudging any law unconstitutional, but leaving it in the power of a bare majority to declare a law constitutional. This monstrous proposition failed, but another almost as bad passed—the bill taking away from the Court the right of appeal in a case in which it had actually been already exercised.

But now the Court had touched the lowest point in its career, and the wheel began to revolve. The war was over. The object of destruction was gone, and the spirit of Conservatism reigned in its stead. To build up what had been thrown down, to restore order, to bring back harmony and justice into the affairs of the country, became the important problems of the hour. The agency best calculated to assist in the work was the judiciary; and it became evident that the hands of the Court must be strengthened. The executive, which had, during the war, been all-powerful, had given way before the legislature on the return of peace; and the judiciary, which had hitherto been the sport of both, began at length to assert its ancient rights. The relations of the States to each other and to the Union, the questions of currency and taxation to which the war had given rise, the questions of private rights, which had of late been settled by the strong arm of military power, all these came back again into its grasp. Popular respect for the judicial function began again to appear. Partisanship in judges, which during the war had seemed a virtue, once more took on its hideous natural aspect. As Congress and the President fell, so the Court rose in regard and esteem. The balance is at length in a fair way of being restored, and one more illustration furnished of the inherent excellence of the system of checks and balances which lies at the root of American politics. Thus one day may the future historian of America record for the instruction of generations to come the lessons of the recent history of our judiciary. Thus will he note how in the revolving years the ship of state rights herself. But his record is our task, his study our daily work, and how far he is to be enabled to read the past as we would have him read it depends upon the exertions of the actors now upon the stage.

A great deal may still be done to retard the natural readjustment of the powers of government by designing or foolish men, and we are very soon to see how far those now in power at Washington are able to comprehend the true use of their authority. By an act of Congress approved on the 10th of last April, the Supreme Court of the United States is hereafter to consist of the Chief-Justice and eight associate judges, and under this provision a new associate Justice is soon to be appointed. By section second of the act, nine new circuit judges are to be appointed, who are to possess within their respective circuits the power of Supreme Court judges. The object of the act is a good one. It was unquestionably passed for the purpose of giving more time for the discharge of its duties to the Supreme Court. But the practical effect of the act will be bad or good according to the character of the new appointments. Never before in the history of the country has the President had such an enormous power placed in his hands as this. Hitherto the changes in the Supreme Court have been so slow that if a President could find a single appointment to make during his term, he was well pleased. But here at one blow the President can create ten new judges, one of them a judge of the Supreme Court, and the rest judges of a tribunal which is superior in authority to all but the Supreme Court. The present organization of the United States courts is as follows: The United States are divided into as many circuits as there are judges of the Supreme Court, and into a large number of districts, each State generally forming one district, though some of the larger States, as, for example, New York, are divided into two or more. In each of these districts sits a district judge, while the circuit court in any circuit is composed of the Supreme Court judge allotted to that circuit, together with the district judge for that district. Appeals may be taken for almost all cases from the district to the circuit court, but it is much more difficult to carry a case up to the Supreme Court, as the sum involved in the suit to entitle a party to appeal must be a large one; practically, therefore, the circuit court is a court of last resort for most suitors. By the second section of the act of April 10, the circuit courts in each circuit are to be held, 1st, by the Justice of the Supreme Court allotted to the circuit; or, 2d, by the new circuit judge appointed under the act; or, 3d, by the district judge of the district sitting alone; or, 4th, by the Justice of the Supreme Court and the new judge sitting together; or, 5th, in the absence of either of them, by the other, together with the district judge. That the circuit will be held chiefly by the new judge can hardly be questioned. This, as relieving the Supreme Court, was the chief object of the act. It will readily be seen that we speak within bounds when we say that to give the President power to appoint nine new circuit judges is to clothe him with an authority such as no President, since Washington, has enjoyed.

It is a gratifying proof of the increased respect in which the Supreme Court is held that we do not hear of any attempt to foist upon it, under the provisions of this act, a partisan judge. There seems to be a general agreement of opinion that no such appointment should be made.

The reiterated assertions that the Attorney-General is to have the place show the general feeling about it. The present Chief-Justice has been "in politics" quite enough to sicken the palate of the most radical disbeliever in the "judicial mind." If Judge Hoar is appointed, the appointment will be an admirable one, though the vacancy in his present office is more likely to be filled by a worse than a better Attorney-General. On this account we should be sorry to see him appointed. But the important matter is that these ten new officers whom the President and Senate will appoint in December should be first of all judges. We do not care whether they are Republicans or Democrats, or Old-line Whigs, or annexers, or anti-annexers, or woman's rights men, or anti-woman's rights men—the first question is, Are they judges? Will they decide cases, regardless of fear or favor, in accordance with law and conscience, or will they truckle to the dominant party of the day, and render decisions in accordance with the popular clamor? If they are of the latter class, the administration of Grant will one day stagger under a heavier load of obloquy than its most grievous political mistakes can ever render it accountable for; because in this case it will not be able to plead the excuse which has served its turn under other circumstances, that the outcry of party supporters was too great to be resisted. There is now no outcry. There has been even a singular silence as to those new judgeships—a silence of which Grant may avail himself to his lasting fame and the country's permanent happiness.

A HINT TO OUR FEMALE AGITATORS.

We shall be told that we are deficient in sympathy with one of Mr. Wendell Phillips's three great "questions of to-morrow;" indeed, we stand a chance of being a good deal worse miscalled than that, even; but should we therefore refrain from speaking out our honest convictions? It will not be denied, we imagine, that among our inalienable rights is the right to "a free platform." If it were not for contradiction and other similar freedoms, how should the world and we reformers have much speech with each other? or, in fact, we among ourselves? We say, then, that there is a certain matter as to which our female reformers—some of them—need to take a lesson from us males of the same species. They may not forget that they are reformers, but no one can deny that many of them do remember that they are female. Go into our next convention, and you shall see some lady, older or younger, getting up on her feet for the purpose of proving that woman has never been allowed to produce great works of art or of literature; that she has had innumerable laws made for her, but has never been permitted to make laws for other people; that if peradventure she has ever been more than a miserable queen-consort—has ever herself held the reins of government—she has been persistently surrounded by male counsellors, who have taken all real business into their own hands, every Elizabeth having had some insidious Burleigh; that if Bridget is one fool, Patrick is another; that woman has been made to bear men's children; in short, that in all ages she has been made man's slave, or else, if he has not enslaved her, he has been fond of her and made her his pet. And we may add that very likely all this she will prove, and with conclusiveness, and very often in a strain of eloquence as good as Colonel Deming's. But, then, there she is, while she is doing it, dressed in, perhaps, an elegant vert nil poult de soie, handsomely trimmed with point lace and satin; or, perhaps it will be in an imported and changeable vert nil and white poult de soie, trimmed with point applique lace and green satin with magnificent Chantilly Lersignie. We have seen one in velvet. And there was one with a panier at the Press Dinner on Saturday last.

It is not so that the anti-slavery cause was carried on, through derision, and mobbing, and murdering, and the hostility of several great religious organizations, and the contempt of the Boston Daily Advertiser, to its final glorious triumph. No more was the Protestant Reformation brought about by the assistance of celebrated modistes. Non tali auxilio does the eight-hour movement make such progress as it makes; nor, in brief, is it thus that any cause conquers, but rather such means retard the greatest causes. Men see this. Mr. Phillips would give Mr. Blackwell, for instance, what the Irish call "down the banks," if Mr. Blackwell were to apparel himself for convention with the splendor that some earnest young female radicals whom we could mention indulge themselves in without any rebuke from the superior officers. We men should be down on such in the twinkling of an eye. There was a sort of Astrachan cap worn some few years ago by the world's people—a shaggy black cap, without any visor, a complete cylinder but not a very long one. Indeed, it was not all of the world's people themselves who wore it, but rather the younger and more jaunty of them. Now a warm Republican who had in many ways, on many occasions, done good service to the cause of reform—a Massachusetts Republican, in fact, and of the straiter sect of the Pharisees, as we may say—moved by we do not know what considerations, bought one of these Astrachans and carried it on his head about Boston and vicinity, just as very likely one of our contributors to the Revolution may soon be wearing a true Tyrolienne hat, or, better still, the helmet-shaped hat of beaver or velvet—shaded with plumes matching in color—which is going to be all the fashion during December and January. She will wear it, we have little doubt, without a word of reprehension; and, indeed, if she is not envied by all the other slaves of man's caprice, we shall have better hopes of female suffrage than we are quite able to entertain now. But our male friend of reform was at once abused roundly. "Look at that hat of his," a co-worker said—a thoroughgoing friend of freedom for all, an Abolitionist whom the late Hon. Amos Kendall, our Postmaster-General, would hardly have let come within miles of any United States mail-bag—"look at that hat of his. A man who will wear that kind of a hat hasn't got his heart with us," he said; and as a matter of fact, wherever his heart was, the man with the extraordinary hat has never since, we have observed, been allowed to get his hand in with us, and could not be cheered to-day in any Massachusetts convention. So, also, the French reformers used to deal with their brethren. It would have been a bold man of the Mountain who should have ventured to wear his chapeau under his arm in the latest years of the last century. Robespierre, to be sure, was allowed to be clean and neat: but then Robespierre had rendered to Liberty unmatched services. Besides, the heads that wagged against his blue coat and his bouquet he could cut off. And then, he had his own head cut off; so, as things turned out, he might with advantage have been more dirty and slovenly perhaps. So, too, of the saints who in the early ages of our era advanced the cause of the church. For some centuries no one cared to go to leeward of a saint; and the saints not only disused water, but severely discountenanced its use, reviling it; and their dress was always peculiar. And so of the resuscitation of German national literature. Read what they tell of Jean Paul in his youth; how he would wear no wig, as did the classicists and the imitators of the French who surrounded him, but exposed his own hair, and that without powder. When Lord Byron was an object of reverence and a leader of revolt, what enemy of Pope did not turn down his shirt-collar and expose his neck? See, again, what Carlyle, or Sydney Smith, or some other writer says about the outer man of any company of reformers. One observes at the first glance, he says, an altogether different look from that worn by a company of conservative rate-payers. The hats are of various orders of architecture—of all except the stove-pipe order—and there are full beards instead of reaped chins, and heads of long hair, and coats with frogs and braids and capes. How often were not travelling Mazzinists arrested in Italy when Austria and its allies ruled the peninsula, merely on the evidence borne by the width of their hat-brims? And out of Italy—in Leicester Square, say—the Mazzinists who did not wear a slouch hat and a cloak had a lively time of it, we may depend. They were not dealt with by the men and brethren as the women and sisters are dealing with each other now.

And yet, after all, may it be that the men and brethren are and have been all in the wrong, and that the weaker vessels may be full of instruction and reproof for them? Possibly a reformer with a hat like the rest of mankind who are immediately about him, and a cut to his hair that does not strike the beholder as monstrous, and a coat that resembles the ordinary coats of human tailors, may be a reformer who is so determinedly a reformer, so self-consciously—we regret to say it—so self-consciously and self-approvingly a reformer, that he is not after all so great a worker of reforms. The man in the Astrachan cap, having goodly apparel, with a gold ring on his finger, may, after all, be the better promoter of good causes. With all his want of griminess, and though his hair be short, and he has never worn a shawl, he may really have done better service in committee-rooms, on platforms, in the press, than the iconoclast who reviles his sumptuousness, and points to the style of his own trousers or head-gear as the true proof of soundness on the main question. It was not the great moral reformer, but only a forerunner of his, let us remind our friend, who wore the camel's skin about his loins. The other came eating and drinking, and in externals was not so unlike his neighbors. Perhaps our Boston Radical—it was a Boston man, or one from thereabouts—may have the remark made to him by some sharp sister, that when the trousers or head-gear are considered as being so closely connected with the main question, there is some indication that they have usurped its place, and, briefly, that he is, in her opinion, a weakly, feminine-minded, self-conscious, ass. Some of the women do talk in that manner, we can tell him.

Perhaps, we repeat, the women are in the right. The oratrixes of the free platform may really be setting the orators of the same an excellent example in declining to discipline each other for their sacques and paniers, and their little hats tilted forward, and their tulles and silks, and all the rest of it. We suspect that they are. We believe we are going over to their side, and that we shall say it is a sign of weak-headedness in the male reformer if he put much reliance on the oddity of his dress, and that it is even a worse sign when he does this knowingly; and that as for them, they do well to make themselves as beautiful and lovely as they can—at any rate, so long as there is a standing offer from some Western man to give a thousand dollars to anybody who will show him, engaged in the woman's rights movement, a single young woman of striking "personal attractions." But this last argument is a low one, and is rather light-minded besides. It is worthy of the brainless fop that we hear about; or that frequent, pipe-stem-legged youth, pale with billiard-playing, and staggering under the weight of his Concha cigar; or that bad man who forgets, when he talks of the women who are promoting the cause, that he had a mother, and sisters. The case may better be rested on the argument presented before the suggestion of this last one.

FRANCE.—"SEEING FRENCH SOCIETY."

PARIS, November 12.

THERE is no other place than France, perhaps, to which so many foreigners come and remain for ever foreigners; merely seeing the external aspects of the spot, and the worst aspects of its society; scarcely ever penetrating into the substrata of the social soil, and knowing the French population in the most superficial way. It may be said that, in the two great German centres, Berlin and Vienna, the stranger sees less even of the real home population than he does here; but, firstly, the statement itself would have to be disputed, for I do not believe that anywhere the genuine native has been used to mix so little with the stranger as in France; and, secondly, supposing the assertion to be true, what is the proportion of the "foreign invader" in any town in Europe compared with what it is in this? Probably about one to a thousand or more. Well, then, I repeat it: to no city upon the face of the civilized globe do such a vast number of foreigners come (at all seasons of the year), and nowhere do they live so utterly apart from the native; producing in the end the condition of things which I set out by affirming, namely, that of entire ignorance as to what the modifications (for better or worse) are which the French race may be undergoing.

In the United States, you perhaps fancy that because England and France are so near the two nations frequent each other and live in a sort of intimacy. No such thing. The French population of the upper and higher-middle classes adopt, since the last ten years, every English habit and custom, and in every possible manner try to shape their lives upon the model of English ones, but they do not like the English traveller in France one atom the better for this; and therein lies one of the most curious anomalies of the whole position. It is a fact that French society and English society cannot mix together, or in any degree fuse; that they do the same things differently even when they do the same things. All their modes of thought are different.

An English family comes to Paris for the winter, we will say—nay, intends, perhaps, to reside there for half the year, and expresses a real wish to "see" French society, to mix with it, and learn to know it. But the first word "see" is the right one and spoils the whole. French society will not consent to be "seen" as a "sight," and what the English man or woman means (unconsciously) is simply that they wish to "see" French society as they would "see" the Louvre or any other "sight." What happens? A French lady is asked to receive the British travellers at her house. She consents, though she begins by premising that "foreigners" can find no amusement in a Parisian salon, and you clearly see that while she is thus consenting she is doing it out of kindness for the person who makes the request, and that she herself does not like it. The night comes on which Madame X——— "receives," and the English family makes its appearance. The lady may be one of Albion's fairest daughters, and one of the least ill-dressed (English women have made great progress in this respect); her husband shall be one of the most amiable of men and (in his own sphere) cultivated. Before half the evening is over they have made a dozen mistakes. The masters of the house pay every attention to their guests, and present to them several of the remarkable personages who frequent their salon. Then it is that you see the incompatibility! Granted that both the British husband and wife speak French tolerably well (which is rare), they think all their thoughts exclusively in English. They have no thought of that which fills the thoughts of the Gaul.

M. X———, the celebrated orator and statesman, begins to talk with the English lady (whom he thinks so pretty). She asks him if he does not admire Mlle. Schneider in the "Grande Duchesse." He is forced, in spite of his politeness, to make her understand that people of good repute and standing ("les gens sérieux") do not attend theatres of the kind she alludes to. She can't comprehend, and he withdraws, after vainly trying to find some subject to talk upon. Another "celebrity" comes, and with equal tact she opens fire about the "Court"—as she styles it—and the fashions set by the Empress. Worse still! She discovers, to her surprise, that her interlocutor knows nothing about all this! The English lady finds it "slow." Meanwhile, the English gentleman has been at a loss to conceive the fire and animation with which the various groups have been discussing—one, a leader of Paradol's in the Débats; a second, an article of the Duc d'Aumale's in the Revue des Deux Mondes; a third, the coming election at the Académie Française. When the "amiable" Britisher is brought to bear upon any one of these little knots of causeurs, whom he thinks so "animated and energetic," he soon throws a wet blanket over the talk, and puts it out either by showing his complete ignorance of the subject being discussed or by awkwardly starting another which is thoroughly antagonistic. He very likely stumbles upon some politician like Rémusat or Berryer (while he lived), and asks him whether he does not think Napoleon III. a "great man—the greatest man of the age?"

The upshot of the whole is that after two hours are "got through," and tea and brioches have been ceremoniously partaken of, the two sides feel relieved when they separate. The Parisians who have "received" tell their guests that on that same evening every week they are "at home," but they hope in their hearts that their British guests will not remember it; and the latter, as they retire, vote their soirée a terrible bore, and say that it is the last time they will ever undergo such an infliction. The error has been principally theirs, for the Parisian lady foresaw what would occur; but the children of Albion had come to "see' French society, without possessing in themselves a single qualification which either fitted or enabled them to understand or like it. Seeing French society as a "sight" does not answer; you must enter into (if you do not adopt) French modes of thought, and feel interest or sympathy for the subjects which cause the French mind to be set in motion.

When her visitors have left her salon, the French lady and her lord indulge in a quiet laugh, and ask themselves what link can exist between two civilizations so perfectly distinct. Yet in that French home half the servants are English; the children are washed and dressed à l'Anglaise; the stables know only English coachmen and grooms; and gigots and roast beef come to table raw and blue, under the notion that so it is done in England, whilst the oldest boy of the family (a boy of sixteen) speaks French with an English accent! Yes, the large mass of rich or respectable people in France now wash, eat, ride, and drive—nay, even speak—à l'Anglaise, but the subsoil—the thought—is still as ever French, immutably, despotically French. They take from the foreigner all that he can give them, but they don't take him with it. They don't like him, neither does he them. They "don't get on together." The consequence is that, as I began by saying, no "foreigner" renders to himself a true account of the improvements in the French race. These are various and numerous, but I will treat of them in another letter.

THE CONDITION OF WOMEN IN ITALY.

II.

LEGHORN, November 1, 1869.

ALL general and apparently sweeping assertions concerning a nation must be understood to refer to the majority of cases in one sense, and to the average in quality in another sense. This average itself is a mere logical abstraction, and need not have any phenomenal reality. If the mean temperature of a month is said to be 50°, it is possible that the quicksilver never stood for more than a few minutes at 50° during the whole time, and that these 50° do not represent the real temperature of a single hour in the course of the month. Yet this average number contains the truth. It is a truth sui generis, though.

In this sense, it may be said of Italian women that their general characteristics are of a negative nature. It is easier to say what Italian women are not than what they are. They certainly are not strong either in individuality or in spontaneity. They have neither strong convictions nor strong feelings nor a strong will; and are, therefore, weak alike in counsel and in action. Their passions may or may not be strong, but they are certainly short; and short, indeed, is the romance of their youth. At an age when a northern belle is still at the height of her ambition and in the midst of her triumphs, the Italian woman, whether married or single, has settled down into a sober-minded, matter-of-fact person, who might be mother and protect her northern sister, or who might transact business and preside at a family council, if her cleverness were equal to her maturity, and if she took a greater interest in things not referring to the drive and the theatre. Not that she cares overmuch for these things, either. She likes them; but she is too mild in her predilections to feel strong desires and strong temptations. She has become wise—as the French would say—prematurely and distressingly wise; and is (let us say at twenty-five) incapable of folly or even rashness. She may yet marry, but that would be a mere matter of expediency; and if she remains single, she feels no disappointment whatever. Old maids are neither sour-faced nor sour-minded in Italy.

This intense wiseness of Italian women also finds vent and utterance in an extraordinary amount of "soft sawder;" and, as they are all great chatterboxes, it may be said of their conversation that it is apt to be extremely uninteresting. Esprit and wit are rarely, if ever, met with in Italian women. The sense of the ludicrous, too, is seldom to be found. Yet who can tell what faculties may lie dormant in their souls? Their short and mild schooling at the nunnery cannot have quickened, much less developed them. Occasionally you hear some good repartee, betraying quickness of perception and presence of mind. But such sparks are the result of a protracted conversational excitement. When this subsides, the fair signora relapses at once into her usual indifference and superficiality.

It is clear that persons with such negative virtues and faults, with such inertness and want of the power of reaction, must fare badly in the lower ranks of society. Nothing presses or oppresses the lady; not even jewellers' and milliners' bills disturb her domestic happiness, her husband being an easy-going man, not minding debts, and taking a childish delight in seeing his wife decked out in the loudest of fashions. Her children grow up among nurses wet and dry, and her household is too rough and primitive to give her any trouble or anxiety. Against what should she react? Against whom should she assert herself? Even in the classical days of the cicisbeo she could feel sure that in the hour of need she would be backed by her old ally the priest. But look at the Italian woman when she is surrounded with difficulties. She neither reacts against adversity nor against poverty; not even against the inclemency of the seasons. She gives in, not indeed without much lamentation, but without any attempt at a struggle. "Pazienza!" she says, and shrugs her shoulders. The Italian woman thus sinks, an inert mass, deeply into the ground on which she happens to be placed. She is a good mother, but she seems drowned in her own maternity. She is toute mère, and revels in the details of the nursery. She will receive her guests surrounded with screaming babes and swaddling-clothes, and not infrequently while suckling the youngest. A nurse sits idling in the next room, but the screaming brats are neither hushed nor sent away, whatever may become of your conversation.

Again, how does she meet the exigencies of the seasons? She neither lights a fire nor spreads a carpet on her brick floor, but vegetates through the bruma nivalis, an uncouth bundle of shawls and wrappers; while, in the dog-days, she seeks comfort in the opposite extreme, and reposes, lightly draped, in her well-darkened boudoir from Sunday to Sunday, when the church-bell rouses her to action, and she goes forth in her most flaring colors (I have seen red gowns in July) to meet her pious sisters at mass. Spectatu veniunt, veniunt spectentur ut ipsæ. Bereavement and the sight of death unnerve her altogether. In Rome and elsewhere, the women often leave the house when some member of the family has died. May not the undertaker look after the dear departed? But the bereaved widow and the orphan daughter do not run away in search of solitude and retirement. They go to stay with their relatives or neighbors, where their sobs are drowned by a cackling chorus of good-natured yet unsympathetic comforters. Such scenes remind one of the choruses of women in Italian operas, who stand round the bereaved heroine, singing old saws and waiting until she is ready to swoon. All this is at least harmless. The dead cannot be recalled to life. But unfortunately the Italian woman shows the same want of self-restraint in the sick-room when all is not lost yet, though the cold shadow of death is felt to be drawing near. She is well meaning, of course, and tender-hearted, but she does not appear to advantage on such occasions; and it may well be said that, with the exception of some well-trained professional nurses, the Italian woman is a fussy, worthless, and often mischievous attendant in a sick-room. From all this it is easy to guess what the effect of privation and poverty must be on the minds and habits of Italian women. A German or an English or an American woman, however poor she may be, seems to have certain innate ideas and traditional standards which brace up her energies and enable her to keep her head above water. She can hardly afford soap, but she will not give up washing for all that. She battles on, and strives to realize some, at least, of her ideas concerning domestic comforts. The Italian woman has no ideas whatever on the subject, and cannot, therefore, fight for them. Overawed by fate, she languidly gives in and never dares attempt to mend it. She forswears whatever is not absolutely necessary for the maintenance of life, or whatever does not afford some gratuitous pleasure. The children like wading in the gutter: why should she buy shoes for them or darn their stockings? Why should she even darn her own or mend her clothes when nobody in her neighborhood objects to rags? These women, though not always ugly, are extremely repulsive, especially those of the towns. By whichever sense you may perceive their presence, you feel repelled, and even far beyond the range of this presence their shrill, harsh voices send a tide of chopping air-waves after you. As to their homes, they are worthy of such presiding angels. It is useless to describe them; they are filthy and cheerless dens.

In the country districts the same low type of womankind prevails. Yet their barbarism is less repulsive, perhaps because it shows itself under forms which reveal man's guilt more unmistakably than woman's weakness. One sees at once that, in these rural regions, the woman has altogether become the victim of man's selfishness. She digs the field and hoes the clod, while her husband or brother sits gossiping in the village café; and in the mountains one often meets groups of ragged women carrying heavy loads on their heads, while their smartly dressed mates walk by their sides, smoking and chatting. Take any fishing village on the coasts of central Italy; let it be four or six miles from the nearest town or railway station, and you may feel sure that all the fish is carried thither on the heads of women.

It is strange that, in a country where the differences of rank may be said to be almost evanescent among the men, these same differences should become so marked and prominent among the women. The Italian lady need not look up to her husband, and in some respects may look down upon him. But the Italian woman of the people is an unmitigated barbarian, vastly inferior to her male companion in intelligence, education, manners, in gait, habits, and aspirations. He may be a good-for-nothing, idle, and ignorant fellow, but he can look smart and intelligent. He is fond of dandy boots, too, and you can see at once they would fit him, if he could only afford them. But his wife is, and looks, an inferior being, whom he may have loved for a moment, but who soon becomes his yielding, submissive victim. Even among the children of the poor the same disparity, the same injustice shows itself. The boys do sometimes wear shoes; but the girls are either barefoot or in wooden clogs. This extraordinary variety of female types is a necessary consequence of the inertness, passivity, and negativeness of Italian women, which causes them to be entirely moulded by fate and accident, and unduly influenced and modified by outward circumstances. Even their virtues and pleasant qualities can be explained by the same hypothesis. It is at once clear, for instance, that women with so little spontaneity can have no strong prejudices or biases of any kind. They cannot be violent partisans as other women are apt to be, nor great hero-worshippers either. Most of Garibaldi's priestesses were daughters of the North. And this absence of bias and prejudice makes Italian women naturally fair and reasonable. Even nervous and hysterical women have nothing of that chaotic flightiness which often disfigures female thought and talk. It is truly refreshing sometimes to exchange a few words with one of these cool and even-minded women, who, in spite of their utter want of education, can listen so well and answer so rationally.

But something far more important follows from this coolness and even-mindedness; something which affects the ethics of Italy. And let it be said at once here that the Italian woman is, in point of morality, the very reverse of what she has been supposed to be ever since the days of Byron. She is eminently sage (to quote once more this delightful French term). I should call it virtuous, if virtue did not imply something like a struggle against temptation. But the daughter of Italy has but a short youth and a still shorter romance. While this lasts, she is of course like any other young woman—a Juliet in posse, who might elope with a duke or with a groom if she were not, during this time of danger, kept under the most rigid control by her parents. Neither this control nor the need for it lasts long; and, when she regains her usual freedom, she is generally found to be quite fireproof, and behaves with becoming ease in men's society.

Byron wrote from Venice to an enquiring friend at home, that, although he knew a great deal about domestic morality in Italy, he could not well communicate it, because nobody in England could understand or even believe him. He was right. Cavalieri serventi and conniving—nay, grateful—husbands are things difficult to understand; and the wife's virtue, under the circumstances, is difficult to believe in. But these things have long ceased to exist. They may still occupy the morbid imagination of credulous tourists. But they are things of the past, and, it should be added, never were, while they lasted, national institutions, but a morbid excrescence of Italian civilization, affecting only the aristocracy. Moreover, it was the profligacy of the husbands that invented the ingenious institution of the cavalieri serventi, and the neglected wives could hardly help accepting it. Now, the Italian ladies have got rid of their cavaliers, and do not seem to miss anything, while their husbands are as vicious and as profligate as ever, and must be held, as much as ever, responsible for the incredible amount of vice and self-indulgence which still disgraces Italy.

Of course, this does not exculpate the other sex entirely. The Italian woman is yielding, but she neither tempts nor is tempted. She accepts the forbidden fruit, not because she cares much for it. The streets of Italian towns are remarkably free from the opprobrium of the nocturnal trade (which is the more remarkable, as the streets are the common lounging places till late at night), not because there is any lack of prostitution, but because the women neither like nor understand the trade.

Altogether, the Italian woman must be pronounced to be a serious and sober-minded person of frugal habits and moderate in all she does or feels. She is, therefore, singularly free from vice. Even the half-savage peasant woman in whom we have recognized such a low type of female humanity is, in this one respect, vastly superior to her male companion. There is something almost manly in this moral equilibrium and repose of Italian women, and the effect is rendered more striking still by the undeniable femininenes of Italian men. Generally speaking, the Italian man is frivolous, fickle, vain, passionate, fond of gossip, more interested in persons and personalities than in things and principles. He is fond of small things, of toys, of lapdogs, of children; and he is all this for life, and not merely during the short honeymoon of his youth. Look at that bearded cavalry officer who beats the pavement so terribly with his dangling sabre; he leads a little Maltese dog by a red silk string. If he has to go far or if the day is hot, he will take a cab, and loll back languidly on its hard cushions in a lady's attitude. You meet him again on the promenade, and now on horseback—a place where he ought to feel at home, but where, nevertheless, he always seems to be in difficulties. His poor beast would go admirably, if he would only let him. But there is no end of kicking, rearing, prancing, snorting, and all this for the benefit of an admiring nursemaid who happens to pass. You can easily see that this is no mere chance; for whenever a new woman heaves in sight, the same equestrian antics begin again.

A gentleman once explained to me the mysteries of an Italian income-tax schedule whose blanks I had to fill up. On coming to the rubric headed "age," he whispered to me with the most touching good-nature: "You need not be particular about this; you may write what you like." Judges indulge sometimes (and this is no bad trait) in a good cry when they can acquit a man unjustly accused. And deputies burst into tears when they have made each other hysterical by personal obloquy and slanderous insinuations in a parliamentary discussion instituted ne detrimentum capiat res publica.

Some men wear stays; some few wear ear-rings; all are fond of jewellery. Italian men embrace and kiss each other on saying farewell, or on meeting again after a long separation. Their style is flowery, their oratory stilted; both are hyperbolic. They are gushing, and would like to jump at conclusions, if fear and caution did not seize them by the coat-tails. These traits, though small in their anecdotal shape, reveal qualities which must have had some cumulative effect on the relations between the two sexes. It is impossible that men, whose average types exhibit similar foibles, should be the heroes of women, though they may become their husbands. Perhaps this acts as a corrective for the insignificance of Italian women, and prevents them from out-womaning themselves. Where vanity and coquetry are indulged in by men, the women cannot think it worth their while to do the same. And so it is, in fact, in Italy. The horseman may pose when a lady passes by, but she will hardly look at him in return, much less pose for him. The whole demeanor of Italian women in the streets shows ease and unconcern, and a striking absence of affectation and coquetry. They must, of course, assume a defensive attitude in the streets, considering how little deference or even respect is shown to them by the men; but it is probable that, in doing this, they require but little dissimulation.

On the whole, the two sexes in Italy seem to stand nearer to each other than elsewhere, and to have less prestige in each other's eyes. Whether the question of women's rights will ever be discussed or solved in Italy, is doubtful. Italian men, otherwise so liberal and unprejudiced, seem singularly averse to this discussion. It may be intellectual laziness or a kind of blasé habit of mind, but they prefer taking an intuitive, common-sense view of such questions, and can find nothing worth discussing in them. They smile and often laugh at the extravagances of the foreigners who show such zeal in the matter. The Italian is a politician, but no socialist and no doctrinaire. Nevertheless, it is probable that Italian women will gain many points without any discussion and public agitation. The whole state of things seems to point that way, and usages will be sanctioned and acquiesced in where innumerable obstacles stand in the way of the discussion and enactment of laws.

Correspondence.

MR. HENRY JAMES AND THE SWEDENBORGIAN CHURCH.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent, who signs himself "A Swedenborgian," does not deal candidly with the public. He knows, quite as well as I do, that I complain of his sect not for professing to play New Jerusalem, but only for professing to be it. I have not the least objection to his organizing "meetings for religious worship and instruction, and for the administration of the sacraments," when, and where, and how he pleases; and he knows this perfectly well. What I object to is, his pretension to pass off this meeting upon unwary imaginations as a more acceptable homage rendered to God than that rendered by any other sect. "The New Jerusalem" is an image used in symbolic Scripture to designate God's accomplished or regenerative work in human nature itself, and has not the slightest relevancy, therefore, to any mere persons, actual or potential, under heaven. In assuming this hallowed name to themselves accordingly in their ecclesiastical aspect, the Swedenborgians are either in fun or in earnest. If they are only in fun, as your correspondent would make it appear, the fun is unseemly, and may easily mislead the simple. If they are in earnest, then I submit that no words can be too pointed to characterize their irreverence and folly. And this is just what they are, very much in earnest—"A Swedenborgian" to the contrary notwithstanding. They are not a harmless gathering for the purpose of playing New Church, but of being it, to the prejudice of all other churches. If they were really content to simulate and not to be the New Jerusalem, no one would more freely allow and fully enjoy the joke than I. But they claim actually to be this grand reality in visible form, and by no means merely to simulate it, and hence they boldly disallow all other worship than theirs as having any divine sanctity. It is all very well for your correspondent to talk of "light-houses." But suppose his light-house, the moment it began to scintillate, should do its best merely to squint obscuration upon all other light-houses, would you not say at once that a more preposterous light-house was never invented, or one more utterly worthless to the mariner? Surely, the meaning of a light-house is not to diminish but increase the light that already exists; and when, therefore, a light-house can find nothing better to do than to discredit other light-houses, we may be very sure that the little light it has is not light from heaven.

But even thus I should have no quarrel with the Swedenborgians. They may organize themselves, for aught I care, into whatsoever ecclesiastical form of rigor or frigor they please, provided they do not at the same time degrade any name that belongs of right to humanity. This, however, is what they habitually do, and this is all I complain of them for doing. They lead the unwitting public to suspect that Swedenborg himself was a man of low sectarian aims. In claiming the prestige of his venerable name and labors for their organization, they give the public to suppose that there is at least something, much or little, in his books to countenance their pretension; whereas, there is not a jot or syllable which wears that complexion. They systematically do their best to make the public believe that Swedenborg himself was a man of the shabbiest ecclesiastical cut, and never conceived of the church—while yet he announced it as a divine novelty in the earth, for which all history waited and panted—as an actual and most intimate life of God in the lowest persons and places of human nature, but only as a new or improved ritual administration of the divine name. It is solely for the dishonor they thus do to Swedenborg before the world that I denounce them to the world. I have, to be sure, a boundless private antipathy to their narrow sectarian ways; but I should never open my lips in public concerning them provided they were content to put their ecclesiastical organization and practice before the public upon its proper merits, and did not seek to justify it by the association of Swedenborg's untarnished name and fame.

I am, Mr. Editor, truly yours, HENRY JAMES.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., November 26, 1869.

MR. E. MULFORD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your allusions to Mr. E. Mulford, you have unintentionally committed certain blunders concerning him and his work. In the first place, he is not a retired clergyman, neither is he in ill health, and, better still, he is not from Connecticut. It is unnecessary to allude to Mr. Mulford's personal antecedents, as we presume your mission will be to deal with his forthcoming work. Until its appearance, we beg you to stay your biographical hand. TRUTH.

Nov. 27, 1869.

[As we had our facts in regard to Mr. Mulford from a personal friend of his, who thought we did wrong in saying that he was "not known to us," and who volunteered to enlighten us, we had great hopes of not going wrong in his case. But here we are rebuked again, it seems; and compelled to notify all persons who have been basing upon our statements any delusive dreams to wake at once to the realities of things.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

MR. WILLIAM GOWANS, of this city, has added a fifth volume to his "Bibliotheca Americana"—a series of truly valuable reprints relating to the early settlement of this country, the authors, in every case thus far, having composed their works on the spot as residents, and having been eye-witnesses of what they relate. The latest is "A Character of the Province of Maryland," by George Alsop, for four years an indented servant in Baltimore's colony, in return for the cost of his transportation thither and his "keep" during that period, and who published this work in 1666 in aid of emigration. It accordingly gives a very favorable account of the new state, and draws a contrast, probably not exaggerated, between the degraded condition of mechanics and apprentices at home and the same class in Maryland. In other respects, it is remarkable chiefly for a certain vulgar humor in the writer, whose diatribes against Cromwellians and the Commonwealth read much like border-ruffian editorials on the immorality of New England. These occur passim in his prose chapters, and are done into verse in some supplementary pieces joined to letters to his kindred—"from the chimney-corner upon a low cricket, where I writ this in the noise of some six women," he says at the end of one. Best of all is Alsop's separate "Relation of the Customs, Manners, Absurdities, and Religion of the Susquehanock Indians in and near Mary-land." His lively account of their cannibalism and savage tortures must have counteracted much of the good effect of his "Character," and was rather oddly bound up with it. The editor of the reprint, Dr. Shea, has added explanatory and other notes of considerable interest and not a little erudition. Mr. Gowans, on his part, does a sensible thing in printing a good edition of five hundred copies for popular consumption, and a very few on large paper for bibliomaniacs. We wish his example might be followed by others.

—As New Year's draws nigh we have the customary announcement of new journals and magazines. As important as any of these projected periodicals is a monthly magazine, to be edited by Mr. Edward Everett Hale. The Christian Examiner is to be given up, and Old and New—which is the rather unfortunate title of the magazine—will be to some extent the expositor of Unitarianism. But it is intended to make Old and New a journal for the widest possible circulation among families, and to this end it will have social and literary articles as well as religious and educational, and will enlist in its service distinguished authors of creeds different from its own. It is understood that the American Unitarian Association will push it, and if that means, as it ought, that each Unitarian clergyman will constitute himself an agent for increasing the circulation, the magazine will start off with a fair wind. But probably there is none of our sects which would be less tolerant than the Unitarian of intellectual weakness in its religious organ; and Old and New will have to be superior to most of the religious press, and to depend mainly on its ability. Mr. Hale's name will be taken to guarantee a good deal of this; though of course only an inspired prophet would venture to say beforehand of any of the sons of men that he is going to be a good editor. The good editor is both born and made, and is a rarer avis in terris than orator or poet. Another new journal that we are going to owe to a sort of Unitarians—or that perhaps we are going to owe—is the Index, to be published at Toledo, and to be edited by Mr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Many of our readers know of this gentleman, for he has been conspicuous as a "come-outer" from the Unitarian camp where doctrines are taught even by the more "advanced" of the Unitarians which are not advanced enough for Mr. Abbot. To such of our readers as are acquainted with his writings and speeches or sermons, we may say that Mr. Abbot—who is not yet in middle life—is a man of decided ability and of undoubted intellectual courage and honesty; so we do not know where the friends of what we may call religious rationalism would be likely to find an editor better able to express their views and opinions.

—There is to be at least one new magazine for children which ought to have considerable success. It may be described as a twin brother of the Little Corporal, or as another form of that warrior; it will appear monthly, and it will be full of original dialogues, recitations, readings, charades, and the like, which may be used in schools on exhibition days and declaiming days. This is "a new kind of magazine," the editors say, and we believe it is; at all events, we think there has not hitherto been a magazine wholly devoted to the particular field of this one. But in the field almost as soon as the Little Corporal's School Festival is something which very closely resembles it, and that is J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.'s New Illustrated Monthly Magazine for the School and Family, which is to be a "reader" fresh every month. The children get tired of their reading-books, says the prospectus: "American boys and girls are dissatisfied with the dulness and want of life" that they find in most of the readers now in use; "first of all things, children nowadays demand novelty," and yet it is not fair to ask the parents to go to the expense of frequently making a change in the text-books. So Messrs. Schermerhorn & Co. have devised the above-mentioned means of giving the desired novelty to the dissatisfied children, and of giving it at an expense that will not provoke the parents to murmurings and grumblings, for their monthly reader, which is to contain ninety-six pages, in clear type, on toned paper, and interspersed with pictures, is to be sold very cheap. One thing the prospectus says without which we certainly should not have asked for commendation of the enterprise—as now on the whole we feel somewhat inclined to do—and that is that the conductors of the new magazine, remembering that to the young all literature is new, intend to select matter because of its intrinsic value and without regard to its age. To make the children, from their first lisp, devourers of daily newspapers and magazines of current interest would be to out-Herod Herod in the destruction of innocents. There will be too near an approach to this, we fear, in "the digests and summaries of current news" which are to constitute the chief portion of the original matter. American children are politicians soon enough already; and they are even now as avid of "facts" as is at all good for them; and although it will be the older readers who will be exercised in this part of the magazine, still even they, we think, will get little good from it, and that not unmixed. Perhaps literary intelligence, such as a well-edited necrology, for example, might furnish, would be a good substitute for the proposed summary. Much might thus be done in the way of criticism of the leaders in thought and learning, and the sympathies of the pupils might be much widened as well as their knowledge extended. But we wish to say a word, too, of general adverse criticism of the forthcoming journal; we much doubt if novelty should be so sought after in reading books as Mr. Schermerhorn seems to believe it should. To teach the pupil how to read and how to speak; how to avoid the faults of pronunciation that prevail in his neighborhood and those which are peculiar to himself; how to inflect his voice and in every way read out the sense that is in the printed words; this is after all the principal object of a reading lesson, and giving the scholar information is a subordinate object. A good teacher who can add to the reading lesson something of his own, who is accustomed to make his scholars criticise both minutely and comprehensively the author in hand, and who is a fairly good elocutionist, can make almost any reading-book answer his purpose, and will not be too anxious for a monthly change of matter.

—There has been a little talk of a disagreeable character in some quarters not of the highest respectability concerning Mr. John Fiske's University Lectures at Harvard. Some people would almost seem to think that the way to treat Positivism is to cover up one's head and forget it as hard as one can. But that is not the opinion of the college authorities, nor indeed of anybody else of intelligence. The true way to look at these expositions of what Positivism is, and what it has to say for itself and in criticism of other systems, is to look at them as parts of a whole system of lectures—a system in which figures Mr. Fiske, who is a Positivist, or an "unbeliever" if you will, but in which figures also Professor Fisher, of Yale, who is as far from being an "unbeliever" as anybody well can be; in which figures Dr. Hedge, who may be taken, we suppose, as representing evangelical Unitarianism; and in which figure also men of almost all other shades of belief, besides Dr. Hedge's, that lie between Mr. Fiske's and Mr. Fisher's. Evidently it is not with the voice of the University that Mr. Fiske is speaking; the University is not preaching any philosophy in particular; but the students may see all. It is besides to be remembered that it is not to boys but to men and women of mature years that all these lectures are delivered—men and women too few in numbers, by the way, and likely to remain few until the price of admission is lowered. The publication in the World of some of Mr. Fiske's lectures is another, and, perhaps, a more legitimate, ground for attacks upon him. But he is like most other men of letters in this country, and finds literature a not too lucrative pursuit. He has as good a right to sell his lectures afterward to an editor as before to a college faculty—always supposing that both the parties to the original contract were of one mind on the subject, and that is a supposition which nobody can suppose incorrect in this instance.

—We see that our principal Western seminary of learning—the University of Michigan—has begun to subscribe for the San Francisco News Letter and California Advertiser, and we are not without some secret terrors lest possibly we may have done something to induce in the minds of the purchasing powers of the university a notion that the sheet abovenamed is a safe companion and guide for youth. We beg leave to wash from the hem of our garment so much as a slight suspicion that we approve of the morality of the "Town Crier" and his accomplices. On the contrary, as to their moral natures, they would seem to us to be in a state of blighted ruin, if we did not reasonably suspect that they were born without any moral natures at all. They confess freely and cheerfully to malice, to envy, uncleanness, disregard of a future state, scorn of the eight-hour law, unmixed contempt for Senator Casserly and all other gentlemen of Celtic blood, contempt, mingled with pity, for all Young Men's Christian Associations, hatred of the clergy, a loathing for women's-rights men, and a serene contemplativeness when women's-rights women put in an appearance, an unaffected admiration for female beauty, a love of intoxicating liquors, a clear disbelief in the San Francisco Pioneers' Association, a willingness to levy black-mail, and, in fact, a thousand other vices and sins of an equally scarlet dye. Here is a remark or two which they made the other day to a correspondent whom they had probably appalled by some new outburst of profligacy or more violent crime:

"An unknown correspondent, mildly anxious as to the orthodoxy of this paper, thinks we might conduct it in such a manner as not to offend the most fastidious. Dear friend, we do not care how much we offend the most fastidious. If we sin against them, there are two courses open to them, they can either stop reading the News Letter or cease to be fastidious."

Yet we think that on the whole we must advise such of our readers as are older, and better grounded in goodness, that of the two courses which the editors point out they should choose the latter and "cease to be fastidious." Certainly, it is often very witty and entertaining. Panurge himself might "loaf" in the office of the News Letter with much satisfaction to his mind and heart. Its wit and impudence, and rascality and blackguardism and cynicism would give him mere delight; and for courage Friar John would applaud it. It is true, too, that, whether or not it cares at all, it very often strikes a good blow for good causes. For instance, the Californian brutality toward the Chinese it is constantly attacking, and its general services in exposing cant and stupidity and humbug must be of real and great value to the San Franciscans. We do not know if it only affects some of the vices to which it lays claim; we do not know, for example, if it levies black-mail; but whatever it does or says, it will change for the worse before we shall say of it that, wicked as it is, it is wholly bad, or that it is not very amusing. But it is disgracefully unfit literature for the young and untrained, and the university faculty might have done worse than prohibit it.

—The Anglo-Saxon man who has forgotten mediæval Florence and Venice, and has been looking down on the business capacity of "the Latin races," may turn his eyes to Notre Dame University, in Indiana, and take cognizance of a "wrinkle" which, so far as we can see, he cannot hope to surpass, nor even to equal. In fact, he may as well resign himself to despair, for in the way of "offering inducements to subscribers" there is nothing more that can be done. Oroide watches, prize strawberry-plants, sewing-machines, pianos, portraits of Grant, copies of "What Answer?" and all the other countless premiums which "any energetic and capable man" may accumulate by sending subscriptions into the offices of the various editors, secular and religious, are of no less than infinite unimportance when brought into comparison with that offered by the ingenious founders of the Notre Dame Ave Maria, a weekly paper. They say that from the beginning they intended that the Ave Maria should ask not for annual but for life subscriptions, and this "in order to secure the permanency of our undertaking." Whether the undertaking whose success was to be secured was the publication of the paper or the maintaining of the college is not made clear; but, looking at the singular device that was hit upon for getting money, we should guess that the Ave Maria was merely an instrument for replenishing the collegiate coffers, and was not an end in itself. "Newspaper men" are not seldom enthusiastic in their belief in "the paper." Some of the gentlemen of the press would cheerfully lie, steal, forget the Sabbath-day to keep it holy, worship graven images, use profane language, cease to honor father and mother, bear false witness against their neighbor, and otherwise trample under foot almost all laws, human or divine, for the sake of "a beat," or of "exclusive news," or of any other advancement over its rivals of the journal with which they are connected. But still there are bounds and limits; and, as we say, we doubt if it was in the interest of their paper merely that our Indiana friends took up with this plan:

"We were taken to task by some of our best friends for offering a life subscription at $20. We heeded not the criticism. We even added the promise of the holy sacrifice of the mass to be celebrated every Saturday at Notre Dame for life subscribers, with a certain number of communions on the same day—from fifty to seventy-five—by way of suffrages from the living and the dead; the same mass and communions, with indulgences and prayers, to be offered individually for departed life subscribers, as it would please our heavenly Father to call them from our midst. Experience has shown the wisdom of this measure, for a vast number have become life subscribers."

The tremendous sacrifice of the mass has been made to serve various ends since first it was celebrated, but this that it serves here is as well calculated as any other that we think of to surprise and stagger the ordinary worldly mind. Protestant publishers, as somebody has suggested, can now do no less than offer as premiums to subscribers good heavy life and fire insurance policies; and even then they struggle after their rivals in vain.

—Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt has shown himself so captious and cross-grained in many of his writings, and has such a fashion of depreciating the labors of other people who have treated of the same subjects which he has, that it is not with any surprise that one discovers him to be something of a pretender himself, and his surliness to have been the cover for dishonesty rather than the honesty with which it is popularly associated. He has recently got out a work called "English Proverbs and Proverbial Phrases," and in the preface to it he takes occasion to abuse a former compilation made by Mr. Henry G. Bohn. "He ventures," says Mr. Bohn, "to impugn and abuse my performance in every possible way, without, as it appears to me, the slightest foundation." "He commences his attack insidiously," it seems, this causelessly malevolent man; he cites Fuller's "Gnomologia" as containing 6,496 sayings, of which many, he says, would have to be taken out as not being truly proverbs; and then he adds gratuitously, "In Mr. Bohn's 'Hand-Book' there is, as may be supposed, a much larger number." And what do you do yourself? Mr. Bohn demands of him. Don't you put down as a proverb the phrase, "A Canterbury gallop," though it is to be found in all the dictionaries? And don't you put down also such stuff as "a word and a blow," and "as flat as a pancake," and "a huge loss," and "a brown study," and "a dunghill gentleman," and "a hop on my thumb"—which last, by the way, as Worcester's Dictionary would have told you, should be written "hop-o'-my-thumb?" After the insidious commencement of his attack—which, had he been better advised, he never would have begun—Mr. Hazlitt proceeds with an attempt at the general destruction of Mr. Bohn, who, on his part, is so surprised and disgusted, and is made so angry with his assailant, that he means to sue him; and that it will serve Mr. Hazlitt right if he does, anybody will admit after reading the letter which Mr. Bohn has sent to the Bookseller. For the cause of Mr. Hazlitt's abuse is that common and noble one which has been at the bottom of one-quarter or one-third of all the ill language in literature. The melancholy truth is that Mr. Hazlitt has been pilfering from Mr. Bohn, has been stealing the results of that gentleman's labors; and having done him an injury, he of course at once falls foul of him. Mr. Bohn has good evidence that Mr. Hazlitt not only made the "Hand-Book" the basis of his own work, but even sent the printed pages to his printer as "copy." In the first four pages of the "English Proverbs" Mr. Bohn finds —unacknowledged, though Mr. Hazlitt pretends that he always makes acknowledgment—twenty of the proverbs first collected by Mr. Bohn; and some of them Mr. Hazlitt could not have got elsewhere, as Mr. Bohn got them from unpublished manuscripts or from sources all but unique. Then Mr. Hazlitt steals from Ray as well as from Bohn, Mr. Bohn says; often taking Ray's Greek, Latin, Spanish, and other parallels, and often taking his explanations, which those of our readers who know Ray's work will remember as a most amusing part of it. Having been guilty of this thievery, into proof of which Mr. Bohn goes at greater length than we can, Mr. Hazlitt wickedly turns round and blackens the unfortunate Bohn and his book. The "Hand-Book" he says, does not reproduce faithfully all of Ray's collection. What is more, the "Hand-Book" is not as good as the collections previous to Ray's. Then again, Bohn's book, says Hazlitt, has the grave defect of giving conflicting and even contradictory proverbs. This is a most extraordinary indictment to prefer; as if half of all the proverbial wisdom in the world were not half-wisdom, and as if scores of proverbs were not all the better for being contradicted. Bohn, too, has neglected several minor works, if we may believeMr. Hazlitt; and has left out not a few good proverbs which may easily be found in the "Gnomologia;" and has given Heywood's proverbs corruptly; and has not given half—no, nor a quarter—of Herbert's "Outlandish Proverbs," and so he goes on, in the sulkiest manner, and without the least regard for facts, till at last Mr. Bohn is out of all patience and works himself into a passion, which, as we look at the matter, has a good solid excuse, and of which we trust Mr. Hazlitt may yet feel more of the effects.

CURRENT FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE rabies biographica is often commented on. Judging from his "Voltaire et la Société Française," M. Gustave Desnoiresterres appears to be no exception to the rule as regards the biographer and his idol. In three successive volumes—"La Jeunesse de Voltaire," "Voltaire au Château de Cirey," and "Voltaire à la Cour"—he chronicles and paints Voltaire in his youth, in his rising greatness, and in his career at court. Yet, in addition to these, another volume—"Voltaire et Frédéric"—is announced as in press, and, measuring by the chronological progress made in the third of the series before us, a fifth would appear to be inevitable. The events of the short space of five years (1745–50) suffice to fill Vol. III., and they are nearly all of a nature to suggest that its title should have been "Voltaire the Courtier" rather than "Voltaire at Court." M. Desnoiresterres has ransacked contemporary history and literature for everything and anything—anecdotes especially—that could possibly illustrate his subject, and yet he does not appear to be aware that he makes his prince of philosophers cut a most unphilosophical figure. As presented in these pages, Voltaire never for a moment ceases to be the courtier. He courts sovereigns, ministers, aristocracy, the police, and most of all the courtesans. He writes to Richelieu (1745): "Tell Madame Pompadour that her kindness fills me with gratitude, and tell her how I praise her to you; for I speak to you of her as I speak to her of you; for, in truth, I am tenderly attached to her, and feel that I can rely upon her kindness," etc. M. Desnoiresterres does the best he can to extenuate Voltaire's hypocrisy, his cringing genuflexions in endeavoring to obtain influence that might open for him the doors of the French Academy, against which he had cast so much mud. His police spy performances in his persecution of the Travenels are, as might be expected, painted as much as possible in chiaroscuro. And then the Du Châtelet-St. Lambert affair. A hardy translator, indeed, would he be who could put it into English, for our modest language would hardly support the original, whose intrepidity of phrase might daunt the boldest. The chapter-heading, "Une Société Gangrenée," is eminently fitting here. The affair it relates is of a cynicism so hideous and yet so strange that it possesses the charm of a venomous serpent, and brings the frightened yet fascinated reader back to it in spite of himself. More than thirty years ago the Edinburgh Review commented upon the St. Lambert story, as then told, but with liberal supply of citation from the original, so hopelessly inadequate to render it was all the English at its command.

"France et Chine: Vie Publique et Privée des Chinois Anciens et Modernes," by M. O. Girard, whom we take to be a missionary priest, professes to describe not only the political, social, civil, religious, and military institutions of China, but also its philosophy, literature, science, and art. The work is over-ambitious in its scope, and undertakes to cover too much ground. For a reader desirous of obtaining a general idea of China, the book may be found useful, but it does not add to information already accessible elsewhere.

With the exception of a chapter on the voyage of the frigate Novara, the "Études et Essais par Émile de Laveleye" appear to be a collection of review articles, mostly on subjects of local European interest. The Novara was an Austrian frigate, sent in 1857 on a scientific expedition around the world. She returned in August, 1859, to find war ablaze between Austria and France. And then happened something most worthy of record: to the credit of the French Government and of advancing civilization, as soon as hostilities were declared, orders were despatched to the French fleets in all the oceans to respect the Novara wherever she might be met with. She was specially fitted out under the auspices of Prince Maximilian, and afterwards bore his remains away from Mexico. One of the last labors performed by Humboldt was to prepare certain instructions for the scientific commission sent out in her, of whose labors a full report was published in the "Reise der Oesterreichischen Fregatte Novara um die Erde." M. de Laveleye takes occasion to dwell on the subject of the United States, discussing its political system and future prospects with great fairness. We discover in him a very discerning observer and an honest and impartial judge; for in a note he says that in 1867 Americans swarmed in Switzerland, and he then proceeds to remark: "Many of these Americans appeared to be young married couples making the tour of Europe, returning by Palestine and Egypt; some had retained their Far West manners, but the majority were perfect gentlemen; what distinguished them from other travellers was that the men appeared to have more dollars in their pockets and the women more ideas in their heads.

The great apostle of the Gentiles appears to be, as they say in France, à l'ordre du jour. M. Auguste Trognon, the author of a history of France, crowned by the French Academy in 1865, has lately published "L'Apôtre Saint Paul: Étude Historique." It is simply the recital of the life and labors of St. Paul as gathered from his Epistles and from the Acts of the Apostles. The author announces that he has no pretensions as an exegetist, and less as a theologian. He appears to be familiar with the Greek and Latin versions of Scripture, but evidently has no knowledge of the Semitic languages. Contrasted with the high color of Renan's work, M. Trognon's recital at first appears pale, but it grows upon the reader by its judgment, logic, and eloquence.

Returning home from the United States on the eve of the last general election in France, M. A. Édouard Portalis conceived it his duty to publish his impressions concerning a nation where liberty really exists. They appear in a work entitled "Les États-Unis: Le Self-government et le Césarisme." The author counsels his French reader to go and look at the country so justly called the New World. Six months' residence there, he says, is better than ten years of study elsewhere. As the title indicates, the parallel between republicanism and imperialism forms the main idea of the work. M. Portalis discusses our form of government and its practical workings, public instruction, religion, and internal improvements. Of course there is a chapter on the Mormons, who appear to have a particular attraction for modern travellers, French and other. M. Portalis has studied our government to some purpose, and Cæsarism is not complimented by his comparisons. The Pacific Railroad excites his admiration, and he enthusiastically comments upon it as a fact quite as important in the history of humanity as the invention of printing, the steam-engine, or electricity. The Americans, he says, have realized the marvellous idea of Christopher Columbus, and have created the direct line between Europe and the Indies that he dreamed of. Again: "When I compare the conquests we desire—these of our Rhine frontiers, for instance—to those which the Americans make every day without spilling a drop of blood, I cannot avoid a painful sensation. Where, to humanity, would be the profit of such a conquest as that of the Rhine frontier? Would it produce a single city, or even a village? It would only make a few office-holders more." The increasing number of serious works such as this one on the United States would appear to indicate that the day has passed when foreign travellers in this country were wholly occupied with the discussion of questions of personal comfort, "domestic manners," and bad cookery. The "American spittoon" may be said to have passed out of literature.

M. Paul Leroy Beaulieu gives us "Recherches Économiques, Historiques et Statistiques sur les Guerres Contemporaines. 1853–1866." Of the four parts into which the work is divided, one—"Statistical Researches on Contemporary Wars"—had already appeared as an article in the Revue Nationale; and another—"The Diminution of the Evils of War"—in the Revue Contemporaine.

Who at the present day has ever heard of Vansleb? A book concerning him has just appeared, which presents a singular instance of what might be called moral resurrection. It is "Vansleb, Savant Orientaliste et Voyageur—sa Vie, sa Disgrace, ses Œuvres, par M. L'Abbé Pougeois." The subject of this memoir died nearly two hundred years ago. He was an Oriental scholar of remarkable attainments, had been a collaborator of the Englishman Castell in the preparation of his "Heptaglotton," and had earned a reputation as an Ethiopian scholar in England and in Germany. Duke Ernest the Pious, of Saxe-Gotha, entertained the altogether original design of connecting the religion of the Reformation with that of the Church of Ethiopia, and, by the advice of Ludolf, a distinguished scholar, and Vansleb's former master, the latter was selected for the remarkable mission. The embassy ended with the altogether unexpected and—so far as the duke was concerned—utterly disgusting result of Vansleb's conversion to the Roman Catholic Church, and his entrance into the order of Dominicans. After some years of study in Rome, he was sent to the East on a scientific mission by Colbert. He had spent nearly four years in Oriental travel and research, when he was ordered home by that minister, and treated with severity and great injustice. Retiring to a small village near Paris, he shortly afterwards died there. Ludolf, jealous of his superior acquirements, had for years calumniated him, false reports against his good name circulated uncontradicted, and in the course of a few years passed into history. His memory being thus weighed down under a load of obloquy, his literary reputation suffered in consequence. Some ten years ago, a conjunction of singular circumstances brought his case to the attention of M. Champollion, under whose auspices the present work has been prepared, fully vindicating Vansleb's memory from the serious charges against him. The book is interesting not only for the story of Vansleb's life and travels and the rehabilitation of his memory, but for the account of his literary labors. Of these, his "History of the Church of Alexandria," written at Alexandria from Coptic documents, is the most noteworthy.

Stendhal is a name frequently met with in French literature. He is admiringly cited by many, and is spoken of with praise by authors so eminent as Balzac and Prosper Mérimée. Nevertheless, to many persons, all this is insufficient to account for his alleged superiority. The examination of his writings did not explain what puzzled us; and now that we have read his life and an analysis of his "art," we confess ourselves more than ever lost in amazement at his reputation. "L'Art et la Vie de Stendhal" is a work written with a facile pen and some power by one who withholds his name. The anonymous author appears to have adopted the method which Sainte-Beuve says is the best for reaching a correct knowledge of the man whose biography you propose to write. This method is to propound certain questions and answer them, if only to yourself—although these questions may seem utterly foreign to the nature of the man's works. Thus: What were his religious opinions? How was he affected by the spectacle of nature? What of him under the head of woman—under that of money? Was he rich? Was he poor? What was his manner of life? What was his special vice or failing?—every man has one. None of these answers are indifferent in aiding you to form a judgment of the author of a book and of the book itself, provided it be not on pure mathematics, and is a literary work into which something of everything enters. Our author has taken the Sainte-Beuve process, but not the implied advice of privacy in its application. In cases where the cause of death is doubtful, it is a satisfaction to obtain the scientific result of a post-mortem examination. But we have no desire to be present at the revolting spectacle, to handle the bloody knives or to hold the bucket. In the moral post-mortem he has undertaken, our writer, with the air of one totally unconscious of the existence of a separating line between vice and virtue, exhibits and dissects his naked subject coram populo. Finding in Stendhal those things which among ordinary people pass for indecent and disgraceful, this pearl of biographers evidently contemplates them as so many graces adding fresh brilliancy to his solid virtues. He says of Stendhal: "Il avait des sens souvent impérieux. Stendhal a toujours et partout cherché par un art exquis, à grouper dans sa vie un choix de fleurs et de sensations agréables." This moral surgeon's knife is keen and bright, and he handles it with great skill. What a deliciously French way of saying in graceful and almost untranslatable phrase that Stendhal was a voluptuary, whose sole aim in life was his personal enjoyment! Especially admirable is that "sens impérieux." The biographer goes on to say—this time in phrase translatable—that Stendhal recognized in the world but two classes of people, viz., those with whom he passed his time agreeably, and those whom he found tiresome. Stendhal, whose real name was Beyle, was of the Voltairean school of writers. Born in 1776, dying in 1842, he may be said to have bridged the period between the encyclopædic and romantic schools. He made his literary début in 1815 with a life of Haydn—a wholesale plagiarism from the Italian. He afterwards wrote "La Chartreuse de Parme"—a sensational novel; "Rouge et Noir"—sketchy, affected, and paradoxical; "Promenades dans Rome"—pretentious and unreliable; "L'Amour"—pronounced by the best French critics a filthy book ("un livre immonde"); and "L'Histoire de la Peinture en Italie"—a work of serious merit, in the perusal of which, unfortunately, the reader who is acquainted with Stendhal's literary history cannot divest himself of an uncomfortable feeling of doubt as to whether he is reading Stendhal or some one else. Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 are still reprinted and sold, and their attractions to readers are their nervous style, originality of phrase, their epicureanism and immorality. But we have other objections to the literary reputation made for M. Stendhal. There is a very curious passage of literary history connected with his name which we have never seen mentioned in any work concerning him, of which his present biographer makes no mention, and which, strange to say, has escaped the research of M. Quérard. It is this: In 1818, the Edinburgh Review noticed his "Rome, Florence et Naples" very favorably, and gave especial praise to his estimate of Alfieri, beginning at page 194. Besides this passage, a long discussion, beginning at page 220 of Stendhal's book, on the state of French society before the Revolution, elicited the warmest admiration of the Edinburgh critic. A few months passed by, when the Review, to its great amazement, discovered that the Alfieri passage, consisting of ten whole pages, was taken bodily from its own article on Alfieri in Vol. XV. Nor was this all; for it was found that the so much admired passage on French society was likewise translated from another Edinburgh Review article on the letters of Mme. Du Deffand which appeared in the same volume (XV.) This will do for the present. If the author of "L'Art et la Vie de Stendhal" publishes a second volume, we may have more to say on this subject.

Moral Reforms, suggested in a Pastoral Letter. By A. Cleveland Coxe, Bishop of Western New York. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.)—Bishop Coxe's little book on Moral Reforms, being a Pastoral Letter, is addressed exclusively to members of his own church, and he takes for granted this membership in all that he says. The topic most prominently discussed is that of "Ante-natal Infanticide," his aim being at once to urge its guilt and to show that Protestantism—that is, "not only the Inorganic Protestantism of the day, but also our own truly Catholic and Apostolic Church" (the Episcopal)—is not responsible for the practice, but that it is equally prevalent among Roman Catholic nations. It appears to us here, by the way, that Bishop Coxe, like most who write upon this subject, lays too much stress upon the guilt and too little upon the injury done to the mother herself. Whether rightly or wrongly, people will never be brought to regard this crime as on the same level as that of murder. Teach them that it is irreparably ruining their own health, and perhaps the evil may be counteracted.

Trees, Plants, and Flowers; where and how they grow. A Familiar History of the Vegetable Kingdom. By the author of "Our Own Birds." (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1870.)—This is a nice little book, with plenty of neat illustrations and capital rustic letters, well printed and tastefully bound. It is one of the books of the period; belonging to a class already large and constantly increasing, though almost unknown a few years ago—a class designed to amuse and edify beginners in natural history, by building upon a solid scientific foundation an attractive, if somewhat airy and unsubstantial, structure. It is not, however, a "history of the vegetable kingdom," nor anything like one. The author discourses pleasantly, in familiar style, on a few subjects, seemingly taken at random, and gives them much the same kind of treatment that made his "Our Own Birds" entertaining, especially to young persons. But he writes in rather too desultory a manner; the chapters have little or no connection, and there is no evidence of the definiteness of purpose necessary to render the book complete as a whole. Still, if his aim was only to produce what we have called a nice little book on botany, he has hit the mark; and the skipping about from one subject to another may just suit most of the readers he will be likely to have. His statements of botanical fact are trustworthy, with occasional exceptions, as at p. 84, where he calls the potato a tuberous root. It is an underground stem, as shown by its development in the ascending axis of the plant, and its bearing buds. We wish that he had not ignored the scientific names of plants; for, though there are two sides to the question of introducing them in books of this sort, the student finds them, sooner or later, indispensable, and he may as well learn them first as last; besides, they give a precision to scientific writing not otherwise attainable. The literary execution of the work, as far as prose is concerned, s very good, and the style is especially commendable for its ease and appropriate simplicity. We are, therefore, the more surprised to find such an awkward slip as—"belongs to a very different genera" (p. 106). Non-professional writers cannot look too closely to these technicalities. But the rhymed lines on p. 24 and p. 56 would have been better omitted. Some of the longer quotations, as those upon the aquarium and upon palms, add materially to the interest of this unambitious but really entertaining treatise.

Directory of Booksellers, Stationers, News-dealers, and Music-dealers in the United States and Canada. Complete to September 1, 1869. (New York: John H. Dingman.)—With this volume and Messrs. Rowell & Co.'s directory of newspapers, whoever wishes to form some conception of the literary activity of this country will have abundant material. Mr. Dingman's labor has been even greater than that required in cataloguing the newspapers; and we believe it to have been as conscientiously and successfully expended as if he were not the only worker in his chosen field. The mere alphabetical index contains about six thousand names, with general address attached, under which they can be sought for in the classified State lists which follow, and which add the name of the street on which the firm does business. In the appendix, the text of the American copyright law is given; an historical résumé of the English; the rates of foreign postage; a schedule of stamp duties, and other information, which the owner of the directory is likely to need. For the trade itself, and for all those wishing to communicate with the trade, the book is indispensable. It is well printed and tastefully bound, and in price has been brought within the reach of the smallest dealer whom it mentions.

Taylor's Landlord and Tenant. Fifth Edition. A Treatise on the American Law of Landlord and Tenant. By JOHN N. TAYLOR, Esq. 8vo, $7 50.

Preface to the Fifth Edition.

In the preparation of this edition, every part of the work has been thoroughly revised, and several important additions made. Some alterations were rendered necessary, by reason of changes in the current of modern authorities, and some conflicting adjudications have either been harmonized or the differences briefly stated; but the original plan is not essentially changed. Such cases as have been reported since the publication of a former edition were carefully examined, and, so far as they were found tributary to the general design, were freely incorporated. More than a thousand additional cases are embodied, which exhibit distinct modifications of the law as it previously stood, or present further developments of its leading principles. Some portions of local or statutory laws have been transferred from the text to the notes, or made applicable to the general law of the States by the addition of explanatory notes. A large amount of new matter is thus presented, but in so condensed a form that the size of the volume is not materially increased. Great care has also been taken to correct former inaccuracies, by diligently correcting the text with the original reports and minutely verifying the citation of cases.

Bennett and Heard's Leading Criminal Cases. Second Edition. Edited by E. H. BENNETT and F. F. HEARD, Esqs. 2 vols. 8vo, $15.

In this edition, the contributions of each writer contained in both volumes of the former edition are arranged in separate volumes, the first embracing the labors of Mr. Bennett, and in the second will be found those of Mr. Heard. Several of the notes have been substantially rewritten, some have been rearranged, and all have been carefully revised, and the additions and modifications suggested by the later authorities.

A PICTORIAL COMMENTARY

ON THE

NATURAL HISTORY OF THE SCRIPTURES.

Bible Animals: Being a Description of every Living Creature mentioned in the Scriptures, from the Ape to the Coral. By Rev. J. G. Wood, M.A., F.L.S., etc., Author of "Homes without Hands," etc. With 100 new Designs by W. F. Keyl, T. W. Wood, and E. A. Smith. One vol. 8vo, half morocco, $8; cloth, $5.

This beautiful volume is one of the most attractive aids to the study of the Bible ever published. Its author, who occupies the foremost place among living writers upon Natural History, has taken up in its proper succession every creature whose name is given in the Scriptures, and supplies so much of its history as will enable the reader to understand all the passages in which it is mentioned.

While the work is one of the most entertaining and profitable that can be placed in the hands of the young, it cannot fail to possess the greatest interest and value to the natural historian and to the Biblical student of mature years.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

"Mr. Wood has the happy faculty of rendering his subject so attractive by his own method of dealing with it, and also by the aid he receives from the pencils of competent artists, that his books force themselves as a consequence into public notice, not alone as scientific treatises, but also as entertaining and instructive reading. The illustrations are drawn in every practicable case from living specimens; and the accessories of each picture, no less than the action of the principal figure, bear upon some passages of the sacred text."—London Art Journal.

"Both the text and engravings deserve warm praise. It is an admirable pictorial commentary on the natural history of the Bible, most attractive and instructive both to old and young readers."—British Medical Journal.

In the Illustrated Library of Wonders,

Egypt 3,300 Years Ago; or, Rameses the Great. By F. De Lanoye. With 40 Illustrations. One vol. 12mo, $1 50.

This volume is devoted to the Wonders of Ancient Egypt during the time of the Pharaohs and under Sesostris, the period of its greatest splendor and magnificence. Her monuments, her palaces, her pyramids, and her works of art are not only accurately described in the text, but reproduced in a series of very attractive illustrations as they have been restored by French explorers, aided by students of Egyptology.

The best Essays, Reviews, Criticisms, Tales, Poetry, Scientific, Biographical, Historical, and Political Information, Gathered from the entire body of English periodical literature, and from the pens of the ablest living writers.

Extracts from Recent Notices.

From Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

"Were I, in view of all the competitors that are now in the field, to choose, I should certainly choose The Living Age. . . . Nor is there, in any library that I know of, so much instructive and entertaining reading in the same number of volumes."

From the Watchman and Reflector, Boston.

"The Nation (N. Y.) in saying that The Living Age is 'the best of all our eclectic publications,' expresses our own views."

From the New York Times.

"The taste, judgment, and wise tact displayed in the selection of articles are above all praise, because they have never been equalled."

From the Philadelphia Inquirer.

"A constant reader of 'Littell' is ever enjoying literary advantages obtainable through no other source."

From the Round Table, New York.

"There is no other publication which gives its readers so much of the best quality of the leading English magazines and reviews."

From the Mobile Advertiser and Register.

"Littell's Living Age, although ostensibly the most costly of our periodicals, is really one of the cheapest—if not the very cheapest—that can be had, whether the quality or quantity of the literary matter furnished be considered."

From the Illinois State Journal.

"It has more real solid worth, more useful information, than any similar publication we know of. The ablest essays, the most entertaining stories, the finest poetry, of the English language, are here gathered together."

From the Pacific, San Francisco.

"Its publication in weekly numbers gives to it a great advantage over its monthly contemporaries in the spirit and freshness of its contents."

From the Chicago Daily Republican.

"The subscriber to Littell finds himself in possession, at the end of the year, of four large volumes of such reading as can be obtained in no other form, and comprising selections from every department of science, art, philosophy, and belles-lettres. Those who desire a thorough compendium of all that is admirable and noteworthy in the literary world will be spared the trouble of wading through the sea of reviews and magazines published abroad; for they will find the essence of all compacted and concentrated here."

The Week.

CONGRESS opened on Monday, and as usual a large number of bills were at once introduced, the most remarkable being one by Mr. Trumbull, making it a misdemeanor for any Senator or Representative to recommend any candidate for office, unless his opinion is asked for in writing by the Executive. The design of this, as explained by Mr. Trumbull in his speech—and the same idea, we may mention, is set out with great clearness in the last North American Review, by Mr. H. B. Adams—is to restore the balance between the different branches of the Government, which has been destroyed by the absorption of the appointing power by individual members of Congress. It is almost useless to hope for the passage of such a measure as yet, but its mere introduction shows the tendency of public opinion. Mr. Sumner has introduced a bill to remove the existing restrictions on the amount of national bank circulation, provided the Secretary of the Treasury withdraws from circulation legal-tenders of the same amount as the additions made to the bank-bills. General Butler is again at work for the repeal of the Tenure-of-Office Act, and Mr. Finkelburg proposes to establish a uniform system of naturalization, which is sorely needed. The tariff war may be said to have already begun in the Committee of Ways and Means, and the protectionists are threatening to oppose the printing of Mr. Wells's forthcoming report, as it is said to contain very unpleasant things. There is talk of their coming down a little—about $2 on pig-iron—but it is doubtful if the really orthodox will submit to anything of the kind. In fact, Judge Kelley is said to be in favor of an increase. Their concessions will be, it is rumored, on tea, sugar, and coffee.

The President's message is short and in the main good, but is wanting in clearness and decision on some of the more important points. He recommends that a law be passed authorizing the Governor of Georgia to convene the members originally elected to the State Legislature, including those since expelled, and administer the oath himself, and, in fact, decide on their qualifications. The Georgia affair has now, we frankly confess, or will have, if this recommendation be adopted, got beyond our comprehension. The State was readmitted to the Union by law; the members of the Legislature afterwards violated their own constitution, as their own Supreme Court has decided, in expelling certain members; but their right to judge of the qualifications of these members by parliamentary law and immemorial usage nobody can deny or has ever denied. Now, the remedy for a violation of a State constitution by a State Legislature lies, in the American system, in an appeal either to the people of the State or the State courts; but here comes the President and recommends that it be remedied by an Act of Congress giving the Governor of the State the power of judging of the qualifications of the members of the Legislature, and putting such persons into it as he thinks proper. What makes the muddle all the greater is that there is nothing whatever to prevent the Georgia Legislature expelling its colored members next year or the year after again; and, indeed, there is every reason to believe, if we may judge by what is passing in Tennessee, that they will do so. And what then? Another Act of Congress, and more threats of "military government"? The great difference between "a government of laws" and one of men has always been supposed to be, that under the government of laws one knows what he may do or not do, not today only, but a month hence; while under a government of men one's rule of conduct may change from hour to hour. In this Georgia matter, however, we seem likely to have something like a display of individual caprice clothed in the forms of legislation.

The President recommends a "gradual return" to specie payments, which is, indeed, the only kind of return possible; most of the declamation against a "sudden" return being like warnings against a too rapid growth in virtue; advises that the Treasury be authorized to redeem its own paper at a certain fixed price whenever presented, as a safeguard against violent fluctuations in the value of greenbacks, a perfectly valueless suggestion; the reduction of the income-tax to three per cent. (which would be as productive as five per cent. if the Civil Service was reformed), and the increase of the National Bank circulation to replace the outstanding three per cent. certificates, which amount to about forty-seven millions; the creation of an officer to be called the Commissioner of Customs Revenue (who can be of very little use as long as the present system of officering the custom-houses is persisted in); the raising of the salaries of certain other revenue officials; and an addition of "dignity" to the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

One of the most important parts of the message is that which treats of foreign affairs. With regard to Cuba, while expressing sympathy with the insurgents, the President lays it down that the conduct of the Administration should be regulated strictly by the rules of international law; that the insurgent force in the island has at no time assumed such proportions as to justify the recognition of it as a belligerent; but "maintains the principle that this nation is its own judge when to accord the rights of belligerency either to a people struggling to free themselves from a government they believe to be oppressive, or to independent nations at war with each other." Mr. Sumner will doubtless read this passage with some chagrin, as his doctrine is that the compensation is due from England for the Alabama claims not simply for the computable material damage, but for the exercise by Great Britain of the right of judging when to accord the "rights of belligerency to a people struggling to be free." The Spanish gunboats, the President says, he seized on the demand of the Peruvian Minister, who "made representations that a state of war existed between Spain and Peru." The President can hardly have been ignorant that the Peruvian Minister also maintained last winter that a state of war did not exist between Spain and Peru, and that his learned argument on this subject is now on file in the State Department; and his maintenance of the contrary thesis this year was, therefore, not worth noticing, much less acting on. In the paragraph immediately preceding, too, the President mentions that the mediation of the United States between Spain and Peru had actually been accepted, and that a commission was to meet at Washington this winter for the settlement of outstanding difficulties. Finally, he dismisses the subject of the gunboats by saying that the Peruvian minister having taken no further steps for their detention, "he did not feel authorized to detain the property of a nation with which we were at peace, on a mere executive order, and had therefore referred the matter to the courts to decide." There is, however, nothing on this showing for the courts to decide. They pass on the complaints and charges of the Government, and if the Government makes no complaint, the courts have no more to say about the gunboats than about the private property of the Spanish minister. Spain and Peru being at peace, as the Peruvian minister has ably shown, and as Spain has not ventured to deny, there is no more reason for bringing the gunboats before the courts than for detaining them on "a mere executive order." What the President says is very like the speech of a police justice who should say, "This man having been brought before me by a prosecutor who acknowledged himself guilty of perjury, and on charges which I myself know to be false, and which indeed he himself abandoned at the hearing, I have determined to commit the prisoner fully for trial, and let him vindicate himself, if he can, before a jury of his countrymen."

The Presidential reference to the Alabama affair, we are sorry to say, throws no light on it whatever, and we know as little now about the time and manner of its settlement as we did before. The points in which the Johnson-Clarendon treaty was defective are indeed pointed out, but then that treaty is now as dead and gone as the Pragmatic Sanction. What we want to know is, what is to take its place; and on this we get no light from any quarter. Senator Sumner's claim for consequential as well as actual damages, which he made as plain as language could make it, but which he and his friends have ever since stoutly denied he ever made at all, the President seems to revive in a vague way; and he hints at some kind of moral satisfaction from England as necessary to a proper settlement of the question. But what the nature of this satisfaction is he does not indicate. Is it an apology? If so, for what—the belligerency proclamation or the sailing of the Alabama, or both? Is it the intention of the Administration to ask for such apology, and do they expect to get it? and if they do not get it, what will they do—fight or wait, intending to fight? What will be proper compensation for England's share in protracting the war, and how will her share be separated from that of France, and of the Democratic party? How, too, is the indirect damage she did—such as raising the rates of insurance—to be computed? On what rule, as settled by what precedents? These are all questions the public would like to have answered, and the message answers none of them. We have had enough declamatory complaints about the matter, and enough refutation of Mr. Reverdy Johnson. Mr. George Bemis, who is in Europe, has written a pamphlet on his correspondence, in which he again slays him; but then, if Mr. Bemis were here, he would know that the public mind has got far past Mr. Johnson's treaty, and longs for something new.

The rest of the message is comparatively unimportant, containing nothing new in the way of suggestion, and we are sorry to say nothing with regard to the condition of the Civil Service, which has formed the great scandal of General Grant's administration, and illustrations of which are cropping out every day. The President alleges what is quite true, that the territory of the United States is capable of maintaining a population of 500,000,000. He might have added that at the present rate of increase it will contain more than that number within a century from this time. We shall then have 500,000 office-holders, and at each change of administration, at a very moderate computation, five million candidates for office, and about one million "men inside politics" pushing their claims; so that the new President of that period will be pursued, during the months of March, April, and May of the year of his inauguration, by seven millions and a half of males and females, of whom certainly half will make their way to the seat of government, the remainder only writing letters. Supposing him to live and preserve his faculties into the summer, the "rotating" will then begin, and at least one million of men and women will begin to whirl, some in and some out, and half a million of "men inside politics" to swear, and the result must be left to the imagination. One striking feature of that great period will be, if things go on as at present, a gigantic national lunatic asylum, for cabinet ministers and ex-Presidents, where they will be gorgeously supported at the public expense, after having distributed the offices. But we trust that, after all this vision will never be realized, and we shall shortly see in the United States fifty millions of people attending diligently to their own affairs, and employing fifty thousand honest and intelligent men and women, at good wages, and with fixity of tenure, to look after the machinery of government for them. Mr. Cox, of the Department of the Interior, is the only one of the Secretaries, if we are not mistaken, who in his report lays his finger on this great Civil Service sore, and asks for the remedy, which he does forcibly and manfully.

The principal point in Mr. Boutwell's report is his exposition of his plan for a return to specie payments. It consists, as was generally surmised, of the issue of a four and a half per cent. loan of $1200,000,000, in three classes, running for twenty, twenty-five, and thirty years respectively, and all exchangeable for five-twenties; and the concession to the Secretary of the power of contracting the currency to the extent of $2,000,000 every month. But Mr. Boutwell believes the return cannot be thought of till the larger part of the five-twenty bonds have been withdrawn from the hands of the present European holders—mostly speculators, Mr. Boutwell thinks, who would in a panic flood the market here with them—and their place supplied by his four and a half per cent. bond, which would be held in the main by capitalists as an investment. He thinks that as long as bonds are sent abroad in large quantities, and are liable to return for gold, we dare not offer to pay in specie; and he apparently looks forward to a time when "the products of industry exported shall be equal substantially to the products of other countries imported," and then, he says, "there will be no demand for specie for export." But "equal" in what? He cannot mean bulk or weight, and must mean value; but if the time ever comes when the value of the imports is "substantially the same" here as the value of the exports, trade will stop, for dealers on both sides expect to make by the transaction. Moreover, Mr. Boutwell seems to overlook the fact that gold is one of our products, and that the larger portion of it is good for nothing except to export. We must say, too, that we look on that glorious time when bonds will no longer be exported from the United States, and all our work done with our own capital, as a dream—sweet, it may be, but still a dream. Bonds will always go abroad in a steady and rapid flow as long as this country offers a boundless field for investment, and foreigners are willing to take six or seven per cent. for money on which Americans can make twenty.

The Cuban Junta are working vigorously, and petitions, got up by them, which are said to be miles long, and signed by "men in nations," are now circulated by them, calling for the recognition of Cuban independence or something. The President's reference in his message to the Cuban business is not of an encouraging nature, it is true, and neither is the approaching release of the Spanish gunboats, but then Congress is meeting, and it is in Congress that the Junta will now do most of its work. The Cuban bonds are said to be so numerous in Washington that we fear they will decline in the market, but they will in the meantime inspire many an orator. The Cuban army and government remain as shadowy as ever; but there is a Cuban constitution we know, for we have read it. There is news from the island of a bloody and ferocious repression of a real or suspected slave rising, and the condition of affairs is indeed such that it would be an act of mercy for our Government either to declare boldly that it will never interfere, or else interfere at once. The hope of some help from this country is just sufficiently strong to keep the interior of the island in a state of anarchy, without doing anything to create or promote organized resistance to the Spaniards. The District Court of North Carolina has decided in the Hornet case that there is no such "people, district, or colony" as Cuba or the Cuban Republic known to the United States as belligerents, and though an appeal from this has been taken to the Circuit Court, the question may perhaps be considered settled. The courts see foreign affairs only through the eyes of the Executive, and the Executive has not as yet seen Cuba.

We have discussed the Richardson tragedy elsewhere, but we feel bound, in justification of what we have said, to add one word on Mr. Beecher's defence of himself at the funeral. If it be true that, as a newspaper correspondent, Richardson's conduct during the war entitled him to Mr. Beecher's sympathy and support under the consequences of a successful attempt to get a woman away from her husband for the purpose of marrying her himself, we are driven to the conclusion that service in the war in any capacity operates as a general indulgence during the remainder of a man's natural life. Tetzel himself never claimed anything half as extraordinary as this. Some of the brethren came very near asserting this in some of their sermons on "soundness on the main question," but we never expected anything like it from Mr. Beecher. But it is a theory that will hardly hold water. As Macaulay has well remarked, it is no answer to a charge of furious driving in the streets to say that a man behaved well at Waterloo. The war has indeed had a most deplorable effect in enabling hundreds of notorious rogues to cover up their past rascalities, but it has not created a class of "chartered libertines." Moreover, we cannot help saying that the comparison of Richardson to "a dead lion," and his assailants to "vile things," and "beetles," and "flies," and "crawling worms," was, considering everything, singularly inapt. If there ever was a case in which the public judgment on a man's conduct was loudly challenged by himself and his friends, it was Richardson's. The New York Tribune teemed for two days with what were really covert defiances hurled at people who thought it was not, as Mr. Beecher says, "prudential" for a married woman to transfer her affections to another man than her husband, and go with her lover to another house, and there occupy what was to all intents and purposes the same room with him, and for the man to announce in print that as soon as she got a divorce he was going to marry her. People who say that a person who so doing came to his death, died as a trespasser and wrong-doer, may be foolish, or misguided, or impetuous, but the man is not a "dead lion," and they are not vermin. The public and press were, we believe, very willing to allow Mr. Richardson to die in peace, and Mrs. McFarland to sorrow in seclusion, but when called loudly to gather round his bedside and admire him, and acquit him, they naturally grew indignant. We think one moral of the affair is, that when you see in the New York Tribune that the young lions of that journal are having a good roar, don't get your hat and rush out to see what the matter is. Wait till they have done. A hundred to one nothing is the matter, and in any case you will fare better in your house than mingling in the crowd around the cage.

Mr. Beecher's charge of adultery against McFarland, interpolated by him in the report of the address at the funeral, even if true, ought not, we think, to have been so interpolated without giving the public notice of the fact that it had not been uttered. But, if we are rightly informed, an attempt was made to fasten this charge on McFarland by his wife when she first began to take measures to procure a separation; and it was her total failure to produce any evidence of it which led to her resort to the Indiana courts; and of the proceedings there he had no notice. They were, therefore, whatever they may have been by the law of that State, by the moral law a mockery, a delusion, and a snare; and we hold it to be a public scandal that such divorces should be recognized as valid by any person in this State authorized to celebrate marriage. The practice of doing so reduces the law of this State, which refuses divorces except for adultery, almost to a nullity; and to the law of this State residents in the State owe what support it is in their power to give. We trust the effect of this McFarland affair will be to make ministers more careful whenever they are not well acquainted with the antecedents of parties presenting themselves for marriage.

The Woman's Rights movement has received an impulse within the last fortnight from the formation of a new association, which has held its first convention at Cleveland (Ohio), and elected Henry Ward Beecher president. It cuts loose, as we understand it, from the organization in this city headed by the conductors of the Revolution, which organ is now in deep disfavor. In fact, the mere mention of an "organ" at the Cleveland Convention seemed to rouse indignation, so bitter, apparently, has been the general experience with regard to this particular means of reaching the popular heart. Most of the leaders of the movement have given in their adhesion to the Cleveland organization, which is now fairly afloat; and, in the belief of many of the members, female suffrage is not far off. The "Woman's Parliament" in this city seems in a bad way—Mrs. Peirce, who was its chief projector, having withdrawn from it. The body, whatever it be, out of which the parliament was to be made, however, still meets once a week, and discusses all kinds of subjects, including specie payments. We need hardly say these debates are exhaustive, and are making the public long for the admission of women to our legislatures. The idea of a "parliament," however, seems to be undergoing obscuration—as the body is sometimes called a "council," and one lady suggested that it be called a "pow-wow," if that would "help along the cause." Unless we are greatly mistaken, the Richardson affair has been to the whole movement, in this part of the world, at least, what shipping a green sea is to a vessel, and we respectfully recommend taking in sail, sending some of the passengers below, and putting a man or two more at the wheel. As we have all along said, the woman question is, par excellence, a delicate question, and won't bear as much wild talk as many of its advocates have been in the habit of indulging in on other subjects. Marriage and the paternity of children happen to be closely connected with it, and on these subjects the "white male" is easily roused, and so is a very considerable and respectable portion of the "white female." It will be well, therefore, not to abuse him too much, because, wretched a creature as he is, and short as is the time which is to elapse before he is to be put in his proper place, he has still an immense deal to do with the ordering of society. Of course, female suffrage does not necessarily touch the marriage relation—we know that as well as anybody; but then there is an enormous number of persons who think it does, and who are as obstinate as mules.

The foreign news of the week is unimportant, or nearly so. The cause of "the parliamentary empire," as M. Guizot calls it, is evidently growing. The "Left" has issued an address, signed by twenty-six of the leaders, containing a programme of its operations during the coming session of the Legislature. It is going to call the Government to account for not convening the Corps Législatif sooner; for making such a fuss about the disorders in the streets last June, and then offering no explanation; and for the recent bloody suppression of certain riots in the manufacturing districts. It also means to propose, as reforms, an absolute prohibition of the Government practice of gerrymandering the electoral districts; the abolition of the electoral test-oath; the election of mayors; the municipal independence of Paris and Lyons; the repeal of Article 75 of the Constitution (protecting functionaries from prosecution); and complete, instead of as now limited, freedom of meeting and of the press. It also blows a powerful blast against the doctrine of "delegation," as we call it, or the "imperative mandate," as the French call it, which makes the representative the mere mouthpiece of the majority of his constituents, and bound to obey their orders. The deputies say they will not take orders from anybody, and will consult their conscience alone. This address gives great satisfaction. Ledru Rollin has abandoned the field, and the latest news says that Émile Ollivier, who, while in general sympathy with the Left, represents its peculiar hostility to personal government, has succeeded in securing the adhesion of 37 Liberals of the famous 116, and may now be called on in the old parliamentary way to form a ministry.

THE FUTURE OF LEGAL TENDERS.

For several years past the Supreme Court of the United States has had before it for decision several lawsuits, on appeal from lower courts, which involve the question of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the so-called Legal Tender Act. For various reasons, the decision of this question by the Supreme Court has been delayed. It is quite uncertain when the decision will be rendered. It is far from impossible that a long time may elapse before a decision is arrived at. There are some who believe that the question will never be decided. In the meantime, this delay piques men's curiosity; the uncertainty exercises a certain fascination over certain minds; mysterious announcements are occasionally made of an approaching decision, followed by still more mysterious counter-announcements of the grave reasons of state which still prevent the action of the Court; and the whole question is so little understood that the public mind is gradually working itself up into a state of excitement concerning it utterly disproportioned to its real importance, while many persons look forward to the fatal day of the decision with much the same feeling of half-contemptuous fear that characterizes nervous people when they speak of the coming comet or the approaching absorption of our planet by the sun. There is just now one of these periodical scares among business men, and we are in receipt of several enquiries as to our opinion of the approaching decision.

It is, however, entirely useless to renew the discussion of what the decision of the Supreme Court may be, or when it is likely to be rendered. Whatever may be the gossip of the Street or the clubs, no one can know what the Court will do. We will only again call attention to the probable effect of the decision when rendered. Of course, if the decision should be that the law is constitutional, everybody understands that nothing would be changed. It is the possible decision against its constitutionality that is looked forward to with so much dread. Now, what is the law that is to be decided upon? It is a law passed by the United States Congress, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow one hundred and fifty millions of dollars (since repeatedly increased), and to issue therefor a similar amount of non-interest-bearing United States promises to pay, now known as greenbacks, and declaring that these promises to pay, these greenbacks, shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public or private, except customs duties on goods imported from abroad. There is no question about the constitutionality of that part of the law which authorizes the issue of these greenbacks. They are under all circumstances promises to pay, legitimately issued, and destined undoubtedly to be at some time or other redeemed or paid according to promise. It is only that part of the law which declared these promises to be a legal tender, which compelled every one to accept them in payment of all debts then existing, that is called in question. It would be practically useless to discuss that question here. Constitutional or unconstitutional, it was undoubtedly a measure of injustice and spoliation, justifiable in the minds of the public by the supposed invincible necessities of war. It was passed, and almost universally accepted. Whatever doubts may have been entertained at the time, were not generally acted upon. It was a time of severe commercial and financial depression. It was a time when very little money of any kind was in circulation anywhere. It was a time when it was extremely difficult to obtain a settlement of a debt in any money. Under these circumstances the new money was not only accepted, but accepted with avidity. Few thought that it would ever fall to a great discount against gold. Many believed that the legal-tender clause would always keep it at par with gold. With rare exceptions, every one accepted it. All debts due, all contracts then maturing, were settled in greenbacks; and, whatever the decision of the Supreme Court may be, there can be no going back to settlements actually made. But some persons accepted settlements under protest, and appealed to the courts. These are the cases now to be adjudicated. If the Supreme Court decides that the Legal Tender Act was unconstitutional, then whoever accepted greenbacks in payment of a debt contracted prior to the 25th of February, 1862 (and protested against such payment in legal form), will undoubtedly be entitled to recover the difference between the value of gold and greenbacks at the time of payment. This is one class of contracts to be affected by the decision. The next class consists of debts contracted prior to the date of the law, and not yet due, such as railroad and other long mortgages, State and city loans, etc. If the act is unconstitutional, then all this class of debts will be payable hereafter, principal and interest, in gold. There is not—there cannot be—any dispute among rational men as to the effect of the Court's decision on these two classes of contracts. Nor have recent decisions in various other courts left any doubt as to the obligation to pay in gold all contracts made in gold since the passage of the Legal Tender Act.

The only class of contracts concerning which grave doubts exist in the public mind are contracts made since the passage of the act, which are payable "in currency," or merely in "dollars," without any further specification. The fear is very widely entertained that, if the act were declared unconstitutional, all these contracts would be payable in gold. There cannot be much ground for this fear. The principle is too well established in law, that a contract is to be interpreted according to the intentions of the parties making it. No man who to-day receives a note made payable in "dollars" simply, would venture to claim that he had meant gold dollars. Nor would the claim for one moment be admitted in court, for if he had meant gold dollars, nothing was easier than to say or write gold dollars. Whoever makes a contract to-day payable in "dollars," does it with the understanding that this means greenback dollars, and no other kind of dollars. This understanding is simply an unexpressed, an implied part of the contract, from which no court will, we think, deliver a suitor. It was precisely the same prior to the passage of the Legal Tender Act. Any contract for dollars made prior to that time was made with the implied understanding that "dollars" meant American gold dollars, and no other. That understanding formed part of the obligation, from which neither of the contracting parties could be released. Congress did, by an act of arbitrary power, attempt to release persons from that obligation by the passage of the very law under discussion; and many persons, in the belief that Congress had that power, did actually submit to the law, and fully release those with whom they had contracts from their obligation, by accepting payment in greenbacks. But it is this very law, this attempted release, that the Supreme Court (a higher authority in this respect than Congress) is about, it is supposed, to declare unconstitutional. Congress could not, in 1862, constitutionally pass a law that released any one from the obligation to pay gold dollars where simply dollars were specified, because at the time of making the contract there were no dollars in existence except gold dollars. In the same way, neither Congress nor the Supreme Court can to-day do anything which releases any one from the obligation to receive greenback dollars where only "dollars" are specified, because at the time of making the contract the dollars in common use, and the only dollars that could have been intended, were greenback dollars; and because, although there were other dollars in existence, these other, rarer, and more valuable dollars would certainly have been specified, if intended. If the Supreme Court declares the Legal Tender Act constitutional, then, of course, greenback dollars remain the lawful currency, and all contracts not specifically payable in gold are payable in greenbacks. If it declares the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional, then that is a reaffirmation, a new endorsement of the principle, that Congress can do nothing to invalidate the obligations of a contract. In either case, a contract made since the passage of the Legal Tender Act, calling for the payment of dollars, is payable in greenback dollars, and in no other.

The practical position of the currency may be thus stated: Prior to the passage of the Legal Tender Act, "dollars" meant gold dollars; since the passage of the Legal Tender Act, "dollars" means greenback dollars; after the Legal Tender Act is declared unconstitutional, "dollars" will, in the eye of the law, again mean gold dollars, and all contracts will have to either clearly specify "currency dollars" or be payable in gold. If the law is declared unconstitutional, the practical position of contracts will be as follows:

1. All unsatisfied contracts for "dollars" made prior to Feb. 25, 1862, are payable in gold dollars.

2. All contracts for "dollars" made since Feb. 25, 1862, are payable in greenback dollars.

3. All contracts for "dollars" made after the decision of the Supreme Court will be payable in gold dollars, unless otherwise specified.

A powerful argument in favor of interpreting the probable decision of the Supreme Court, so as to make all existing contracts payable in gold, is sought to be based upon the ground that it would be a means of partially redressing the injustice done the whole creditor class in 1862 by compelling them to accept greenbacks worth only seventy-five or fifty cents in gold in payment of gold dollars. But, in the first place, the injustice then committed can never be made an excuse for a fresh and still greater injustice; and, in the second place, there is not the remotest probability of this redress reaching the persons then injured, since many of them are dead, while others from creditors have become debtors, and vice versa. It is, besides, very questionable whether as a class the creditors were not as much benefited by the Legal Tender Act as the debtors; for few practical business men sincerely doubt that without some such measure the debtors, as a class, would have had to go without payment entirely. It is on precisely similar grounds that the more intelligent among the creditor classes are now violently opposed to a legislative contraction of the currency. They recognize that their claims, while nominally increased in value thereby, would be entirely jeopardized by the universal weakening of the debtor class; and that as it was the policy of creditors in 1862 to submit to a real reduction of their claims enforced by an unjust law, so it will be the policy of creditors in 1870 not to seek a nominal increase of their claims by a forced contraction of the currency, nor by a perversion of the Supreme Court decision, even were the latter possible. Debtors and creditors alike may rest assured that the decision of the Supreme Court, whether for or against the constitutionality of the Legal Tender Act, will not affect any contracts entered into since February 25, 1862. At the same time, it is well to bear in mind that the transactions made in gold coin are daily increasing in number in all parts of the country, and that we are gradually drifting into a double currency, such as prevails in several of the countries of continental Europe. It behooves, therefore, all prudent business men to be scrupulously careful to distinguish in all their contracts between specie dollars and dollars currency.

"PROGRESS" IN MASSACHUSETTS.

We said the other day that Mr. George Walker, who was sent abroad some time ago to negotiate a loan for Massachusetts, had been unable to accomplish his object. He found that foreign capitalists had not that same high opinion of Massachusetts credit which once placed her securities among the best in the world. It is very much to be hoped that an opportunity will be given Mr. Walker to state publicly the precise nature and extent of the difficulties in the way of the loan he attempted to negotiate, so that the citizens, not only of his State, but of all other States, may have a few useful landmarks to guide their future financial course. It is not quite enough to know in general that the credit of a State is ruined: what we want is an accurate description and recorded plan of the road to ruin, with monuments and distances, courses and measurements, plainly marked out for the warning of future generations. Mr. Walker, we hear, has no sort of objection to make a public statement; and publicity will be all the more necessary because the local journals are apparently not indisposed to cover up the matter with ambiguous phrases, and even go so far as to deny the general fact. And there are also other reasons which make some disclosure still more imperative—reasons which are not generally known to exist, and which, therefore, as journalists, we feel bound to lay before our readers. They are, shortly, these: that it is understood that the Legislature this winter will be applied to for a new loan to the celebrated Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad; that it will be applied to to "modify" a contract with reference to the equally celebrated Hoosac Tunnel; and that a vigorous push will be made on the part of the "Massachusetts Central"—a corporation which has as yet no existence save in the minds of the corporators—for a few millions more. It is also supposed by the well-informed that these three will unite their energies, and, aided by an intelligent and industrious lobby, perhaps supported by a genial governor, trundle their combined log through the halls of legislation into the statute-book. We say these things are understood to be likely to happen. Of course, everything is as yet rumor, but our readers may be assured that these are no improbable predictions, but have every presumption in their favor.

To begin with the youngest of these enterprises—the Central. This railroad has for a long time been living solely on the hope of a governmental subsidy. It has no funds, or credit, or property; but it has an unlimited amount of perseverance, and last year came so very near getting the three millions it asked for that its agents will approach this winter's task with redoubled energy. The Boston, Hartford, and Erie is a different matter. We will not weary our readers with a recapitulation of their performances in the last Massachusetts Legislature. Before this we have related how the State first lent three millions and appointed a commission to watch its disbursement; how the railroad found the three millions insufficient, and the commission much more than sufficient; how it formed an alliance with the Governor; and how together they managed to oust the commission without hearing what the commissioners had to say about the matter, and to lend the road two millions more on much easier terms than those of the first loan. Of all these things we gave a full account when they occurred. Now it is time to narrate the sequel. When the commission was expelled, the road, feeling its hands at length untied, began to do what it pleased with its money, and what it did please it is not given to outsiders to know. But this much is known, that whereas its bonds were at that time worth 60, they are now selling at 46; and whereas their stock was worth 25, it is now worth 10. The fate of the other party to the bargain Mr. George Walker knows more about than anybody else. And now the rumor rises that the last loan of two millions was wholly insufficient, that the road cannot be built without a few millions more, and that, unless the State wishes to lose what it has already advanced, it must make a third loan.

The subject of the Hoosac Tunnel we approach with a certain awe. The Hoosac Tunnel is a hole which the State of Massachusetts determined to have bored through the thickest mountain in the State, some years ago, in order that a railroad might be laid down in it, "to form one more great link in the chain of communication between" the declivity on the east side and the declivity on the west side of Hoosac Mountain. These slopes are inhabited by hardy tribes of mountaineers, who, owing to the extreme height and ruggedness of the mountain and the impassable character of the surrounding forests, have never been able to form that intimate acquaintance with each other's customs which civilization requires. The State, therefore, determined to lend a helping hand, and make a line of communication which should be at once durable and safe. The mountain is five miles thick; the first loan on the part of the State was made in 1854, and in the spring of 1869 about two miles of the work had been partially completed. This was at the rate of one mile in seven years and a half, and at this rate the tunnel would be partially completed in the year 1891, or thirty-seven years from the date of the first loan. After that, of course, the finishing work would have to be done.

At first the State merely advanced money; but, finding that the money disappeared while the tunnel did not rapidly increase in size, this system was abandoned, and the State took possession of the work itself. The amount of money advanced down to December 31, 1868, was, in round numbers, $4,338,000. But by this time both the mountain tribes which had demanded the tunnel, and the Commonwealth also, had become thoroughly dissatisfied with the progress made, and it was determined to throw the work into the market, and to have it taken off the shoulders of the public by some responsible contractor. Bids were received, and the contract was finally awarded to Walter and Francis Shanly, of Montreal, who agreed, by a contract made with the State on December 24, 1868, "to do and perform all the work necessary to complete the Hoosac Tunnel, with its central shaft (being a portion of the Troy and Greenfield Railroad), in accordance with the schedule hereunto appended, and furnish all materials, and lay down and complete through the whole length of the tunnel one railroad track, and, after the completion of the tunnel and railroad track, to remove from the tunnel all materials and other things, so as to leave the tunnel and railroad track in complete order ready for use, and to the satisfaction of the Governor and Council of the Commonwealth; the whole to be done by the first day of March, A.D. 1874, and for the sum of four million five hundred and ninety-four thousand two hundred and sixty-eight dollars." According to the last report of the Tunnel Commissioners, nine millions would cover the entire expense of the State on the completion of the work under this agreement, and the report concluded with this gratifying announcement: "The agreement concluded on the 24th of December, 1868, with Messrs. Walter and Francis Shanly, gentlemen of great skill and experience in similar undertakings, has placed in their hands, at a remunerative price, and under a guaranty highly favorable to the Commonwealth, the further construction of the tunnel and of the railroad through the same. The expectation may now be entertained that this important enterprise can be completed by the close of the year 1873, in a manner acceptable to the State and worthy the high character of the contractors." The taxpayers of Massachusetts rubbed their hands for joy, and all the journals of the State shouted aloud in exultation. The work was at length out of their hands, and a definite sum was fixed as its price.

Alas for the vanity of human hopes! It now turns out that the contractors cannot do the work for the agreed price. It will ruin them. It is quite insufficient. It is inequitable. There is a misunderstanding about certain details in the contract. And great damage was done to the work by the September floods, which, being an unavoidable accident, the State ought to repair. Now, all these difficulties seem to have been provided for in the contract by a stipulation that on default of the contractors the Governor and Council should have power to terminate the contract by three months' notice in writing. But this the contractors are unwilling to have done. What they want is a "modification" of the contract, or, in other words, they want the stipulated price increased.

Whether these various plans, or any of them, will succeed, we of course do not know. To the impartial observer, the recent history of Massachusetts finance is indeed a puzzle, though the effect of her system upon her credit is natural enough. But how far she will go we are curious to watch. Having acquired the habit of making advances to insolvent corporations, it is difficult for her to retreat without losing all that has been so lavishly advanced. On the other hand, unless she draws back now, she will be worse off than ever. Public opinion is sluggish and is accustomed to the spectacle of annual loans. Not so the Hartford and Erie Ring, the Central Ring, or the Hoosac Mountain Ring. These are active, energetic, persistent. We shall keep our readers informed of the progress of the struggle, if there is any struggle.

THE RICHARDSON TRAGEDY.

We recur to the subject of the Richardson-McFarland tragedy with sincere regret, both because it is at best a very repulsive subject, and because, since we touched upon it last week, one of the actors in it has been removed by death. We believe that, in spite of the somewhat conspicuous position occupied by Mr. Richardson in the newspaper world, the public would have been very well content—we certainly should—to pass the affair over with little more notice than is accorded to all similar outbursts of violence and ferocity, and to have left McFarland to the judgment of the court before which he will shortly be summoned, and Richardson to the judgment of that still higher tribunal before which he now stands. Owing, however, to what we will not call by any stronger name than the error of Richardson's friends, an attempt was made on the very day of the crime, and persisted in down to the day of the victim's death, to carry public opinion in favor of the latter by storm, and under cover of the smoke of McFarland's pistol to push home the conclusion that it served him right for Richardson to help to take his wife from him, and make arrangements for and announce his intention of marrying her, before judgment had been pronounced in the divorce suit (and that suit brought in Indiana), and that, in short, McFarland ought to be hanged with short shrift, and Richardson admired and cherished by the community. The unseemly publication of every telegram and every private note expressive of sympathy with him under his mortal wound, the still more unseemly outburst of fury against his assailant, and the very repulsive sensational report of the wedding at the Astor House, we might, under ordinary circumstances, ascribe simply to that diseased love of notoriety by which every movement of a certain class of newspaper men seems to be governed, and which makes them often appear to consider the minutest revelation of his private affairs to the public gaze the kindest thing they can do for their dearest friend. We feel bound, however, on the present occasion, to ascribe their theatrical performances to a more serious, and more respectable, motive, and conclude that the hullabaloo raised about this shocking affair was really meant to get a snap judgment from the public for the benefit of the dying man's memory and for the comfort of his family.

But we say the attempt has failed, and signally failed. It is not often, we believe, that a closer approach to unanimity is to be witnessed amongst the public than prevails with regard to this wretched affair, and more especially with regard to the deplorable attempts made to put a good face on it. We do not now refer particularly to the indignation excited by the marriage ceremony. The awfulness of the circumstances under which that ceremony was performed ought to have made it—no matter what the nature of Mr. Richardson's and Mrs. McFarland's previous relations may have really been—as private as possible; and, we confess, the fact that the divorce was obtained in Indiana, and not in this State where the parties resided, and that no judicial decision worthy of the smallest respect had been passed upon the facts; that there lay in jail a miserable husband with his children by his side—the only children, be it remembered, who had any claim on Mrs. McFarland's care—protesting, red-handed, against the whole proceeding, as the last and greatest of wrongs against him, ought, it seems to us, to have put the clergymen on their guard. In such cases, there are considerations weightier than any man's agony or any woman's fame. But whatever their fault or mistake, the presence of the reporters, pencil in hand, "working up" every detail of the ghastly scene, and noting down verbatim even the prayer, for sale at four cents a copy, with a discount to clubs of forty, put the stamp of the stage on it and damned it. Few men and few women, to whom marriage is anything more solemn and more sacred than a civil contract, we are sure, read the report, with a knowledge of all the circumstances, without feeling their blood stirred by something which, if not indignation, was not far removed from it.

We referred to this subject last week without, as we said at the time, any other knowledge of the facts than what we got from the newspaper reports, and on the strength of these we ascribed the separation of Mrs. McFarland from her husband to his "drunkenness and cruel treatment." We have since read the evidence taken in the habeas corpus proceedings instituted by McFarland for the recovery of his children before the Massachusetts courts, and we are bound to say that there is no proof whatever of either drunkenness or cruelty before the separation, while the testimony as to Mrs. McFarland's conduct and as to her relations with Richardson before the divorce and at the time of her leaving her husband, is, to say the least, very damaging. The worst thing brought against McFarland, indeed, was that he was poor and irritable, and that his wife was obliged to support the family by acting and literary work. His drunkenness seems to have been a vice contracted since the break-up of his family. As, however, the facts will all come out on his trial, there is no occasion—and indeed it would be hardly proper—to dwell upon them further than to say that it is in court on that occasion, and not in the newspapers, that Richardson's friends will have to vindicate his memory.

But why does his memory need vindication? Why does the public get behind the testimony of those who knew him as to his manliness, his simplicity, his courage, and his truthfulness? Why does it refuse to accept his, or McFarland's, or anybody's account of the causes which led to the separation of the McFarlands and to the McFarland-Richardson marriage as conclusive evidence that Richardson was right and McFarland wrong? Why have ninety-nine men out of a hundred of the best and purest and truest men in the community been saying during the past week either that Richardson met his deserts, or that, at all events, he merits no sympathy? Why do those who most abhor murder under any circumstances, who deny that even killing in hot blood, and under any provocation whatsoever, can be anything but murder in "the dir'st degree," pause when cases such as occur, and only condemn the assassin after a struggle between their moral feelings and intellectual conclusions? The answer is easy and simple, though nobody who knew nothing of the relations of men and women except what he learned from Mr. Mill's book or the debates at the meetings of the woman's suffrage associations, would ever guess it. In giving it we have to speak plainly, and our impression is that the questions which some advocates of woman's rights are raising will never be settled until there has been much more plain speaking on the part of those who see whatever of good there is in the existing order of society. It is that there is such a thing as sexual passion; that in many women and in the vast majority of men it is so strong as to be almost overwhelming; that in all ages and in all states of society it has been as much as religion, law, morality, and custom could do to regulate or control it; that it makes a weak spot in the strongest and purest natures—a spot at which the wisest as well as the most foolish tremble and are afraid; that probably all other social forces put together have not contributed half as much to influence human character and human society, to make or mar the fortunes of states and men. Nevertheless, one might almost, as we have said, read through nearly the whole literature of the woman's rights movement, beginning with Mr. Mill's book, without suspecting the existence of this tremendous force, or supposing that its existence had much to do with the formation or maintenance of that mass of usages and rûles known as "woman's condition" in society; without inferring that the restraints put on the intercourse of men and women, the limitations placed on woman's independence by law or custom, had any better source than the freaks of an irresponsible tyranny, or were other than the arbitrary exercise by man of the authority given him by brute strength over a fellow-creature who happened to be weaker, gentler, and more submissive than himself.

This force is, however, not a thing to be got rid of by ignoring it. We may keep it off the platform as much as we please, or refer to it with scorn, as something to be repressed or even abolished by education and culture; it is sure to assert itself at all times and everywhere, and to force every people which means to live and last to adopt their manners to its working. The experience of ages as to its corrupting influence on the will; of its perverting influence on the judgment; and of the difficulty which the wisest and purest often experience in deciding where its action ceases and that of higher motives begins, have established firmly either in the jurisprudence or the enlightened opinion of all civilized, certainly of all Christian, countries the following amongst other presumptions, as absolutely necessary to the proper preservation of the institution of family in the existing state of human nature, and as only to be rebutted, if at all, by a judicial decision based on clear evidence: (1) that the party, either man or woman, seeking a divorce, is not entitled to it; (2) that a person intervening in a quarrel between man and wife, and assisting in bringing about a separation, is, if the party with which he or she sides be of the opposite sex, an object of grave suspicion; (3) that if he or she intervenes avowedly from motives of affection, and with the view of marrying the object of that affection after a divorce has been obtained, he or she is, for all the purposes of a moral judgment on the act, guilty of adultery, and ipso facto exposes himself or herself to whatever social penalties the community may have in store for such offences.

To all pleas based on the exceptional purity or good intentions of A, B, or C, the answer is obvious—that rules for the preservation of the family have to be general; that if exceptions were granted to everybody who chose to aver that his motives were good, it would result in making marriage the feeblest of all human associations, and would, indeed, deprive it of all moral support in the very cases in which it most needs support—that is, in that of persons of strong passions and weak moral or religious impressions—and would place children, who are the wards of society and whose interests are more sacred than those of either husband or wife, because they are parties to a contract which they have had no hand in framing, in the most terrible of situations; and we say deliberately, that it is for them—mute, defenceless, dependent, as they are—for whom we are bound, in framing and enforcing marriage laws, to care most tenderly.

THE RIGHTS OF CHILDREN.

EIGHTEEN years ago Herbert Spencer wrote a chapter on the rights of children. In this chapter, which was considered wild and revolutionary by some, in fact, a reductio ad absurdum of his entire social philosophy, the writer maintained that the law, "Every man has freedom to do all that he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man," applied as much to the young as to the mature; that the child had faculties to be exercised; that it needed scope for their exercise; that to obtain such scope it must have complete freedom—freedom coextensive, and, consequently, rights coextensive, with those of the adult. In working out the bearings of this principle Mr. Spencer dealt hard blows at the received doctrines of parental authority, rule, and care. He more than implied that the best thing parents could do for their children was to give them a good letting alone. This chapter has often occurred to us in connection with the reasonings about women's rights. It would seem at first glance as if the extreme advocates of the rights of women to share, and share alike with men, in the business affairs of society, were carrying out Mr. Spencer's doctrine in good earnest. The children are to have a good letting alone. The law of liberty may be trusted to look after their development. The principal right being the right to freedom of growth according to the natural bent of their dispositions, the new order of things will meet this requirement exactly. The parents being both out of the way, the "little individuals" will be allowed to grow in grace undisturbed. A deeper glance at Mr. Spencer's pages, however, discloses the fact that he does not propose to dispense altogether with parental supervision, but only with certain old-fashioned, coarse, and unintelligent forms of it. He says to the parents, "Hands off," but he adds, instead of hands, hearts. In a word, he vastly increases the responsibilities of mothers and fathers by insisting that their influence shall be more subtle and pervasive, and that, to this end, their care shall be more steady, more constant, more intelligent, and tender. That to this end again, their characters must be of finer mould, their culture more perfect, their manners more gracious; all of which is discouraging to the hope of foolish mothers, that they are at last justified by stern philosophy in neglecting their children.

What will the extreme advocates of the rights of women say to this? We are aware that before now critics have raised the objection that the new reforms would if carried into effect result in the neglect of children, in their consequent untidiness, unruliness, wilfulness, and ignorance; further on, in their viciousness and general demoralization; and, ultimately, in the defeat of civilization and the blighting of mankind. We are aware, too, of the reply which has been made to such apprehensions, namely, that they are groundless; that the proper care of children does not occupy all the time; that when other duties are done, there is room for those of the nursery; that women have brought up large families of children, and brought them up well, "in the intervals of business," they themselves being physicians, or teachers, or artists, writers of books, editors of papers, or tenders in shops; that, in fact, the mental freshening they got in this way was a help rather than a hindrance to the faithful performance of their domestic duties. To these arguments there are several things to reply, which, to say fully, our space forbids. We may be permitted to entertain a doubt respecting the truth of the last assertion, if laid down as a rule. We take the liberty to demur in regard to the declaration that precedes it, having seen something of the households and of the children belonging to these discursive and enterprising mothers, and seldom envying or desiring the same. We could very properly urge the old saying, that, being exceptions, the women who achieve such feats in administration at home and abroad prove the incapacity of women in general to do the same thing. Distinguished ability furnishes no rule for average, far less for under-average, ability. A reform like the one projected implicates all women and all children, as much those who want to get rid of their offspring as those who want to nurture their offspring; the careless as much as the thoughtful, the faithless as much as the faithful, the incompetent as much as the competent, the vast multitude who need to be kept at home and held to their duty by every possible argument and inducement, as much as the exceedingly small number who have faculty and spirit to spare for outside pursuits. Society is interested in the mass of experiences, not in a few special experiments. The special experiments may succeed perfectly, to the satisfaction of the most captious critics, without at all affecting our judgment on the main case. For all that appears thus far, that judgment reads adversely to the belief that the rights of women, as interpreted by the Revolution, for instance, are compatible with the rights of children to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Without entering on a general discussion of a topic so broad and so complicated, without attempting to reach the heart of its philosophy, we will call attention merely to the obvious considerations, that a day consists of twenty-four hours; that but a portion of those twenty-four hours can be employed in active labor, especially in labor that drains the nervous system of its vitality; that if this vitality is spent in one absorbing pursuit it cannot be spent on another, and if the active hours are passed away from home they cannot be passed at home. True, it takes very little time to cast a vote; an hour is enough for the daily newspaper which prepares the voter for his office; caucuses and conventions, public assemblies and primary meetings, do not occur very frequently, and they occur mostly at night, when the children are, or ought to be, in bed. But other business cannot be despatched so easily; business that continues the larger portion of every day, and takes the life out of those who engage in it, as almost all business does, presents a very serious obstacle in the way of family nurture. The editor, for example, must be at his office daily for several hours; the lecturer must travel about the country; the author must literally slave at the quill; the merchant must journey from place to place, and must live in immense calculations; the trader must nurse his trade; the shopman must be constant at his counter, waiting for customers; the lawyer has no time to spare for babies; the doctor must be in other people's houses, and at the call of other children's parents day or night, often at the very time his own family requires his care, being so urgently in demand that he has no leisure to do anything for them; the preacher is also a minister and is unable to control his time.

As we look into it further the difficulties increase. The humbler occupations allow still less freedom. What will become of the children while their mother is sailing a boat, or driving a stage, or doing duty as a watchman, or propelling an engine, or plying the needle as tailoress, or superintending an oyster saloon? The case of poor women who were obliged to leave their children while they went out washing or sewing for the day has excited commiseration; kindness could not consent that the little creatures should be uncared for during the numerous hours, left to fall into the fire, or tumble down-stairs, or bump their heads against the table or the stove, or, at all events, to be untaught and untrained. The crèche was a device for making good the mother's disability. Good women stepped in to take the mother's place and nurture the infant till the mothers came for them. Perhaps the institution of the crèche is to be amplified and extended, so as to embrace the duty of taking care of all children while the matrons are attending to their political, civil, social, financial, commercial, or industrial concerns. Then a new department of labor will be created—that, namely, of nurturing and educating other people's offspring; an office of immense responsibility and difficulty, requiring the best material of human nature and the best training of it, the whole being, at the same time, superfluous, for the simple reason that Providence has already arranged for the contingency by giving children natural protectors and educators in the persons of their mothers, and holding them to their duty by the bonds of an affection which makes amends for many deficiencies and for which there is absolutely no substitute.

Let it not be supposed that we treat the subject with levity. It is altogether too serious for joking. The proper nurture and discipline of children is probably the deepest concern of society. Probably! It surely is; for if it is neglected, society will not go forward, and if it is abandoned, society will be broken up. Politics and statesmanship, law, physic, and divinity, finance and commerce, manufactures and trade, books, magazines, and newspapers, will be of little importance if minds are untaught, hearts undisciplined, and characters undeveloped, to use them well. We may be old-fashioned, old-fogyish, prejudiced, and besotted, but we persist in thinking that society needs good children as much as it needs wide-awake women, that family nurture is of as deep consequence as feminine activity, and that the woman who rears a brood of children healthfully and wisely, confers greater benefit on the community than half a dozen lecturers, politicians, lawyers, or money-makers. "Paradise," said Mahomet, "is at the feet of mothers." But it is not likely to be at the feet of mothers who forget that they are more to their children than to themselves, and more to society through their children than through their gifts; and it is not likely to be anywhere if mothers spend their lives as fathers are obliged to spend theirs in the heat and bewilderment of business affairs. We would deprive none of their rights; we hope that women will obtain all of theirs; but let us see to it that rights do not clash; and, especially, let us take care that they have them who have the best claim to them, and for whose enjoyment of them society has most need.

ENGLAND.—THE COLONIAL EMPIRE—EMIGRATION.

LONDON, Nov. 18, 1869.

THE Queen went into the city in great state the other day with all manner of trumpeters, and horse-guards, and loyal addresses, and enthusiastic crowds, to open officially two newly constructed works—a bridge at Blackfriars and a viaduct across Farringdon Street. I must refer such of your readers as are anxious for the details to the columns of our daily papers and to the Illustrated London News. There they may read to their hearts' content of the noble ceremonies of the day and the touching zeal of the British Alderman. They may also discover that the said public works are really additions to our small stock of architectural beauty—though it is true that certain great granite pillars under the viaduct showed ominous cracks the day after the opening. However, the engineers have demonstrated, according to precedent, that nobody was to blame, and that there is not the slightest danger to the safety of the edifice. Perhaps cracked granite is as good as whole. In other respects the affair went off as such affairs do, that is, with much general congratulation and mutual applause. The Lord Mayor quite touched the hearts of his constituents next day by announcing that he was to be made a Baronet for having been Lord Mayor on so auspicious an occasion; and it is whispered that great efforts were made to bring it off just before the end of his term of office, so that the new Lord Mayor might not have that enviable distinction. A truce to such scandal!

I will only add that another demonstration had been mooted by placards, which would not have been quite so agreeable. It was proposed that the unemployed laborers of the city should rank themselves on either side of the line of procession by way of a mute protest against the existing state of things in general. The poor unemployed were too loyal to insult Her Majesty by the sight of their wretchedness, and kept in their usual hiding-places, or it may be that they had too much dignity even in their rags for so lamentable an exhibition. Be this as it may, they did not appear; and the aldermen could consume their turtle-soup that evening without being forced to reflect on the misery which was only too near. Another demonstration of a similar nature attracted some attention. A petition was drawn up and exposed in public places for signature, the tenor of which is rather remarkable. It sets forth that there is at present a vast amount of distress amongst the poorer classes—a fact which is really notorious. The weekly returns of London pauperism, which had, during most of the present year, been about equal to those of corresponding periods in 1868, have suddenly shown an ominous increase. Fevers, telling of partial starvation and its consequences, have been rife; and the prospect for the ensuing winter is really ominous. Starting from this acknowledged fact, the petitioners proceed to set forth their remedy. They say that there are great quantities of unoccupied land in our colonies; that those colonies were won by the blood and toil of Englishmen, and should be used for the benefit of the country; and they conclude by praying the Queen to adopt measures for an organized system of emigration, with the view of making these lands available for our own distressed poor. Many remarks might be made upon these statements, with which I will not trouble you at length. However, the sentiment to which the petitioners gave utterance was expanded and enforced with remarkable power in a very eloquent article in the Pall Mall Gazette. The general tendency of the article was to express a theory which deserves some consideration. It repudiated with much force the views which Mr. Goldwin Smith advocated in his book on the empire. Hitherto, it said, we have been treating the colonies from a mean and parochial point of view. We lost America by trying to govern too much; we are alienating the colonies by trying to govern too little. Of late we have given them self-government; we have regarded the whole question exclusively from the debtor and creditor point of view; because the colonies could not be made to produce any direct returns in money, we have decided that they could make us no returns at all. We have given way to the prosaic doctrines of the Manchester school, and proved ourselves unworthy descendants of the generation which produced such men as Chatham, Clive, and Hastings, and won for the English race its influence over the world of the future. The petition of these workingmen showed no vague socialist dreams, but a noble aspiration towards a worthier conception of our duties and destinies as a race. If we were content to be nothing more but a small set of commercial adventurers, inhabiting a small island, and content with our insignificance, there was no more to be said. But we should endeavor, if we had still any noble sense of ambition, to rise to imperial views and maintain the unity of our race throughout the world. There could be no worthier object for statesmen than to bring about such a result, and to lay deeply the foundation of a vast empire or confederation of the English-speaking populations. It was admitted that the task was difficult, but it was the duty of statesmen to grapple with difficulties, and not to take the most ignoble line of policy simply because it was the easiest.

I am writing without the article at hand; but such was its general substance; and I think that the sentiment, expressed with remarkable power, meets with a very considerable response. I cannot enter into the argument at large, nor point out objections to the policy thus indicated which will be at least as obvious to you as to me. I will content myself with the remark that the difference between the article and the petition is significant, though not avowed. The writer of the article took the petition for his text, and spoke as though he were simply expanding its meaning. But in reality he took a very different view from that of his clients. He, as the exponent of a large class of educated men, sees before him a grand idea of the possible future of our colonial empire. A "parliament of man, a federation of the world," may be a chimerical prospect, but a union amongst the infant nations now growing up in various quarters of the globe, with England as the central body of the system, is undoubtedly a grand, if perhaps an impossible, conception. In Australia, in Africa, and in America we have descendants, who sometimes boast of being more English than the English themselves, and it is a pleasant dream, if it is nothing more, for a member of the parent stock, that the sentiment may give rise to some political organization able to preserve peace and friendly intercourse through vast regions, and to command the respect of the world. This vision, however, whether sound or baseless, is very different from that which floats before the eyes of the unemployed laborer in London. He knows only that there is a good deal of land, supposed in some sense or another to belong to the Queen, and naturally thinks that it ought to be used for his benefit. Why, he says, when thousands of people in the metropolis are supported by poor-rates or charity, should this vast estate of which they are legal heirs be allowed to run to waste? Give each man who can't get work his share of the property, and our surplus population will find a satisfactory provision. As for any supposed rights of the colonists, or any objections that they might have to being swamped by the pauper labor of England, he treats them with a contempt such as that which George III. would have felt for the American objection to take our tea. Here, then, is the divergence of which I spoke. The statesman sees a prospect of a union between different fragments of the race founded on a mutual regard for each other's rights and a delicate balance of conflicting interests. The unemployed sees simply a chance of getting hold of a certain quantity of property which in his opinion belongs to him and his representatives, and is in danger of appropriation by the colonists. A union of any kind founded on the first conception would be in danger of an awkward misinterpretation when it came to be worked by people who entertained the second theory. And it is unlucky, though not unnatural, that the popular ignorance as to the various interests of colonies dispersed over so wide a surface is profound enough to be favorable to very dangerous misunderstandings. We have got into a chronic difficulty over New Zealand, and a plan to appropriate the waste lands of the Australian colonists might destroy something of the exuberant loyalty which they sometimes display under the present régime.

The possibility of any union or league between the various branches of the empire is so remote that it is enough for the present to indicate the existence of a sentiment which, if rather unpractical, is certainly not ignoble. Our hands are too full at present of many home matters to give it any chance of coming forth now into the sphere of the political controversies of the day. But the uneasiness implied in the desire of the unemployed for the waste lands is of more importance. Many things point, as I have more than once remarked, to the probability of an increasing emigration from England. It is an easy if not a radical cure, and the shortest way of obtaining at least a temporary relief. The long-continued mercantile depression has made itself felt very deeply and seriously. The present winter, so far as we can see, is likely to bring to the surface an amount of distress unparalleled of late years. People are looking round for relief in various directions, and this is only one symptom of the existence of an uneasy feeling. Another is the agitation for a partial reversal or modification of the free-trade policy. I do not indeed believe that that agitation, which is carried on in very half-hearted fashion, is in the least degree likely to produce any practical effects upon our legislation. All that I wish to infer is that there is a great mass of discontent, which will tell in more ways than I can trace upon the politics of the immediate future. The land laws of Ireland must produce some vehement discussions, though our oracles are still dumb as to the nature of the Government policy, and the newspapers which affect to have any knowledge fluctuate strangely in their views. I suspect that, as in the case of the Reform Bill and the Irish Church, nobody tells us what is going to be proposed, simply because nobody knows. But whatever the plan which finds favor, it must give rise to some discussions likely to spread beyond the immediate cause of action, and I have dwelt at some length upon the symptoms, which, as you will easily see, may give them a turn neither expected nor desired by many of the respectable classes.

Correspondence.

MR. JAMES AND THE SWEDENBORGIANS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I do not wish to make your pages the vehicle of a controversy with Mr. James respecting the true interpretations of Swedenborg's teachings, and I therefore content myself with saying that, in my view, he mistakes the purport of those teachings as much as he mistakes the spirit and aims of the Swedenborgian Church organizations. But he makes one or two assertions which I must beg of you permission to formally deny.

It is not true that I, or the Swedenborgian Church organizations, have the pretension to pass off our worship as "a more acceptable homage rendered to God than that rendered by any other sect." The idea is a figment of Mr. James's imagination. Nor do we "boldly disavow all other worship than ours as having any divine sanctity." This also is an unfounded assertion. We simply maintain, as Mr. James maintains, that the religious doctrines which we profess are true, and, consequently, that other doctrines are false to the extent that they differ from ours, but we claim no superior personal sanctity on that account, knowing full well that this would be superlative folly.

Mr. James denounces us to the public as misleading their opinion of Swedenborg, while at the same time he professes to be able to set them right. I would answer him in his own words: "When a light-house can find nothing better to do than to discredit other light-houses, we may be sure that the little light it has is not a light from heaven."

A Swedenborgian.

[We devote further space to this controversy with a good deal of reluctance, and hope that Mr. James, if he feels called on to rejoin, will not introduce new matter.—Ed. Nation.]

PENNSYLVANIA SCHOOL EXPENSES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Permit me to correct a mistake which occurs in your issue of Nov. 25, under the head of "Literary Notes," where, speaking of the Pennsylvania common schools, you say: "The expenses last year were $6,200,268, being upwards of a million dollars more than the year before, and a larger sum, if we mistake not, than has been expended by any State in the Union for free education."

The expenses of the common schools in the State of New York during the same year, as stated in the Annual Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, were as follows:

For Teachers' Wages	$5,597,506 94
For Libraries	26,632 34
For School Apparatus	234,528 09
For Colored Schools	64,807 59
For School-houses, Sites, Furniture, etc.	2,184,064 95
For all other incidental Expenses	933,401 75
Total	$9,040,942 02

In addition to the sums thus reported, there was expended in the support of educational institutions, and for the salaries and expenses of school officers, during the same year, considerably more than $300,000, all of which, with the exception of about $25,000 allowed by boards of supervisors for the expenses of school commissioners, was paid out of the State Treasury. The following is a statement of the additional expenses, all of which are directly chargeable to the support of a school system:

For Expenses of Department of Public Instruction	$15,000 00
" Support of Normal Schools	75,000 00
" Salaries and Expenses of School Commissioners	114,000 00
" Printing for Department	25,000 00
" Support of Teachers' Institutes	18,000 00
" Support of Academies	40,000 00
" Support of "Teachers' Classes" in Academies	18,000 00
" Support of Indian Schools	8,000 00
" Maintenance of Board of Regents	8,000 00
	$321,000,00
Add amount previously reported	9,040,942 02
Grand total	$9,361,942 02

Of the sum thus expended, about half a million was derived from the income of the school and literature funds, about twenty-two hundred thousand from the State tax for the support of schools, while the balance was almost wholly raised by voluntary taxation in the cities and "rural districts." LITERARY.

MESSRS. NICHOLS & NOYES announce for immediate publication "Pater Mundi," which is by the author of "Ecce Cœlum." This work, and the forthcoming "Ecce Femina," by Mr. Carlos White, of Dartmouth College, make not less than seven or eight volumes with titles of the "Ecce" sort, which would seem to be quite enough of them, though Mr. White's is rather happy considering his line of argument. Still, to find a lucky title is something like finding a four-leaved shamrock—so far, that is to say, as one's labor and trouble are concerned. As for the exceptional luck, it seems that one no sooner finds a good title than everybody else with a publisher finds one too. Messrs. Nichols & Noyes will also publish speedily a book called "The Sexes, their Relations Here and Hereafter." It is by the Rev. Mr. James Reed, of Boston, and may be expected to give us the Swedenborgian view of man's relation to woman. But there is more or less curiosity as to these; and some of our New York woman's-rights women are so diligently and successfully preparing the general public for a hearty revulsion from the favorable or rather the interested feeling which it had a few months ago, that both Mr. Reed and Mr. White may expect a good audience and more applause than a while since they could have got.——Mr. W. J. Widdleton announces a new edition, with thirty illustrations, of the poems of Edgar Allan Poe. There is to be a new and perhaps juster life of the poet, who probably has indeed suffered at the hands of his biographers; though probably, too—not to be too hard on Doctor Rufus Wilmot Griswold—the poet has himself largely to thank for his sufferings. We recommend the new biographer—or would if we had not an impression that he is in England, where, we believe, the book is to be first printed—to read the December Putnam's, and extract Mr. Putnam's report of how the Doctor encountered Thackeray one day, and how "the great Thacker," as the Irish gentleman called him, "sat down on him," as they say in the West, in not the greatest manner, to be sure, but still in a manner not without edification to those who recollect our American critic and his works and ways.

—We have received the prospectus of the Index, the forthcoming organ of the Free Religionists, of which we spoke last week, and now are able to speak of its character more definitely than we could then. Every phase of earnest thought, says the editor, will have a fair chance to be heard. No article will be rejected on the ground that it teaches theism, nor any on the ground that it teaches atheism; transcendentalism and positivism shall have equal rights of speech accorded them; spiritualism and materialism, "free religion" and Christianity, all are to meet on equal terms. Nothing more will be asked of a writer than that his article be in the new journal's general field of thought, and that it possess ability, and be fair, courteous, and of good moral tone—the editor being solely responsible for the application of these tests. What the paper's general field is to be, our readers may more distinctly see by looking at the titles and a list of seven essays which will appear in the seven opening numbers: first comes "The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion;" next, "What is Christianity?" next, "What is Free Religion?" next, "Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as corner-stones"—and not contrasted to the disadvantage of Free Religion, we may surmise; fifth is "Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to institutions, terms of fellowship, social ideal, moral ideal, and essential spirit;" sixth is "The Practical Work of Free Religion;" and last is, "Unitarianism versus Freedom." These are all lectures written by the editor, Mr. F. E. Abbot, who promises in addition "short and shotted" articles by able co-operators of his—Mr. O. B. Frothingham for one, and Mr. W. J. Potter for another, who both will fill regularly a certain space. And whether its articles are original or selected, short or long, they will be "uncompromising, fearless, radical," putting faith in ideas and working for them openly and regardless of consequences, for "its only policy will be strong thought and plain speech." Yet it will not "seek to shock the religious nerve," but though "standing squarely outside of Christianity, it will aim to be just to it, recognizing its excellences, noting its defects." What, in Mr. Abbot's opinion, these latter may be, the reader unacquainted with his writings may partly gather from what he goes on to say next: The Index "will pay no deference to the authority of the Bible, the Church, or the Christ, but rest solely on the authority of right, reason, and good conscience." It will trust no revelation but that of universal human faculties. It will accept every certified result of science, philosophy, and historical criticism, asking no question what it proves. Thus one more new crusade opens, and there is a brave sound of "trumpets blown for wars," and we seem to hear great neighing of steeds and the noise of armorers hammering at armor over in the direction of the Catholic World. But the Index is more agile than that warrior, and appears every week instead of every month, thus having a clear advantage. Two dollars a year is the price of the Index, and it sets out with a capital in hand sufficient to run it for one year certainly.

—The prospectus of Old and New, also, we have received since our last week's mention of it; but there is perhaps not much to add to what was then said. It is apparently going to be less distinctively Unitarian than we had supposed. "Its aim," the conductors say, "is to improve the social and religious life of the American people by freely bringing forward subjects of the highest social and religious importance;" and it will have the further aim of giving to the public stories, literary essays, and criticisms by the best writers in these departments; sketches of travel and articles in physical science "by men and women who know what is known;" and, finally, a Record of Progress. In this last department, "without much attention to the merely transient squalls or tea-pot tempests," Old and New will attempt to show what progress the world is really making in educational matters, in social reform, in its scientific and religious associations, and in its administration of public offices. All these topics are to be discussed under the inspiration of the Christian religion as interpreted by "a broad and liberal theology;" for Old and New is going to recognize the truth, which nowadays everywhere compels assent, "that while the religion taught by Jesus Christ is as old as the throne of God, Theology, which is the human expression of man's knowledge of God, requires new statements with every day." This, on the whole, seems like a programme calculated to please, and there are names in the list of contributors—volumina fallacia—which make promise that the programme shall be well carried out. Dr. Walker, for instance, will have an article in the first number; so will Mr. Emerson; so will Mr. "Frederic Ingham;" and Mr. Sidney Andrews, who has recently come home judiciously well pleased with the Californians, will say something about the Pacific coast, and he is a trained observer and an honest reporter, and therefore worth hearing. Professor J. P. Cooke is down among the contributors to future numbers of Old and New, and with him are Professor Joseph Lovering, Dr. O. W. Holmes, Mr. Lowell, Professor C. C. Everett, Professor J. P. Lesley, Professor Nathan Hale, Mr. George P. Marsh, Mr. C. F. Adams, Rev. Mr. C. E. Stowe, Rev. Dr. J. F. Clarke, Mrs. H. B. Stowe, Mrs. J. W. Howe, Dr. Bellows, Rev. Mr. Robert Collyer, Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, one of the pleasantest of writers for the young, and Mr. Horace Scudder, who also has a pretty gift that way. Four dollars a year is to be the price of the new periodical, and it will be published simultaneously in Boston and New York by Messrs. H. O. Houghton & Co. in the former city, and by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton here.

—Some malicious Philadelphian, taking his cue, perhaps, from the World's jester—who lately described Boston as 95,000,000 miles distant from the sun, revolving on its axis once in every twenty-four hours, etc.—has issued a representation of half the globe, including all the civilized portions, on which Boston appears as "the geographical as well as intellectual and moral centre." The idea, however, seems to us a good deal better than the execution, which is not nearly so funny as the World's simple statistical paragraph. Measured by private libraries, we presume Boston could not now pretend to be the intellectual centre of the United States, even as competing with Philadelphia alone. Perhaps its Public Library does not approach in the richness of one, at least, of its collections the musical library of Mr. Joseph Drexel, of Philadelphia, of which a catalogue has just been printed, containing fifteen hundred numbers, which represent almost twice as many volumes. This is said to be surpassed only by the British Museum and the Leipzig libraries. In Philadelphia itself, we remark that "centres" are changing—the Academy of Natural Sciences, the Historical Society, and the Academy of Fine Arts all moving westward. To be strictly accurate, we should say that the last is intending to move whenever it can sell out to advantage, and has fixed upon Broad Street for its future location, where it will keep company with the Academy of Music, the Union League Club-House, the Masonic Temple, and some fifty churches, actual or prospective. One institution resists removal, though we trust it admits of progress, and that is Girard College. One rarely hears of an alumnus of this remarkable foundation, but graduates go out from it year by year, and some of these went into the army during the rebellion, and offered up their lives for their country. Recently the statue of a soldier (by Bailly) was erected in memory of them by their Alma Mater, and the making of a speech on that occasion by Mr. Kane O'Donnell, the poet and journalist, reminds us that he was one of Stephen Girard's beneficiaries.

—The living writers of English history are in a position in the like of which, perhaps, no band of eminent literary men ever found themselves before. Each must have the author's partiality for his work, and must feel something of pain if it seems threatened by the danger of sudden obsoleteness and oblivion, or if there seems likelihood that the child of his mental labor, which was to outlive him and keep his name alive, is destined to go down to the dust before its parent. And yet, on the other hand, every student of history, remembering his labors of research and of thought—remembering how difficult it was to find grounds for judgment, and how difficult, when they were found, it often was to settle upon a conclusion—must rejoice that new materials are coming to light in almost boundless profusion, that many errors are on the point of banishment, that many old doubts are soon to vanish, and that, in general, certainty and light are in a thousand places to be substituted for uncertainty and half-light and total darkness. We mentioned last spring the formation of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, and expressed a hope and belief that it would be successful, and, further, a hope that it would be able to extend its investigations over countries dependent upon England or susceptible to her influence—as India, for example, with her various literatures of the past, and Turkey, with her provinces rich in monasteries, and possibly in manuscripts. The Commission's work in England has been astonishingly successful. More than thirty ecclesiastical and lay corporations, and more than seventy noblemen and gentlemen, have placed their treasures at the disposal of the Government; and it is now proposed that the course which has had such results in England shall be pursued in Scotland and Ireland also. One family alone is said to have sent in from their muniment-room five thousand private letters, written by important personages of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Another has contributed one hundred letters from Prior the poet, and two hundred from Stepney, Prior's friend. The present possessor of it sends in a collection made by Sir William Dugdale, and not disturbed since that famous antiquarian's death. It is said to contain many manuscripts as old as the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries—among them being charters of Anglo-Saxon and of Norman kings, and of Matilda, the empress. Then there is a record in Lord Halifax's handwriting of many of his conversations with William the Third—a sort of record that we may suppose the chief of Trimmers peculiarly fit to keep, and which is doubtless interesting. The owner of this autograph did not know he owned it till the commissioners set him hunting. Among the vast number of other things, there are two hundred and twenty letters by Charles the First never before published—letters throwing light on the history of Perkin Warbeck, the "Flemish Cheat," as they used to call him, who has long been one of the mysteries of English history; letters from Henry the first Tudor, from Elizabeth of York, from Cardinal Wolsey, Catharine of Aragon, and Henry the Eighth; later letters giving fuller particulars of the Gunpowder Plot, and still later letters confirming the account of Charles the Second's having made a good Catholic end. This mass of matter, and the masses more that will be added to it, will all, of course, bear much sifting, and will get it; but we may probably look to see a recasting of more than one character in English history, and a different color given to many acts and occurrences. At all events, we may confidently expect that history will for the next generation take a more prominent place in English literature than it has in the immediate past.

—It is well enough known that when anybody wants a book of reference—a gazetteer, a dictionary of words, or of biography, or of history, or of anything else—and can get a German or a French one, he does not care for an English or an American one. But this reproach is now partly taken away. There has just appeared in England a dictionary—or half of one—which is said to be as good as any dictionary needs to be—a dictionary without a superior. It represents the life-long labor of one remarkable man and years of the labors of very many more men. Mr. Richard Cleasby, of London, was the son of a Russia merchant, and was born we do not know exactly when, but not far, on the one side or the other, from 1800. He was educated at Cambridge, and while still there discovered a strong bent towards the study of the Teutonic languages. After leaving college he travelled much in Germany, everywhere making close philological observations and recording them copiously in his diaries. These observations on the spot were afterwards of great service to him, and Jacob Grimm said of him that he knew more about the different forms of the German tongue than any one German. What others got from books or from hearsay, he, being rich and able to go where he liked, got from the mouths of the men and women themselves who spoke the various dialects. Scandinavian literature, too, he was familiar with, and Anglo-Saxon. But Mr. Cleasby was not a learned man only, but also a wise one, and having made himself familiar with Teutonic philology in general, he began to consider what particular field in it he should choose for the most thorough cultivation; for he was a believer in Goethe's maxim that if a young man would do anything great he must limit himself. He settled on the Scandinavian field. At once he began work, spending most of his time in the North, but making occasional visits to England and to Germany, to all of whose philological scholars he was known. It was not long before he determined that the production of an Icelandic-English dictionary should be his task, for thus he thought he could best serve both Scandinavian and English philology. He spared no money or pains; he made constant journeys; he hired a great number of amanuenses and co-laborers; he put himself in close communication and intercourse with the scholars of Copenhagen, and in every way addressed himself strenuously to the labor of making a dictionary which should be worthy of a place beside any such work in any language. A main feature of it was to be that it should give not only the birth and origin of each Icelandic word, but also its history as it has come down the centuries, having now one shade of meaning and now another. That this might be done, the book was to be exceedingly rich in quotations; many passages were to be cited and each word was to tell its own story. The work went on; specimens were printed which every one warmly approved; the collection of material was well-nigh over, and the method of arrangement had shown itself clearly to Mr. Cleasby's mind, who saw himself near the successful close of a long labor—a labor in which we may see a monument of moral not less than of mental strength. Just at this moment he died suddenly: a typhoid fever carried him off in the autumn of 1847. His heirs, however, showed themselves true heirs of the man as well as of his fortune, and it was soon decided that the dictionary should still be printed. Scholars in Copenhagen were employed to finish it, and in 1854 the MS., nominally complete, arrived in England. Mr. George W. Dasent, the very well-known and distinguished Scandinavian scholar, undertook to see it through the press; but soon he found that as yet it was not a dictionary, but only the making of one, and that much more work must be given to it. As years went on, he saw that he himself would never be able to bring it out, and with the permission of the Delegates of the Oxford Press, Mr. Gudbrand Vigfússon was brought over as editor. This able scholar—aided as they could by Mr. Dasent and Dr. Liddell—has not only edited with success Mr. Cleasby's work, but has added one-half to its bulk and greatly to its value from the stores of his own scholarship. The first part, from A to H, is now published, and bears the title of an "Icelandic-English Dictionary, Chiefly Founded on the Collections made from Prose Works of the 12th–14th Centuries." It is said to be excellently well printed, and it is of course costly—so much money and time having, first and last, been expended upon it, not only by the Cleasby family and afterwards Mr. Dasent, but by the conductors of the Clarendon Press. There is now, we may say, an opportunity for a good number of our wealthy men to make their respective colleges a gift so complete and so admirable that there are few which could be given or received with more entire and equal satisfaction to both the giver and the receiver.

—Sir Edward Creasy, in his "History of England," attributes the modern institution of nobility to the custom which grew up under the Roman Empire of giving the title of comes to certain leading courtiers of the emperor. In this view there is, no doubt, a large share of truth; but the author is not quite accurate in the account he gives of the origin of this imperial institution. The great historian, Mommsen, has discussed the question of the Comites Augusti in his usual exhaustive manner, in a late number of the Hermes. According to him, the institution originated during the Republic, with those magistrates who served "out of Rome; or, rather, out of Italy. The purely metropolitan officials never had comites, and never could have them; for comes is the travelling-companion, and, therefore, belongs to the official only in so far as he travels." Further, "as the imperial office itself was developed out of the pro-consulate, the imperial comites were developed out of the pro-consular. So long as the emperors remain in Italy, they have not such companions, and can have none such, because they are essentially travelling-companions of the rei-publicæ causa absens." It is not until the time of Constantine that we find comites with established rank—first, second, and third order, and with no relation to any journey. The immediate occasion for this "essentially new creation" may have been, he suggests, the circumstance "that the Empire under Diocletian, and, in a certain sense, under Constantine also, was without a fixed capital (Residenz), and the emperor of this period, as being constantly upon journeys, might also have standing travelling-companions."

—Pseudonyms and anonyms are attracting much attention of late. In old times the bibliographer contented himself with the bulky and ill-arranged Placcius, continued by Mylius. Now he turns for instant aid to the convenient, but, alas! not over-reliable, "Index Pseudonymorum" of Weller. For a long time Barbier was the only authority in this branch of French literature. Barbier is by no means superseded, but De Manne's continuation and supplement has already gone into a third edition; that D'Heilly's "Dictionnaire" is not useless is indicated by the publication of a second edition; and the great "Supercheries Littéraires Dévoilées" of Quérard, long scarce, is, as we mention below, in course of republication. In Italian, the work imperfectly performed by Lancetti has been executed by Melzi in the most thorough and satisfactory manner, and probably his successor need do little but add the books that have appeared since 1859, when the last volume of his "Dizionario" was published. The Germans have had no work of late specially devoted to this subject; but Weller's "Index," used in conjunction with Kayser's "Bücher-Lexicon," enables one to get the most needful information. One would think that all shame-faced Belgian men of letters must have been dragged to the light by M. Delecourt in his long "Essai," begun in the "Bibliophile Belge," and, after the death of that periodical, ended as a separate publication. The Russians who have written anonymously in the French language, and the Frenchmen who have written anonymously about Russia, have been called to account by S. Poltoratzky in the same periodical. We know of two Englishmen and two Americans who have undertaken to supply the deficiency in this branch of bibliography which has long been a reproach to our literature. The Americans, we fancy, have abandoned the task; one of the Englishmen, Ralph Thomas, has already published a convenient work on the English pseudonyms of the present century; the other, Mr. Halkett, has labored on a book of more extensive plan for fifteen years, but we may have to wait long before it appears. To tear aside the veil under which modesty, malice, or pretence hides itself requires knowledge, sagacity, and, above all, patience for long hunts through books of all sorts, and persistent questioning of publishers and men of letters. By patience, perhaps, almost all the secrets that are worth knowing may be learned; even Junius, who has given a century's sport to a whole pack of essayists, is thought to be unearthed at last by an expert in handwriting. In no other literatures than those we have mentioned has anything been done hitherto of any account; but E. Collins's "Anonymer og Pseudonymer i den Danske, Norske og Islandske Literatur" (Copenhagen, 1869, 8vo, pp. 216) promises to supply the want in regard to Scandinavian books. The chief gaps which still remain are in the Dutch, Spanish, and West-Slavic literatures, and these will perhaps be filled if the interest in the subject continues and spreads.

—Of many French bibliographical dictionaries, the names of which suggest themselves as illustrative of the remark above made, we need only mention two—Brunet's "Manuel du Libraire" and Quérard's "La France Littéraire"—and of both these writers there is now something interesting and new to be said. The first work we have mentioned has a modest bibliographical title, it is true; but many are the scholars who have been glad to profit by its treasury of knowledge. The second will tell you at a glance all you could reasonably expect to find consigned to print concerning any and every known French author, however obscure. Quérard was eminent in his walk of literature. He devoted a lifetime to his labor of predilection, and produced a book worthy of himself and his country. In assigning works to authors and authors to works, one difficulty naturally beset him, and increased as he approached the present literary period. He found works that did not belong to the names announced as their authors; others that were not written by those who claimed them; others ascribed to those who had not written them; others, again, published anonymously or under pseudonyms. This naturally suggested a special classification, which, once commenced, soon grew into material for a separate work, which he published under the title of "Les Supercheries Littéraires Dévoilées." It contained 9,430 articles—expositions of as many literary frauds and plagiarisms. An alarming number, one might say. And yet it was from this point that the work really began to grow in size and importance. Fifteen more years of labor, and Quérard was ready to commence a second edition, containing 50,000 articles. But one number was issued, when he died, and the work was suspended. Fortunately, M. Gustave Brunet came into possession of the deceased Quérard's papers, and will complete the work, to which will be added "Le Dictionnaire des Ouvrages Anonymes," by Barbier. The first volume—letters A to E—is just published, and of its 1,278 pages 153 are devoted to Alexandre Dumas. Exhibit is made of the paternity of the works bearing his name; also, the nonchalant ease with which he helped himself to what best suited him. Long citations are given, in parallel columns, from authors ancient and modern, and from Alexandre, in which the resemblance amounts to identity. The article closes with the reflection that, if ever Dumas reaches the right to a seat in the Institute, the classical arm-chair will not suffice, for he would require a bench even longer than that formerly claimed for Scribe, renowned for his dramatic pillage.

A LONDON APPRENTICE IN MARYLAND.*

Of the history of Mr. George Alsop, author of the "Character of the Province of Maryland," nothing is certainly known except what may be gathered from that amusing tractate itself. He was about twenty years old when, "consin'd by Fate within the narrow walks of a four years Servitude," he took his departure from London for the Lord Baltimore's plantations. He himself would seem to be willing we should understand that he was self-exiled, and that the cause of his leaving home was the loyal disgust that overcame him when he reflected how his revered sovereign had been treated by Cromwell and his "base Mechanicks"—by "A Drayman that knows nought but Yeast." But he discovers so good a knowledge of various evil practices carried on in "Lewknor's Lane" and "Mother Coney's," and other dubious resorts in London, and his overpowering disgust at the usurper came upon him so suspiciously late—for Cromwell died in 1658, just as our young monarchist was going aboard ship—that we may forgive ourselves for suspecting that the gentleman left the realm at the instance of some Puritan magistrate who had views of his own as to the proper method of dealing with roystering apprentices. "A handicraft apprentice" he speaks of himself as having been, or we should have been inclined to think plausible our conjecture that he had been bound to an apothecary, he has such a wealth, and so constantly uses it, of most unsavory comparisons drawn from the art of the pottinger; and they are comparisons which show minute knowledge, and run on all fours so well, that one would suppose that Alsop must have handled the pestle and been familiar with the dispensatory and its recipes. This may easily be, for his handicraft apprenticeship lasted but two years, he says, so he had time for both, and was not of a disposition to be called stable. r he may have spent a great part of his youth in school. Evidently he had been measurably educated, and no small conceit he seems to have of his acquirements and capabilities. To his prose—which is mostly in the Ercles vein, and finely bombastic, as if he had served with Pistol and admired that hero—he is always appending copies of verses, which, however, are as bare and bald as the poetry of the man of prose bombast is apt to be. But these effusions he dashes off in a few moments. "They were delivered me in the company of some Gentlemen"—he says on one occasion, speaking of two caps—"that ingaged me to write a few lines upon the purple one, and as they were friends I could not deny them; and here I present them to you as they were written." And again he says, "What you'le find will be Ex tempore, without the use of premeditation." We spare the reader Master Alsop's verses; but for his prose here is a specimen. His business being to tell what were the staple products of Maryland, he produces an exordium of half the length of his chapter upon "Trafique" in general, of which what here follows is a part:

"If trade should once cease, the Custom-house would soon miss her hundreds and thousands hogs-heads of tobacco that use to be throng in her every year, as well as the grocers would in their warehouses and boxes, the gentry and commonalty in their pipes, the physician in his drugs and medicinal compositions; the (leering) waiters for want of imployment, might (like so many Diogenes) intomb themselves in their empty casks, and rouling themselves off the key into the Thames, there wander up and down from tide to tide in contemplation of Aristotles unresolved curiosity, until the rottenness of their circular habitation give them a quietus est, and fairly surrender them up into the custody of those who, both for profession, disposition, and nature, lay as near claim to them as if they both tumbled in one belly, and for name they jump alike, being, according to the original translation, both Sharkes."

* "A Character of the Province of Maryland; described in four distinct parts. Also a small Treatise on the Wild and Naked Indians (or Susquehanokes) of Maryland—their Customs, Manners, Absurdities, and Religion. Together with a Collection of Historical Letters. By George Alsop. A new edition, with an Introduction and copious Historical Notes. By John Gilmary Shea, LL.D." New York: William Gowans. 1869.

He can, however, be direct enough when he chooses, and there is a queer alternation of an exaggerated, Owen Feltham sort of rhetoric with the plainest possible way of calling a spade a spade. Once in a while, be it said, he puts us under obligations for a new word, which, in its swelling way, is not so bad. Thus, he contemns and abhors "a common and folding-handed beggar;" and of the wild ducks in the Chesapeake he says that they come "in millionous multitudes." It may be taken, perhaps, as a proof of his having partly or wholly undergone a liberal education that he is enabled to follow the fashion of the day, and prefixes to his book some complimentary verses, by a certain "friend"—an "H. W., Master of Arts"—who dates his production "from My Study," which we fear is euphemistic. It is known that in those days there were Masters of Arts who customarily bestowed themselves in taverns not too reputable, to say nothing of worse places. And, whoever "H. W." may have been—and all trace of him is lost—and wherever was "My Study," certain it is that he had not greatly profited by his residence at the university, if we may judge by the favor of his muse.

Apothecary's apprentice or not, Alsop is, beyond a doubt, a highly entertaining rascal; he is manifestly a braggadocio or ruffler, but not destitute of parts, and any reader, however little antiquarian in his tastes, will enjoy the "Character," "wherein is Described, in Four Distinct Parts, the Scituation and plenty of the Province; the Laws, Customs, and Natural Demeanor of the Inhabitants; the Worst and Best Vsage of a Mary-Land Servant, opened in view; and the Traffique and Vendable Commodities of the Countrey. Also a Small Treatise on the Wilde and Naked Indians (or Susquehanokes) of Mary-Land, their Customs, Manners, Absurdities, and Religion."

The narration was written for Lord Baltimore and the rest of the company of Maryland adventurers; and, not improbably, it may have been done on some hint from them. It is, at all events, boldly dedicated to them. They had latterly not been finding it so easy to get Englishmen to emigrate, and would have followed the usual practice in hiring somebody ready with the pen to "write up" their enterprise for the press. This was not a task which our literary apprentice would not gladly take in hand, and, going to work with a will, he produced what seems to have been a true enough account of the state of things in the colony, and one well calculated—if we except the terrific description of how the heathenish Susquehanokes disposed of their prisoners—to advance the interests of the company. He begins by declaring, in round terms, that he who out of curiosity desires to see "the Landskip of the Creation drawn to the life, or to read Nature's universal Herbal without book, may, with the Opticks of a discreet discerning, view Mary-Land, drest in her green and fragrant Mantle of the Spring." Neither does he think that there is any place under the Heavenly altitude, or that has any footing or room upon the circular globe of this world, that can parallel the fertile and pleasant ground of his whilom residence in its multiplicity, or rather, he would say, in Nature's extravagancy of a superabounding plenty. "For so much doth this country increase in a swelling Spring-tide of rich variety and diversities of all things, not only common provisions that supply the reaching stomach of man with a satisfactory plenty," but also in uncommon vegetable growths, that "those parts of the Creation that have borne the Bell away (for many ages) for a vegetable plentiousness, must now in silence strike and vayle all, and whisper softly in the auditual parts of Mary-Land, that none but she in this dwells singular." And in respect of the animal kingdom within her borders, Maryland is eminently blessed. As for hogs, they disfrequent the houses, indeed; but they may easily be slain, and in number they are so great that upon necessity one must judge the Province to be nothing more nor less than the Gadarean territories; and if Satan were minded to enter into a drove of swine every day and urge them into the sea, his victims would hardly be missed out of Maryland. Sheep are not many; but then few persons desire them. Deer are innumerable, and there are, besides, the Elke, the Cat of the Mountain, the Beaver, the Possum, the Squirrel, the Hare, the Otter, the Monack (woodchuck), the Musk Rat, and many more, mostly good for food, "yet of no value nor esteem here," there being so much other food. Ferocious wild animals are not worth minding; they "do but little hurt or injury worth noting, and that which they do is of so degenerate and low a nature (as in reference to the fierceness and heroick vigour that dwell in the same kind of beasts in other countries)," that no one cares for them; "the highest of their designs and circumventing reaches is but cowardly and base."

In the matter of government, Maryland is simply "The Miracle of the Age." The sects are orderly and not mutinous, like Fifth Monarchy Men, nor are there ever seen there "any of those dancing Adamitical Sisters" that deserve whipping for their deportment. There is there no "Aquafortial eating" of heavy taxes; the Provincial House of Burgesses wastes no time in gilded orations, but is business-like and honest; the lawyer there "may button up his chops" if he thinks his bawling is going to support him, for equity reigns; there the constable needs no train of halberdiers; there "a man may walk in the open woods as secure from being externally dissected as in his own house or dwelling;" there the son works in the field with the bound servant; there the daughters are sensible and modest, and they have a plain wit, "so that he that intends to court a Mary-Land Girle must have something more than the Tautologies of a long-winded speech to carry on his design, or else he may (for ought I know) fall under the contempt of her frown, and his own windy oration"—Master Alsop, lightly as he turns it off, having evidently had some experiences he would fain forget. The man in servitude in Maryland is a happy being, with very good prospects. He has an ancient customary privilege to repose himself within the house three hours every day of the hottest months, and he never works on Saturday afternoons; in the winter, unless his ingenuity prompts him to hunt the deer, recreate himself by slaughtering the swans, geese, or turkeys, he has nothing to do but sit by the fire; at the end of his time his master gives him a farm, and is obliged by law to assist him. So then those persons who are perpetually saying that farm servants in Maryland are sold in open markets, and draw in carts, like horses, tell a lie "lymbeckt from their sottish and preposterous brains;" and a lie such in its enormity that "if they should search to the very Center of Hell, and enquire for a lye of the most ancient and damned stamp," Mr. Alsop confidently thinks none to equal the one above-mentioned could be found.

With artificers the case is still better than with laborers on the farms, light and gentlemanly as their occupation is; and women are especially valued, for no sooner do they reach the shore than they are at once courted into matrimony—"the best luck here," in short, "as in any place of the world besides." Men, our author here remarks, coming back to his sore subject again, have not altogether so good fortune in this kind, without—mark you—"without they be good rhetoricians." So he goes on with his persuasive tongue, telling not a few lies both of the modern and ancient stamp, no doubt, and doing them so well, considering his dislike of them, that the adventurers more than once printed his book as a means of roping in servants. We have not space to give any of his description of the Indians, which is all interesting. In that part of the book he seems, in his desire to cut a figure as one that had seen these "only hieroglyphicks and representations of the Furies," to have lost sight of business, and his traveller's tales—true enough, too, probably, bating his making the male Susquehanoke seven feet high—must have scared many a cockney more than the sea-voyage or the apprenticeship to the tobacco planter.

Dr. J. G. Shea, of the New York Historical Society, has edited this rare old book for Mr. Gowans, and his notes are a valuable addition to the text. There is in particular one very good historical note—that which makes a résumé of the history of the Indian tribes of which the Susquehanokes were one; and he gives also some detailed information in regard to them, and the more numerous but less brave and able Algonquin tribes which surrounded them.

THE MAN WHO LAUGHS.*

From the falling off which his two subsequent novels show, Victor Hugo no doubt reached his high-water mark in "Les Misérables," which, after all deductions have been made, is a remarkable and, perhaps, a great work. It certainly goes deep and has made an impression on many classes of readers that will not soon be effaced—not pre-eminently as a novel, though it has many excellences in this respect, but on account of its vast energy, its lyrical fire, its splendid descriptive passages, and a sort of epic swing and intensity throughout. But neither of "The Man who Laughs" nor of its immediate predecessor, "The Toilers of the Sea," can as much be said. They both have, indeed, something of the sort of lurid moral grandeur that characterized "Les Misérables," but they possess far less interest as stories, and show a hardening and intensifying of those peculiarities of Victor Hugo's mind and manner that make the reading of his novels, even the best of them, to some persons a kind of literary torture. His stiff and stilted dialogues; the jerky, abrupt, galvanic movements of his characters, his morbid craving for the monstrous; his epileptic tendency; his violation of dramatic law; his want of humor; his contortions when his invention fails him, and a certain incongruity that is like false time in music—these faults and deficiencies, prominent enough in all of his works, are at times painfully so in "The Man who Laughs."

* "The Man who Laughs. By Victor Hugo." New York: D. Appleton & Co.

Most American readers, we imagine, will feel the want of humor more than anything else, because in English literature humor has a functional importance like the juices and lubricating liquids in the animal organism, and because, also, in this work Hugo essays its introduction in no small measure. This want is noticeable in the author's inability to enter into or to understand certain facts and conditions of life, or certain occurrences, like the prize-fight which he describes, but it is conspicuous in the manner in which he perpetually confounds the grotesque with the hideous. The former it is impossible for him to portray. He invariably pushes it so far that it becomes the monstrous, the abnormal, and excites our disgust rather than our laughter. His hero, Gwynplaine, he would have us believe, was the most comic, mirth-provoking object the sun ever shone upon, and yet he repeatedly describes him as a gnome, a hydra, a full-blown monster. Gwynplaine was a person of noble blood, whose identity had been destroyed in youth by a species of vivisection performed upon his face, which was made to wear a broad, petrified grin. Women were horrified and could not endure a second look, and it would have been better for their unborn children had they not looked at all. But this ghastly, mutilated creature is Victor Hugo's symbol of the droll, the grotesque. He describes him as being followed through the world by the most violent and uproarious laughter. People laugh till they nearly go into convulsions. Funeral cortéges are disturbed and the mourners are obliged to turn away their heads to avoid what would be an indecent exhibition of mirth. The wretch who was the author of this mutilation, under the torture and with the death-rattle in his throat, laughs when he beholds him, and dies. So irresistible is his grin and such medicine for hypochondriacs, that he adopts the exhibition of it as a profession, and goes about the country in company with his foster-father, Ursus, and a blind girl, Dea, making a show of it for the amusement of the crowd. They travel and live in a kind of rolling-hut—a Diogenes-tub on wheels—which Ursus and his wolf, Homo, draw. In time this hut gives place to the green-box, which probably resembles one of our peripatetic daguerrean establishments, is drawn by horses, and has a stage arranged, upon which the company, including the wolf, play some rude pieces, Gwynplaine's "piquant" visage being, of course, the chief attraction. Their great piece, which night after night fills the court-yard of the Tadcaster Inn with a panting, laughter-convulsed crowd, is called "Chaos Conquered." It is a sort of drama of creation, ending in a farce, and shows again how the author fails to discriminate the true genesis of mirth. That a crowd full of motherwit and unerring animal instincts, as all crowds of the common people are, should laugh at or tolerate such a preposterous farce, such a falsetto farce, is too much to believe. Starting with the true enough principle that laughter is born of the unexpected, the incongruous, the author caps the climax of a scene that is meant to be in the highest degree solemn and impressive, and to fill the spectator with a feeling of mysterious apprehension as when in the presence of the supernatural, with the hideous visage of Gwynplaine brought into bold and sudden relief by a jet of light falling upon it. The shock, the revulsion of feeling which must follow such a bucket of cold water, begets, according to M. Hugo, a very tornado of mirth. The populace yells, pants, surges, and is fairly beside itself with mirth. It may be but a step or half a step from the sublime to the ridiculous, yet everything depends upon which side that step is taken. On certain sides the two spheres are worlds apart, and whoso essays the step here fails outright, as does Hugo in the present case. In other words, there are certain feelings that never alternate with each other. For instance, we are never accessible to laughter when under the influence of fear, or when filled with awe, or when experiencing the emotion of the sublime. From the pathetic the step is easily taken, almost as from the same levels, but when taken from other heights the feelings have first to be let down. In fact, if an angel were to appear before us with a clown or a gnome peeping over his shoulder, the incongruity would not be more painful or further from the comic than it is in this piece, which, according to M. Hugo, so convulsed the London crowds two hundred and fifty years ago.

The only instance in which we sympathize with the laughers in this curious book is, we suspect, just when the author would not have us sympathize with them, namely, when Gwynplaine makes his speech in the House of Lords. There is something so irresistibly grotesque and incongruous in the spectacle of this tragical buffoon, this grinning Medusa, suddenly disclosing himself in the midst of that body and proceeding to harangue them on the rights of the people, in the wildest and most furious manner, that no wonder every feeling of restraint and decorum gave way, and the old peers and young peers, the bishops and the chancellor, nearly laughed themselves out of their wigs and gowns. Our moral convictions of the merits of the situation are undoubtedly with Gwynplaine, yet nothing is more common than for the laugh to be against the aggrieved party.

Neither do we think Victor Hugo any more successful in portraying the passion of love in this work than in depicting the emotion of mirth. Few readers, we fear, will be touched by the spectacle of the billing and cooing of Gwynplaine and Dea. The conception, as it lay in the author's mind, of this frail, sightless girl loving this noble but fate-smitten being is no doubt very praiseworthy. We sympathize thoroughly with the purpose and aspiration of the artist in contrasting the two figures, and in granting to Gwynplaine the one ray of heaven's sunlight in his sepulchral life—the satisfaction of being loved by a woman, and a woman to whom his hideous deformity could have no existence—as, indeed, we may say we sympathize with the theoretical artist throughout the book; but from the working out of the passion we get no pleasure. It is indeed even nauseating. He gives the endearing expressions of the lovers, divested of all those little graces, those arch and playful moods, those cunning indirections, those soft tones and ways, etc., which mark the talk of lovers, and the result is a mere bandying of epithets. Here is a specimen:

— My life!
— My heaven!
— My love!
— All my happiness!
— Gwynplaine!
— Dea, I am intoxicated. Let me kiss your feet!

Indeed, the action of the story throughout is preternaturally formal and stiff. The last scene on board the Matutina is meant to be overwhelmingly impressive—the dramatic at white-heat; but it is so lacking in the vital elements of the dramatic, namely, naturalness and plasticity, that it is simply absurd, and freezes instead of melts us. As the wreck begins to settle, and there is no longer any hope, the motley, ragamuffin band kneel about their leader, with their knees in the water, and repeat after him, line by line, each in his or her own language, the Lord's Prayer. Every moment they are settling into the deep. The water reaches their shoulders; there is only a circle of heads with upturned faces serenely jabbering as the prompter proceeds. In a moment more there is no response—at least, it does not reach the ears of the doctor, for the vocal organs of the suppliants are an inch or two under the water; yet no doubt they went through with the motions, and no doubt, also, their skeletons are kneeling to this day on the motionless hulk of the ill-fated bark.

The scene is a copy, with only slight variations, of one to which our author treated his readers in "The Toilers." The hero of that tale meets a similar fate in the same cast-iron manner. Finding himself supplanted in the affections of the lady whose hand was the promised reward of his long and desperate struggle in rescuing the engine and machinery of the wrecked steamer, he proceeds to arrange the marriage and flight of the inconstant maiden with his rival, and then seeks out a well-known niche in the rocks by the sea-shore, which is left bare at ebb tide, and is a pleasant seat, but which gives swift death to a person caught there on the flood. Here he seats himself, and gazes at the vessel that bears the newly-married couple away. As the ship passes opposite and within a few rods of him, the waves are lapping his feet; presently they mount to his knees, then creep up his body, then encompass his neck. Still he gazes at the receding vessel, and still he sits unmoved. The agony is prolonged; the water rises to chin, it blots out his mouth, it reaches his eyes, and, as these are closing for the last time, he catches a glimpse of the vessel—a mere speck on the horizon—and, as the sail finally drops out of sight, a spectator would have seen only a hat floating about where the lover's head had disappeared. This, like the scene on board the Matutina, is perfect; the machinery works to a charm; there is not a hitch anywhere; but that it is dramatic or impressive, or anything but preposterous melodrama, is what nobody thinks but M. Hugo.

The only character in the book that has any degree of reality, or is at all dramatically shown us, is Ursus—a gusty, crusty old quacksalver and native philosopher, full of wit, necromantic lore, and practical benevolence, who simulates the bear while really he is the lamb—a type of character which Hugo draws easily and personates admirably. Ursus goes through with his part very well, except in the scene in the Tadcaster Inn court-yard the night after the disappearance of Gwynplaine, when th author imposes upon the reader the superhuman task of believing that he not only acted every part in the play, but at the same time, by his wonderful ventriloquial powers, simulated the hum and stir, the calls and cries and hubbub, of a dense, excited crowd, so as to deceive the quick ears of Dea, the blind girl, who, it was thought, could not bear the knowledge of her lover's absence. The spectacle is painful in the extreme; and if we were to laugh, it would be at M. Hugo and not with him. Ursus supposed Dea would be deceived and believe that her lover was present, and that an audience unusually boisterous and mixed was witnessing the performance; but we are spared this last absurdity.

For the rest, there are graphic descriptions of character, but the article itself is not there. We are treated to a reminiscence or an analysis, and not to an actual, living creation; the author's own personality monopolizes most of the attention; there is no doubting what manner of man he is; and if he would or could draw a little to one side, and give these figures a chance to act and speak for themselves, most of his readers would be a deal better satisfied. Tom-Jim-Jack would no doubt have changed his name, and he and Gwynplaine, meeting unexpectedly amid the corridors of Corleone Lodge, would hardly have called each other to account in the following startling manner:

— Gwynplaine, what's the meaning of this lord's coat?
— Tom-Jim-Jack, what's the meaning of this officer's coat?
— Gwynplaine, I don't answer questions.
— Nor I, Tom-Jim-Jack.
— Gwynplaine, I am not named Tom-Jim-Jack.
— Tom-Jim-Jack, I am not named Gwynplaine.
— Gwynplaine, I am at home here.
— I am at home here, Tom-Jim-Jack.

Whatever may be Victor Hugo's merits as a writer—and they are many and great in certain directions—it becomes more and more apparent that he is not par excellence a novelist. His quality is lyrical rather than creative. Especially does he lack that continence and equability necessary to the artist who would average and reproduce nature and life. We feel at all times a want of good flesh and blood—of something that moves otherwise than by sudden leaps and starts, like a jumping-jack or the images of a puppet-show.

OSBORN'S METALLURGY OF IRON AND STEEL.*

THE metallurgy of iron has lately had very much thought expended upon it, yet the subject is by no means exhausted, and the number of results scientifically determined and systematically arranged is so small that metallurgists, professional or practical, all welcome very eagerly any additions to our stock of knowledge. We hoped when we saw this ponderous volume of nearly one thousand pages, by Professor Osborn, not only to find much that should be new and valuable, but a work that should correctly represent the state of the American iron industry. The least that could be expected of such a work was that it should be a careful and accurate résumé of the most important facts relating to the subject, and that it should be written in an intelligible style. In perusing the book we were sorry to find all our hopes and expectations speedily and entirely disappointed.

From the preface we learn that Professor Osborn first intended simply to re-edit Mr. Overman's treatise on iron, but finding it impossible on a "thorough examination" to make it represent correctly the present standpoint of iron metallurgy, he therefore wrote "a work almost entirely different in method and in matter." "There was, nevertheless, so much material in Mr. Overman's book which was useful," we read in the preface, "that it has been introduced and acknowledged, either by the use of his name or by enclosing the quoted matter in brackets." The "so much material" referred to comprises over three-fourths of Overman's work, making fully one-half of Osborn's, with Overman's original illustrations, as published in 1850, and we were surprised to find the numerous and well known inaccuracies and blunders of Overman retained in full.

For instance: In the original work appeared an impossible analysis of peat ashes, which was, perhaps, a misprint. But Dr. Osborn seems to have such implicit confidence in Overman as to deem it unnecessary to question any of his statements, so here (page 184) we have perpetuated an analysis of peat ashes of unheard-of composition, containing no less than 133¾ per cent. of oddly combined ingredients. An error once started is hard to stop, and this absurd statement once more revived is destined, doubtless, to meet us often. It has already found its way into the columns of a prominent technical journal, the Engineering and Mining Journal, where the article on peat was given in full with editorial approval.

Welter's law, that "the amount of heat liberated by the chemical combination of various substances with oxygen is directly proportional to the amount of oxygen consumed," long since proved to be inaccurate, is retained by Osborn as "one of the most useful inculcations of chemistry" (p. 245).

Overman's work contains, it is true, many useful practical details of the manufacture of iron, but is wofully deficient and inaccurate in the scientific treatment of the subject. The fact that any one should endeavor to build up a work on such a foundation does not promise well for the superstructure.

The first chapter in the book on the general principles of the chemistry of iron is, doubtless, original with Professor Osborn, at least it has never been our lot to meet with anything so remarkable in chemical or metallurgical literature elsewhere. It is, perhaps, the most incoherent, obscure, incorrect, and puerile chemical production that has been written since the days of the alchemists. With the intention of making himself intelligible to the most ignorant of his readers, he playfully calls carbonic acid the rust of carbon, analogous to the rust of iron. He states incidentally that heat will expel oxygen completely from oxide of iron—a statement so manifestly false as to need no refutation. On combustion his ideas are ludicrously vague. It is clear to him that carbonic oxide, being the product of the partial oxidation of carbon, is a combustible gas, not, however, because it is capable of combining with more oxygen, but because "carbon is consumable, and oxygen, as we have said, supports combustion; all the conditions therefore of flame or fire exist in carbonic oxide." Carbonic acid, being the product of the complete oxidation of carbon, will not burn. The Professor, duly recognizing the fact, is puzzled to know the reason why, for, according to his theory, it ought to be more combustible than carbonic oxide. It remains, notwithstanding, obstinate in its incombustibility, and he is forced to content himself with calling the fact "an anomaly." We can imagine, when the Professor contemplates the combustibility of hydrogen, how surprised he must be that water does not burn! He should peruse as soon as he can some elementary work on combustion, and meantime rest satisfied with the reflection that what has been already completely burnt cannot be burnt again.

The looseness of style in which the book is written is apparent on every page. For instance, on page 25 we read: "It (phosphoric acid) combines with the iron, to the great vexation of the iron manufacturer." Phosphorous, not phosphoric, acid, is meant.

On page 24: "The oxide of silicon is silica or quartz"—which is inaccurate: what is meant is, that silica is an oxide of silicon—"and silica is the substance silicon combined with oxygen, making silica."

The following sentence, on page 158, may be said to be well mixed: "The properly sized crucible having been taken, line the interior with charcoal powdered and mixed with water, or water and molasses, or molasses alone, previously well mixed with the coal and the latter thoroughly triturated into the mass in a mortar." Mr. Dixon, the well-known crucible maker of Jersey City, will, perhaps, be surprised to find himself quoted as saying (p. 540), "that the nearer a crucible comes to being all plumbago, the quicker it will melt."

The particulars of original experiments are fortunately very rare in the book, as Dr. Osborn seems to be incapable of judging correctly of the results he obtains. From three experiments, tried on silicious, argillaceous, and calcareous ores, he concludes that any of these ores, on being strongly heated in a crucible with a well-fitting cover, without the addition of carbon or any reducing agent, will become partially reduced to metallic iron, the amount of the reduction being in proportion to the amount of lime present. We do not give his conclusions in his own words—they are too obscure; but we have, we believe, correctly interpreted his meaning. Dr. Osborn must not expect to overthrow so easily the accumulated evidence of generations, that oxide of iron, whether in the presence of silica, clay, or lime, cannot be decomposed by heat alone.

The directions given for the analyses of ores, fuels, and fluxes are entirely superfluous. For one acquainted with chemical methods they are crude and inaccurate, and to one not familiar with chemical manipulation they must be utterly inexplicable. The Professor's own ideas of chemical analysis are evidently very vague. He divides the "wet assay," for instance, into, first, volumetric assay; second, chemical analysis. It will, doubtless, be new to many that volumetric is to be distinguished from chemical analysis.

The confusion and misuse of scientific terms is a peculiar feature of the work. On page 316, we are informed that the furnace is divided into four zones of specific heat, meaning specific action, for which blunder Percy is made responsible on page 326. On page 185 we read: "The specific gravity of a cord of wood is from two to three thousand pounds." This is retained from Overman. On page 27, manganic acid is called manganese acid. For pure oxide of iron (page 143) we read oxide of pure malleable iron. Determination of substances is used for detection (page 117). On page 169 we hear of a protosalt being reduced to a sesquisalt. On pages 132 and 913, chromic iron ore is called chromate of iron.

Scientific nomenclature has been enriched by the Professor with some original terms, such as, oxygenated and carby-oxygenated crude iron! (pp. 140–141). Quality of heat is said to mean temperature (p. 243).

In the preface, Dr. Osborn acknowledges that in the chapter on the special properties of iron and its compounds he has been greatly indebted to Percy's work. Any one familiar with the able treatment of this subject by Percy will be incensed by the way his statements and experiments have been misquoted. It looks as if Dr. Osborn had turned over the leaves of Percy's book and taken sentences at random, without regard to their connection or relative importance, always altering the language to the detriment of the idea. We give a few quotations by way of illustration: We read in Percy's work ("Metallurgy of Iron and Steel." London. 1864), page 79: "By washing the residue the arsenic is separated as soluble alkaline arseniate, while pure sesquioxide of iron is left." Osborn (page 107): "On washing the residue, pure alkaline arsenic is removed and pure sesquioxide of iron remains." Percy (pp. 98–100) gives the details of six experiments on the reduction in silicate of the protoxide of iron by carbon, from which is proved that "only two equivalents of the protoxide of iron in tribasic silicate can be reduced by carbon." Osborn (page 111) did not see the drift of the experiments and overlooked the result, and has given merely a condensed account of the first experiment with this result: "Product: well-melted buttons of white iron." At the conclusion of an interesting series of experiments by Percy on the carburization of malleable iron by means of hydrogen which has passed over charcoal at a red heat, he says: "The questions suggested by this point are, Did hydrogen under these conditions take up any carbon, or was the gaseous compound of carbon which caused the carburization of the iron simply evolved from the charcoal employed?" "The question arises," according to Osborn, "Was it from the hydrogen mechanically taking up carbon, or was it from hydrogen eliminating, by some chemical affinity, the, so to speak, latent carbon of the charcoal, and thus charged with carbon, passing over to the piece and carburizing it?" Such a jumble of words may convey an idea to Dr. Osborn, but will not edify many of his readers.

In the chapter on iron ores, Dana is also misquoted. We read (p. 43): "Dana includes all these varieties" (bog-iron ore, etc.) "under the specific name of Limonite." In Dana's "System of Mineralogy," 1869, page 172, we read under Limonite: "Only part of stalactitic limonite, brown or yellow ochre, bog ore, and clay iron-stone belong here."

Instances might be multiplied indefinitely of this system of garbling extracts without regard to the author's meaning, but we forbear. We must not forget to mention that the element fluorine, which has up to the present time defied all efforts made to isolate it, has been recognized by Dr. Osborn. "Liberated fluorine" from cryolite, we are informed incidentally, attacked clay crucibles to such a degree that the use of cryolite had to be abandoned at the American Steel Works, Brooklyn!

The book is also sadly deficient in regard to recent improvements in the manufacture of iron. On the important subject of coking, we have, in addition to Overman's work, nothing but the single method used at the Cambria Works, Pa., for coking in heaps. The large number of coking furnaces that have come into use in the last twenty years have been completely ignored. On roasting of ores we have, in the way of novelty, merely the three methods, with illustrations, given in Petitgand & Ronna's appendix to the French translation of Percy. The many new forms of roasting-kilns in which waste gases are used are entirely omitted. Westman's kilns, introduced into this country by Mr. Hewitt, might have been at least mentioned, as the book has "special reference to American materials and processes."

Steel is discussed and dismissed in fifty-seven pages. We find here no reference to the Siemens-Martin process, and the Bessemer process as practised in America is not once mentioned.

In fact, one would infer from Osborn's book that the manufacture of iron and steel, since Overman's treatise was published, had been practically at a stand-still. An attempt has been made, it is true, to bring that work up to date, but with so little care, industry, and research that the new book is hardly better than the old.

We feel that such a work as this cannot be severely enough condemned. Reviving a bad book that should have been allowed to remain in oblivion, and taking it as a groundwork, the author has added but little that is useful and much that is false, the whole being written in a most incoherent, slovenly style.

GENERAL ROBERT E. LEE'S BIOGRAPHY OF HIS FATHER.*

On its outside this book bears the brief title, "Memoirs of the War: Lee," and doubtless most persons, would confess to a feeling of disappointment on being made aware that the "war" is the war of the Revolution, and that "Lee" is General Henry Lee, the "Light-Horse Harry" of Revolutionary fame. The book is now in its third edition; but it was in 1827 that the second edition was printed. It has, therefore, hardly been a book for our own time; and some who were readers in 1827 may now be curious to return to the old books which treat of Revolutionary matters, and read them over again by the stronger light recent events would shed back on them; but we think it likely that this edition would, like its predecessors, respond to all calls for the work for forty years to come, were it not that General R. E. Lee has something to say in it.

It would not be easy to declare fairly in what reverence "Light-Horse Harry" is held by his countrymen; but supposing their reverence to be equal with the esteem of his contemporaries, we can safely say that the feeling is of a rather sentimental nature. It is a characteristic of even the reading class of Americans to give themselves up easily to a sentimental admiration of their successful military men without minute enquiry into the details of their successes. Very few in civil life know anything about the particulars of the plans and schemes, or even battles, of Washington, Scott, and Grant; they were victorious, and that is enough. "Light-Horse Harry" had great successes in his sphere, and his very nom de guerre shows the sentimental quality of his countrymen's admiration for him.

His book is not an autobiography, as it perhaps might better be; it merely recounts the military history of a distant time, and exactly what that was, except that it resulted in our independence, scarcely any one now cares. There is nothing now in the book which has not been accessible in its earlier editions for many years, except the new biography of the author by his son. This, as we have surmised, may lend fresh interest to the work, General R. E. Lee being one of the most famous men of his period. In spite of his celebrity he has neither said nor written anything since the war that has been made public, and a large number of men have a certain unsatisfied curiosity to hear from him. Until now, he has apparently thought that no applause of what he might say could be more gratifying than the wonder what he would say in case he said anything; at any rate, he has kept a long silence. The way in which he has broken it will perhaps not satisfy those who were anxious for him to speak; but they will undoubtedly take what they get, gladly. We shall speak only of the biography, therefore, as being the only matter in the book of very lively interest to-day.

Unless one inclines to "smile at the claims of long descent," the opening paragraph will command his respect, William the Conqueror, the battle of Hastings, and Richard Cœur de Lion figuring in it. Launcelot Lee, the founder of the family, came over with the Conqueror, it seems, "and when the estates of the native English nobility were divided among the followers of William, a fine estate in Essex was bestowed upon him." We live in the nineteenth century, to be sure, and not in the eleventh; but it suggests itself, as one reads, that if General R. E. Lee should not recover from Government his lost Arlington on the Potomac, perhaps he may find some balm in recalling how his ancestor cheaply settled down into other men's domains.

Numerous men of mark sprang from the various branches of the Lee pedigree, to the untrustworthiness of which, however, public attention has been called in this journal. What else it contains that is not in the memoirs is mainly the correspondence of Colonel Lee with prominent men, and some letters to his son, Charles Carter Lee, a student at Harvard. We see that in his capacity as partisan commandant in charge of outposts, Colonel Lee had occasion to write to General Washington on June 21, 1778, concerning affairs about Stony Point, and his biographer thinks that his letter suggested to Washington the subsequent successful attack on that place, an account of which, on July 18, Lee communicated to Governor Joseph Reed. A note informs us that this and other letters to the same person were furnished to the biographer by the Hon. W. B. Reed, who must find much satisfaction in Colonel Lee's cordial endorsement of the patriotic labors of

* "Memoirs of the War in the Southern Department of the United States. By Henry Lee, Lieut.-Colonel Commandant of the Partisan Legion during the American War. A new edition, with revisions, and a Biography of the author. By Robert E. Lee." New York: University Publishing Company. 1869.

Governor Reed, whose character as a patriot has lately been a good deal assailed and defended. Both General Lafayette and General Greene wrote letters to Colonel Lee, speaking most warmly of him and his services; and his retirement from the army early in 1782—which, from his correspondence, seems to have been caused by pique, and a wish to be married, as well as by ill health—was undoubtedly the cause of much regret to all his comrades in arms. He then visited Stratford, the residence of Colonel Philip Ludwell Lee, in Westmoreland, on the bluffs of the Potomac, "the owner who, before the Revolution, was a member of the King's council, living in great state, and kept a band of musicians, to whose airs his daughters, Matilda and Flora, with their companions, danced in the saloon or promenaded on the house-top." Colonel Lee, who "had recently left the Southern army overwhelmed with grief and despondency, was soon happily restored by his union with the eldest daughter, Matilda." After the war Colonel Lee was elected Governor of Virginia, and while holding that office was thought of by the General Government for the command of the troops on the Western frontier, but did not receive the appointment. Corresponding with Mr. Madison on this subject, Governor Lee used these words, a part of which his biographer has put into italics: whether it was so in the original we are of course unable to say: "One objection I should only have (the above conditions being acceded to), and that is, the abandoning my native country, to whose goodness I am so much indebted. No consideration on earth could induce me to act a part, however gratifying to me, which could be construed into disregard or forgetfulness of this commonwealth."

On this, General R. E. Lee comments as follows: "These extracts show that immediately after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and during the administration of Washington, men who had distinguished themselves for their zeal in promoting it were deeply sensible of the obligations they owed both to the State and General governments, their native commonwealths, and the adopted community into which these commonwealths had been formed." In reference to Hamilton's financial measures, so unpopular with his State and section, Governor Lee wrote also to Madison: "I really see no redress unless the government itself be destroyed. This is risking too much, because great evils must inevitably flow from discord, and the people must suffer severely, whatever be the event of such an experiment." On which General R. E. Lee remarks: "Although his correspondence at this time, as well as the course of his life, proves his devotion to the Federal Government, yet he recognized a distinction between his 'native country' and that which he had labored to associate with it in the strictest bonds of union."

Colonel Lee, having been for some time a widower, married on the 18th of June, 1793, Miss Anne Hill Carter, of Shirley, on the James River, a fine farm lying just in front of McClellan's outposts when the army of the Potomac was encamped at Harrison's Landing. The first child by this marriage was called "Algernon Sydney, after the great martyr of liberty, and, according to family tradition, of the kindred of the Lees." After commanding the Federal troops sent by Government to break up "the Whiskey Boys' Insurrection," General Lee closed his public career in Congress, where, on the death of Washington, he was appointed "the public organ of his country's sorrow, on which occasion he pronounced those memorable words: "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his fellow-citizens." The remainder of the biography is composed of letters written by General Lee from the West Indies, where he had gone for his health, to his son Charles Carter Lee, at Cambridge. In these letters, which are full of tenderness for all his family, he speaks only once of General R. E. Lee by name: "Robert was always good, and will be confirmed in his happy turn of mind by his ever-watchful and affectionate mother. Does he strengthen his native tendency?" The father is very ambitious for his son at college, and gives him much good advice. Among other things, he tells him to hold before his eyes, as models, Marcus Aurelius and John Locke. All these West Indian letters show that General Lee was a cultivated man and had a warm heart. On his way home, he died, March 25, 1818, at Cumberland Island, on the coast of Georgia, at the house of Mrs. Shaw, the daughter of General Greene, unhappily none of his own family being near.

This biography will make known some particulars, not to be gained from the "Memoirs," of the private character and public services of General Henry Lee. And, we regret to state, it will be found to be the means employed by General R. E. Lee to show that he is in his retirement a disappointed secessionist, claiming, in the interest of secession, that his father, who was the friend and intimate of Washington, supported the Union with a mental reservation.

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

Miss Alcott is one of the many women whom patriotic feeling, or feelings more or less colored by patriotism, urged into the work of nursing sick and wounded men in the military hospitals of the late war. To this fact her little volume of "Hospital Sketches and Camp and Fireside Stories" owes most, though not quite all, of its value. If it were not in a certain sense history it would be of but little importance for what it contains, though it would still be of some importance for what it promises. Assuredly, however, we should be unwilling to say that much of the book is to be taken as truly historical; except, indeed, as we see in it correctly reflected the exaggerated and passionate way in which during the war-time we were all considering the actors and events of our great drama. The negro was not and is not just what Miss Alcott loves to paint him; but most of us used to think he was; the white rebel was not necessarily so black as he is almost without any exception painted by our enthusiastic partisan; but, true enough, time was when whole communities so thought of him. In this sense, then, Miss Alcott's book is almost all history. Her lively pictures, or rather sketches, of the nurse's troubles and triumphs and services, and of the sick men's ways, we can call historical in a better sense; though it would not be well for any one to take them as sworn evidence, or to believe them, if the truth, anything like the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

But apart from the merit of this volume as a record, it may profitably be spoken of at some length as the work of a writer not without a probable future as a worker in literature, not without some influence, and not incapable of exerting a partially bad influence. She is extravagantly sentimental, and is like a good-natured child in her way of indulging her kind-hearted impulses. We take it that it is in part attributable to Mr. Dickens's example that Miss Alcott gives herself over so often to the moving principle of the Christmas-story kind of literature—which covers the whole earth as the waters cover the sea with what we trust we may be pardoned for calling slip-slop, sweet, to be sure, but not too natural and not too wholesome. This is the principle which has produced those so many cosy rooms in which the warm firelight plays on the face of the drowsily ticking clock, and the chairs seem to extend their plump arms invitingly, and the tea-kettle hisses; in which Mrs. Podgers, or whoever it may be, waits, with the buttered toast before her on the hob, till "he" shall come in; and into which "he" by-and-by comes, a cheery old soul, who has been made late because he had to give five-pound notes all round to the shopmen and porters, and who stands beaming on Mrs. Podgers, and by-and-by produces a dirty, ragged, but intelligent street-boy, who—to make short a familiar story—is duly filled to repletion with good fare—"what cuts of turkey, and what spoonfuls of stuffing, and then what mountains of pudding that boy did eat," while our beaming friend and the matronly Mrs. Podgers chuckle and laugh—and is established in the warm corner, and finally is adopted, and "hoorays" at the wedding which soon comes off, and at which all the other little street-boys are feasted and get a shilling. Whatever may be the precise manifestation of it in particular cases, we may say in general of Miss Alcott that she hardly ever fails to make this principle the law of her world. What it is not wrong to stigmatize as a greedy, heedless appetite for a world full of rosy happiness, and that, too, of a sufficiently material nature, possesses her pretty fully; and the reader who does not overmuch like this gets a constant impression of "gushing"—as the great practitioner of it calls it—that which is all but fatal to his enjoyment; while the reader who does like it—well, he gets it; and that is fatal to his learning as soon as he should that there are better things in literature as in life than sentimentality, however sweetened.

Our author has, too, the fault of giving us her own notions in her professedly realistic accounts of the sayings and doings of others—as, for one example out of many, in the talk, on p. 31, that is put into the mouth of the sergeant. This is wrong in more ways than one, but we care only to point out to Miss Alcott that to work thus is to be a defective workman, and that she has a vicious habit to look out for. Truth to imaginative fact is a hard matter, no doubt; but truth to the facts our author is dealing with in this book ought to have been easier. And, as Scott told the youth who was doing vague word-painting by way of describing an imaginary landscape, it is necessary, if one would paint imaginary landscapes that shall seem real, first to learn to describe actual landscapes with patient observation, and with conscientious honesty no less.

Miss Alcott's vivacity—we fear in a young gentleman it would get a harsher name; her sympathies with many good things; that kind-heartedness of hers that we have been abusing—but only because we fear its excess, in literature, enervates the springs of real benevolence; her occasional gay humor, not seldom neatly satiric; the frequent closeness of her observation; her good descriptive power; and her usually simple and pleasant English, make her a writer of whom hopes are to be entertained. We speak of her with this book as her witness.

Hans Christian Andersen's "Improvisatore" and "Two Baronesses" are perhaps curious rather than anything else; though of course he is a man who could not write seven or eight hundred pages without saying much that one would gladly read. But we think they will be found chiefly interesting for the light they throw upon the author himself rather than for anything they are in themselves. They make it evident, for one thing, that great as he is in short stories, a long one is too much for him. Everywhere in these novels there are weaknesses. Effects without good cause; causes that produce no effects; personages that are of no use; wild improbabilities side by side with the most threadbare incidents; borrowings from others, and repetitions of himself—all these abound in these two jumbles of prose and poetry. Of plot he seems never to have had any conception; and the short flights of his little prose poems for children must have further weakened his constructive abilities.

Again, in both these tales he shows us what an influence Italy had on him—or rather what an impression Italy made on him. One is reminded of the Northern barbarians, his long-ago ancestors, who wandered about Rome with much the same wonder and awe. As for Italy's influence upon him, we imagine that a chief effect which it had upon his genius was to confirm him in the notion which he seems to hold, in common perhaps with most northern poets of modern times, that profuse pouring out of poetical impressions is poetry truly so called. "Improvisatore" is made rather tedious by rhapsodies of this kind. No doubt Italy also nurtured in him, as he wandered under skies so different from those of his native north, the power of appreciating so keenly as he does the varying moods of nature. But in spite of these shortcomings, these books are worth looking at—more especially "The Two Baronesses," which contains some partly fascinating pictures of Danish life—a strange life of fishing hamlets in the shifting sand, and among a queer nobility and the burghers of the towns. They are part of the series of Andersen's complete works, by Hurd & Houghton, and are handsomely made.

Why Mr. "Ikey Solomons, Esquire, Junior" wrote his novel of "Catherine" not many of the readers of to-day distinctly remember—so well have the days passed over when the heroes of fiction regularly brought up at Newgate or Tyburn, coming thither from Hounslow Heath or the Minories. But in 1840, what with Bulwer, and Ainsworth, and Dickens with his "Oliver Twist," and the imitators of these greater lights, there was need for somebody to satirize out of family reading the refined and philosophical highwayman, and the self-sacrificing women of the town, and the generous, devoted burglar and jail-breaker. So Thackeray, a moralist of immense common-sense, a satirist enthusiastically fond of the satirist who drew the lineaments of Mr. Wild, a great hater of humbugs—except perhaps a little humbug or two of his own—resolving that Newgate, if exhibited, should be shown up drop and all; that if criminals were to figure in literature it should not be as philosophers or brave lads, but as the scoundrels or fools that they commonly are; that if seductions were to be a staple ingredient in stories, the seducer and seduced should not be represented as shining angels with unwonted delicacy of soul, but as probable accomplices in crime and weakness, and probable partners in misery—set to work and produced this story of "Catherine"—the most depressing of all his stories, unless, perhaps, we say that "The Fatal Boots" is more disheartening. The heroine is Catherine Hayes, who was burned in 1726 for "petty treason," she having atrociously murdered her husband, and being, therefore, a real heroine of the Newgate Calendar. As we have not looked up her history, we cannot say how close her latest chronicler keeps to the facts of her life, but he gives us the idea of his having handled his theme much in the way in which he produced his historical works—that is to say, using for embellishment, and to give local color, his minute acquaintance with the aspects of English life in the eighteenth century. But he worked hastily, and for the sake of teaching a certain lesson—that is, for a moral rather than an artistic end; and moreover, such of his facts as he owes to the trial, such as related to Mrs. Hayes's later years, seem to have bothered and hampered him somewhat, or he did not take pains to make his invented facts conform to these—else we cannot account for the conduct of his Sergeant Brock after that person has became the Iago-like Mr. Wood. But, as we have said, we see in "Catherine" much of its author's wonted cleverness as a historical novelist; and we see also in great strength his familiar power as a satirist of society and an observer of human nature, and no one who likes Thackeray will read this tale without the accustomed pleasure. The scene of the last interview between Catherine and Count Max is one which Thackeray has nowhere else equalled for the horrid effectiveness of its main incidents. But we suppose him indebted to the Calendar for this. We think that without doubt the publishers are to blame for having cut out the catastrophe of the story—which consisted of the contemporary details of the trial and execution of the criminals. Thackeray chose to copy these from the newspapers of that day instead of writing out an account of his own, but this he chose to do because it gave the best end to his book, answered best his intentions in writing it, and gave it a fitting and complete finish. The reason given for this mutilation of the work is that it is simply horrible. But so it should be; and so is the whole story horrible. We may add that, all things considered, the reason has its amusing points.

Most of Professor Schele de Vere's "Wonders of the Deep" appeared a while ago in Putnam's Magazine. There is nothing much to be said about it. It talks of pearls, oysters, coral, and other kindred things in the usual manner of cyclopædias of useful information, and probably a boy of twelve or fourteen would find it entertaining and think it useful. It might be a good book for a holiday present.

Lowell is the poet who does the "Diamond" series of Fields, Osgood & Co. its latest honor. This edition of Lowell, dedicated to Mr. G. W. Curtis, is complete so far as concerns the works already published in volumes, but wants a New England sketch or two—like "Toby Adam's Story"—which have been published only in the magazine pages, and are one day to make a book by themselves, and which will make a book that, to our mind, will be quite as worthy as any other of their author's place among the two or three English-speaking poets of our time whom lovers of poetry most believe in. Here then we have, in a very cheap form, everything that Mr. Lowell has written in verse from the days of his youthful "Legend of Brittany" down to the year-old "Under the Willows." We do not profess ourselves admirers of Diamond editions; yet bad editions of good poets have been better makers of other poets than all the "large-paper copies" that ever were sumptuous in libraries.

Emerson, too, is put within reach of very moderate means in Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co.'s two volume edition of his essays—Emerson, that is to say, so far as he is to be found in his prose. And perhaps the saying about him that he knows better than most men what is poetry but not so well what makes a poem is true to this extent at least, that most of the poetry distinctively his he has let get into his prose as much as into his poems. Only perhaps, however. But in any case here is all of the prose of the most emancipating, so to speak, and probably the most elevating of our American writers—despite his being so often a stumbling-block and foolishness to many who respect and admire and even love him, and who owe him much.

It never has been possible, and we may say that it never will be, to make any collection deserving so large a name as a "Library" of contemporary fiction in which the works of some of the included authors will not seem to have come by intrusion into company too good for them rather than by a right of entrance not to be challenged. But there are writers whose grace rather than their strength or beauty is their charm, and whose manner and tone qualify them for admission to the circle of the great ones and princes. Such surely is Madame Sartoris, the author of that delightful story "A Week in a French Country-House"—with at least one character admirable, and new in fiction—which no one ever read who would not wish that he had not, and that it was still to read. And such is the author of "The Story of Elizabeth." Never otherwise than fresh in details, clear cut in delineation, delicate and thoughtful, her stories are as pleasing as naturalness in manner, worth in the matter, and skill of sure-handed workmanship must always make any work, whether of the highest or of a lower order. In two volumes we have almost all of Miss Thackeray's that the world knows anything about, and no one will be sorry—least of all these great novelists themselves—to see her father's daughter side by side, in Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co.'s Household Library, with George Eliot and Charles Reade. She is of the line of Englishwomen which, beginning with Jane Austen, has made so broad and honorable a mark in the English fiction of this last century. If none of them can be said to have produced a novel of universal merit, hardly any more can we say so of their male contemporaries; and in the rank next below the very highest surely they have run their brethren harder than Dr. Todd, for example, would wholly like to confess.

We presume our general title will include "Strange Visitors" (New York: Carleton, 1869), inasmuch as this consists of "a series of original papers, embracing philosophy, science, government, religion, poetry, art, fiction, satire, humor, narrative, and prophecy by the spirits of Irving, Willis, Thackeray, Brontë, Richter, Byron, Humboldt, Hawthorne, Wesley, Browning, and others now dwelling in the spirit world, dictated through a clairvoyant while in an abnormal or trance state." Through this channel the late Mr. Raymond addresses the New York public; Napoleon Bonaparte the French nation; Mrs. Browning her husband, etc., etc. Napoleon comes to the rescue of the Second Empire, and exclaims in spirit-French:

"Restez-vous, mon patrie; Napoleon shall decide aright. No, petit garçon, Napoleon le Grand will place you upon the highest pinnacle of peace."

Artemus Ward gives an account of his post-mortem experiences, which is neither characteristic nor funny, though the editor assures us that, during the delivery of it, "Artemus Ward's conversation and gestures were exceedingly ludicrous. He was the very personification of mirth, occasionally going to the wall, and humorously 'chalking out' his designs." Byron, in smooth but otherwise un-Byronic stanzas, says that his soul is sick of calumny and lies; while Mr. Raymond makes the best defence yet of Mrs. Stowe:

"I am told by Byron and others that Lady Byron, recently arriving in the spirit-world, and finding matters very different from what she had expected, and that she was received nowhere as the wife of Lord Byron (who, having resided there some thirty years, had formed a new and happy alliance), was stung with jealousy and vexation, and hastened to inspire Mrs. Stowe to repeat the story which had become a matter of faith with her, hoping thereby to inflict a punishment on Byron, who ignored his relation to her."

It must be, we think, at least the third edition of Rev. Dr. N. C. Burt's work, "The Far East," which Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co. send us from Cincinnati; and if it were the fourth or fifth it would not be undeservedly successful. Freshening our recollection of it by glancing over it again, we have found it answering our first impressions of it as in many respects original, and entertaining throughout, and to be recommended to all who wish to study in a realistic way the geography and present customs and condition of Egypt, Palestine, and other parts of the Levant. The book now appears on tinted paper and with an improved exterior, and may properly take a place on the holiday shelves.

No little controversy has been excited by Dr. J. G. Kohl's "History of the Discovery of Maine" in Vol. I. of the "Collections of the Maine Historical Society" (Second Series), and the author's accuracy has been assailed in many quarters, apparently with grounds. One of his opponents is the Rev. B. F. De Costa, who has embodied some of his objections in an introduction to the reprint of the "Sailing Directions of Henry Hudson, prepared for his use in 1608, from the Old Danish of Ivar Bardsen" (Albany: Joel Munsell, 1869). This editor's criticisms on Kohl, however, form but a portion of the Introduction, which chiefly relates to pre-Columbian voyages and charts, and also endeavors to prove that Hudson was by no means the discoverer of the river which bears his name, nor in any way remarkable as a navigator. Persons whose prejudices may be shocked by this opinion should take refuge in Mr. Reade's monograph on Hudson; and they will also get some powerful aid from Mr. Henry Stevens in his "Historical and Geographical Notes, 1453–1869," appended to a pamphlet on the Tehuantepec Railway (New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1869). Much of Mr. De Costa's reasoning is certainly to be set aside if, as Mr. Stevens maintains, the charts on which so much reliance is placed were simple reproductions of the coast-outlines of Eastern Asia—long thought to be one with America—which are well known to resemble in a remarkable manner those of our Atlantic seaboard.

A composite book, but a very good one, which will amuse both young and old, is James Greenwood's "Wild Sports of the World," with plentiful illustrations from the Messrs. Harper's storehouse. The author is not a mere compiler, though to be praised in that capacity. His study of natural history has enabled him not only to select judiciously from books of travel and adventure, but to discourse fluently and with knowledge of the structure, habits, and uses of the animals which pass under consideration. The elephant, lion, puma, gorilla, rhinoceros, tiger, hippopotamus, buffalo, chamois, ostrich, kangaroo, walrus, etc., etc., are among these, and much is to be learned concerning them. The United States furnishes a number of anecdotes. Mr. Greenwood's style is such as makes reading easy, and only occasionally departs from the requirements of correct taste or the sake of being "popular."

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,

654 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

New Monthly Magazine.

Messrs. HURD & HOUGHTON will publish, on the 15th day of December, the first number of a Monthly Magazine for general and popular circulation, under the title

OLD AND NEW.

OLD AND NEW differs from magazines now in circulation in attempting a wider range of topics. It is intended for the home circle, and its effort is to interest all members of that circle.

OLD AND NEW, therefore, in publishing Stories, Literary Essays, and Criticisms, by the best authors, does not confine itself to them. Its aim is to improve the social and religious life of the American people, by freely bringing forward subjects of the highest social and religious importance.

Its conductors believe that the time has passed when politics were to be discussed only by statesmen, and religion only by clergymen. The fit study and consideration of such themes is now the privilege of all.

OLD AND NEW will thus discuss every subject of present importance. It will attempt such discussion in such ways as may be interesting to the great body of readers, with the best illustration which can be commanded.

OLD AND NEW will be edited by Rev. EDWARD E. HALE. He has the help of a large number of the most distinguished writers in this country, and of valuable correspondents in the Old World. The several departments which they propose in the outset for their journal, besides those spoken of, are STORIES AND OTHER PAPERS, by the most successful writers.

ARTICLES ON PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND SKETCHES OF TRAVELS, by men and women who know what is known.

CRITICISM, kind and fearless, on contemporary literature, such as shall guide the choice of book-buyers; and a RECORD OF PROGRESS. In this department, without much attention to the merely transient squalls or teapot tempests OLD AND NEW will attempt to show what advance the world is really making in its Colleges and Universities, in its Scientific and Religious Associations, in its Social Reform, and by offices of Public Administration.

The discussion of all these topics will be conducted under the inspiration of the Christian Religion, in the interpretation of a broad and liberal Theology. For OLD AND NEW will recognize the truth, which everywhere compels conviction now, that while the religion taught by Jesus Christ is as old as the throne of God, Theology, which is t he human expression o fman's knowledge of God, requires new statements with every day.

The first number of OLD AND NEW will contain articles by

HARRIET B. STOWE,	SIDNEY ANDREWS—"DIXON,"
JULIA WARD HOWE,	R. W. EMERSON,
HANNAH E. LUNT,	FREDERIC INGHAM,
HENRY W. BELLOWS,	GEORGE LITTLELESS,
W. T. BRIGHAM,	J. B. TORRICELLI,
ROBERT COLLYER,	JAMES WALKER,

And other authors of distinction, who reserve their names.

Early numbers of OLD AND NEW will contain papers by the same authors, and by

MRS. A. D. T. WHITNEY,	PROF. J. P. LESLEY,
MRS. MARY THROOP,	PROF. J. P. COOK,
HON. WILLIAM C. BRYANT,	PROF. C. CARROLL EVERETT,
HON. GEORGE P. MARSH,	JOS. P. QUINCY,
JOHN G. WHITTIER,	HORACE E. SCUDDER,
HON. CHARLES F. ADAMS,	REV. C. E. STOWE,
HON. ANDREW D. WHITE,	REV. J. F. CLARKE,
PROF. JOSEPH LOVERING,	REV. GEORGE M. STEELE,
PROF. O. W. HOLMES,	REV. CHARLES BEECHER,
PROF. J. R. LOWELL,	REV. A. D. MAYO,
PROF. NATHAN HALE,	REV. HORATIO STEBBINS.

OLD AND NEW will be a royal 8vo of 144 pages, handsomely printed.

Terms: Yearly Subscription, $4; Single Numbers, 35 cents.

Specimen Number mailed on application.

The Week.

THE President's message, and the reports accompanying it, appear, on the whole, to have made but little impression on the public mind. The praise of them one meets with in the papers is feeble, and so is the blame. The general sentiment, as expressed by the press, seems to be that the message was a composite production—the work of many hands, and, therefore, containing no very strong or well-defined view on any particular point of public policy. It is not at all unlikely, however, that General Grant is still under the influence of the strong hostility to the President's having any "policy" which sprang up during the closing years of Andrew Johnson's reign, and that his gingerly handling of many themes is due to a sense once strong, and still uneffaced, of the danger of seeming to know more than Congress or wishing anything Congress has not considered.

The Senate's peculiar work has been upon the United States courts; on Thursday last entertaining a bill to raise the salaries of the Chief-Justice and his associates in the Supreme Court to $12,000 and $10,000 respectively. The same day Mr. Trumbull reported from the Judiciary Committee a bill to define the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in certain cases, binding them to the "decision of the political departments of the Government on political questions," declaring the validity of the Reconstruction acts to be beyond the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and inhibiting it from entertaining jurisdiction in any case arising under the execution of these acts in Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi. On Monday, Mr. Drake spoke at great length in favor of his bill taking away from the Federal courts all power to pass upon the constitutionality of acts or joint resolutions of Congress. His argument can hardly be said to have been listened to by his colleagues. The same day, Mr. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill empowering the President to retire any judge of the Supreme Court when satisfied that the latter, by accident or infirmity, is permanently incapacitated for the duties of his office. On Monday, also, Mr. Wilson presented a bill to regulate the importation of foreigners under contracts made abroad, and involving service for a term of years in this country—the first attempt at national control of the Chinese immigration.

The ninth census has been the House's chief occupation during the week, owing to the fact that the bill regulating it must become law before January 1, or fail altogether. General Garfield has very properly led the debates, and has thus far saved his bill from serious alteration, like that threatened by General Butler when he moved to make the officers of internal revenue, enumerators. Mr. Jenckes secured what appears to be a valuable amendment in the interest of mining, manufacturing, commercial, and social statistics, to be collected and arranged by experts, in addition to the enumerators. Mr. Ingersoll, of Illinois, brought up the currency question on Saturday, in a bill authorizing the Treasury to issue legal-tender notes to the amount of $44,000,000, with which to buy in and cancel gold-interest-bearing bonds. He wanted this bill referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and an effort to lay it on the table failed—88 to 64. But General Garfield succeeded in getting a reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency, by 88 to 57—a sign, we take it, of a healthy condition of the House. On Monday, several bills for the admission of Virginia were appropriately referred.

Cuba and Georgia have engaged the attention of both Houses. In each the thrilling resolutions of the South Carolina Legislature were presented; and on Monday Mr. Ward, of New York, in presenting a monster petition in favor of granting belligerent rights to the Cubans, obtained a suspension of the rules that it might be read. This was all very well, perhaps, but in the Senate Mr. Carpenter scarcely appeared to advantage in offering a resolution that, in the Senate's opinion, the Spanish gunboats ought not to be allowed to leave the United States during the continuance of the rebellion in Cuba. What he said yesterday in support of this resolution we may consider next week. In the treatment of Georgia, both Houses followed the President's lead in preparing for a remodelling of the Legislature, the chief difference between them being that the House would act through the military commander, the Senate through the actual Governor, of the State. On motion of Mr. Morton, acceptance of the Fifteenth Amendment was insisted on. On Tuesday, the late Senator Fessenden was appropriately remembered in eulogies something more than formal, and noticeably numerous in both branches.

There is talk of the renewal of the Alabama negotiations, but this time in Washington, which is undoubtedly the proper place for them. Upon a matter of so much delicacy, and on which so many persons have to be consulted, there was never much chance of a settlement anywhere else. But then there is not much chance of a settlement even there unless the Administration makes up its mind as to what it wants, and means to insist on. It will not do to keep on saying that the Johnson treaty would not do; everybody admits that, and there is no further market either for exposures or refutations of him. Before the negotiations can again be opened with a chance of success, the Administration will have to say for what it desires material, and for what moral, satisfaction, and must also define "moral satisfaction." As between nations, it is a very vague phrase. Formal apologies, it must not be forgotten, for governmental acts are unknown between first-class powers except as the humiliations imposed on a conquered enemy.

General Terry has made a report on the condition of Georgia which is not very pleasant reading. He says, in substance, that in many parts of the State there cannot be said to be any government at all, that in no part of it is there any security for life or property, and to negroes in particular, seeking redress for injuries, magistrates dare not, and juries will not, do justice. Ku-klux bands rove over the State, chastising whom they will, and keeping the well-disposed and peaceable in constant terror. General Terry's remedy is the conversion of the existing Legislature into a "provisional legislature," "from which all ineligible persons should be excluded, and to which all eligible persons elected to it, whether white or black, should be admitted," and this Legislature, he says, would "enact such laws, and invest their executive with such powers, as would enable him to keep the peace, protect life and property, and punish crime." On what General Terry bases these expectations it would be hard to say. He must either suppose that the wrongdoers will pay peculiar respect to laws passed by a legislature installed by a military commander (there are already laws on the Georgia statute-book against murder, robbery, and arson), or that it will arm the Governor with extraordinary powers, and give him an armed police or militia to enforce them. But we all know that the laws of a "provisional legislature" will count for no more with the truly wicked than the laws of any other; that great powers, without the physical means of exercising them, would simply make the Governor ridiculous; and that there is no probability that the State would supply him with a police.

General Terry's other remedy is the restoration of military government, which, he says, "is a very simple process." The restoration of a nominal military government is, no doubt, easy enough—a pen and a sheet of paper are all that is needed. But a real military government for Georgia, one that would secure life and property, would include 10,000 soldiers, and these General Terry has not got, and is not likely to have. He has now less than 300 infantry all told, besides the artillery in the forts on the coast. There is really something comic in the notion which many good people seem to entertain, that if you call the government of the State a "provisional" or a "military," and not a "civil government," and do n't let its representatives sit in Congress, the Ku-klux people will stay quietly in their beds at night, the police magistrates dispense even-handed justice, and the petty juries stand nobly by the negro. What heightens the effect of this is, that while the State was under "military government" before, these outrages were as common as they are now; and they will be common for a while after all thought of military government has been abandoned. Even the negro, for whose protection the proposed change is recommended, being something of a wag himself, will be amused when told that the government, being now called "provisional," he may sleep in peace.

A bill is now before the Senate prohibiting the Supreme Court from "holding any act of Congress whatever invalid for any supposed repugnancy between such act and the Constitution of the United States, or for any supposed want of authority in the Constitution for the same." Mr. Drake, of Missouri, made a long speech advocating it, in which, after saying a great many things with which everybody is familiar, about the impropriety of allowing five judges, or even one judge, to veto the acts of the legislature, he got down to the essential point—which is contained in the question, If Congress is to have the sole right of judging of the constitutionality of its acts, is not Congress omnipotent? No, says Mr. Drake; "this objection has no force, inasmuch as it is based on the supposition that a majority of Congress would be equally regardless of their oaths of office, their fealty to the Constitution, and their duty to the people." We suppose it must have emanated from some wicked man, probably a Copperhead; but then seeing "it has no force," and the majority of Congress is sure not to do wrong, why have any Constitution at all? Why restrain this body of sages by any restrictions whatever? Why not let them make their own Constitution every session? Indeed, why administer any oath of office? Is not it an insult to make such a body swear that it will do its duty? In old times, it used to be supposed that constitutions were made for the protection of the minority against the majority, but then the simpletons of that period were not aware that majorities never tyrannize, or even desire to tyrannize. Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont, in replying to Mr. Drake, asked "whether all history did not demonstrate that the greatest safeguard of liberty and private rights was to be found, not in the legislative branch of the government, but in the fundamental law administered by an independent and fearless judiciary?" Mr. Edmunds seems to be getting "unsound."

M. André Cochut, the well-known French economist, has a very interesting article in the last number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, in which he states once more, and unanswerably, as it seems to us, the Cuban case against Spain, which is probably stronger than ever colony had against a mother country. There is hardly a single principle of political justice which has not been violated in the government of the island. Moreover, he alleges that the Cubans contributed heavily in money to assist the revolutionary chiefs in their arrangements for the overthrow of the Queen, and were thus entitled to expect a full share in whatever benefits flowed from the success of the enterprise. The reply of the Spaniards, of course, is that their good intentions were frustrated by the revolt, and that if the Cubans will lay down their arms they shall have justice. M. Cochut, however, suggests as one difficulty in the way of the Spanish Government in dealing fairly with the island, the heavy interest of the Spanish trading and manufacturing class in the maintenance of the monopoly of which the Cubans are now the victims. M. Cochut sees no probable termination to the present struggle, and no possible means of restoring Cuban prosperity except the autonomy of the island, and lauds highly the forbearance and honorable dealing of the United States towards the Spaniards.

The Porto Rican deputies have, however, at last obtained seats in the Cortes, and early in November gave that body an account of the condition of the island, which, according to them, is horrible. Six deputies out of ten spoke, and they all told the same story; there were no roads, no schools, no police; trials were secret, condemnations arbitrary, punishments cruel, the laws mere decrees of the Governor, the taxes overwhelming, and, to crown all, there was slavery. The new constitution for the island has been drafted, admitting it to the rank of a Spanish province.

An account of the proceedings in the McFarland divorce case has been furnished to the Cincinnati Commercial by an Indianapolis correspondent, from which it appears that violence to the extent of smashing furniture and crockery, besides habitual drunkenness and failure to support his family, and two or three abandonments of his wife, were proved against him by her father, herself, and Mrs. L. G. Calhoun, of the New York Tribune. But the proceedings were conducted as privately as possible; the only notice to the defendant, who did not appear, was the publication of the summons four times in a weekly paper of the town of Martinsville in Indiana. The State Attorney appears to have intervened to the extent of cross-examining the witnesses; but a cross-examination without any knowledge of the facts, and without any instruction from the other side, was of course of no use whatever. Whatever be the merits of this case—and we have no intention of casting any discredit on any of the witnesses examined in it—we have only to repeat, as to the value of such divorces, that to annul a contract like that of marriage on an ex-parte hearing, and without any notice, or attempt to give notice, to the other party, beyond publication in an obscure country paper eight hundred miles from his residence, is an enormity which Indiana may of course perpetrate as she pleases, but to which other States ought to give no countenance or sanction. We suppose there are few persons who are not cognizant of cases in which perfectly innocent, often helpless and dependent, wives have found themselves divorced in this way, without their knowledge, from rascally husbands, who, after having deserted them for the requisite year, and supplied proof of the requisite term of residence, are thus set free, perhaps to marry a paramour.

We perceive that subscriptions are being collected to assist in McFarland's defence, and judging from a little stump speech made by that gentleman to the coroner's jury prior to his committal, he evidently considers himself the champion of domestic purity, and other people are helping to confirm him in his delusion. If anything were wanting to make this repulsive affair still more repulsive, it would be the conversion of his trial into a defense of the institution of marriage, and himself into a here; and yet, we fear, we shall witness it, or something very like it. We believe he and his friends are abundantly able to provide for his defence, and we hope no indignation over the Richardson marriage will seduce intelligent and respectable people into helping to put a good face on a cold-blooded and cowardly murder, by giving him any money for any purpose. Do not let us have in New York a revolting farce like the Sickles or Cole trial. Mr. Beecher has, by the way, retracted his charge of adultery against McFarland, interpolated in the report of his address at the funeral which appeared in the New York Tribune.

The Indianapolis Journal, in reply to the attacks, now so numerous, on the administration of the divorce laws of that State, says that "the Indiana lawyers and judges, far from encouraging divorce suits, dislike and avoid them extremely, and that persons coming into the State merely for the purpose of residing the length of time requisite to procure a divorce, have the seal of social disapprobation irrevocably placed on them." To get an Indiana divorce, the petitioner has to swear that he or she is a bonâ-fide resident of the State; and if he or she swears it, what, the Journal asks, can the Judge do? In short, it throws the whole blame of whatever scandal Indiana divorces have caused on the perjurers from other States who flock in to get them. This is all very well as far as it goes; but then who is responsible for the State's being a place to which perjurers love to resort? Surely the people of it. When they find that their laws attract vicious people it is their duty to change them, instead of calling on other States, as the Journal does, not to have bad men and women among their population. One little change we will take the liberty of suggesting—a denial of divorce in all cases in which both parties are not real residents in the State, and the rigid exaction of proof of personal service of the summons on the defendant. It would appear, however, that a person coming into the State as Mrs. McFarland did, for the mere purpose of getting a divorce, is not a bonâ-fide resident, and, what is more to the purpose, the Judge, her lawyers, and the State Attorney must have known it.

The Delaware State Journal and Statesman, after speaking of the Nation in terms which modesty forbids us to quote, mentions, by way of giving additional weight to our views on the Georgia question, that "the editor holds a Federal office by appointment of General Grant." The Journal and Statesman will, we are sure, be sorry to hear that there is no truth in this assertion. It describes what ought to be, no doubt, but which, alas! is not. We hold no office, and, what is worse, none has ever been offered us, nor has anybody ever "gone to Washington" on our account. To say that we do not feel this would be mere affectation, through which the simplest would see. We should, we confess, have valued some little place greatly, not for the sake of the money, but for the sentiment of the thing. We have bottled up our wrath pretty well so far, but patience on some subjects has its limits, and General Grant will shortly hear from us.

The conflict of the free-traders and protectionists in France grows faster and more furious. The treaty with England will be, next year, terminable on a year's notice, and the protectionists are making fierce assaults on it, under cover of the odium attaching to the arbitrary way in which it was negotiated and imposed on the country. By way of stopping their mouths, the Government has ordered a commission to enquire into its effects on certain branches of manufactures about which most complaint is made—namely, metallurgy and its subsidiary trades, and the cotton, linen, and woollen manufactures. But the commission contains Rouher and Michel Chevalier, who helped to frame the treaty, as well as other free-traders, and is therefore treated by the protectionists as a farce. To pacify them, the Emperor offered places on it to Pouyer-Quertier, the well-known manufacturer and agitator, as well as M. Brame, Baron Gros, and others; but as these gentlemen are only offered a voice, and not a vote, they will probably all decline. Pouyer-Quertier has done so already, with some indignation; but then he is naturally in a bad humor, having failed terribly as a candidate for the legislature, both in Rouen and Paris, people not caring much about his tariff gospel, and caring a great deal about his thick-and-thin support of the worst acts of the Imperial régime during the last eighteen years. He was plunged into confusion on the platform in Paris by being asked, after having proclaimed himself an unflinching foe of despotism, whether he had not voted fourteen times for the law of Public Safety (which enabled the Government to transport people without trial). He had to confess, and, after confession, of course there was nothing left for him but to disappear. The south is, in the meantime, coming out fiercely in defence of the treaty—Lyons, Marseilles, and Bordeaux, as the representatives of the great silk and wine interests, joining hands in support of it. The general opinion now is that the executive will do nothing more about it at present, and the commission will report nobody knows when.

The Austrian imbroglio seems to be making but little progress towards settlement, at least as far as regards the Czech difficulty. If the slaves could be got to lump their claims and pretensions, of course the trouble would soon be over. But then the Galicians claim autonomy as Poles, and mainly with the view of making the province a rallying-ground for the champions of Polish independence. The Bohemians, on the other hand, stand up for a revival, with the necessary modifications required by the federal union, of the historic kingdom of Bohemia, with of course a Czech government, against which 2,000,000 of Germans resident in Bohemia, and possessing a large portion of its wealth and enterprise, protest violently. Until some arrangement has been hit upon that will satisfy all parties, or at all events supply a bond strong enough to hold the empire together, if exposed to any strains, all talk of Austria's engaging in aggressive demonstrations against any other power is simply absurd.

The New York Times, instead of waiting, as we proposed, three or six months to see whether that "triple alliance" came to anything, insists upon trying to "corner" us before Christmas, and, after having brought the Pall Mall Gazette against us, now produces the Moscow Gazette, as cited by Dr. Abel, the Berlin correspondent of the London Times, and Dr. Abel himself. Now, the Times ought to have quoted the whole letter; we would do so ourselves if we had room, as in this way we should put the alliance on the shelf till February, at least. What it does quote proves nothing. In the first place, the Times does not seem to understand the position of the Moscow Gazette. That paper owes all its importance to its being the organ of the fanatical old Moscovite party, and that party has undoubtedly some influence in Russia; but the Gazette is in no sense the organ of the Government, or the exponent of its wishes. We are sorry to find that the Times thinks it is better informed on questions of European politics than the Nation. On some questions it doubtless is; on others—and the probability of this triple alliance is one of them—we aver, blushingly, that the Times is in error. In fact, we can think of no reason for the Times considering it an authority at all, except that Moscow is a great way off. Moreover—and this is the best of the story—the Berlin correspondent of the London Times, whom we admit to be one of the best authorities in existence on the politics of Germany, actually agrees with us and does n't agree with the Times. He refers, indeed, to the speculations of the Gazette, but only to express his opinion that there is nothing in them. He says that on the field of diplomacy "there is many a seed sown that is not destined to grow up." "People in Berlin," he adds, "indulge the hope that the Paris and St. Petersburg parties at the bottom of the scheme will either be prevented by their sovereigns from carrying it out, or, themselves thinking better of it, as was done some time ago in a similar case, eventually shrink from the perilous adventure of provoking the nation of Germany. Should these expectations be disappointed, it is scarcely probable that Austria will be one of the interesting trio." We must remind the Times, also, that we never said that no "triple alliance" was "talked of in Europe." What we said was (Nov. 18) that "few who have paid even slight attention to Austrian and Prussian politics during the past year will credit a report of an alliance, for any practical purpose, between Russia and Austria as against Prussia." The Moscow Gazette says there ought to be an alliance between France and Russia for this purpose, and "hopes" there will. Dr. Abel says he doubts whether there will, and that "it is scarcely probable that Austria will belong to it."

THE RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Readers of the Nation need not be reminded that, in our opinion, the discussion of the resumption of specie payments can never arrive at any satisfactory result so long as the present popular views of specie payments are adhered to. The whole theory of maintaining specie payments with a paper currency is based upon the ability of the bank or government that issues the paper currency to redeem it on presentation. Now, the only paper currency that can be redeemed at all times is that for every dollar of which a gold dollar is held in readiness to redeem it by the bank or government issuing it. If a bank issues ten millions of currency and has nine millions of gold in its vaults, and the ten millions of currency are presented for redemption, the bank must suspend specie payments. If all the gold in the United States, estimated at about two hundred and forty millions of dollars, were in the vaults of the National Banks, and the National Banks were called upon to redeem all the currency they have issued—three hundred millions—they would be obliged to suspend specie payments. If the United States Government contracted its greenback currency from four hundred and fifty millions to one hundred millions, and held its present stock of, say, ninety millions of gold, and the one hundred millions of greenbacks were presented for payment, the Treasury would have to suspend. If the Bank of France or the Bank of England were called upon to redeem one-half or one-third of their notes outstanding, they would have to suspend specie payments, just as the New York banks did in 1857 and in 1861. The ability of any bank to maintain specie payments so long as it issues one dollar more of notes than it has specie in its vaults depends entirely upon that one dollar not being presented for redemption. It does not matter whether a bank has one dollar in gold for every two or three or four dollars of its circulation; so long as it does not have one dollar in gold for each dollar of circulation, it will be obliged to suspend if the whole or a large portion of its circulation is presented for redemption. The soundness, the responsibility of the bank, its resources in other kinds of property, unlimited if you please, have nothing to do directly with its ability to redeem its circulation if presented. No one doubts the general solvency of the United States Government, yet if it had all the gold in the country in its vaults, it could not redeem its greenbacks if they were presented. The National Banks are supposed to be abundantly sound, yet if they had all the gold in the country in their vaults they could not redeem their notes if they were presented.

No one will believe this to be a serious statement. The answer will readily rise to every one's lips: if the Treasury had so large an amount of gold in its vaults, every one would know that he could get the gold for his greenbacks whenever he wanted it, and no one would present any greenbacks for redemption. Or, if the National Banks had so much gold in their vaults, who would not prefer to hold and use and carry bank-notes? Who would think of presenting them for redemption?

But our statement is a perfectly serious one. The answer which rises to every one's lips is precisely the whole popular fallacy that underlies the whole misunderstanding of the question.

Paper money in our present state of civilization is in almost every respect preferable to specie. For all domestic uses, paper money that can be at all times redeemed for specie will have the preference over all other kinds of money. For domestic use no one will think of presenting greenbacks or national bank-notes for redemption as long as he knows that he can have them redeemed whenever he chooses. But there is one use for which paper money is not preferable to specie. There is one use for which paper money is totally useless, and for which specie is absolutely required. That use is the payment of debt abroad. However much confidence foreigners may have in our securities, there is one security they will not take. They will not take our greenbacks nor our national bank-notes. When we have to pay them anything we owe them, they demand specie. They may be perfectly convinced that the Treasury or the banks have gold enough to pay every note twice over, but they do not want to send for it; others to whom they owe money may not believe it; others may insist upon having the gold from them; and so they must insist upon having the gold from us. We have to send them the gold, and in order to get it we have to go to the Treasury or the banks and ask them to redeem their notes, so that we can get the gold. We know perfectly well that they can redeem them, every dollar, yet that does not prevent us from presenting the notes for redemption, because we need the gold. The popular fallacy is just this: that no notes will be presented for redemption as long as the holders know that they can have them redeemed at any time. The truth is, that under certain circumstances the ability of the banks to redeem their notes will not prevent the notes from being presented for redemption. Unless, therefore, the banks or the Treasury hold a dollar in gold for every dollar of currency issued, their ability to maintain specie payments after resumption will depend, not upon the popular belief in their ability to redeem, but simply upon the amount of notes that holders may be obliged to present for redemption because they need the gold. In other words, the ability of the banks or the Treasury to maintain specie payments after resumption does not depend, as the "practical, common-sense" school of financiers so confidently assert, upon the popular belief in their ability to do so, but simply upon their actual ability to redeem such notes as may be presented for gold needed to export abroad. In short, the ability of the Treasury or the banks to resume specie payments does not depend upon the Treasury, or the banks, or Congress, or the will of the whole people, but simply on the amount of gold likely to be required for export. If the amount of gold likely to be required for export is in excess of our annual production, no power that we know of can maintain resumption. If the amount of gold likely to be required for export is even near our annual production, the maintenance of resumption would be impossible. Resumption and the maintenance of resumption will be possible just so soon as a steady annual export of specie of considerably less than our annual production gives a reasonable assurance that our growing stock on hand will suffice to meet any sudden emergency of more than ordinary magnitude. Then resumption will be possible, but no sooner.

Seen by the light of this statement, which we take to be incontrovertible, Senator Sumner's plan of resuming specie payments, by substituting national bank-notes for the outstanding greenbacks, at once appears valueless. For the substitution of one kind of paper money for another cannot increase either our annual production of gold or diminish its probable annual export. It is true, as the Massachusetts Senator asserts, that the reduction of the amount of greenbacks outstanding, of which the national banks are obliged to have a certain quantity on hand for the redemption of their notes, would compel these same banks to hold a larger proportion of specie for the same purpose, and thus gradually bring them nearer to the point where they could resume entirely in specie. But where is the specie to come from that they are to hold in increasing quantities? Will a law obliging the banks to hold it increase the supply? It is not claimed that it would. But it is claimed that, if the banks could not get the specie which the law required them to hold, they would be compelled to withdraw a corresponding quantity of their notes, and thereby get nearer to specie payments. In other words, the whole plan of Senator Sumner is disguised contraction, or nothing at all. Now, if the position taken by us at starting is correct, it must be shown that contraction will either increase the production of gold or diminish its export, or else contraction can not be claimed as an aid of resumption.

Thoughtful contractionists believe that a moderate contraction of the currency would cause increased economy, diminished consumption of foreign goods would diminish our imports from abroad, and thereby lessen the probable export of specie, and thus aid in resumption. We will not attempt to deny that contraction would cause increased economy; indeed, it would lead to some suffering and widespread impoverishment, and a largely diminished consumption of foreign goods. But does a mere diminished importation also necessarily diminish the probable export of gold? The amount of gold to be exported, roughly stated, is the amount by which our imports exceed our exports. The imports alone do not make up the difference. It is necessary that the exports continue the same. If the exports diminish as much as the imports, the balance to be covered by the export of gold would remain unchanged. Now, nothing can be more certain than that our ability to export largely depends upon a large domestic production, that the only stimulus to domestic production or production of any kind is found in the prospect of a profitable sale, that contraction and forced economy diminish the prices of all products and diminish consequently the prospect of a profitable sale of products, diminish the stimulus to production, and consequently diminish production itself. But if our ability to export largely depends upon a large production, will not diminished production diminish our exports, and will not smaller exports of products compel a larger export of coin? It is evident that contraction will not diminish the export of coin.

We are not arguing the question of contraction generally. It is possible that our currency is in excess of our wants, and may have to be reduced, but any argument in favor of reduction must be based on some other grounds than its aid to specie payments by means of its supposed effect in diminishing the export of gold. That contraction is not necessary to produce economy is very evident from the fact that with our present expanded currency extravagance of every kind is notoriously decreasing every day, and is being followed by a compulsory economy of the most pinching kind. That without contraction prices of every article are rapidly declining need not be told to any one who has anything to sell. That without a dollar of contraction our credit abroad is rapidly improving, every one knows who reads the daily papers. We are strongly impressed with the belief that within a few years the present circulation of the country will be largely decreased, but let not contraction therefore be prematurely urged as a remedy for evils that it will not cure, or as a doubtful stimulus to subtle changes that are accomplishing themselves without that aid.

But when shall we be ready to resume? That question, of course, is not easily answered. Gold is now selling at about 123. The exports of gold this year have fallen considerably below those of last year, and for the last four months have entirely ceased. We have a large portion of an abundant grain crop, and of a liberal cotton crop at high prices, left to export. The present condition of the foreign exchanges indicates that there is no large foreign indebtedness now maturing. The importing trade all complain of unusual depression of business and a growing indisposition to import goods from abroad. There is, therefore, a reasonable probability that there will be no large coin export for some months to come. Should this presumption prove correct, and the present depression in business continue for any length of time, we shall probably find by the end of spring that we have added a large portion of the annual production of specie to our stock on hand, and are to that extent better prepared for resumption. The premium on gold is then likely to be lower. The losses involved in resumption are then likely to be less. The minds of the people, no longer looking at specie payments as a distant event, will have been gradually preparing for it. Returning thrift and economy will have increased our exportable products and diminished our importations far beyond what contraction or forced resumption could have done, and if we are, in addition, favored with good crops next fall, we may see Congress, in its session of 1870, discuss the practical measures necessary to resumption with some prospect of resumption being maintained. Until then, the whole question is likely to remain untouched.

THE BAR AND THE JUDGES.

In any very evil state of society, the blame is generally to be about equally divided among all classes of men. The evil may be more conspicuous at one point than at another; but, on a close examination, it is usually found that the stain goes very deep and reaches all orders—all departments of government. In the discussion to which the judicial corruption of this State has given rise, the invectives of the press and public have been launched altogether at the heads of the venal judges. Very little has been said about the responsibility of the bar for the present state of things. Nevertheless, a good deal may be said with justice. In other countries, and in the better days of our own, the bar, in one way or another, always assumed a position of authority and responsibility about the organization and procedure of the courts of law. It has professed to know more on these subjects than the rest of the community, and has claimed the right of being listened to as an authority on them. Thus it has dictated the selection of judges; it has moulded the reforms in pleading; it has managed the admission of its own members; in short, it has stood between the public and the courts, protecting each against the interference of the other.

Of late years, however, not only in this State, but in all the States, a totally different view of the relations of the bar to the courts has become popular, and has at length not only worked its way into State constitutions, but has now begun to be favorably regarded by many members of the very profession whose most deadly foe it is. According to this new theory, the judiciary is responsible, not to the bar, but to a vague, indeterminate, inconstant, changing body, popularly called and believed to be "the people," but, in reality, being a succession of irresponsible party caucuses. According to this view, of course, there is no longer any relation of duty between courts and lawyers. The courts, just like any other political bodies, are responsible to their constituency, "the people," while the bar has now only duties to perform toward its clients. In the old order of things, an order which still exists in theory, a barrister was an officer of court, responsible to his superior; in the new order he is about as much an officer of court as, let us say, an elective sheriff. Lawyers, knowing that they have no voice in matters relating to the judiciary, come to regard the judge somewhat in the light of an alien enemy gifted with extraordinary powers, the operation of which it is their business to elude as far as possible.

Thus far the new theory only affects the relation of lawyers and judges, without touching the essential characteristics of the bar as a learned profession. But it would be a mistake to suppose it stops here. Its next step is to change the organization of the bar. Under the pretence that justice requires that law, just like the ready-made clothes or retail apple business, should be thrown open to all comers, regardless of their ability or proficiency, the friends of the "people" next broke down, whenever it was in their power, all the conditions of admission to practice. It was urged, as a conclusive argument, that no long study was required by the State of licensed pedlars or cattle-drovers; why, then, should any be required of licensed attorneys? The people could judge, it was said, whether a lawyer was a good lawyer or a bad, and if this was so, there was no reason for any restrictions upon practice. It was in vain that it was replied that clients, as a matter of fact, found it very hard to judge between a charlatan and an efficient counsellor, or that the very persons who were least likely to be good judges were the same ignorant poor who were most likely to expose themselves to the deceptions of impostors. Nor did the advocates of the new order pay any heed to the argument—a very efficient one, if standing alone—that the entire judicial system, being a purely artificial creation, called into existence by the State for purposes of its own, was eminently a fit subject for regulations and restrictions of all kinds. We say this argument found no friends, and the reason is evident. After the bench had been thrown into the market, it was absurd to maintain a fastidious inconsistency about the bar. So, at one fell swoop, bench and bar were thrown into the arena, and judicial and professional honors became the prizes of a degraded scramble. It is true that in most States "boards of examination" were allowed to remain amid the general wreck, but how much good they have done is hardly even problematical, for they have always been rather a legal fiction than anything else. The same deference to "the people" which gave the new movement its original impulse sufficed to prevent the boards of examination from any greater efficiency than may be comprised in methodically registering and passing all applicants. It is perhaps surprising that these boards have not themselves been made elective bodies; if they had been, the dominant political party might have acquired the control of the bar as it has of everything besides. We throw this out as a mere suggestion for what it is worth.

The remaining move made by the advocates of the changes we have been commenting on, was to keep at a low point the salaries of the judges. The effect of this upon the character of the bench is obvious. Its effect upon the relation of the bar to the bench, though less evident, is no less real. The low rate of remuneration accorded the judges under the new system made it at first difficult, and at length impossible, for any of the best lawyers to accept judicial positions, and thus one more link was severed between the judiciary and the bar. So long as the elevation of accomplished lawyers to the bench was a familiar spectacle, so long, of course, did the bar continue to regard itself as a part of one judicial whole. The more unfamiliar the spectacle, the more alien does the judiciary seem. Gradually the old ideas of mutual responsibilities and mutual duties die out. The lawyer comes to look upon himself as the carpenter or the tailor looks upon himself, and upon the bench as a political engine of oppression and wrong, which often thwarts, but may, if judiciously used, further his professional schemes. While the judges still continue pure, he uses ordinary means; when they become corrupt, he grumbles and becomes a corruptor. He has no control, no influence, no authority; he is only a lawyer. Why should he interfere? The people elects Barnard, Cardozo, and McCunn; if it likes them as well as Kent, and Marshall, and Story, let it be so. If the minds of the lawyers of this city were to-morrow opened for public inspection, who does not know the uniform type of cynical indifference which would appear to view?

For the last twenty years the courts of this State have been steadily sinking in integrity, dignity, and intelligence, until to-day there is hardly a judge within the limits of New York who is not at least suspected of corruption the moment his name appears before the public. Yet in all this time the bar has maintained a timid silence on the subject, some of the causes of which we have endeavored to point out. Although it has long been manifest to most of the intelligent lawyers of the city that unless they moved nobody would move, and the state of affairs must continue to grow worse until some terrible calamity should rouse the public to action, still they did nothing. They grumbled in private, they confided horrible tales to their wives and their friends; but as for action, that seemed as far off as ever. The consequence of their silence was that, for a long time, no knowledge could be obtained of the nature of the difficulties in the way of reform, except what came in the shape of a vague, inarticulate cry from the newspapers. But the objection to the ordinary newspaper as an organ of law reform is, that however immaculate a slogan it may set up, its accusations of corruption are so common and so indiscriminate, and it is so unsparing at all times of its vocabulary of abuse, that when the necessity for really strong language comes, no one pays any more attention to its attacks than they would in the case of an ordinary "newspaper controversy." When, in addition to this, it is remembered that the profession of journalism does not generally include a knowledge of the common and statutory law, the slight effect of the great dailies in this matter may perhaps be accounted for. But let the bar speak, and all is different. The public will always attend to the opinions of experts when the public interest is involved. And there are several signs that the prolonged and dangerous taciturnity of the bar is at length coming to an end. The appearance of the appeal by eminent lawyers on behalf of the judiciary amendment in this State, and the singular success with which this movement was attended, points to an increased interest in reform on the part of the only portion of the public who are really competent to pronounce an opinion. The projected organization of the Law Reform League within the bar points in the same direction. In 1873, according to the provisions of the new judiciary article, the question will be put to the people whether they will retain the present system or substitute that of appointment. All parties are disgusted with the present régime, and with energy and concerted action the elective system may in that year be for ever destroyed. On the other hand, if the change is not made then, the State goes on in the old road for twenty more years—until another constitutional convention meets—and then the effect of this may be imagined.

A CATHOLIC LESSON FOR PROTESTANTS.

THERE is one instructive feature of the Œcumenical Council, to which, however, it would, perhaps, be useless to draw the attention of anybody but Protestants; and that is, the striking illustration it offers of the power of organization. Catholics, of course, will not be persuaded that the force which enables an old and not very able priest to summon from the four quarters of the globe an assembly whose decisions the greater portion of Christendom will regard as the direct utterances of Divine wisdom, and a dozen sovereigns are looking for with real anxiety, does not emanate directly, and as it were miraculously, from the Almighty himself. But Protestants, whatever they may think of Romish doctrines, have long been satisfied, and with abundant reason, that the organization known as the Roman Catholic Church, such as we see it, with its great clerical army, its elaborate yet skilful discipline, its wonderful power of using all kinds and conditions of men for its own advancement, of adapting itself to all stages of civilization and all varieties of manners and antecedents, of bringing learned and simple, proud and humble, to kneel before its altars with a forgetfulness of worldly distinctions which the Protestant sects all preach, and sigh, and pray for, but have never been able to bring about, is simply a legacy bequeathed to the modern world by the Roman Empire. Mr. Maine has pointed out, in the closing chapter of his great work, the influence which was exercised on the doctrines of the Latin Church by the Roman lawyers, into whose practised and cunning hands the moulding of the ecclesiastical organization naturally passed, or, at all events, from whose minds and methods the church naturally received a powerful impress after it had emerged from the Catacombs and become the religion of the state. It was from them, too, that the clergy undoubtedly learned the art which they have never since lost—the art of government, the art which enabled them to build up on the ruins of the political empire, and without other materials than savages and slaves, that splendid spiritual empire which, because it is spiritual, is perhaps the greatest glory of the human race, and whose wonderful passage through fifteen hundred years of storm and change, the oldest, proudest, and, all things considered, most powerful of existing institutions, the Œcumenical Council meets to celebrate.

Now, the thing which distinguishes the Latin Church to-day from the Greek Church, and which distinguishes it from all the sects which have broken off from it, which makes it a sovereign power treating on equal terms with secular governments, instead of being a mere state institution for the spread of religious instruction, or an obscure association of believers for worship and mutual edification, is, undoubtedly, that it has from the beginning been managed by jurists, or men thoroughly permeated by the juridical spirit. Mere theologians, or mere moralists, or mere politicians, would have made shipwreck of the church as an organization long before the ninth century. The Christian religion they, no doubt, would have preserved—that had foundations to which the Roman lawyers could make no additions; but the Catholic Church, as we now see and know it, could never have passed through the Dark Ages and come down to our time if there had not always remained at its head a body of men who had inherited the great traditions of the Roman bar, its knowledge of human nature, its sagacity, its subtlety, its faith in human reason, and, above all, in cultivated human reason, as the controller and director of the affairs of men.

The Roman lawyers, it must be remembered, were not simply what the modern bar is so apt to be—a mere body of advocates enduring drudgery for hire; they were, in reality, a body of philosophers, to whom the Roman people committed, through several centuries, the moulding of their jurisprudence—that is, the application to the regulation of their public and private affairs of the best morality of the time. They were, too, almost equally familiar with legislation and administration, and passed with a facility unknown in our day from the laborious studies of the closet to the command of armies and government of provinces. In short, the Roman people, wonderful in many ways, were above all wonderful in this, that they not only emerged from barbarism mainly through their own efforts, but they, through all their storms and revolutions, never lost sight of the fact that if a state is to live or be worth living in, its ablest men must make its laws and fill its offices; that, whatever the wishes of the people may be, it is in the silence of the jurist's study, and not amid the clamor of the forum, that the machinery for carrying them out must be provided. The result was that, in spite of their complete ignorance of political economy, and their maintenance of slavery, they succeeded, without gunpowder, or steam, or electricity, in building up an immense empire, in completely assimilating the greater part of it to Rome herself in morals and manners, and in so thoroughly permeating it with the spirit of her civilization that at this day her language forms the groundwork of that of three of the greatest nations of modern Europe, and there is not a court in Christendom whose judgments are not influenced or moulded by the opinions of the great lights of Roman jurisprudence. The Roman bar did not pass away without teaching the clergy the secret of Roman strength; and they used their knowledge and their juridical habits of thought to build up that wondrous ecclesiastical structure which to-day excites so much of the world's awe or detestation. They met the savage northern invaders in the same spirit of self-confidence which Suetonius expressed so finely in his speech to the legionaries in Britain when, with his little handful of men, he found himself opposed to the countless hosts of Boadicea—"not to mind the noise and empty threats of the barbarians; that the fate of every battle was decided by the swords of a few brave men."

It is very certain, as it seems to us, therefore, that "the army of progress" may learn a good deal from that venerable and, as many think, effete organization, the church. Human character has, within historic times, undergone considerable modification; but the constitution of the human mind remains and will remain the same as long as the race lasts. Knowledge will always be power; reason will always, in the long run, govern the affairs of men. Its doing so is one of the lines by which Providence has separated man from the brute. Human society is the most delicate of all pieces of God's handiwork; more delicate by far, even, to him who considers it aright, than the human body; and the power, the longevity, the influence for good, the share in carrying the world on to that golden age for which, whether as the Kingdom of God or the Good Estate, so many generations have sighed and have yet to sigh, which may be attributed to any one community, will always depend on the amount of cultivated reason it contains, which it brings to the conduct of its business. For communities which deliver themselves over to vain babblers, and potterers, and ignoramuses, and believe that the heights of heaven can be scaled by much speaking, there is clearly no lasting place, no great or illustrious destiny, reserved in this world of ours as at present ordered.

A PEEP INTO THE CABINET WINDOWS.

WASHINGTON, December 12, 1869.

THE liberal reformer's idea of an administration after his own heart would no doubt at the outset assume, like Voltaire's satire and Presidents' messages, that in this best of possible worlds this nation is the best of possible nations, and by consequence this Administration the best of all administrations, past or to come. But at this point the connection between the ideal and the real is certain to stop. The reformer would have said to himself that here, at the beginning of a period of sound and healthy reaction, is a new government chosen by common consent to restore peace, to sweep away abuses and corruption, to guide our great and vague ideas of national progress, and, as the result of all, to fix again deep in the popular mind the sound principles of constitutional republicanism, which have lost a little of their power, thanks to war and party politics. By a sort of natural and inevitable growth, a whole scheme of duties would develop itself regularly and consistently in the new President's mind, and, when the time came for laying it before the world, there could be no confusion or blundering; each part of the composition would be strongly sketched; harmony would rule everywhere; nothing would be wanting or out of place, nor could there be gaps, or botches, or blurs in a work where every touch was subordinate to a central idea. In an ideal President there are no mistakes of judgment, and still less any evasion of responsibilities which are the essence of government. All his words are weighed, with the end of maintaining the executive in its proper position of the chosen leader of the people in all its liberal and progressive projects. But perhaps one would take most pleasure in the working of an ideal administration; the unity and the solidarity, so to speak, of the different elements of the administrative brain; the economy of force shown in intelligent co-operation, from the President down to the errand-boys; the long and laborious discussions on what seem small points, as the disposition of a few thousand dollars in relief of taxation, or the difference of one-half per cent. in the interest of a new loan; the quick and decisive resistance to impertinent dictation from outside, as in the case of removals from office; the open and cordial reception of knowledge, from whatever source it might come; the deliberateness of reflection and decision; the unanimity when decision is reached; in short, the fixed purpose showing itself through every act to place the executive at the head of the government and the nation.

If any one who took up the President's message last Monday had these ideas in his head, he probably felt a lively degree of disappointment. Almost at the outset he would discover that the President does not propose to himself any general scheme of action, and he would be perplexed at learning that the President, so far from showing zeal for the correction of abuses, wishes to postpone all consideration of the taxes which most swarm with gross abuses, and this, too, without offering the smallest reason for postponement. The evils of the Civil Service do not even meet with so much as a word of notice, and the views presented in regard to political economy are almost calculated to upset one's faith in the progress of knowledge, and to call from another world the angry ghost of Adam Smith. Nor is this all. That the Government should express opinions which seem to a part of the public quite indefensible, is nothing very new to the world; but that it should express a variety of views on the same subject, each inconsistent with the others, and sometimes equally indefensible, is a novelty in administration. But the documents that come with the message offer precisely this spectacle. The President, for example, urges as the cardinal point of his internal policy an immediate return to specie payments by means of a sliding scale, without necessary contraction. The Secretary of the Treasury dissuades immediate resumption, but if anything is to be done he inclines to a regular monthly contraction. A reformer may be ready to agree with either, but certainly cannot follow both. The Secretary's political economy is quite as eccentric as that of his chief, but it would puzzle a professional juggler to know what he is driving at in regard to the commercial marine. The President recommends a reduction of the income tax. The Secretary's whole financial scheme seems limited to the conception of a visionary four and a half per cent. loan, and he would leave everything else, even the income tax, as it is, in order that the Government may continue to the end of time its superb operations in shaving its own notes. The Comptroller of the Currency has, on his specialty, views which are also peculiar to himself. The Secretary of the Interior urgently presses a reform of the Civil Service, which the President and the other Secretaries apparently are either indifferent or opposed to. And to crown all, while the President and the Secretary of the Treasury vie with each other in dissuading interference with the taxes, the Special Commissioner of the Revenue, with their apparent consent and encouragement, issues a most elaborate and vigorous denunciation of the tariff.

Here is certainly richness! Never was there a government which left its affairs in a looser, not to say a more slovenly condition, or troubled itself less about appearances. But the confusion has its advantages, too, and one of them is that any ordinary outside observer can without an effort look, as it were, into the windows of the Cabinet, since the windows are thus left wide open for every curious loafer to gape at. The President's message is an actual challenge to analytical criticism. One may take it to pieces like a child's puzzle. Here is the sensible and cautious touch of the Secretary of State! Yet it would have been interesting if he had expressed a little more distinctly his ideas as to the present legal status of the Alabama claims. There, all in a row, are ranged the other Secretaries! Every now and then one catches a nervous stroke which recalls the manner of the Attorney-General. So far, all is order; all is, if not very great, at least very good. But when one looks for the most important officer of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, one asks with surprise where on earth he has stuffed himself, and whence comes it that his department is in such hopeless confusion? Are the remarks on reciprocity conceived in his style? Is the postponement of reform in taxation his brilliant idea? The message recommends a reduction of the income tax, but Mr. Boutwell recommends maintaining all the taxes. Still less is the Secretary's hand to be seen in the currency projects of the message, which are in the most undisguised opposition to his ideas as contained in the report. The four and a half per cents may indeed be set down to his credit without a sigh, but the suggestion of a Commissionership of Customs Revenue is surely a long-cherished and often-urged project of Mr. Wells. What, then, has happened to the Secretary of the Treasury? The wide space his figure should fill is left void and blank, except for the vague outline of half-a-dozen blurred and unrecognizable forms which seem at one time to resemble the President, at another some one Secretary, or, again, some face not known to Washington. Is it possible that Mr. Boutwell has of his own accord obliterated himself in this shocking manner, or has he been compelled to do so? Or, most alarming supposition of all, is this droll figure of four and a half per cent. all that really exists of Mr. Boutwell anywhere in this world; his whole and identical image; what Carlyle would call Mr. Boutwell's mysterious ME, standing in the conflux of eternities?

Whatever may be the reason, it is perfectly evident that the financial part of the message shows nothing but confusion, want of concert, and strange mixture of boldness and timidity. The boldness is most evident in the remarks on the currency, and it is curious that precisely these remarks, all share in which is repudiated by the Secretary, show more study and reflection than almost any other part of the message. The President's plan of resumption is that which Sir Robert Peel adopted for the Bank of England in 1819, with the omission of much cumbrous machinery, and the substitution of a very ingenious scale of appreciating the value of the greenback in proportion to the ordinary rate of interest, so that there could be no motive for hoarding greenbacks, the bonds still remaining a better investment for capital. There is one weak point in this plan, which is the danger of a sudden turn in the foreign exchanges; but even against this the Treasury might be easily protected. The timidity of the message is most conspicuous in the evasion of the difficulties of taxation, and the only reason for this timidity seems to be the eagerness of the party hacks to escape the issue of protection, which threatens to cause serious trouble, and perhaps a general break-up of party lines. Yet it is universally agreed by all parties concerned that this recommendation to postpone can amount to nothing. The coal and iron battle has already begun, and must be fought out, whatever side the Administration takes. The only effect of the President's course is to throw the whole subject over to Congress, and to weaken and distract the energy of the reformers, so as to make it probable that the session will be wasted in empty disputes. Still, another result may be to encourage the movement which is on foot to put an end to Mr. Wells and his commission, which expires next June by limitation, unless renewed by a direct vote in Congress.

Turn and twist all these different threads, however, whichever way one chooses, they invariably lead back at last to the same point. While in all other respects the message is a strong document, and while the Secretary of State, though standing on less favorable ground, has surprised even his friends, and seems almost to carry the Administration on his shoulders, yet, wherever the region of finance is touched, one only finds the most unconcealed proof of a lack of unity, and often of irresolution or even downright ignorance. Something has evidently gone wrong in the Treasury, or the Secretary has proved himself to lack the strength necessary for his place, since wherever he is seen his influence is absolutely negative. This internal discordance makes the whole financial policy of the President more or less a failure. Even his bold lead in the currency question is weakened by it, since it is evidently not in harmony with his other ideas and those of his chief subordinate. But, after all, the true significance of the weakness so brought to light is the question it raises, whether, in the face of coming necessities, the situation can possibly last.

FATHER HYACINTHE AS AN ORATOR.

THE discourse of Father Hyacinthe in the Academy of Music last Thursday evening (the French conférence is a more expressive term for what was neither sermon, oration, nor lecture) was a charming lesson in rhetoric for American orators, professional or lay, fledged or unfledged. It was marked by the absence of that constant peculiarity of American oratory—the making an effect, or, what is worse, trying to make one; for whether or not the effect is produced, the effort at effect is conscious to the speaker and palpable to the hearer. An American orator goes at his audience as an enemy to be vanquished by the force of his logic, his figures, or his facts; to be captivated by some strategy of words; or, if need be, ridden over by a tremendous charge of eloquence at the last. All through his speech or oration he is working up his effects, with his mind so intent upon these that a perceptive hearer is all the while aware that an assault is being made upon him by a succession of climaxes; and as the speaker approaches the last of these, there is an accelerated movement, as at the close of a symphony, for which the whole apparatus of sound and motion is brought to the utmost intensity of action. With rare exceptions, the American orator does not at the outset put himself en rapport with his audience, as people of average good sense and an intelligent interest in his subject, to whom he is about to talk because he has something to say that is worth their hearing. He begins by feeling around his audience for some point of sympathy or attack, as the case may be, and seldom loses his consciousness either of himself or of his hearers by absorption in his theme. In these respects, American oratory is intensely forced and mechanical.

Father Hyacinthe, on the contrary, appeared before an audience of three thousand strangers in the quiet, easy way in which he converses in the parlor. Hardly seeming to raise his voice above the tone of ordinary conversation, he took up the word "apology," just dropped by the president in introducing him—"et moi aussi, mesdames et messieurs, j'ai besoin d'une excuse;" and after two or three minutes of pleasant, animated conversation, he had an audience of sympathizing listeners, to whom he could talk, if he chose, with his hand in his pocket—feeling that he had them there also. To be sure, he had the reputation of a great orator, and the favoring interest that attaches to his peculiar position; but these put him to the disadvantage of having to realize everybody's ideal of himself, and to disappoint a curiosity that prudence and delicacy forbade him to gratify. Yet speaking in an unaccustomed place and dress, amid surroundings far from congenial to his clerical tastes, under a cruel hoarseness—saying nothing of the Pope and Council or of his own position and prospects—he held the rapt attention of the assembly, and received its enthusiastic response. What was the secret of this? That one who for years has been acknowledged the foremost pulpit orator of Paris, the bare announcement of whose name would draw thousands to Notre Dame two hours before the appointed service, and whose conférence would hold standing for another hour the volatile and the serious, the common and the cultivated, in one accord of fixed, silent, earnest attention, must have the gift of speech in its divinest qualities, would have been accepted upon the testimony of these facts themselves, had no opportunity been given here for observing and analyzing so renowned an orator. And now that he has been seen and heard in contrast with our own orators, it is difficult to say more than this—that he does move his hearers with a masterly and fascinating power, and (as De Pressensé has described his preaching in Notre Dame) "seems to send over them a breath that lifts them like the waves of the sea," while at the same time his own soul "is like an Æolian harp, quivering with intelligence and sensitiveness, vibrating with every breeze that blows about it."

His manner, as we have said, is easy and natural—that of a cultivated gentleman engaged in earnest, animated conversation. A musical and flexible voice, possessing that peculiar quality called sympathetic, at once charms the ear and excites the hearer to a pleasurable susceptibility independent of the words spoken; and the orator has so trained and cultivated this instrument that though it possesses no great compass, and is incapable of deep and heavy notes, a mere inflexion will give new force to a sentence, and a word or clause uttered diminuendo will seem to draw after it the soul of the hearer into the very depths of the speaker's own soul. This magnetism he knows well how to use, and the natural play of emotions through the tones and cadences of his voice is the very perfection of oratorical art. Father Hyacinthe uses this power to the best advantage in those two effective forms of sentence, the antithesis and the climax. His sentences are transparently clear, and so well constructed that every word is fitted to its place; and when he advances from step to step in thought, until the sentence grows to a paragraph, each clause is so adjusted to its fellows, and the whole structure is so simple and withal so rhythmical, that the mind takes it in without an effort—or, rather, is carried into it as if this were its own thinking. But in the delivery, Father Hyacinthe makes every advance of thought telling by his varied rendering of the emphatic word. Thus, in his discourse upon "Civil Society and Christianity," speaking of the original right to the soil of him who first cultivates it, he says:

"Ah! when I have done this, there is no power on earth—even though it call itself Louis XIV.—which has the right to stand up and say, as this monarch once said, 'I am the owner; you are the tenant.' No! the owner is myself. It is all mine—soil as well as crop. You cannot rend that patch of earth from me; neither can you give me a title to it. My right consists in the act of my will, which said to this field, this forest, Be mine. My right consists in the landmark I have placed in the hedge I have planted. My right! it is in the sweat of my brow, the blood upon my hands, the rude embraces with which my love and labor have seized and fertilized the land. Henceforth that land belongs to the person of man. I hold it in my own right, and God stands by me in the claim."

The finish of each sentence in Father Hyacinthe's discourses shows that they are fashioned with care, yet there is nothing elaborate or complicated in their construction. He does not write before speaking, but meditates long and profoundly, and brings everything into the best shape in his own mind. In speaking, his gestures, like his voice, obey the impulses of nature; he never studies dramatic effects.

The thought of Father Hyacinthe's discourses is not properly philosophical in its conception, nor formally logical in its method. Rather it is philosophy under the forms of poetry, and logic fused into feeling. Yet every discourse evinces a subjective order of reflection and composition in the mind of the orator. As one listens to him the method of his discourse is latent—for seldom is his argument in the form of a syllogism, or strictly consecutive—and at times he appears rather to be saying beautiful and brilliant things about his subject than developing the subject itself. Yet, as in the best musical compositions the trained ear will detect the theme running through the entire movement, so in the after-study of one of Father Hyacinthe's conférences, if not at the moment of listening, there is apparent a law of unity ordering the movement of the whole; a central theme of thought around which his exquisitely toned sentences move as progressive variations.

This was true of last Thursday's conférence. His subject was "The Conduct of Life." First defining life as essentially motion, having a point of departure, a direction, and an end, he described the heart as the force motrice in the life of man, a force at once conciliating and ruling between reason and sense; it idealizes and purifies both thought and sensation; the sensations mount to it, and reason descending, the two therein unite and fecundate. Reason alone cannot supply a serene emotion, a principle of consolation. In the moral order the heart is the power of loving. Above all, man is a lover, and therein lies his strength. He who thinks in his heart is the true man, the good man, the happy man. At this point the speaker broke forth in a fervid exhortation to love—love the family, love country, love the state, love right and justice, love the church, not as a sect, but as that divine institution which unites under one banner all the children of Jesus Christ. The heart as the motive power teaches that life should be devoted neither exclusively to temporal things, nor to heavenly things to the neglect of the earthly. As at the first, man was placed in the Garden to till it, so the Eden of to-day is our planet, which we are to subdue and enrich as an act of duty to God and a preparation for heaven. And so the heart carries religion into daily life. And this motive power tends to the realization of the brotherhood of humanity, a consummation which Father Hyacinthe eloquently described as the grand problem of the nineteenth century and of this continent.

Here was a course of thought and argument logically connected in the mind of the orator, though not after the manner of Mill; and a real philosophy, both mental and ethical, though not formulated after the manner of Sir William Hamilton. Indeed, a part of the charm of Father Hyacinthe's oratory lies in the fact that he conveys important truths by suggestions rather than propositions, and is so much the thinking of the heart. Yet it is not wanting in deep, close thinking—a little scholastic, and at times mystical, but nevertheless profound and original thinking; for while it is easy to see that to an American audience there was nothing new or striking in last Thursday's conférence, yet from him it was both fresh and original; and there was an intense interest in hearing from the lips of a priest of the Roman Catholic Church the declaration of the sovereignty of conscience, the sanctity of marriage, the divine ordination of the family, the spiritual unity of the Church, the universal brotherhood of mankind in freedom and equality. Despotic rule in France has taught him the art of uttering the boldest truths under suggestive forms that escape the letter of the law; and so in these significant utterances he defined his position toward the Pope and the Church without really naming either. His address before the Peace League is a fine example of this power in its hits at "personal government." All his thoughts are in harmony with the highest truths, and show the broadest sympathy with humanity, and the widest charity for all who possess the love of Christ. They seem to flow spontaneously from the heart; and this marks the third and highest point in the analysis of his oratory. Father Hyacinthe is a man of deep convictions; a thoroughly sincere man; one feels that he believes what he says, and is in earnest because he believes it. This sincerity and earnestness of feeling rise at times to a sublime fervor of utterance. As he portrayed the heart as the true motive power of life, he stood before his audience the impersonation of his doctrine that the heart creates ideas—that ideas are not gained by climbing the ladder of reason, but "descend from God, and take life and dwell within us, and make the mystery of our actual life, its deliciousness, its sublimity, its deification." In uttering such sentiments, Father Hyacinthe is borne aloft by the fervor of his own feeling; with upturned eyes, unconscious of himself or his hearers, he seems to be conversing with God in the lofty, fiery strains of Isaiah, or rapt in contemplation with the mystic beauty of Fra Angelico. De Pressensé had caught this impression when he wrote, "The imagination of Father Hyacinthe is beautiful and grand; he seems even to be lifted by the movement of his own thought and heart, and at his best moments he has a power of fascination which is absolutely incomparable." Such an orator is one that the world will not suffer to be silent, and if the Church of Rome has no more use for him, he will yet find a pulpit broad enough for both Christianity and man.

FRANCE.—BISHOP DUPANLOUP AND M. VEUILLOT.

PARIS, November 26.

THIS is a fortnight of "sensations," and what the French call events. The Ollivier Ministry and the Dupanloup Letter—these are, in truth, "évênements" in Parisian parlance. As the latter of the two is by far the most important, and that whereof the importance will be longest felt, I will begin by it. Every American reader will still have in his mind the fiery protestation of the great Carmelite, Father Hyacinthe, three months since. Scarcely a few days after, came a short but curious appeal to him from the Bishop of Orleans, imploring of him not to be implacable in his resolve, but to re-enter the bosom of the church.

For those who know Monseigneur of Orleans, this letter, some weeks back, meant simply that he felt uncertain as to the issue of the Œcumenical Council, was inclined to believe the Jesuits would have the best of it, did not intend in that case to oppose them, but was sorely grieved at finding such a theologian and such a celebrity arrayed against him as the Père Hyacinthe. Things have marched since then; and, by dint of examining closely into the actual position of matters, the ambitious Felix of Orleans has discovered that probably the Ultramontane party may suffer a defeat before the assembled church at Rome. Accordingly, to the stupor of the ultra devout, out came the active and talented Bishop, ten days since, with a pastoral letter, which took all France by surprise. He therein exposed doctrines which, in fact, are merely those which lie at the root of Father Hyacinthe's terrible protest—doctrines which are one and the same with those of the German episcopal manifesto, and re-echo all that the so bitterly disliked Archbishop of Paris had put forth in his valedictory letter to his clergy.

In very dutiful and circumspect language, the Bishop of Orleans treated as heterodox and "impossible" any attempt to proclaim the infallibility of the Pope. He distinctly asserted the infallibility of the assembled church, and the primacy of the Pope. He distinctly stated that the sovereign Pontiff is "primus inter pares," and absolutely nothing more. He reverted straight to the doctrine of St. Augustine, and of all the fathers of the church, and above all (and worst of all, in Jesuit eyes!) he declared the church and the episcopacy of France to have always been, and still to be, the truest, best guardian of Christian tradition and doctrinal truths. This is true—but this implies "Gallicanism," the word so abhorred of all Jesuits—the word in which such men as Bossuet, upon whom it has been the delight of the Ultramontanes of our day to throw odium of every kind, conquered. The camp of the devout was in pain and vexation extreme, sorely put to it, and really knowing not which way to turn. "On ne sait à quel saint se vouer" became a plain truth, for Monseigneur of Orleans had, through his violence and intolerance, become the "saint" of all the ranting old women and canting young priests in France. And lo! here was this paragon of piety, this doctor, this surest and severest of spiritual guides, backsliding, and slipping about neither more nor less than the old serpent himself, or Father Hyacinthe, which is all one. Who to believe in now, since this prop had given way! "Believe in no one," cry the Jesuits; "there is no belief in science, or in truth, or in man, or even in the Gospel! There is but the Pope only! Believe in him—once make him infallible, and the whole thing is easy enough." Granted; but these very Ultramontane brawlers had affirmed Felix of Orleans to be next to infallible himself! What was to be done? Pending this, there came worse. Of course, the mouthpiece of the perplexed and discomfited had been M. Veuillot in the Univers. Of course, no sooner was the Orleans manifesto published, than he prepared his cudgels, and set to work right lustily to belabor M. Dupanloup, as he had already belabored M. Mazet, the learned and pious Bishop of Suza. But this time Tartuffe-Veuillot had met with infinitely more than his match, and he brought down upon his head, to the very last drop of the vials, wrath that had been gradually filling at the source of the public indignation. Mgr. d'Orleans turned round, doubled his fists, set to with a will, and—there is no Veuillot left! There is an ugly, shapeless, unclean mass, better to contemplate from afar than to touch—and that was Veuillot! and that is what the deadly blows and cutting stripes of the most idolized of intolerant bishops have made of him! I doubt whether anywhere in literature, prose or verse, from Juvenal to Junius, there exists anything so ferocious as this episcopal onslaught. But rarely, if ever, has anything been so well deserved.

The effect is tremendous; it is as if the roof of Notre Dame had fallen in, and crushed the entire congregation. People shake themselves, get rid of the dust and rubbish of a great demolition, and look around to see where they are and what has become of their neighbors. I have lived nearly all my life in France, and for fifteen or twenty years seen many things happen, but such a sensation as the Bishop of Orleans has created I have not seen since the coup d'état of '51. It is a coup d'état in the realm of conscience, and not perhaps to be duly appreciated by foreigners; not to be appreciated by any one who had not made a study of the moral and religious situation of this country for the last ten or twelve years.

Just after Father Hyacinthe's letter a very devout (but enlightened) Catholic said in my hearing: "We are lost, for they will make a second Spain of France, and all true faith will be trodden down by gross, impious idolatry." This is the situation which, it is probable, M. Dupanloup's two recent publications will help to modify; and for whosoever thinks the religious condition of a nation worthy his attention, it is certainly one of the most important events that could occur. But I again repeat that, for those who know M. Dupanloup, there is more importance in his having been the executioner in this case than if any other member of the French episcopacy had been so. If the cause of the Ultramontanes and Jesuits had not been a losing one, Hotspur-Felix of Orleans would never have asserted himself as he has done; consequently, his conduct implies even more than an individual act, and gives hopes to all true and intelligent Christians that good and not evil may yet come of the Roman Council.

A few words may not be thrown away in describing some of the various phases of the official life of the Bishop of Orleans. As a young man, he distinguished himself chiefly by his friendship with the group of liberal Catholics, such as Lacordaire, Montalembert, Cochin, the Broglies, and others; and he remained several years curé of St. Roch without being particularly famed, even for his eloquence. There were orators in the pulpit, as Ravignan, Lacordaire, and others, so much more eloquent than himself that it was not until they were no more that his celebrity began. He based its origin upon his liberalism, and in 1853 made himself a candidate for the Académie Française. Though the public was much surprised thereat, he was elected, and for several months the cry of "A liberal prelate!" was raised and echoed through the world of letters. Until the current of Ultramontanism set in with such sudden and unexpected strength (chiefly after Castelfidardo), the Bishop of Orleans did nothing to forfeit the reputation he had gained, but about six years ago he gave signs of an intemperance of zeal and an intolerance that plunged his friends into despair, and caused the Jesuits to exult. This phase endured till a few days since, and then came the pastoral letter to his clergy, which took people of every shade of opinion aback. Above all, the friends of Father Hyacinthe are full of rejoicing, and say, "Now you see how, in the main, he was right in all he said; for here is the champion of Rome, and of the Syllabus even, taking his stand in reality upon the same ground, and resisting all attempts at encroachment on the part of the Pope." The one word is spoken, the one step taken, by the Bishop of Orleans, from which he can never recede. He has thrown in his lot with the "church" instead of with the Pope's person; and it is to be hoped that the majority of the episcopacy of all nations will follow him. If so, greater benefits may ensue upon the convocation of the Council than are generally expected.

Now, to turn to politics. The notion of a ministry formed by a minister, and not imposed upon a certain number of ministers by the Emperor's will or caprice, is also an event which makes the public open its eyes in wonderment at the progress made by liberal ideas within the last six months. If Émile Ollivier remains firm and does not give in, he will have done as much for political as the Bishop of Orleans for religious freedom. If he yields one iota of what he demands, he will have lost the finest position any man has occupied in France since Casimir Perier. There is less importance in the objection made by people generally to M. Ollivier than you would suppose. They say, "He is incapable of being an efficient minister—he is not a politician—not a statesman." That may be; nay, I am disposed to think that is so; but his capacity or incapacity for politics as a minister is not at present what he is called upon to prove. The part he is called upon to play is that of an independent, honest man, who will not be a minister save on the conditions which he thinks right, and save on the one condition of responsibility for the evil or the good he may achieve. Should Émile Ollivier obtain power on the conditions of forming a cabinet and being responsible for its policy, he may, after he has obtained it, wield it with more or less capability. That is of small consequence. Should he prove a capable minister, so much the better; should he prove an incapable one, his work will be done all the same, for no other after that will consent to be a mere nominee of Napoleon's; and the fact of ministerial responsibility will be established, and self-government have virtually gained the victory over personal rule. You see I was not wrong in telling you that this fortnight has been rich in "events." Every day that passes by now may bring modifications that no one has looked for or deemed possible. Paris and Rome may, each in its way, afford great lessons.

MR. JAMES AND THE SWEDENBORGIANS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

"A Swedenborgian" quibbles. I have nowhere said that he and his fellow-sectarians claim any special divine sanctity in their "personal" capacity, but only in their corporate or ecclesiastical aspect. The soi-disant New Jerusalem possesses, in the judgment of its members, a superior sacredness to any other church, a diviner warrant to exist: such is not only the implicit logic of their position, but its overt dogmatic precept as well. Else why should they exclude every previously baptized person from their communion who refuses to undergo re-baptism at the hands of their priesthood? Is your correspondent's disclaimer of any force against such a fact as this?

Your correspondent would fain construe me, also, into a self-constituted light-house. His sarcasm stultifies itself, for I have no pretension to that immodest designation, being at most an inspector of the article, and this purely en amateur. Thus the obvious function of a light-house being to warn, not to invite, whenever I discover one passionately wooing the anxious mariner to its embrace, or saying to him, "Come boldly on," in place of saying, "Be off as fast as your trembling legs will carry you," I am sure that this is no honest light-house at all, but a mere habitaculum of wreckers living by the plunder of the innocent. It is exactly this judgment of mine that your correspondent complains of, in reference to the light-house set up, as he says, by his sect. For seeing, as I do, how fatal a thing it must be to the voyager in search of that holy city, the New Jerusalem, whose spiritual itinerary is broadly traced by Swedenborg, to get stranded upon the heartless rocks, and barren sands, which here and there usurp that sacred name, and profess to constitute a visible anchorage and embodiment of its spotless doctrine, I cannot help lifting my voice through the fog to any bewildered wretch who seems exposed to such a catastrophe, and advertising him of the skulking peril that besets him. It is a mere affair of spiritual temperament in me, and disclaims any official or even officious significance. No one in fact can be more willing than I to see every one who frankly chooses his fate undergo spiritual shipwreck. I am, Mr. Editor, yours truly,

Henry James.

Cambridge, Mass., Dec. 11, 1869.

[The "Swedenborgian" has called upon us, "the light of battle in his eye," and expressed a wish to prosecute these hostilities still further in our columns; but we have firmly informed him that, as far as we are concerned, the controversy ends here.—Ed. Nation.]

A WOMAN'S COMMENTS ON THE McFARLAND CASE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Concerning the McFarland-Richardson tragedy new testimony, of course, may yet come to light vindicating the parties whose action led to the commission of the crime. But from such evidence of facts as yet appears I hardly understand the degree of blamelessness which seems accorded to the wife of McFarland and the murdered man. I totally condemn this arbitrating by powder and shot whatever questions concern the honor of women, and think that this particular class of qarrels has had the monopoly of assassination quite long enough. But I yet fail to see how this especial case, as some newspapers argue, is one peculiarly adapted to rouse public sentiment against murderers of this order. That the life of the late victim was a useful one, that he was a man, as it seems, of amiable qualities and much beloved by his friends, that the woman who "drew him to his doom" is also reported as an estimable person, gifted and attractive—these are certainly reasons for lamenting a tragedy involving such characters; they are motives to pity, but are they arguments for justification? When our involuntary sympathy with the untimely death of the one and the harrowing desolation of the other of these two sufferers gives place to our calm judgment, does that also find these parties interesting above others, blameless above others who have been similarly undone?

Extraordinary circumstances, as I have said, may yet be shown (and I trust they may) to have justified the very extraordinary facts openly admitted in that long-ago published letter of Mr. Richardson, which so curiously combined something manly in its style with something very confounding in its acknowledgments. That a gentleman and lady should exchange love-letters and be betrothed within three weeks after the latter had separated from her husband was, in short, a state of things which would not be countenanced save in those who had very immense arrears of virtue and honor to draw upon. And just here lies the point which moves me to take up my unwilling pen on this subject. Is there or is there not a most fatal weakness in our moral judgment when we pardon in the better man what we should infallibly condemn in the worse? Natural this may be. Is it just?

Thus run such defensive arguments of the press as I have seen: Mr. Richardson and Mrs. McFarland were not vulgar people—they were educated, high-toned, honorable—therefore what they did was right. Now bring up some uneducated, low-toned man and woman—some pair down in the obscurer strata, where life's complications press just as painfully and more darkly—let such be convicted of nothing more than that premature relation which these openly avowed, and with what derision would their claims to virtue and honor be received! I would say this with all due reserve. I know that the upright, even when they fall, are not as those who go prone by nature; but the question is, Has an immoral position an absolute quality, or is it only relative to the previous character of the individuals concerned? If it is a grave question how bloody revenges like those of McFarland are to be stayed, it seems to me of equal moment that right should be established as right, and wrong as wrong, in relations whose disturbed balance vibrates from the top to the bottom of society.

You say in the Nation of last week, justly condemning McFarland's crime, that "the country swarms with half-crazed husbands and lovers, who read the law reports, and see that no outrage is punished, provided a man can show that his feelings about some woman led him to commit it."

True. And I say also that "the country swarms," the whole world swarms from the beginning, with sore-tried men and women, women not matrons in their thirties, not fortified by years or culture, having no impersonal outlooks of thought or literature, to whom personal relations mean all of happiness or misery—beings struggling in ties more or less unfortunate, and crying wildly against conscience, "Shall we not break free ourselves, no matter for the wreck we leave behind us?" Among these are multitudes who do not read the Nation or aught else, but to whom surely filters down whatever the Nation, whatever all papers and books and tongues of men everywhere say, as to whether one's selfish good shall be set first or second in the conduct of life.

I am no admirer of that type of women who continue to worship and adore utterly unworthy men, be they husbands or otherwise. The love of a rational being is the heart's spontaneous tribute to lovable qualities. But in the majority of all close human relations, even when love lies dead, fidelity has yet a noble office. There are outrages, it is true, before which even this last minister must fly; but when such climax has been reached, it would be more fortunate if it could be proved this side of the State of Indiana.

I have seen reported a discussion of this tragedy in a woman's rights club of New York, which has the more induced me to say what I have. I am too ignorant of the various New York societies for advocating these interests to know the relative rank of the club referred to; it may not be representative, but its ideas lean in precisely this direction which I deplore—a bias that, whether justly or unjustly, is still so much suspected of marking the new reform, that, despite the weakness of Bushnell and the strength of Mill, thoughtful women still hesitate to join it. The lady orators of this club declaim indignantly against "the right of property in women;" they declare of Mrs. McFarland, "There was a woman mentally formed to outgrow her husband, he was not her proper mate," etc., etc. Which premises being freely granted, what follows? That she should take her proper mate forthwith? Certainly, according to the club. With what decency may be, but at all events take him, otherwise her "development" will be thwarted. Ah rash orators! Our development goes on in strange ways. Through thwartings many, over the wrecks of passion and of hope, ofttimes goes on God's best development in us, and who shall hinder it? Does anybody doubt that ill-assorted marriages are in the majority? What multitudes of husbands and wives we all see to whom Somebody Else would be more congenial. Heaven and earth speed the day, all angels above and clubs below help it on, when men and women shall come to such insight and the seasons shall so conspire that the Somebody Else shall be more generally discovered and secured in the first place. But while human nature is rash, and human beings live their deeply related lives, there will ever be paths unwisely entered on, from which nevertheless it is all but forbidden to look back.

Some coarse and domineering notions are doubtless still extant in the male mind, but "the right of property in women" need not be so jeeringly flung back on them. Men and women alike, we are all owned somewhere—morality, civilization, the world has a right of property in us. No man liveth unto himself, and if women seem to be yet more straitly held, is it all "a relic of barbarism?" Undoubtedly some of it is, but since the Lord Almighty has made woman the very keystone of home's arch, so that the wider wreck inevitably ensues from her displacement, the stubborn race, observant of consequences, will be likely to criticise most sharply whatever new architectures may seem to make her place vacillating.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Lippincott & Co. announce as nearly ready a new edition of the Rev. Howard Malcom's "Index to Religious Literature," with addenda; we hope also with manifold corrections, for which there was room. Nearly ready, too, is Mr. John Humphrey Noyes's "History of American Socialisms," from an inside point of view, the author being the head of that most singular of all our socialistic experiments, the Oneida Community. Those who have read Mr. Hepworth Dixon's account of this body, or its organ, the Circular, from time to time, will expect from Mr. Noyes at least able treatment of the subject he has proposed to himself. It can be only a sketch, however, that is contained in one duodecimo volume, "with tinted paper;" but this will doubtless answer Mr. Noyes's purpose to point a moral withal. The real service has yet to be performed, by some one who will give himself up to it, of writing a detailed history of communism in this country, with names, dates, and incidents, and without philosophizing. There could be but one compilation more curious, and that would be the history of the great number of foreign settlements which have remained almost as homogeneous as when they were planted here, with a power of resistance against assimilation of which the so-called Pennsylvania Dutch furnish a near and striking illustration.

—In reading Mr. W. Thompson's admirable work on the "Parks, Promenades, and Gardens of Paris"—of which we shall make fuller mention hereafter—we have been impressed with the desirability of popularizing what experience has taught to be the principles of landscape gardening for public purposes. Some recent pamphlets on the proposed Chicago parks have done good service in this way, and Mr. Thompson's book, if it could be sold any cheaper, would do still greater. As it is, it might well be presented by any city to its park commissioners. Philadelphia, for one, would not find it a bad investment, seeing what different views are said to exist among its trustees or commissioners in regard to its park, which has by good chance greater natural advantages than most parks have possibilities. Boston, also, seems to stand in similar need of instruction, though it has as yet only got to talking about a park; but its landscape gardening on a small scale, such as the Common and Public Garden call for, has been of a sort indicative of rather small capacity and limited culture. The city, however, does not, we believe, lack experts; and one of these—Mr. Robert Morris Copeland, if we may judge from the initials—communicates to the Boston Advertiser of the 2d inst. a plan which merits attention, both from the writer's experience in such matters and from its obvious adaptation to the topography of Boston and its suburbs, and to the not remote absorption of the latter by the former. It would be out of place here to say more than that Mr. Copeland advises a number of parks, connected by a boulevard encircling the entire city, and making access to one or other or all of the parks easy and pleasant from any point within the circle. Could this be accomplished, it would certainly follow, as the writer remarks, that "another generation would see Boston the most beautiful city in America."

—There is said to be extant—unprinted, we are sorry to say—an antediluvian romance, invented by a resident of Boston, in which a principal personage is Methusaleh. In the only passage of this work which has come to our knowledge, the patriarch is represented as taking a little walk on a breezy morning in one of the latest of his nine hundred and sixty-nine years. He is met by a friend and neighbor, and a short conversation ensues, which, if it could be depended upon as authentic, would almost incline one to the belief that Miss Jean Ingelow's conception of the "oldest man" is closer to the facts of his life and character than the one which Dr. Hedge has very recently given to the world. As we understand him, Dr. Hedge doubts if the word "Methusaleh" be not incorrectly referred to any one person, and if it may not really be the name of some Asiatic tribe or people, which in the course of about one thousand of our calendar years rose up, made war and peace, flourished and prosecuted the arts, and then decayed into luxury, and at last disappeared, just as kingdoms and empires are for ever flourishing and fading. Miss Ingelow, on the other hand—in some one of her poems—makes out the patriarch to have been in his old age a wicked old man, who in process of years had lost nearly all knowledge of God and good things and given himself up to heathenish practices. Our Boston romancer is with Miss Ingelow rather than with Dr. Hedge. In his hands the patriarch is not a tribe at all, but a person of a sufficiently distinct and forcible individuality, and of character not so much too good either. "How do you find yourself to-day?" says the friend, in the Boston romance, as Methusaleh approaches, taking his constitutional walk. "Well enough," says the old gentleman, with an energy not to be expected in a man bent over "two double"—into the shape of a horseshoe—"I'm well enough; if this cursed wind would leave off blowing my shoe-strings into my eyes." In support of this chronicler and Miss Ingelow—so far at least as concerns their opinion of Methusaleh's moral character—we cite the substance of some remarks published in the last number of the Christian Union. When Methusaleh was 187 years old, says the writer, he begot Lamech; and when Lamech was 182 years old Noah was begotten; so when Noah was born Methusaleh was 369 years of age. Now it was when Noah was 599 years old, and a small fraction of a year, that the flood came; or, as is stated in Genesis, "in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month." So then, when the first day of the deluge dawned, Methusaleh had not completed his 969 years. Yet he was 969 years old when he died. And certainly he did not die in the ark. And as certainly he did not survive the deluge. It is probable, therefore, that he was drowned, and perished with the wicked. But may it not be that when Lamech's age at the birth of Noah is given, and Methusaleh's age at the birth of Lamech, the statement is made as we now often make similar statements? May it not be that the completed years are mentioned, and no mention is made of how far we may have gone into the current year? If that be conceded, why then, says the Union, we may freely suppose that Methusaleh's 969 years had run out before the beginning of the deluge, and that the oldest man that ever lived was not also one of the wickedest—too wicked to be spared with his grandson. We see little or no reason why the concession should not be made. Nor, on the other hand—if the Union will pardon us—why it should be. To say nothing on some other points which suggested themselves as we read "An Inquirer's" article, it could not have been a very strange thing to people of that generation that men of six, and seven, and eight hundred years old should be persons of no character. In fact, as the Union knows, it is because of the badness of the men and women favored with the extreme longevity of Methusaleh and his contemporaries that we of the present are not ourselves living out our term of centuries, instead of putting up with threescore-and-ten years.

—The New York Tribune some time ago proposed to present the Herald with a map. The idea appeared at first strange, but upon reflection it seems, indeed, as if it would be rather a good idea to furnish some of our "great dailies" with a full set of elementary school-books. The Tribune was undoubtedly induced to make this noble and disinterested suggestion by a more or less lively consciousness of its own shortcomings. To the map for the Herald ought to be added a hand-book of universal history for the Tribune, to serve the editor of this highly esteemed paper as a compass if his evil genius ever tempts him to again embark upon the wild sea of œcumenical councils. A copy of the "Conciliengeschichte," by Dr. Hefele, the bishop-elect of Rottenburg (whom Professor Schem justly calls probably the most learned among all the bishops), would perhaps prevent the Tribune a second time calling this world-renowned scholar "Fesele of Rattenburg." Such a hand-book of geography would be needed also to prevent the learned foreign editor from again degrading the Asturias by calling them "a city." If he had had an historical handbook, he never would have written, or would have written very differently, the article on the Œcumenical Council in the Tribune of December 8 (we refer, of course, to the article on the fourth page, and not to that under the same heading on the first page, which is evidently written by the well-known scholar, Professor A. T. Schem). The Tribune believes every one of the œcumenical councils has been held "in the basin of the Mediterranean." But, then, Basle and Constance are not situated in the basin of the Mediterranean, are they? (See the hand-book of geography.) Councils have hitherto been held in various cities of Asia and Europe, "but none at Rome till now." Really? But what about the first Lateran Council, convened 1123 by Calixtus II., under the Emperor Henry V., to settle the all-important question of investiture? and what about the second Lateran Council, convened by Innocent II., 1139, under the Emperor Conrad III., which condemned the heresies of Arnold of Brescia? and what about the third Lateran Council, convened by Alexander III., 1179, under Frederick I., which condemned the errors of the Albigenses and Waldenses? and what about the fourth Lateran Council, as held under Innocent III., 1215, which confirmed the dogma of transubstantiation? The fifth Lateran Council we shall pass by, since it is not universally recognized by the Catholics. At all events, the fact that four Councils have been held at Rome will save us the trouble of animadverting upon the ingenious reasons the Tribune puts forth to explain why there has been none. After this, the present council can of course expect little mercy. We accordingly find that, according to the Tribune, a special notice to attend was served on the Greek and Armenian patriarchs residing in or near Constantinople. The Tribune, as the German proverb says, heard the bells ring, but did not know where they were hanging. All the so-called Eastern Churches were honored with an invitation to attend, but the invitation served on the Armenian patriarch of Constantinople has been especially talked of on account of the highly interesting consequences it has had. Patriarch Boghos forbore to give a definite answer ere he had received the advice of his superior, Kebork IV., the Catholicos of the Armenian Church, residing at Eschmiazin. Kebork having refused his permission to accept the invitation, Boghos, with four other prominent members of the "Medjlis," who leaned towards Rome, tendered their resignations, which, upon the instance of the opposing party, were accepted by the Grand Vizier. This will do for the present, though the article in question furnishes many most tempting points.

—Among the best appliances for studying geography must be reckoned the raised maps in imitation of the surface of a country, which have long been in use abroad. They ought to form part of the equipment of every grammar-school at least, but so far as our experience goes this is never the case among us. Rev. W. L. Gage, of Hartford, has had manufactured in Germany a map of Palestine on this principle, showing the mountains, valleys, plains, and water-courses of that diversified land, and the principal places and districts—in the selection of which last his services as editor have chiefly consisted. It measures about eleven inches by nine, including the narrow wooden frame, and contains a separate representation of Jerusalem and its environs. We notice a few literal errors, such as Gaulanitis (for o); and Gath, as one of the five cities of the Philistines, might have been expected to appear on the map. But on the whole we can say that any one sending Mr. Gage one dollar will get not only the map postage free, but also his money's worth.

—We do not remember a journal which was ever started with so favorable a staff of contributors as Messrs. Macmillan & Co.'s Nature, of which the third number is now before us. Of American names it presents those of Agassiz, Cooke, and Wolcott Gibbs, of Harvard; Mr. S. H. Scudder, of Boston; Professor H. Morton, of Philadelphia; and Professors Dana, Brush, and Johnson, of Yale. Berthelot, J. B. Dumas, Feruet, and Quetelet are among the contributors. Of the German scientists who will write for the new paper are Wöhler, of Göttingen; Streng, of Giessen; Oppenheim and Magnus, of Berlin; Kékulé, of Bonn; Fehling, of Stuttgart; and Hauer, of Vienna; and to these may be added the name of Dr. C. Le Neve Foster, of some Piedmontese institution. As for Englishmen of eminence in science, or the "popularization of science," there is hardly one who is not under promise to Messrs. Macmillan & Co. There are Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Jevons, Haughton, Galton, Lewes, Charles Kingsley, Hooker, Murchison, Forbes, Lubbock, Bruce Jones, Brodie, F. W. Farrar, Rolleston, Hirst, Odling, Clement Markham, and a hundred or more of others. Popularizers of science will be needed as much, or nearly as much, as scientists worthy of the honor of the name, in order to carry out the intentions of the publishers of Nature, for the journal has in view a twofold object. It is intended—perhaps primarily intended—to place before the general public the broad results of scientific work and discovery, and to urge the claims of science to a more general recognition in education and daily life; and it is also intended to aid scientific men themselves by giving early information of every advance in the field of the natural sciences throughout the world, and to give them an opportunity of discussing such questions, arising from time to time, as they may be interested in. Abstracts of papers now before European and American scientific societies and reports of scientific meetings will be furnished for the benefit of scientific experts. For the general public there are to be full reviews of scientific books; full accounts (illustrated when necessary) of scientific discoveries of general interest; records of the efforts, now everywhere more frequently making, to give to science a prominent place in institutions of learning; and, finally, articles in praise of science, and articles on subjects connected with the various points of contact of scientific knowledge with practical affairs. "For the general public," we have said, will this last-mentioned work be done; but, as we have said on other occasions, and as we now and then feel inclined to repeat—so much do the men of science permit themselves to prowl and bite at the "sensual caterwauling" of the poets and novelists and essayists—the experts also in this and that science will, doubtless, get benefit and assistance from the "popularizing of science," to which a great part of Nature will be devoted. The scientist most eager to exalt science, and most disposed to condemn the imperfectness of the culture of which scientific knowledge is not an ingredient, and most apt to despise smatterings of knowledge, ought to find it easier and easier every day to make the confession that for him, too, a vast portion of science in general must be "popularized;" that no more than the merest "sensual caterwauler" who troubles Professor Huxley's repose, can he or the Professor himself lay claim to the title of expert in all the branches of science. But however its contents may be divided and shared out, it is evident already that they are going to be valuable and interesting to a wide circle of readers; and the paper's price puts it within easy reach, for it is sold for fourpence in England, and in this country for twelve cents, although it is a handsome and well-printed quarto of some thirty pages. It can be had in monthly parts if the reader should prefer it in that shape, and the price of each part would then be about half-a-dollar, exclusive of postage.

—In the second number of Nature there is an article on cuckoos' eggs, by Professor Alfred Newton, which has an interest as dealing with a sort of feathered land-pirate, who, thanks to Shakespeare and Wordsworth, occupies a high place in poetic literature, and who also cuts a great figure in the idle folklore of more countries than one. The article has, too, a special interest for many readers because it seems to furnish some corroborative evidence of the theory of natural selection so dear to Mr. Darwin—or rather suggested by Mr. Darwin, and so dear to Darwinians. Everybody knows how the cuckoo lays her eggs in the nests of other birds, confiding in the ability of her broad-backed young to shoulder out of their homes the natural possessors. There has long been a theory that to secure the safety of her offspring while yet the shell is unchipped, the mother cuckoo colors and marks her eggs so that they resemble to a greater or less degree those of the bird in whose nest they are deposited. Mr. Newton, after having examined several good-sized collections—gathered in Africa, France, and England—of the eggs of cuckoos and other birds, is more than half ready to believe that the old, vulgar notion is correct, and that there is a "law of nature" in obedience to which the cuckoo's egg is in a great many cases, though not always, colored like the egg of the victim of her imposition. For example, in Sologne, a district which lies just south of Orleans, in France, the cuckoo's eggs are almost all blue, and almost always found in the nest of the stone-chat, a bird whose eggs are always blue. Again, in 1858, a Mr. Tristram sent to Mr. Newton, from Algeria, a collection of eggs, among which were some of the cuckoo. But Mr. Newton found two more cuckoos' eggs than Mr. Tristram had led him to expect. The fact was, that these two were so nearly like the eggs of a certain North African magpie, on which the young cuckoo is often billeted, that, skilful an oölogist as Mr. Tristram was, he had been deceived into thinking them laid by the magpie. And again, Mr. Newton finds that the birds which most frequently act as foster-parents to the English cuckoo are the titlark, the pied-wagtail, and the reed-wren, and to the eggs of these birds that of the cuckoo bears a sufficiently close resemblance. It is proper to say, on the other hand, that the English hedge-sparrow is often pressed into service by the English cuckoo, and that there is seldom—perhaps never—any similarity at all between the eggs of the dupe and the deceiver. But so many are the cases to be cited on the other side, that this exception rather suggests a question as to the perspicacity of the hedge-sparrow than supplies a weighty objection to the existence of the law above mentioned. Now, how are these facts to be accounted for? It will hardly be believed, Mr. Newton thinks, that the cuckoo can in each particular case voluntarily influence the color of her egg so that it shall deceive the particular pair that she intends to victimize. That hypothesis he rejects, and rejecting it he makes or finds the loophole through which comes in the theory of natural selection. Every person who knows about the habits of animals, knows very well, says he, that certain of these habits tend to become hereditary. There is then nothing very unreasonable in supposing that each cuckoo, most cunningly placing her egg in the nest of the same species of birds, transmits this habit of hers to her posterity. It is not attributing marvellous sagacity to the cuckoo to believe of her that when she has found she has once fooled the titlark or the reed-wren she should seek out their nests a second or a third or a sixth time. Every year we see migratory birds come back and build their nests in the spots they occupied the preceding year; and that a bird should steal a nest in the place and in the way that she stole it before is not more wonderful than that she should honestly build herself one in an accustomed locality. That her young might probably do the like after her Mr. Newton believes well enough ascertained, and he mentions in corroboration of the other testimony to that effect the case of a pair of golden eagles of whom he knew. One of them was celebrated for the beauty of her eggs, which could readily be distinguished from those of any other bird of her kind. The other was the daughter of this one, and when she came to maturity her eggs were found to have the same remarkable brilliancy and beauty of coloring which had marked those of her mother. So, then, says Mr. Newton (following up his argument), we need not be much afraid to say that a cuckoo may form a habit of laying a particular style of egg as well as a habit of laying it in a particular place. Now, admitting this, we may proceed to apply the doctrine of the "survival of the fittest," and applying it, we come to the conclusion that the particular gens of cuckoo which inherited and transmitted the habit of laying in the nests of any species of birds' eggs having a resemblance to the eggs of that species, would prosper most in such members of the gens as had the trick of laying eggs most closely resembling the eggs of the species to be imposed upon; and, cæteris paribus, the other less skilful or fortunate members of the gens would in time disappear. A good test of the operation of this kind of natural selection would be to see if in the cases of birds not easily duped the cuckoo of to-day is compelled to get up a close imitation of the eggs of the rightful owners of the nest—the "birds not easily duped" being, of course, the birds which, as observation shows, the cuckoo of to-day least frequently deceives—the birds in whose nests her intruded eggs are least often found. Such, says our author, are the red-backed shrike and the bunting lark, and it is in the nests of just these birds that the cuckoo's eggs, when they are found at all, are found to be most like the eggs that belong there.

—In the Nation of October 7 we mentioned an unsavory fashion of damping linen, practised by Chinese servants. A correspondent calls our attention to the following passage in a letter of Southey's from Portugal (6th June, 1800):

"We have often heard a noise below which puzzled us; it was like damping linen, but so often that all the linen in Lisbon could not have supplied the sound. At last, when Maria was cleaning the adjoining room, we heard it; she was laying the dust, and in the same way as she damps the clothes in ironing—by taking a great mouthful of water and then spirting it out: this is the Portuguese way, and the mouth makes a very good watering-pot."

It is not very clear whether by "this is the Portuguese way," Southey means to speak of laying the dust merely, or both of that and the damping of linen. From the way in which he alludes to the latter at the beginning of the extract, we should be almost led to infer that the sound was one with which he was familiar in England. Lecturers willing to take a little of the conceit out of us moderns are apt to twit us with the prediscoveries of the Chinese. Did the Portuguese learn the use of this providentially furnished squirt among the pig-tails? Or did they teach this occidental secret of housewifery to the children of the East? By the way, sculptors find this the handiest method of keeping their clay moist—we mean no double-entendre.

—The Chicago Skandinaven, of Dec. 1, informs its readers that, according to private advices from Christiania, Björnstjerne Björnson, the well-known tale-writer, intends coming to America in the course of next summer, when he will visit the large Scandinavian settlements in the West, and also the chief cities, much as he has been doing in Norway, reading his own stories and poems. His presence here will remind us how large and respectable a body of his countrymen we have among us. Other distinguished visitors from the Continent are promised. It was rumored recently that we might shortly expect the eminent Prof. Dr. von Holtzendorff, of the University of Berlin; but we believe his journey is postponed, while Büchner's is talked of more seriously. M. Prévost-Paradol has also been announced as designing to deliver a course of lectures in this country, which his command of the language makes quite feasible. Whether he would succeed in "drawing" in any other but the lecture season, may be doubted, though principally because he is less famous in the United States than he ought to be. It would be a rare privilege to listen to lectures like those which he recently delivered to the members of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, on the "Social State of France;" and we believe they would greatly interest our best audiences.

—M. Prévost-Paradol alluded in his second lecture to the great and obvious distinction between the French family and the British one—the small number of children in the former, and the French mode of contracting marriages. However much the one characteristic seems a reproach and the other repugnant to our notion of the true relation of man and wife, both, the lecturer observed, were due to the same cause, "the excessive love for children." For an Englishman to understand this paradox, he continued, it must be borne in mind "that all French inheritance, of real or personal estate, is constantly divided in equal portions among the children, that they have no India or Australia to go to, and that emigration is generally considered as a kind of penalty or desperate remedy for great faults:"

"A curious fact is that the apprehension about bringing up children keeps pace among us with the acquisition and increase of property. Our peasant, as a landowner, does not like to see his lot dwindling to nothing after him, and dreads a large family; and the same feeling pervades all classes. As to our marriage customs, they must be also attributed in a great measure to the constant wish of securing, as far as possible, the future state of the children against the results of equal partition. It is with such a view that money is so much taken into account for our marriages, which are most often settled like a business matter by the parents or legal advisers of the family."

We have, then—and a book might more easily be written upon the subject than a lecture—the singular phenomenon of real virtue in a people leading directly to immorality and physical degeneration, of which the French physicians have endless instances to relate; while a law framed in the interest of all children equally is the immediate cause of the deliberate suppression of offspring, and a stationary instead of an advancing population. For society as it now is in France, the Second Empire is evidently not wholly nor first to blame.

ILLUSTRATED HOLIDAY BOOKS.*

SOME of the works of Kaulbach are well known in this country, none of them better known, however, than the drawings of Charlotte, from "The Sorrows of Werther;" Orestes and his sister, from the "Iphigenia," and two or three scenes from "Faust." These and other designs are for sale and often sold in the form of large photographs from the drawings. These designs and some twenty more are contained in this large volume of the female characters of Goethe, where they are given in line and stipple engraving by Mandel and others. Mr. Lewes adds to the volume an introduction and a brief description and discussion of each picture, with quotations from the poem illustrated and translations. But, unless the reader knows the poem pretty well, he will find, in almost every case, Mr. Lewes's comments insufficient. For instance, as we have not by us in any form and have never read the drama in which figures Clœrchen, we fail to extract from the extracts here given any intelligent idea of the story; half as much space used in relating it would be worth more than the disconnected dialogue given. The book, it will be perceived, is a gift book on a rather large scale, and similar to the many books made up of engravings and remarks upon them which the exigencies of Christmas, birthday, and saint's-day gift-giving produce. Its chief value lies in the possibility that some may be led by it to the study of the works of Goethe. If one person is led to read Hermann and Dorothea or Faust, or even the little ballad, "Röslein auf der Haiden," from a desire to understand these pictures, or in any other way by the influence of this book, it will have served a good purpose.

For the pictures themselves little enthusiasm can be excited. As engravings they are not admirable—no collector so unsophisticated that he would think them worthy of room in his portfolio; indeed, they have little pretension that way, and beyond being laborious and elaborate, and carefully close to the original drawings, probably lay claim to no distinctive excellence. There are differences of merit among them, however, and the worst of them comes much nearer to being admirable than, for instance, such work as that used to set off the Tennyson designs of Gustave Doré, just now so popular. For the artistic character of the pictures, considered as compositions, this may be said: that there is something of that unity of the masses and simple harmony of line which is so hard to describe or even explain, which can only be pointed out, which never appears in an artist's work unless he has been gifted with the natural, unteachable faculty of composition. Kaulbach's power in this way, though not of a very rare or elevated kind, is probably his greatest gift, and the one gift that has enabled some German princes and professors to make of him that which they were determined to have—a great Protestant painter. Of course, the best he can do in the way of composition is not to be seen in the pictures of this series, containing, at most, half-a-dozen figures each. On the other hand, the fault of his composition—that which separates it from the design of the really great composers, namely, its obviousness and forced balance of part with part—can be seen here nearly as well as in the "Battle of the Huns" or the "Destruction of Jerusalem." The best composed picture in this book is probably the "Margaret kneeling before the Mater Dolorosa;" that composition, at least, is simple and natural, suggested by the subject and not doing violence to it, not inharmonious in line, and helped by a chord of light and shade much less harsh than is common in this set of designs.

In regard to light and shade, the pictures as they lie before us, the combined work of designer and engravers, are excessively disagreeable, owing in great part to an almost total disregard of local color, that is to say, of the colors of different things. Consider, for instance, one of the most varied in detail, "Adelheid;" in this the dresses and the various parts of dress of Adelheid, the bishop, the minstrel, the page, and the monk, are all represented as of the same color, from which the carved table, the books, the flagons, the curtain, the carpet, the lute, the cat, and the faces do not vary. The amount of light upon each surface is all that is allowed to give it more or less force of shade, three or four black things only excepted, as the bishop's skull-cap, and Adelheid's hat and fan. There is nothing that hurts engraving more than this vice; nothing that removes it so completely from the domain of natural and universal art into the world of technicalities and connoisseurship. Sky-blue is of a higher tone of light than dark indigo-blue. If it is your purpose to make a pen-and-ink drawing of a United States soldier in uniform, you should represent his coat many shades darker in its general effect than his trousers; the first and most important thing to get is that which the eye first perceives, that the soldier has a very dark and a much lighter garment. The contrary practice deprives black and white work of all force and intensity. The engraving before us is one pale simulacrum, without depth, without brilliancy, and yet it is not just to ascribe this fault wholly to Kaulbach without careful examination of the originals, or of photographs from them (if the originals are, as we have assumed, cartoons not in color), because the German engravers have rather taken up this fashion of disregarding local color. We had to complain of that not long ago in the case of a work otherwise very noble—the engraving of Holman Hunt's "Christ in the Temple." It is probable that examination would show that Kaulbach's own work with the chalk has been as regardless of color as that of his engravers, but these engravings in themselves do not prove it.

Consider this Adelheid picture somewhat further. It is from the play of Goetz von Berlichingen—Goetz with the Iron Hand. Mr. Lewes's account of it amounts to nothing, but Sir Walter Scott's translation of the play is within everybody's reach. In the picture before us the story is fairly well told; the five personages are less like dolls and more alive than in many of the designs; but let every one who knows what expression is, and when it is well rendered, form his own opinion of the expressional qualities of this design. How obvious it all is; how staring; how the leer of Adelheid, the gloomy reverie of the page, and the loose vulgarity of the monk are forced into sight; how that sidelong triumph of Adelheid, which the bishop is supposed not to see, resembles a stage whisper, which the actors are supposed not to hear. The whole feebleness of the design finds its culmination in the cat. What is the cat leering about? Is she Adelheid's familiar spirit? Mr. Lewes calls her a "voluptuous and cunning cat," whatever that may mean. The effect on the spectator is nearly that produced by the first appearance of the Cheshire cat, in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland."

* "Female Characters of Goethe, illustrated by W. von Kaulbach. Text by G. H. Lewes." New York: Theodore Stroefer. 1869.

That is a bad instance; but take Gretchen going into church, Faust and Mephistopheles looking on; or Hermann and Dorothea descending the mountain; or any picture where strong emotion should be expressed, and observe how poor and expressionless are the faces. Even the children in the Lotte and the Ottilie have stolid faces and immovable bodies, modelled in wax, one would think; there have been painters who have modelled their groups in the solid before painting them; is Kaulbach one of those? and do his expressionless faces come of clay? The children are made to get bread and butter on their faces, and laugh and cry and scream, open their eyes wide, make mouths, and all the rest; and they are puppets when all is done. There are many artists who are not called great historical painters, who—not able to paint allegories and histories on a colossal scale—are content to make wood-cuts for Punch and Charivari. Try Leech and Gavarni, if you want to play with children, not Kaulbach. But can we get Furies, either, from Kaulbach? There are the Furies pursuing Orestes; they are ugly, and coiled around with snakes, and they all set their lips and frown, and are as absurd as they are ugly.

Action and gesture come as hard to our designer as expression of face. Dorothea is not stumbling and receiving support from Hermann; Faust is not expressing any admiration of Gretchen; the children are not trying to escape from the witches in the wood; Goethe's muse does not float in the air, nor is he at all disturbed at her very corporeal presence, neither is he skating with any success and speed at Frankfort. This last, however, is a well-recognized fault of the painter's, that he has never been able to draw motion. In the great Nibelungen frescoes at Munich the arms do not move, the swords do not pierce; in the great Destruction of Jerusalem nothing is going forward, even the trumpets do not get blown; it is as if a tableau vivant had suddenly died. Clœrchen in this book comes near to being in movement, but she is almost the only figure that is not petrified. The movelessness of the figures was not, however, what we were speaking of, but the want of imaginative conception of a scene. A good instance of that is the Leonore. In that scene all is quiet; there was no violent action to try to draw and fail in drawing. All that was needed was to see the possible group, their expressions of face and positions of body. All! It is all, indeed; all greatness of art comes of just that seeing what does not exist to the bodily eye; a greatness to which no one of these designs has the least pretension.

Of the many painters who were forced into a painful prominence by the desire of King Ludwig and his surrounders to have at all hazards a great national school of painting, Kaulbach is not the worst, but none were more unsuited than he for a grand rôle as historical, religious, and metaphysical painter. Stately design, grandiose composition, the rendering of the most impressive poetical, religious, symbolical, and historical subjects, these he has been forced to strive for, and at these he works in a hopeless, patient sort of way, with mock-heroic result. He is better and nearly at his best in the confessed mock-heroic of Reineke Fuchs, spirited and real, but disagreeable on account of the ascription to animals of only the bad passions of man, and yet more offensive on account of wanton foulness in many of the designs. Unfortunately he is as able and as natural in other designs, suppressed but handed about pretty freely in Germany and elsewhere, and of unparalleled obscenity. These excesses may be accounted for charitably by setting them down to the working of an unrestrained fancy. While true imagination does not appear in any work, a fanciful thought sometimes does, as the mole in the Reineke Fuchs who appears emerging from his hole, spade in fist, to do honor to the conquering fox, or the cat in the "Lotte" who turns to see the toy-horse beside her.

Illustrations as bad as Kaulbach's are to be found in the new "Lady Geraldine;"* but fortunately they "obscure" a lesser poem than the least of those we have named above. After all, and in spite of the reminiscences of our sweet youth, and in spite of a good, strong line or two, what rubbish this "Lady Geraldine" is! What a difference between the excellent intention and the feeble result! For though Blackwood found it very ridiculous to approve and commend marriages between people of widely different social positions, it was yet with excellent intention that the poem was written. Its one thought is that the modern world forgets spiritual and moral greatness in the pursuit of mere physical triumphs.

> With a broad clown's back turned broadly to the glory of the stars."

Let the world beware of the worship of science, mastery of physical nature, and external prosperity. If we should gain all the power over nature of which we can dream, yet

> "'Twere but power within our tether, no new spirit power conferring,
> And in life we were not better men nor bolder men in death."

Those two lines well represent the poem. The evident intensity of the writer's feelings as she set down the words, compared with the prosaic result, is the same in the whole read together as in a part. It was all written to say just that, and if anything else has been said, it is by accident. But let us not forget that some of the accidents are happy ones. "Tennyson's enchanted reverie" is a happy thought, and it becomes us to forget that it read in the early editions "Tennyson's God-vocal reverie." And that is n't bad about teaching "the hillside echo some sweet Tuscan in a song." Good bits, and a general result of nothing; that, alas! is the record of all the poets but a few great ones and a few less, as poets, but strong and simple as men.

But to return to the illustrations of this volume: they are the combined work of Mr. W. J. Hennessy and Mr. W. J. Linton as designer and wood-engraver. It is hard to be compelled to criticise this kind of work. It does not pretend to have any artistic merit, or to help the poem in any way, or to give pleasure to anybody. The pictures are not even what the poem is, a few good thoughts unpoetically expressed; they are only parts of a Christmas gift-book, and as such their existence should be mentioned, and no more. But unfortunately so much praise is forced upon even unpretending pictures like these—we have seen warm commendation even of the unorganized blot at foot of page 16, "The deer half in the glimmer"—that they must be characterized. We are very sure that Mr. Hennessy knows how slight this work is, and how little any judicious person will judge of him by it.

A very much better book, in every way, is the "New England Ballads,"† Mr. Fenn's little landscape-portraits, to coin an appellative, are as effective as (teste Mr. Whittier in the preliminary note) they are accurate. It is a pity, by the way, that Mr. Whittier has shaken popular faith in his judgment on such matters by good-natured commendation in "letters to the publisher" of various chromos and portraits. This time, however, we believe him as devoutly as if he were Ruskin himself. And we wish that artists who have books to illustrate would try this same portraying process, and see if it is not generally more efficacious than trying to make the fancy work when it is not in a working humor. The little picture at the head of the volume, page 3, "Right over the hill runs the path I took," is as good as any of these little landscapes, and very good. To be admired and enjoyed are also "Sailed away from a sinking wreck" on page 22, and "Sweetly along the Salem road" on page 26, "The hamlet's buried idler's sleep" on page 51, and "At set of harvest day" on page 85. But indeed, except for some rather meaningless heavy shading of rocks, as if the engraver was put to it to make them look heavy and hard, the combined work of Mr. Fenn and Mr. Anthony in these little landscapes is capable of giving really enduring pleasure. We are glad, too, to find Mr. Hennessy here, perhaps at his best, and certainly not at his worse than worst, as in the unfortunate book spoken of above. The group of mother and child on page 89 is sincere, purposeful, downright drawing, and the picture on page 46, though it seems as if we had seen that young woman before, we can bear to see again. They are both well engraved; and indeed that one on page 89 is a very excellent piece of wood-cutting of the kind. Mr. Homer's two pictures, on pages 18 and 19, are simple and natural, and show his power, almost unequalled among our painters, as a draughtsman of expression. In Mr. Frederick's design, on page 23, there is to be seen what is rare in art, a busily and naturally engaged crowd. We have the pleasure of finding in this book, taken together, something better than a gift-book, pleasant and well-known ballad-poetry with pictures that help the reader and gratify the lover of nature.

"Songs of Life"* is a reprint, on a smaller page, of a part of the well-known "Folk-Songs" published some years ago. The selection of poems is a good one, there are illustrations of varying merit, and the fac-similes of handwriting, of which there are five in this volume and more to come in the subsequent ones, are interesting. The four volumes which Scribner & Co. propose to make out of the rather unwieldy "Folk-Songs" will form a very handy collection of short poems, the more so as there are many pieces in it which are not often found in such collections.

Several books of colored illustrations† are before us, the first of which is rather a portfolio of prints than a book. "The Illuminated Christian Year" is a series of nine texts, with symbolical borders and ornaments, for Advent, Christmas, Epiphany, Ascension, Good Friday, Lent, Easter, Trinity Sunday, and Whit Sunday. We notice a curious slip in the symbol of the Trinity, the well-known triangle, "Pater non est Filius," etc., the affirmative being wanting; but except for this the usual emblems are properly employed. The designs present nothing remarkable.

"The Parables of Our Lord"‡ is a much more elaborate and carefully made series of colored prints, presenting, on opposite pages, pictures illustrating the parables, and texts taken from the parables surrounded by ornamental borders. These borders are announced as from the famous Grimani Breviary, kept in the Library of Saint Mark at Venice. But the charm of that splendid volume is in its unequalled miniatures; the borders, however varied and rich and however splendid in color, belong to a degenerate art—to an era that had forgotten the true art of illumination for picture-painting, and could not even make good borders for its pictures. These borders, translated into color-printing not of the finest, and associated with poorly designed ornamental texts, would hardly be recognized by the Cardinal Grimani or his librarian. The pictures seem to be faithful studies of costume. Every one is mounted in a sort of passe-partout of stout board, and the whole book is very carefully made up.

A better book than these, and showing us what the boasted art of chromo-lithography really is good for, is Mr. Walton's "Alpine Flowers."§ The larger work, containing this artist's excellent drawings of the "Peaks and Passes" of the Alps, will be remembered, as well as the merit of the drawings as given. It is rare to see work so sincere and so successful in the form of published pictures. This book is in some respects better, because more limited in range. The representation of the flowers comes nearer absolute truth than the pictures of glaciers and distant peaks. But the mountain flowers are as characteristic of Switzerland and Savoy, and as clear to the memories of travellers, as the great mountains themselves. Any one who sees the Alps as he ought to, on foot, and when he ought to, in spring and early summer, wades ankle deep in blossoming herbage to which the field flowers of the lowlands are poor. The variety seems infinite; the strangeness is like that of another planet. Even the flowers we knew in the valley seem different and more beautiful, and the Alpenrose (Rhododendron) and Edelweiss and Mountain Gentian are glorified beings unknown out of this Paradise. We press them and bring them home, and some lose their colors at once, and some keep them longer, but none are very lovely except to memory and by association. Mr. Walton's drawings are the sort of thing we should all be glad to bring home with us if we could.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

It is not such a number of years since the first "Juveniles" were sent from the English press; and then they were little more than the talk of the nursery put into print. Next came the adaptations of old tales that in other generations, and perhaps in other countries, and in somewhat different forms, had done duty in pleasing children of a larger growth; and at the same time with these adaptations and corruptions came some new inventions, seemingly of the same character, though in fact without the kernel of deeper significance which is contained in much of the genuine fable lore, however degraded it may in process of time have become. Thus, probably, Goldsmith may have been making up "Goody Two Shoes" out of the whole cloth, not so very far from the time when somebody else was making over the really historical tragedy of the French country gentleman and his many wives into the "Bluebeard" of the nursery story; and while a certain venerable tale, ancient in many languages, was going into the English of "Whittington and his Cat." But wherever the "Juveniles" came from, they were not at the beginning very numerous; and there was hardly such a thing as a regular "juvenile business." That there is such a business now every book-store bears witness every winter, and that it is a business which is getting too big there will not be many people to deny. Every religious sect wants a regular supply of denominational story books; there must be stories on the collects and on the catechism, and on the church feasts and fasts for the Episcopalians. Many a Sunday-school library has had a book about the Quakers, and their deficiency in the matter of belief in an atonement. Anti-Popish books and anti-Protestant books for the young are legion. We know of dozens, we dare say, of "Juveniles" which attack various forms of paganism; and one or two books we have which are pro-Chinamen, while the books which teach small boys and girls the wretched state of the infidels, both here and hereafter, are almost without number. So, too, every "cause" has or has had its youthful literature, and there is no end of the sixteenmos in behalf of temperance, aggressive against slavery, opposed to the use of tobacco in all its forms, in favor of newsboys' homes, condemnatory of the treatment of the sailors of our commercial marine, and, in general, relating to this kind of sociological subjects. Then, again, there are hardly two of the ten commandments which have not been inculcated by scores of ethical works, supposed to be well adapted to the comprehension of boys and girls. Besides all these, there are also the hundreds on hundreds of books of travel and adventure, and country, and city, and boarding-school life; and the thousands of books of life in fairyland—and in the fairy-land of a dozen countries; for the translator, also, has been set at work to cater to the needs of the children, and we now purvey to our young food as far brought as from Russia, and Kafir Land, and India, and are still ransacking remote lands for new fables and tales. Old stories, too, we are breaking up for children's use; we have Sir John Mandeville, for instance, and Froissart, and Bunyan, done over into something which—whether or not it is Bunyan, or Froissart, or Mandeville—the youngest reader may read and partly understand; and there are at least two writers of "Juveniles" who have given us a "Life of Christ" for small readers, and one who has given us an expurgated Bible, heavily illustrated. And what child, from four years old, is without his one or two monthly magazines?

Is this demand for children's reading more or less factitious—created by men who supply it—the work of the publishers? There are people who say so, and we do not deny that we have at times inclined to take that view of the case. But the publishers are not the first sinners—if any sinners there be. The various sects and societies are responsible for a vast number of the books which are stuffed into the children's heads every year. Parents buy them, to be sure; but not as parents supplying a natural demand of their young folks, but as parents who are superintendents of Sunday-schools or secretaries of Lodges of Good Templars, and who have something to preach to their children. The publishers, however, are not backward in pushing on the ball, and what with them and the rest of us we certainly have got to a point in the production of literature for the young at which forbearance becomes a virtue. A good many other things might be said on this head; but to say but one will save our space, and will, perhaps, sufficiently call attention to the fact that the "juvenile publishing business" is too merely a business, and will very likely raise the presumption that it is a business which might be considerably diminished with advantage to young America, and to American literature as well. Everybody has noticed, we suppose, that now for some years hardly any one has made a success in writing well for his contemporaries—in saying in the best way he could the things that he knew—in really making a contribution to literature—who has not been at once seized on, and set to making books for children—books more or less bad, or books more or less good, but in any case evidently made for money, and from the start likely to be bad rather than good.

Take now this "Trotty Book,"* of Miss E. S. Phelps's. As we have borne witness, on more than one occasion, Miss Phelps is a writer of merit. Sickly, overstrained, self-conscious—and morbid New Englandish, with almost the worst sort of New Englandism—as much of her work is, and inadequate as is her theory of life as well as her knowledge of life, she nevertheless has valuable gifts, and has given promises of good things to come if her strength holds out. She certainly has a hopeful gift of humor, and a heart that is in the right place whenever she can keep her eyes off it for a few minutes. But who but a publisher would have put her to writing "juveniles," because she had sold many thousand copies of "The Gates Ajar"? Then in this "Trotty Book" there is humor—very forced, too, a deal of it—and there is plenty of truth of details; and of course there is kindheartedness; and there is also, or the story would not be Miss Phelps's, a dead set at our heart-strings, with intent to wring them. The first chapter contains a picture of a little child, lost in the woods in a snow-storm—a boy of two or three years old who cries miserably for help. So boys of equal age have cried before in other books; but in this one we, of course, have with our boy a little girl, his sister, who might well enough have brought her brother out of the snow, but who selfishly runs away and leaves him—for she has an evening's amusement before her—and who, after making him suffer all but death, herself suffers a good deal of that luxury of woe of which so many of her creator's bigger personages have already suffered greater quantities. Is this sort of thing worth doing, we wonder? We have not thought so when our author was doing it, in the unpleasant beginning of her "Gates Ajar," and the unpleasanter "Pemberton Mills" story, and the still unpleasanter "Calico," which was made for people of mature years; and we do not see how it is much better when done for younger readers. We mention it, however, rather for the reason that Miss Phelps seems to be all wrong in this matter always, than that the example of her fault, which happens to be now before us for comment, is a particularly glaring or pernicious one. Luckily, children cannot reject much; and if they will read almost anything, as "juvenile" writers well know, so, too—let us be thankful—they will forget almost any bad or poor thing. At all events, one really good book—one book fit for them, which addresses what in them is best worth addressing, and does it skilfully—is always able to banish from their minds the greater part of the worthless stuff that incapable writers have put into them. "Robinson Crusoe," or "Two Years Before the Mast," or "The Arabian Nights," or "Cook's Voyages," or "Sandford and Merton"—any one of them is more than a match for whole libraries of "Memoirs" of the early dead, and whole shelves full of warning against drunkenness, profligacy, and theft. Miss Phelps's book the adult reader will find not unamusing. He may, perhaps, have his doubts whether some of the sayings and doings of the hero are reproduced without any embellishment at all; but still he will often be reminded of the doings of little boys and girls. Whether the childish reader will be amused by it we do not know. Some children are quite capable of liking it. We confess we have known a few children—some of whom are still living—who listened with eagerness to tales which only just before we had heard intelligent critics condemning with severity; but we may assert, too, that we never knew the tales so condemned to become established favorites; and we are well persuaded that there is something bad—nothing good enough, at all events—about every book for children which the children do not repeatedly turn to, and con, and almost learn by heart. Who ever told a boy or girl a story really good for him or her that he did not have to tell over and over again? And, on the other hand, who ever told a child any story that was not sure of attention on the first if not on the second telling? It is a fallacious test, often as it is tried and triumphantly cited, to apply to "juveniles" that "the children liked it." Good "juveniles" are liked to-day, and to-morrow, and for ever, and the child becomes a father or mother, and perennially tells them over to new children, while year by year generations of annual literature flourish, and fade, and disappear.

And now draws near a certain Pharisee by the name of Walter Murray, with his phylacteries made broad and his hands folded on his bosom. Walter Murray is the chief personage of a story called "The Apthorp Farm," one of "The Woodbine Series,"* which, if we remember, we have already more than once had occasion to condemn without reserve. It is unnatural, full of mistaken notions as to what it is possible or desirable for boys to do, and fit only to spoil the boy who is so unfortunate as not to be repelled by it. It opens with a scene in which the personages are three—the hero, his mother, and the subsidiary hero. The hero, who is in high health, allows himself to say, at the sight of a certain pony—"O mamma! how I do wish I were rich." Thereupon, his mamma immediately shows him that the rider of the pony, a boy of Walter's age, is very pale and thin and peevish-looking, and that, although he wears gloves, his hand is semi-transparent, or nearly so. In this kind of books, by the way, one never has wealth and health together, so parents may take notice that the "Woodbine" and similar series are not intended for the large class of cases in which the young Lazarus of real life cannot blink the fact that young Dives not only has better skates and a faster sled than himself, but also has the use of both legs and enjoys as good digestion as the hungriest and healthiest boy in the parish. To impress upon Walter's mind that he is far better off than the rich Frank Apthorp, whom he envies and whose pony he very naturally covets, Walter's mother takes him up to Squire Apthorp's, whose wife is an old schoolmate of hers and is still a friend, though Mrs. Murray is no longer wealthy, and there he makes Frank's acquaintance. Frank is, of course, a miserably spoiled child, whom nobody can please; who is selfish and cross, and has a way of telling his indulgent father and mother that of course nobody cares for him because he is a poor cripple. The two boys are left alone, and Frank expresses himself with so much bitterness on the question of sticking in the house all day and every day, that Walter overcomes the diffidence and delicacy for which boys in "Woodbine Series" are justly notorious, and reveals to his friend a character made up of nearly every Christian grace—every single one, except, perhaps, long-suffering. He admits that his temper is hasty, though his disposition is magnanimous and generous, but confides to Frank that he is struggling with this fault; that he never answers back if he can help it; that if he cannot help it he seeks his closet, and then begs pardon of the person offended. He suggests that the sick boy might try devoting himself to the service of others as a means of overcoming the tediousness of his life. Moreover, he declines to go to the tea-table—little used to dainties as he is—because the crippled boy cannot very well go, and when tea is sent up to the two of them he says grace. This surprises Frank, who is asked in astonishment if his father does not do so at every meal. Thus it is that in a "Woodbine Series" they inculcate the observance of the Fifth Commandment. Another sample of how the duty of honoring fathers and mothers is impressed on the young reader of such books is the chapter which recounts Mrs. Apthorp's heartless neglect of her son—"leaving him to hirelings," as her husband says, "till he is down with hip complaint." After—or before—Walter has said grace and the boys have eaten, some cut flowers are brought in, and Frank and Walter set about making bouquets, with the understanding that Mrs. Apthorp shall decide which is the prettier. They are made, and the lady hesitates to pronounce; but Walter, taking the flowers, changes them rapidly from one hand to the other, remarking that he perfectly understands Mrs. Apthorp's hesitation, and, after shifting them about sufficiently, he calls for judgment. It is given, and at once Walter begins jumping up and down. A frown darkens Mr. Apthorp's brow. "So young and so untender!" he feels like quoting; "so pleased with a victory over an invalid!" The reader versed in the "Woodbine Series" class of tales knows well, however, that their heroes are not caught napping in that manner. Of course the generous boy was jumping up and down because Frank's refined taste had led him to put the dark myrtle in juxtaposition with the delicate orange blossoms, and thus produce an effect which made his bouquet the superior of the other.

Needless to say, Squire Apthorp by-and-by wishes to adopt Walter, and that he is successful in getting Mr. and Mrs. Murray's consent. Needless to say, either, that after some slight misunderstanding between Walter and Mr. and Mrs. Apthorp—consequent on the machinations of Eugene, a designing though polished lad, who wishes to become his uncle's heir, but who is disgraced at last—the adopted son becomes the means of converting the squire, and is the more than friend and brother of Frank, whose character, under Walter's forming hand, daily grows more beautiful. Needless, too, to say that Walter's real father is aided by his second father to go into business again, and recovers all the wealth out of which, just before our tale opens, his rascally partner had defrauded him. All this happens, and more; for, at the end of the book, do not both the boys, now come of age, fall desperately in love with the same young lady? and does not Walter, perceiving Frank's passion, give her up freely, though with a bitter pang? and does not Frank by-and-by pass away, with his love-tale hidden in his heart? and does not Walter—the artist by nature, the noble Christian merchant, the canting little prig, the impossible boy, the man that never existed, the youth whom all healthy boys would infallibly hate if they could see him, and whom no one who had ever been anything like a boy would once think of holding up to boys as a model for imitation or a creature to be believed in—is it not written in this combination of Sunday-school book and sensational novel that Walter wooed and won Miss Julia Ward, who long had secretly loved him? It is so written; and not in this one volume alone, but in a hundred similar volumes which each Christmas calls into being; and worse reading for the young than these same volumes it would not be easy to find. It is almost incredible that the writers who make such books do not understand that, so far as they get any attention from boys and girls, they do great harm. They poison the sources of healthy life in the child's moral nature; they pervert his natural instincts; they set him upon acting a part, or else, which is nearly as bad, they discourage him into thinking that, because he is not as white and glistering as the young lepers who are held up to him as examples of more than human cleanliness, it is therefore useless for him to try to be good. Hypocrites such books infallibly make, if they make anything, or else unhappy, struggling little creatures, taught superfluous misery; and it would be a good day if, in reverentia pro pueris, we could have a censor and a bonfire for the "juvenile market."

Perhaps M. Paul Du Chaillu is not the one man of all men for a companion of youth, but he is Hyperion to a Satyr in comparison with the author last mentioned. He is a little sanguinary in his dealings with the brutes which he comes upon in his travels, and kills and skins with a single-eyed ardor for the advancement of science which leads him to recount fearlessly a deal of butchery. But we incline to think that his descriptions of his hunting adventures—his account of the shooting of the beautiful gazelle for its hide, and of his capturing the young gorilla which he had orphaned for the sake of the museum—will tend to excite as much pity and sympathy in the young reader as bloodthirstiness. And the courage and hardihood, energy and love of adventure, commended to admiration in "Lost in the Jungle"*—to say nothing of the information which it very pleasantly conveys—make it a book we should be willing to give to all boys old enough to read its easy English. According to M. Du Chaillu, the boys and girls themselves are of our mind, and they have tried him long enough to feel sure of their opinions. "When he asked the boys and girls of New York if he should write more books for them, the tremendous cheers and hurrahs they gave him in reply told him," he says, "that he had better go to work." His esteemed publishers endorsed that opinion. "Certainly," they said; "by all means, friend Paul. Write a new book, for 'Stories of the Gorilla Country' and 'Wild Life under the Equator' are in great demand." So to work Friend Paul went, and in this well-illustrated volume we have wild beasts, wild men, strange insects, monstrous reptiles, and whatever else M. Du Chaillu deals in—not forgetting the gorilla who beats his breast as much as ever, gnashes his teeth, advances as bravely as of old to attack the hunter, and displays all the gigantic strength and semi-human sagacity with which M. du Chaillu's gorillas have made us familiar. At one time we thought we were to be treated to a white gorilla, an aged, hoary one, but our author contented himself with giving us the ordinary dark kind, though of these he has some which are fearfully wrinkled and a little gray, though none (that he kills) are of diminished vigor or ferocity so far as we have observed.

Miss Nellie Eyster is the author of "Chincapin Charlie," a merry, unpretending little book for young people which we remember to have read and liked some two years ago, and her "Tom Harding and His Friends"† has the same good qualities which made its predecessor a commendable book. There is no pretense or nonsense in it; there is a very good understanding—for a woman's book—of the nature and habits of boys; and if there is perhaps a little more "vital religion" than it is very well to give boys in the books which after all do their best when they abstain from point-blank inculcation of truths, still, hers is neither a pharisaical nor a mawkish religiosity, but is unaffected and honest, and will at least not repel the young men to whom it is offered. And Miss Eyster, with her frankness, and heartiness, and liking for boyish fun and activity, digs about the roots of all those good plants in the human nature for her readers, and will do them ten times or a thousand times the benefit that she could do by preaching. She makes boys acquainted with real boys, who are not perfect indeed, but who are actually existent, and in many ways admirable, and thus she gets a hold of her hearers which, dealing in abstractions—though they were abstractions approved of by every convocation of every church—she would not get in a hundred years. She is not the cleverest woman who writes for children in this country; here, as elsewhere, the "juvenile market" often affords us the spectacle of blocks being cut with razors; but there are few writers in this field who ever clearly see what to write and what not to write to their peculiar audience. She does not waste high imaginative poetry on them; nor give them fine-spun fancies, and allegories as head-strong, and as hard to get into, as any alligator on the banks of the Nile; nor vulgarize them with razeed novels; nor fill their heads, as with sawdust, with a conglomeration of so-called facts in this and that science. But she gives them personages of boyish age and tastes and pursuits, and getting them interested in these she proceeds with entertainment and instruction, and will leave any of her readers the better for her help—if, that is to say, it is the business of boy literature primarily to make the boys manlier in spirit; and, secondly, to give them pleasure and the profit—more tangible than the spiritually elevating—which is got from the exercise of the mind, the access of new knowledge, and the more or less indirect instilling of precepts of sound morality. Tom Harding, we may say to intending purchasers, is a Pennsylvania boy who pays a winter visit to New Orleans, and afterwards to a cotton region of Georgia, and the book is useful geographically and, so to speak, politically. It will be well liked by boys from ten to fourteen years of age, not to speak of older people.

What to say about the temperance books—or rather the total abstinence books, for there are no temperance books—which come in such numbers at the time of the holidays, it is a little difficult to decide. No one can deny that the evils of intemperance can hardly be exaggerated; and it is not pleasant to withhold praise from persons who are eagerly working to abolish drunkenness. Yet we very seldom find a book exhorting to total abstinence which is not repulsively or, at the least, foolishly and laughably bad. A flood of "wet damnation" is overflowing the land, sure enough, one says to one's self; but why should it wash away all logic, and even endanger every shape of truth? And supposing it admitted that we are to do all that we can by word and deed to banish intoxicating drinks from society, need we therefore fling ourselves headlong against chewing tobacco and tobacco-chewers, and then on cigars and pipes, thirdly on coffee and tea, and finally on cayenne pepper, and catsup and picalilli, as constituting a first step in "that downward road from the caster to the gutter" which numbers of our reformers are denouncing? And even granting that this is to be done—that from pepper-sauce to plantation bitters every stimulant is to be abhorred—still, do we do well to put our views in their fulness into books that the smallest boys are to read and criticise—for all readers are critics? Here, now, at the present moment of writing is a well-meaning story, by Miss Chellis, called "Aunt Dinah's Pledge,"* and, besides its good intentions, portions of it are not so ill written either, for though the story is trivial and absurd in all essentials and in most of the details, there is a figure of an old black nurse which is so drawn as to give a hint that the author had laid bodily eyes on the original, and in depicting it had not quite got out of sight of nature and truth. Miss Chellis undertakes to set forth, which everybody believes, that the excessive drinking of intoxicating liquors is a frightfully bad habit, ruinous to body and mind. Further, she seeks to show, what not so many will believe, that there is no safety, or no certainty of safety, for the man who drinks at all, unless he decides on totally abstaining from everything intoxicating. Still further, she teaches, what many people will disbelieve, that in the signing of a written pledge there is a peculiar protective virtue, and that everybody would do well for his neighbors' sake, if not for his own, to sign some such paper at once. But her way of enforcing her conclusions on other people is as wise as this: She includes in her invective the loathsome pipe and the offensive cigar, and to refrain from smoking is as vigorously ordered by her pledge as to abstain from unrectified whiskey. Tobacco leads to dram-drinking, and the smoker is in her eyes a sinner. The youthful reader who is to be saturated with abhorrence of inebriety, and to learn the danger of tampering with spirituous liquors, is to look at his Cousin Tom, say, who smokes, and his grandfather, who takes snuff, and his friend the old salt who makes him boats, and who likewise chews plug-tobacco, and to pronounce them violators of God's law, enemies of the rising generation, bad men, and filthy fellows. He knows better; and even he has his doubts if Miss Chellis may not be wrong about the rum and water. Perhaps our author does no immediate evil—beyond leading our young friend into making two or three impertinent speeches to his elders, and getting him a pair of boxed ears as a consequence. But, by-and-by, such is the venturesomeness of youth, and such the certainty that the boy is yet far from being born who shall be without spot—by-and-by the youthful reader just mentioned, having grown up a bit, betakes himself to the use of tobacco in some one of its forms. He finds that it is a pleasure and a comfort, and soon he begins to suspect that, man's life being no longer than threescore-and-ten years, he may very probably die of some ordinary disease before he drops dead from the effects of nicotine. He discovers, too, that his sister Mira is so far different from Miss Chellis's "Mira" that she does not retire shedding tears of sorrow and disgust when he returns to their once happy home with the smell of cigars upon him, but that, on the contrary, she is not above filling a pipe for him herself; that, indeed, she goes further, and assures his intimate friend, when he calls, that she is very fond of the smell of tobacco. What, then, does the young man say of Miss Chellis and others like her? Doubtless that as they were so far out in the matter of smoking, and cried "Wolf" so hard when but a small mole was in sight, there may be some mistake in regard to the liquor question, at least as regards cider and ale; that it may be as well to make trial of the inebriating cup. Then comes the drunkard's bowl—though we may remark to Miss Chellis that the drunkard's bowl, and the worm of the still, and the poisoned chalice, and other things which they attack so persistently, are not the vessels which the more practical tempter offers the giddy youth who trusts himself in his power at commercial lunches and billiard saloons, and other such unmetaphoric places. Then, we repeat—after the discovery of the mistake about the smoking—comes the drunkard's bowl, or a bottle and tumblers, and, in brief, the upshot of the matter is, that the well-meaning but not too sagacious enemy of stimulating drinks has done something to diminish the Cold Water Army and to swell the bloated hosts of King Alcohol.

So much for the direct evil which is done by over-eager and exaggerated preaching, even if we admit that the subject chosen by the total abstinence writers is a very good or a fit subject on which to address childish readers. But we think no such admission should be made. It is a depressing, brutalizing theme, and no treatment of it can make its presentation very well worthy the attention of children at their most impressible age, and when they should be as much as may be surrounded by what is elevating and purifying—when they should be lifted up by all influences that can be employed, and when it is of less consequence to preach at particular faults than to ennoble the tone of the whole character. Then, again, this matter does not concern children, but their fathers and mothers; and to offer it to their notice is merely to arouse their curiosity, and to run into danger of doing them harm without securing any corresponding chance of doing them good. All temperance literature for the young might well be abolished, we think; and in almost every special case it might justly be condemned for particular faults and follies as well as for its general tone. This is the verdict that we for our own part should pass on "John and the Demijohn"*—a rather clever book—and "Dr. Willoughby's Wine"†—two volumes, of the same character as "Aunt Dinah's Pledge," which we read at the same time.

A very cheering sign that we are getting on in the art of teaching, and that our posterity will learn more and more exactly and more easily than we were permitted to, is Mr. Freeman's solid, conscientious, and entertaining history of England to the Conquest.‡ It is a book which the parent of a growing child—say of twelve and upwards—can hardly excuse himself for not purchasing if able; and it is as fit for a Christmas gift as a book of tales. The style, in fact, would alone recommend it—English history told in simple and colloquial English, that, without being in the least constrained, is almost monosyllabic. Witness these sentences:

"They tried to land both at Watchet and at Porlock, but they were driven off at both places, and most of them were killed, except those who could swim to their ships. These few went and 'sat' on one of the Holms, the islands at the mouth of the Severn, either the Steep Holm or the Flat; but they could get nothing to eat, so many of them died, and the rest sailed away, first to Dyfed, or Pembrokeshire, and thence to Ireland."

The steady, chronological march of the narrative is relieved here and there by episodes which the author will not admit as trustworthy history, nor yet omit wholly, because a grain of truth may be in them. These, with warning duly prefixed, he casts in a form akin to the Bible-English. He gives also occasionally a ballad, and in other ways keeps up the young reader's interest to the end. The notes are for grown people—parents or teachers—and so is the preface, which we should greatly like to quote entire. Here is the opening only:

"This little volume is an experiment, but it is an experiment which I may say has already succeeded. Its object is to show that clear, accurate, and scientific views of history, or indeed of any subject, may be easily given to children from the very first. In truth, the more rigidly accurate and scientific a statement is, the more easy it is for a child to take it in. The difficulty does not lie with the child, who has simply to learn, but with the teacher, who often has to unlearn."

Further on, he states that this work was begun, for his own children, before his "History of the Norman Conquest" was undertaken, and that his investigations for the larger work have served to perfect the smaller, while each remains independent of the other in form and purpose. Then follow some remarks on Old-English words and names, their spelling and pronunciation, and a chronological table for the period studied. In the body of the work are five historical maps of Great Britain, such as children are never, and grown folks seldom, provided with; and finally there is an index, which completes the numerous excellences of this really masterly text-book.

Mr. Neal's little book* consists of three parts: an essay, if it can be so called, on "Children—What are they good for?" written forty years ago, at least; a child's story, "Goody Gracious! and the Forget-me-not," written "for the purpose of showing—and proving—that fairy stories need not be crowded with extravagant impossibilities, to engage the attention of our little folks;" and 293 short anecdotes of children and their sayings, old and new, gathered from all sources, and accompanied by comments—this part called "Pickings and Stealings." But for the middle of this sandwich, we should not have guessed it to be made up for children, or classed it under juvenile literature. Children certainly should be kept clear of it, even if they have to be deprived of a story which writes "This was all a dream," after the usual narrative of "extravagant impossibilities." Their elders may read the selections with some enjoyment, unless liable to be shocked by the large number which bear on theology and religion, and of which there is none better than the story of the boy who said, "O dear! I'd rather go to two circuses than one meeting." To give some idea of the way Mr. Neal has cooked over the more or less fully narrated incidents he has come upon, we present two (accidental) versions of the same story. First we have the comment at full length:

"No. 75. A gentlewoman—I hate ladies—belonging to Gardiner, Maine, paid a visit to the graveyard with her little daughter. Seeing the effigy of a horse on one of the upright slabs, she stooped down to read the inscription, but nothing did she find to explain the mystery; whereupon the child whispered that 'maybe the poor man died of nightmare.' A very plausible conjecture, was it not, for a region where so many live and die of the same ailment, now under the name of apoplexy, and now under that of the heart disease, or plethora?"

And then we have the comment in a sub-title, a change of sex in the deceased, and one or two other variations:

"No. 186. Inferential.—A mother, who had with her a little daughter, was examining the figure of a horse on a tombstone, and wondering what on earth it was an emblem of. There was nothing to explain it in the inscription. 'Mamma,' said the little one, as they moved away, 'I should n't wonder if she died of the nightmare.'"

To expand Mother Goose's hints and fragments of stories into complete ones, with beginning and end, plot, incidents, and all—such was the idea born of the "Fairy Egg."† Its success here is rather equivocal. We do not know the child that would prefer these elaborated products to the raw material. Have our three friends found that the infant whom Mother Goose pleases is generally curious to know more than the verses tell of Bo-peep, or Richard and Robin, or the old woman who sweeps the cobwebs from the sky? or why the cow jumped over the moon? And does the infant's imagination go for nothing? Such has not been our experience in the nursery, nor Miss Gibbons's either, we dare say, since her "Little Bachelor" alone, of all the stories amplified, always keeps the original text in sight. To her also was entrusted the pictorial illustrations, which exhibit a good deal of originality and skill in designing, especially where young folks are to be represented. Some of her letter-pieces are exceedingly clever.

An instructive book may be written for children by one who consults for the history of Paris "Henri Martin's 'Histoire de France,' Thierry's 'Récit des Temps Mérovingiens,' Gilbert's 'Description historique de la Basilique métropolitaine de Paris,' Smiles's 'History of the Huguenots,' White's 'Massacre of St. Bartholomew,' Mme. Campan's 'Memoirs of Marie Antoinette,' and the best modern guide-books," but a thousand to one it will be anything but entertaining. The author of "An American Family in Paris,"‡ has indeed made several visits to that city, but we believe there are many persons who have never left the United States who could describe the French capital more vividly and attractively from books alone. There is, too, something essentially unreal in these family excursions, with the learned papa, or tutor, or governess, eager to be pumped and never nonplussed, and precocious youngsters who cry "jolly!" whenever they extract a new date or fact, and always suck a subject dry before leaving it. And just so far as this is a departure from reality, we fear it is unprofitable for the young. The illustrations would count on the other side, of course, but then a few stereoscopic views would outweigh them all.

Miss McKeever has, no doubt, a genuine fondness for children,* but she has also an undeniable weakness for verse, which quite swallows up the good which might result from the former. In this latest production of her muse, where verse and prose alternate in a curious manner, she shows her utter incapacity as a versifier—e. g.:

> "The bride is a pigeon, so white and so pure,
> The groom, dressed in dove-color, looks so demure;
> Blue jays for the groomsmen, with heads perched so high,
> And red-birds for bridesmaids, so gay and so spry."

And so on, almost without end. We question, too, whether Miss McKeever can write a hundred consecutive verses without such false rhyming as in these two lines:

> "In their travels, they met with some very strange birds,
> But the shy little pigeons so seldom had stirred, etc."

There is much to forgive, however, if these stanzas were evoked by the colored prints—which is quite likely.

The Week.

THE Senate has, during the week, discussed and passed the bill to reconstruct Georgia. It directs, first, that the Governor of the State shall convene by proclamation all the persons declared elected by Gen. Meade's proclamation of June 25, 1868, who shall then proceed to organize themselves as the General Assembly, "in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, according to the provisions of this act." Each member must then take oath that he never, after having held any public office, lent aid to the rebellion, "except in consequence of direct physical force." The Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Georgia will take cognizance, and shall have sole and exclusive jurisdiction, of perjury, and the Circuit or District Court of attempts to prevent the taking of the oath, or participation in the proceedings of either House after the oath has been taken. The exclusion, on account of race, color, or previous enslavement, of any one thus duly constituted a member, is next declared to be "illegal and revolutionary," and is prohibited. Upon application of the Governor, the President shall employ the military and naval forces to enforce the provisions of the act. And, finally, the Legislature shall ratify the Fifteenth Amendment before Senators and Representatives are admitted to seats in Congress. On Tuesday, the bill was carried through the House by General Butler.

Other noticeable proceedings in the Senate were the passage between Messrs. Carpenter and Sumner over the Spanish gunboats, on Wednesday week; an elaborate and well-considered argument against the eight-hour law by Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, who pronounced it a failure in the Government's experience, and an injustice to artisans and other laborers everywhere; and, on Monday, Mr. Schurz's bill to reform the Civil Service. This bill is for several sections copied almost verbatim after Mr. Jenckes's, but contains very important differences, on which we have not time to dwell this week. The House passed the Census Bill on Thursday, rejecting, finally, Mr. Jenckes's amendment; it has been postponed, but still saved, by the Senate. It was on Thursday, also, that Mr. Mungen, of Ohio, rose into obscurity on the subject of repudiation, and that, under the lead of Mr. Garfield, Republicans and Democrats embraced in defence of the national honor, and wondered who had ever thought of tarnishing it.

Astonishing as the Georgia Reconstruction Bill is by itself, it becomes more so when one reads the arguments by which it is defended. Georgia has been already admitted to the Union, under a solemn act of Congress, or, in other words, under a pledge of the nation, after having formally fulfilled all the conditions exacted of her by the original Reconstruction Acts. What the supporters of the present bill say in support of the theory that she is not in the Union, is, that her Senators had not been admitted to their places in the Senate, the majority of the Senate pronouncing them disqualified—something which might happen to New York to-morrow—and this is gravely given now as a reason why the General Government may overturn the State Government, and put the people under martial law, and impose fresh conditions of reconstruction. The expulsion of the negro members of the Legislature was a great outrage, but the constitutionality of it was very sensibly, on President Grant's recommendation, submitted to the Court of the State. The Supreme Court has accordingly decided that it was unconstitutional, and it now remains for the Legislature to abide by the judicial decision, which it is generally believed it will do when it meets in January. But the promoters of the present measure, apparently having a horror of the slow and regular processes of American jurisprudence, and being enamored of imperial ways of settling things, refuse to wait, and have accordingly passed an act repudiating the legislation of last winter, over which the country toiled and sweated so much, breaking the public faith, and setting a shocking example of contempt for law. The worst of it is that one of the excuses put forward in defence of this high-handed violence is, that it is done for the protection of negroes and loyal men against the violence of their neighbors, as if the way to provide for their protection was to keep them before the eyes of their fellow-citizens as the cause of the subversion of the State Government; and as if the respect of juries and magistrates for the law of the land could be promoted by exhibitions of Congressional disregard of it; and as if, in case the public opinion of Georgia cannot, or ought not, be trusted to for the protection of Georgian citizens, we ought not at once to provide permanent gendarmerie and Federal magistrates, armed with summary processes, instead of cheating the negro and the loyal whites with airy nothings called a "provisional government" or "martial law," things which have just enough substance to irritate, and not enough to afford the smallest protection either for life, or limb, or property. Mr. Bingham made a strong and able protest against the farce, but in vain.

Repudiation may be said to have received a coup de grace, during the week, by the passage, on General Garfield's motion, of a resolution condemning it in every shape and for all possible reasons, the occasion which called for the motion being some wild talk in favor of a national swindling by Mr. Mungen, of Ohio. All the Democrats present voted for the motion, some supporting it in strong language. The Philadelphia Age calls attention to the fact that the Democratic members voted in a body for a somewhat similar resolution in 1865, and seeks thereby to show that repudiation has never been a Democratic doctrine. It is quite true that in 1865 there was no talk or thought of cheating the public creditor; the movement began in 1866, the originator being Mr. Andrew Johnson, and the Democratic press very generally joined in, all over the country, not exactly in demanding, that the debt should not be paid, but in calling for its payment in greenbacks, and urging fresh issues of greenbacks for the purpose, or in holding up the bondholders to public odium as usurers, bloated aristocrats, blood-suckers, and so forth—which was neither more nor less than preparing the way for repudiation. Indeed, the best thing they can say for themselves is, that the Republican party tolerated in its own ranks talk fully as bad in quality, and more mischievous because coming from Republicans, as any which came from Democrats. But, then, the gist of the whole matter is, that certain politicians on both sides did what politicians are everlastingly doing—underestimated the popular virtue.

Our old friend, Mr. J. M. Ashley, has been removed at last. We felt satisfied, since we heard of his declaration of his willingness to "bow to the popular will" in the Territory on the subject of a white man's government, that trouble was in store for him, and that this would damage him, as his corrupt partnership with Case, as revealed in his correspondence, did not do. Indeed, the Case correspondence does not seem to have damaged him at all, or very little. Leading Republican Senators canvassed and voted for him, and everybody he asked signed his recommendation. The President, we believe, knew little about him. Since his removal, some difficulty in the way of his successor, General Potts, of Ohio, taking his place, makes it not improbable that he may be allowed to linger a little longer, but we presume his doom is sealed. If General Grant will now bring home Daniel E. Sickles, he will have removed the two great blots on his Administration. If Senators will stand firm against Sickles's confirmation, we feel satisfied they will receive the hearty commendation of all that is best in the Republican party.

The President's nominations for the new circuit judgeships have been in the main very good, but one of them, that of Mr. George H. Yeaman, a Kentuckian, now minister to Copenhagen, who would have made an excellent judge, has been withdrawn, and that of Mr. Withers, of Michigan, substituted. The cause of Mr. Yeaman's failure was the disinterment of certain speeches of his in 1862–'63 against the exercise of the war power, and especially the exercise of it for the emancipation of slaves. His "war record," for a Kentuckian, we believe, was excellent, and his rejection is simply an additional and striking illustration of the tenacity with which the North laid hold of the anti-slavery idea when once it had been brought to see that it was the fundamental idea of the struggle. Mr. Hoar, the Attorney-General, has been nominated for one of the vacancies on the supreme bench, and Mr. Edwin M. Stanton the other, caused by the resignation of Judge Grier. Mr. Stanton, who probably has as little of the judicial temper as any man who ever mounted the bench, has been at once confirmed without the customary reference, and by a large majority—46 to 11—by way of recognizing and rewarding his services during the war, in which he sacrificed both health and fortune. The nomination of Mr. Hoar, on the other hand, hangs fire, owing to his personal unpopularity with Senators, and it is curious to watch how the newspaper correspondents catch the senatorial tone and telegraph "little digs" at him to their respective journals. The causes of this unpopularity are his want of familiarity with, and what is of more importance, patience with; the ways of politicians; his undisguised contempt for "claims," and his tendency to stick pins into wind-bags. Considering his reputation as a judge and his high character, the hesitation of the Senate over his nomination is a curious piece of childishness. The country would, however, gain for the present by his total rejection, as he makes a rare Attorney-General, and helps to supply the Cabinet with that foundation of all statesmanship—good sense.

There is trouble between the Administration and the Senate about the new Judges, the Judiciary Committee making the extraordinary request that the President should furnish them not only with the letters of recommendation of the persons he had nominated, but of those he had rejected. This he declines to do, and there appears to be enough tartness of feeling existing on both sides to make it desirable that the quarrel should stop here. The Senate got into bad habits during the Johnson administration, which, it is to be hoped, it will try to lay aside. Its performances over Mr. Hoar give evidence of a very undignified state of mind.

There has been a good deal of magnanimous eloquence expended over Mr. Fessenden's memory by some of his old political adversaries, from which it appears that he was as pure and upright a man, and as sound a lawyer and politician, as the country has ever had. This is all true; but it was just as true last spring during the impeachment trial, when hundreds of curs were barking at his heels, and he was as nearly overwhelmed by insult and vile insinuation as such a man could be. That was the time, therefore, for a political adversary, who knew his worth and integrity, to have got up and said at least some of what was said in the Senate last week. Uttered then, it would have honored the speaker, and consoled and supported a brave and faithful public servant in the discharge of his sworn duty, and saved the party from some disgrace. Uttered now, though of course creditable and decent, it has somewhat of the character of an empty form. We mention it by way of preparation for the next attempt to hunt some honest man into baseness.

We think we see some symptoms of shame on the part of the people of Indiana with regard to the state of their divorce laws, and we hope there are signs of the same thing—though as yet we fail to see them—on the part of the Indiana bar with regard to the mode in which they are administered. The ex-parte account of the McFarland case lately furnished to the Cincinnati Commercial has called forth replies from some of the Indiana papers, from which it appears that the copies of the Martinsville Gazette in which the editor swore the notice to McFarland was published, do not appear on any existing files of that widely-circulated paper; and one journal says that its belief is that the practice was resorted to in this case which has been not uncommon in similar cases, of publishing an extra edition of three or four copies, which, and none others, contained the notice—the plaintiff's attorney paying the cost. A more ingenious contrivance for debauching the bench, the bar, the press, and society at large than is to be found in Indiana legislation on this question, a civilized community has not often hit on. People are, however, beginning to ask themselves in every direction how much longer we ought to go on with the property and morals of one nation exposed to the conflicting action of thirty-seven different laws of marriage and divorce.

The Spanish gun-boats have sailed, amidst fierce protests from the Cuban partisans and the showers of stones and other missiles from a mob which collected on the wharf, and had to be held in check by a detachment of marines. Accounts from Cuba, too, represent Grant's message and the release of the gun-boats, combined with the cool weather and improved health of the Spanish troops, as having a very depressing effect on the fortunes of the insurgents, who have recently been driven from at least one entrenched position—but who suffered most in the encounter, it would take a seer to say. At Washington, the Cuban interest is decidedly on the decline, Cuban bonds being rather too plentiful, and the Cuban lobby importunate enough to bore even Congressmen, who are probably better used to bores than any other class of created beings.

Mr. Wells's report is out, but we regret to say reaches us too late for extended notice this week. It is longer, we believe, and more elaborate, and takes stronger ground against the tariff than any of his preceding reports, the evidence on the subject of course accumulating with each revolving year. He makes at the opening the startling statement, or perhaps we should rather say understatement, that the war cost the country nine thousand million dollars, to say nothing of the lives expended. Those who remember the period before the war, when the value of the slaves, about two hundred million dollars, was mentioned as sufficient to cover with ridicule the proposal to emancipate them by purchase from their owners, will read Mr. Wells's report with a deeper sense than ever of the mystery of the future and the feebleness of human foresight. Mr. Wells, while drawing a gloomy future of the material progress of the country, gives a very doleful account of the manner in which its wealth is distributed amongst the people, and of the effect of the tariff upon its productive power, and, above all, its effect in excluding American commodities, even grain, from foreign markets. The storm the report will raise against him amongst the high-tariff men will be tremendous, and there is little doubt a vigorous attempt will be made to prevent the renewal of his office, which expires by limitation in June. We trust Congress, however, will have more sense than to heed it, as Mr. Wells's work is really one of the most valuable results of the war, and is playing a most important part in the economical education of the people.

We believe we have at last come to an understanding of the nature and objects of the "Woman's Parliament." It has been formally organized in this city, with Mrs. Peirce, of Cambridge, as its president, within the last week, the earlier movement on which we commented having been merely preliminary, and the "Woman's Councils" and other gatherings which have intervened having been mere meetings for desultory debate. The word "parliament," we understand, does not contain the germ of any pretensions to the character of a legislature, but is used in the primitive and literal sense of a conference, or council, for discussion. The body has nothing to do with the suffrage movement, of which, indeed, it speaks disrespectfully, holding that until women are able to maintain their ground with men in all walks of life the ballot will be of no use to them, and that, in order to hold their own, they need to be trained to work of all sorts, to learn the art of transacting business, and of managing their own affairs without male help. It proposes, therefore, to occupy itself with such questions as women's education, work, wages, dress, amusements, health, clothing, vices, temptations, legal disabilities, and so forth—a tremendous programme, but full of interest. "Harmonies" and "affinities" it refuses to discuss, and refuses to say what particular act of Congress will, in its opinion, finally establish the reign of truth, justice, and purity on earth, and drive the male rascals into the great alkaline desert.

If we may be allowed a word of criticism, however, we will say that we think the Parliament is in error in refusing to discuss female suffrage, or advocate it at all. The subject is now engaging the attention of great numbers of persons, and there is an immense deal to be said for it, and it is suffering grievously, as it seems to us, from the rant of some of its supporters. They are beginning to indulge in extravagant prophecies about the result of female voting, to believe which one would have to believe first of all either that women are angels already, or that the ballot would make angels of them; and tpe consequence is, that great numbers of sensible men and women refuse to listen any longer, and begin to treat the whole subject with contempt. Now, if the "Parliament" be composed of women who are able to keep their heads cool while talking of woman's condition, they would do well to discuss her political rights among other things, and give sober consideration to the question of her probable influence on politics, or, rather, to the probable influence of her sex on her political action.

A controversy, marked by a good deal of bitterness, has been raging during the week between Benjamin F. Butler and Horace Greeley. It arose out of a personal appeal—one of a kind which Mr. Greeley now frequently makes in the columns of the Tribune—to General Butler to throw his weight into the scales in favor of a general amnesty for the South. One remark of Mr. Greeley's, at the very outset, that though he heard many things said against General Butler, he never heard him accused of being a fool—being a covert insinuation that the General's reputation was that of a knave—satisfied us that the discussion would be marked by great ferocity; and we were not mistaken. It took at once, in General Butler's hands, the shape of a comparison between the amount of popular confidence enjoyed by each disputant, and in this the member for the Fifth District achieved an easy victory, as he had been returned to Congress in spite of his peculiar financial views and the opposition of an able Republican, while Mr. Greeley, in his late attempt to achieve similar distinction, had run behind his ticket in the best Republican districts, and only received a handsome vote in the wards most notorious for electoral frauds in this city; the conclusion was, therefore, that Mr. Greeley's opinions on this subject were not worth listening to. We are bound to say, however, that in history and moral philosophy Mr. Greeley beats his opponent all to nothing, and would stand on a very lofty moral eminence if it were not for a cutting allusion to Jeff. Davis having been the General's favorite candidate for the Presidency in 1860, which, of course, brought him down at once to the Butler level, and will probably lead to bloody reprisals within the next few days.

The effect of the Emperor's speech at the opening of the Chambers does not seem to have been very favorable. Émile Girardin reports in the Liberté that he had asked all his Liberal friends what they thought of it, and the only thing in which they agreed was in considering it "incoherent." He calls attention to one phrase in it—"As to order, I will answer for that"—which was also used by President Louis Napoleon, in a speech on a similar occasion, a week before the coup d'état in 1851. Some surprise is expressed, too, that the Emperor should have ventured to rejoice over the abolition of slavery in the United States, seeing that, if his Mexican project had been successful, and the Confederacy through his indirect aid had been established, slavery would not have been abolished. In the meantime, however, the Emperor's health is said to be excellent; and Dr. Ricord is cited as an authority for the statement that his recent illness has done him a deal of good, which will be sad news for "Dr. X.," the dissolute physician who used to prophesy his approaching decease in the Reveil. The Liberals are preparing for a vigorous campaign in the Corps Législatif—the notices of "interpellation" given by Jules Favre being so radical as to promise even to satisfy Raspail, the aged Red, who is with Rochefort the principal representative of the pure and unadulterated democracy. Moreover, M. Favre has for the first time exercised "the right of initiative," or, in plain English, the right of bringing in bills accorded to the lower house by the late Senatus Consultum, by bringing in one of exceeding brevity, but of exceeding importance, viz.: "The constituent power shall belong henceforth exclusively to the Corps Législatif." The "constituent power" means, in the political phraseology of continental Europe, the power of making or modifying the organic law, which the Emperor now keeps for the Senate and himself, but which Jules Favre and the Liberals insist must be transferred to the representatives of the people. This is, therefore, an attempt to put an end in form as well as in fact to personal government, and strikes so directly at the very roots of the Empire that it is feared by many that, if the Emperor cannot successfully resist it in any other way, he will resist by a coup d'état; but he is rather too old for another enterprise of this sort, and, what is of more consequence, the men who made the last one successful have vanished, and there is nobody to take their places. They were lucky dogs, for the France out of which they made their fortunes exists no longer.

There is a good deal of agitation in a small way in Europe over the ferocious attitude taken up by the Sultan towards the Khedive—the former calling on the latter to cease contracting foreign loans, lay down his fleet, and submit himself to the imperial grace, or be deposed, and Mustapha Fazyl Pasha put in his place. The Turk is said to be greatly set up by the success of his late loan, and considerably chagrined by the éclat which his vassal has derived from the opening of the Suez Canal, and is, consequently, not sorry to have somebody to kick, just to show the world that there is still some of the old fire left in him. The European press generally treat his course as rank folly; some feel satisfied, and with reason, that the quarrel will come to nothing, as France and England will interfere to keep the peace; while others recommend that a ring be formed, and the parties left to fight it out. What does more to make the Sultan's course seem ridiculous is, as we mentioned some weeks ago, the strong probability that he would get the worst of it if he came to blows, the Egyptian troops being able to give a good account of three times their number of Turks. If nobody interfered, too, the war would hardly be confined to the Turks and Egyptians; Greeks and Bulgarians would lend a hand, and the Levant would become a scene of such strife as has not been witnessed for a long while—which makes it probable that somebody will interfere, even if the Sultan does not grow wiser.

MR. TRUMBULL'S SUPREME COURT BILL.

PERHAPS the strongest argument for Mr. Trumbull's bill cutting off the right of appeal to the Supreme Court in certain cases, and obliging the court to derive from Congress its official knowledge of political facts, is to be found in the question, What should Congress have done if the Supreme Court had declared the war unconstitutional by denying the right of the Federal Government to coerce a State? Of course the answer of ninety-nine men out of every hundred would have been, Disregard it. In other words, people would have said, There are some issues too grave to be submitted, in the present state of human nature, to any legal tribunal, which never have been and probably never will be submitted to any legal tribunal; and one of them is the right of twenty millions of people to exist as a nation. This is a question which has never yet been laid before any less arbiter than the Lord of Hosts. There never yet has been a man, and never will be a man, it is safe to say, in the present stage of human development, competent to give judgment on it. The proofs in such a controversy could be carried into no earthly chamber nor comprised within any written or spoken pleading, for they consist in the readiness of vast numbers of men to lay down all that makes life dear, and life itself, in pursuit of an ideal good. When men enough agree to do this to make all material resistance to their will useless, all argument on their right to do it becomes child's play. Nations may yet submit to legal arbitrament questions of more or less, of this meaning or that meaning, of true or false, of honorable or dishonorable; but the question to be or not to be will, it is safe to say, be for ever reserved to the sword.

The right to fight in defence of the national existence would, however, be of little use without the right of deciding when the danger to avert which the fighting was begun is over. Anybody who is authorized to tell us when to lay down our arms might as well also be authorized to tell us when to take them up, because he can with a word render our taking them up vain. In other words, if we conceded to the Supreme Court the right of saying when an insurrection was fully suppressed, we might as well concede to it also the right of saying whether it should be suppressed at all or not. Therefore, that Congress should have charge, and exclusive charge, of the work of reconstruction, is the logical result of its having exclusive charge of the work of putting down the rebellion. The elements which enter into the question whether the rebellion is extinct or only smouldering are of a nature to prevent them being properly placed before any legal tribunal, and to incapacitate any legal tribunal from forming a correct judgment on them.

Having said this much, we may safely add that it is needless to attach any importance to Mr. Trumbull's bill—much less to Mr. Drake's bill depriving the Supreme Court of the power of declaring any Act of Congress unconstitutional—on the ground that something is needed to check the tendency of the Court to usurp power over the coordinate branches of the Government, or to assume predominance in the Government. The argument is made still less respectable, too, by the attempts made to fortify it by citations from the prophecies and protests of the democratic fathers. The dangers which these worthies, without any experience to guide them, thought they foresaw, we, with a good deal of experience, perceive that they did not foresee at all. The fear that the court would lord it over Congress and the President has been proved not to have a particle of foundation. Indeed, the judiciary is the branch of the Government, and the only one, which has been steadily declining in influence and authority during the last fifty years. The other two have found means to compensate themselves in one direction for what they lost in another; but whatever the judiciary has lost, it has lost outright. Nearly every tendency of the day has told against the increase of its power, while there is hardly one which has not helped to increase the power of the executive and the legislature. The growth of wealth, combined with the possession by Congress of the public purse, has lessened the influence of the bench by condemning it to poverty and making it less attractive to able lawyers. The increasing influence of numbers on the conduct of public affairs has added enormously to the force of the representative branch of the Government, and proportionably diminished the force of the branch which has no constituency to back it up. In an age when the number of men who dare to speak their own sentiments as such is greatly diminished, of course judges' opinions count for less than they did in the age when individual statesmen were a political power. Moreover, the prevailing taste for political and moral speculation, the decline of authority, the weakened force of habit, the dislike of walking by landmarks or on beaten tracks, have all tended to bring into disrepute the function of comparison and interpretation, which in our jurisprudence is the only one left to the judges.

It has been shown, too, by actual experience, what one would think might have been predicted à priori even by Jefferson, that the revisory power over legislation of a tribunal which can never be called on to pass judgment on the validity of a law at all except on the demand of a suitor in a boná-fide controversy, can rarely be a source of danger or even of inconvenience. It is a remarkable fact, too, that, the one occasion on which the court could be fairly charged with attempting to settle a political controversy by a judicial decision, the attempt was made not for the honor and aggrandizement of the court itself, but for the benefit of one of the great political parties of the day; thus revealing its greatest danger, and that which those who legislate about it are bound to give most heed to—the danger of its being used as a tool by a party in power to give a kind of moral sanction to measures not otherwise justifiable.

There are many signs, some of which we mentioned a fortnight ago, that the Supreme Court is recovering from the temporary loss of influence and dignity inflicted on it by the Dred-Scott decision and the events of the war. The general excellence of the President's appointments to the new circuit judgeships, capped by the bestowal of the vacant seats in the Supreme Court itself on Judge Hoar and Mr. Stanton, and the increase of salaries which is now pending in Congress, are all signs of a healthy reaction in the public mind as to the inestimable value of an upright, independent, and honored judiciary. The jurisprudence of a country is neither more nor less than what we may call its morality applied to its affairs, or, in other words, its morality formulated and committed to the custody of men trained to the faithful and efficient discharge of the duty. A people which, emancipated from the rule of authority, is left without a jurisprudence so preserved and extended, and without more exact tests of the value of its resolves than the winds of doctrine blowing from platforms, and debating clubs, and newspapers, may be said to occupy in the moral world a place somewhat analogous to that which nomad tribes occupy in the political world—running from one well or oasis to another, without aims, or aspirations, or progress. The art of judging and the habit of honoring judges are acquisitions which the Anglo-Saxon race only among modern nations can be said to possess; and there is none of its riches it should more carefully cherish. The judge as an independent institution, and not a Government functionary, is something of which other peoples only dream or sing. We have it: let us keep it.

MINORITY REPRESENTATION IN ILLINOIS.

THE people of the State of Illinois are much interested just now in the discussion of Personal, or, as some of them call it, Proportional Representation; and there seems every likelihood that the Constitutional Convention which has just met will take this subject into serious consideration. It is much to be desired that an experiment should be made in good earnest, in at least one branch of the Legislature; and it is equally to be desired that it should be made so judiciously and cautiously as to be a test of the merits of the principle itself, and not merely a trial of some favorite method of applying the principle in practice. A failure now would probably be fatal to all hope of seeing any speedy reform in this important matter; and a failure is quite as likely to be the result of unessential details as of any fault in the principle itself.

There are three plans of Personal Representation which are well known and widely discussed. First, there is Mr. Hare's plan, of allowing each voter to endorse upon his ballot any number of names in the order of his preference, only one of which is to be in any case counted —each person elected to have a fixed quota of votes, and all ballots beyond this bearing his name to be counted for other candidates following these endorsements. This most complete and equitable system is tacitly set aside in our discussion as being too complicated for our community.

Second, there is the plan of the New York Personal Representation Society, which pays no regard to quota, recognizes the principle of plurality choice, and gives each member as many votes in the Legislature as he has received at the polls. The third plan is that reported to the United States Senate by Mr. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, according to which each elector has as many votes as there are members to be chosen, but may cumulate them, if he likes, upon one, two, or more candidates. The New York plan is especially designed for a State Legislature, and it is hard to see how it could be conveniently applied to the election of members of Congress; for, even if the rule for suffrage were the same all over the Union, there will always be a disparity among the different States in the proportion of votes to population. Mr. Buckalew's plan is intended especially for Congress; for a State Legislature it would probably be necessary to subdivide the State into two or three sub-districts; indeed, this would seem desirable even for members of Congress in the case of the largest States.

Most of the Chicago papers are advocating a modification of the New York plan, on the ground that this gives a perfectly fair and equal representation of the whole community. The method proposed by the Chicago Republican provides for an absolute equality of members of the two parties, by dividing the State into districts, each choosing two members, but no elector voting for more than one. Even this would not result in an equality, for in districts where there is an immense preponderance of one party, that party would get both members; and besides, it wholly leaves out of sight the possibility of a third party, or the representation of persons who are dissatisfied with both parties. Further, it leaves the inhabitants of each district just as absolutely subject to King Caucus as at present. It answers one purpose—the representation of minorities, that is, of a minority; but the no less needed reform in the representation of the majority it leaves wholly out of sight.

These objections lie to this special plan; but the objections to the general principle followed by the New York Society are no less weighty. It rests upon the theory of delegation, that the representative is to be only a mouthpiece of his constituents—a theory which is no doubt correct in so far as he is chosen upon a special issue, but no further. In not one case of ten do representatives divide upon questions that were distinctly before their constituents when they were elected; and even when this is the case, the question may have shifted in such a way as to appear now in a wholly new light. For instance, the present Congress was chosen on the issue of Reconstruction. The questions of Finance and Civil Service Reform were clearly before the country. Everybody knew that they would be the leading ones before the Congress; yet few persons considered this in their voting, because it was properly felt that the work of Reconstruction was not clinched until it had been approved by a popular verdict, and that that was the work of the hour. So that on this plan the power of members of Congress upon the great questions of to-day would be proportioned to their position upon the dead issues of two years ago.

We do not, therefore, approve of the New York plan, because it is based upon the false principle of delegation of power, and because even this principle it carries out but lamely. When we consider further the complications of the voting in a large legislative assembly, where each member should cast several thousand votes, it is surprising that so impracticable a scheme should meet so much favor. It should at least be modified by cutting off the two right hand figures of each sum, and letting the members vote only the round hundreds.

Another point in which we differ from the Chicago papers is in regard to the district system, the establishment of which is a chief ground of complaint against Mr. Buckalew's plan. Now, this is to us one of the best features in his plan. What do we want of these cumbersome, artificial, electoral districts, when we already have towns and counties? We agree that it is desirable to pay some regard to locality, and have no objection to districts large enough for each to choose half a dozen members or more, provided these are not chosen exclusively by the majority; but it is in these petty districts, where local politicians and local interests reign supreme, that half the mischief of the present order of things lies. Adopt the New York plan, with the modification suggested above, but with its original feature of no districts; let the votes be untrammelled by "shrieks of locality," and cast their ballots for the best man, wherever he may happen to live, and we may be sure that the best men in the various sections of the State will be recognized and gladly chosen by their neighbors.

The Chicago Times, indeed, while joining its Republican neighbors in favoring the reform in question, inclines to advocate Mr. Buckalew's plan, and at any rate avoids schemes so impracticable as that before described. It makes, for instance, the very judicious suggestion that if districts be retained at all, they be identical with the counties—the number of members to vary with the population of the county, and the voting to be done either by cumulation or by limiting the vote of each elector, so that the minority might be sure of at least one member in all counties where more than one was chosen.

The New York plan, if modified as suggested above, by confining the votes of the members to the round hundreds, and further restricting this method of voting to questions where the ayes and noes are called, might work well—although even then it would give unrivalled opportunities for filibustering. But it would, we confess, have one advantage over Mr. Buckalew's plan, as well as over the plan that we ourselves proposed two years ago: that no disadvantage would reside in the disparity of votes received by different candidates. Our proposition was like Mr. Buckalew's, except that it did not allow the cumulating of votes—each elector was to cast only one, and a plurality would elect; both plans would leave it as a healthy and legitimate work for party organization so to district and control their parties in the several sections as to prevent much waste of votes. At any rate, the difference in the number of votes received by different members would not be any greater than at present, and either plan would allow electors to scratch a bad nomination without voting against disparity.

One thing we wish to insist upon again. It is not wholly in the interests of the minority, that is, of any specific minority, that we favor this principle, but quite as much for the protection of the majority itself, and the elevation of the character of legislative bodies. This object can be reached only by destroying the excessive power of the Caucus, and for this we believe any of these plans—except that criticised above—would be efficient. The people of the whole Union are looking hopefully to Illinois, and it would be worthy of this noble State to inaugurate a reform from which so much good may result. We trust that no difference of opinion on unessential details will prevent honest men of different parties who are laboring for great public ends from agreeing upon some method, which, if not theoretically perfect, will ensure at least a measure of reform.

THE SITUATION IN IRELAND.

The Irish difficulty may be said, during the last few weeks, to have entered on a new and extraordinary phase, plunging the Gladstone ministry into a sea of trouble, of which no man can see the end. The disestablishment of the Irish Church was an excellent measure in al respects but one. It came at a most unfortunate time; it were better done sooner or done later; that is, if an act of justice ever admits of postponement. It resembled every preceding English concession to Ireland in being apparently the result of intimidation. The arguments against the maintenance of the Irish Church were as strong in 1865 as they were in 1868, yet anybody who talked of its abolition in the former year was set down as an impracticable visionary, while those who proposed it in the latter year were hailed as enlightened statesmen. Now the only thing which had occurred in this brief interval to bring about this sudden change in English sentiment was the discovery that the close of the war in the United States had left a large body of Irish military adventurers without employment, and with more or less military skill and experience; that they had succeeded in organizing an immense association on American soil, and raising large sums of money for the avowed object of stirring up rebellion in Ireland and making armed attacks on British territory, and that the American public had been so irritated by the course of the English Government during the war as to be disposed to wink at and even encourage Fenian enterprises; nay, that it was not impossible that the weight of the Irish element in American politics might precipitate a bloody solution of the Alabama difficulty. Moreover, the nature of the Fenian operations in both England and Ireland was such as to spread terror through society. The leaders were apparently troubled with no scruples, and were faithfully served by adherents who swarmed in every English town. If ever there was a moment when the ordinary rules of the lower worldly prudence prescribed standing firm and yielding nothing, it was the moment when Mr. Gladstone proposed the surrender of the church. And yet the moral situation was one from which there was no other possible outlet.

The natural result followed. The English liberals have received no credit whatever for having undergone any intellectual conversion, or made any moral advance as to the mode of dealing with Ireland. There is probably not an Irish Catholic who does not ascribe the change of policy to pure, unadulterated fear; and the minute the land question was mentioned as the one next to be dealt with, the Fenians set to work to apply the stimuli they found, or thought they found, so successful in the case of the church. Not that the Fenians proper desired or enjoyed the settlement of the church question, or take any interest in the land question, either. They are probably perfectly sincere in saying that nothing but total independence will satisfy them. But the result in the case of the church has enabled them to convince those who do not belong to their ranks that peaceful agitation, or "moral force," in which O'Connell had taught them to place a certain reliance, was of no value whatever, and that Fenian tactics were the only ones to force from England quick and ample concessions—whether the object in view was religious equality, or tenant right, or total independence, mattered not.

Accordingly, Fenians, or people of a Fenian turn, now have it all their own way. There is no longer much taste for discussions of the land question, and, indeed, as far as the Irish are concerned, little or no discussion. That is carried on in the main by Englishmen, and at all events in the English papers, and the only Irishmen who take part in it are landlords or men of the landlord class. The tenants "help along the cause," as our agitators say, by killing landlords, robbing houses of arms, and serving notices of an early death on persons interfering with actual possessors of farms. They no longer, as a priest remarked, the other day, in a speech in Waterford, take the trouble to form organizations for the commission of outrages; each individual, when he finds himself in the vein for it, without communicating his purpose to anybody, "takes his revolver and tumbles his landlord" without more ado. Nobody sees him, or, if anybody does, he knows better than to swear against him, and juries know better than to convict him.

Along with the demand for the settlement of the land question came a demand for an amnesty for the Fenian prisoners convicted last year. If the Fenians had believed the government to be strong or brave, an amnesty would have been possible. In the presence, however, of the popular impression of its state of mind, Mr. Gladstone felt, and he was confirmed in his opinion by the representations of Irish property holders, that an amnesty at that juncture would result almost in a break-up of the social organization, and deadly peril for every landholder, if not for the entire Protestant population. He accordingly refused. One of the convicted Fenians, O'Donovan Rossa, a man apparently of very violent temper and great bodily strength, continued, during his confinement, to testify against British rule by hostile operations against his keepers. Four or five powerful men were found necessary to remove him from one cell to another, and one of his morning salutations to the warden was the emptying of his slop bucket in that functionary's face. This policy of his so delighted his friends out of doors that they nominated him as a candidate for the representation of the county of Tipperary in Parliament, in opposition to a thoroughgoing Liberal barrister, Mr. Heron, who had the hearty support of the priests; and such was the terror they inspired that, out of a registered constituency of nearly 10,000, only about 2500 went to the polls, and Rossa was elected by a little over 1200 votes, his supporters, of course, knowing well that as a convicted felon he cannot serve, and being apparently impelled into voting for him, partly as a defiance to the government, and partly for what they would call the "divilmint" of the thing. Moreover, the priests who supported Mr. Heron had to have a guard of police on their way home, to protect them from a thrashing at the hands of enraged Christians of their own flocks. In like manner, a meeting in Dundalk, presided over by a Catholic nobleman, and taking what may be fairly called extreme ground in favor of fixity of tenure, has been broken up by a furious mob, who refused to allow of any speaking, and, as far as could be ascertained, were opposed to any settlement of the land question which did not include a house and an acre of land in fee simple for every laborer.

In another district a Fenian or Ribbon lodge or committee is issuing orders of a peculiarly restrictive character; one, for instance, forbidding the Catholics, on pain of death, to have their corn ground by a certain Protestant miller. And the spirit of disorder and defiance to the law is spreading everywhere. Juries have had to be escorted from the court-houses; an old man of seventy has been shot down at the plough, in a cool and deliberate manner, for serving a notice on a tenant; and landlords are "tumbled" a few yards from their houses, while taking a morning walk, much in the fashion in which Mr. Pumpelly describes the Apaches as settling their differences in Arizona with the employés of the mining companies. The military force on the island now amounts to 24,000 men, and Mr. Gladstone is said to talk of calling Parliament together to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act.

The result is, that the Irish land question—one of the most complicated and delicate ever submitted to a legislature, and which bears not only upon landed property in England, but, it may be said, on all property—instead of being settled by calm discussion, and after a patient hearing of all parties and interests, will probably find a solution in the midst of the wildest excitement and exasperation, which will satisfy nobody after it has been reached, and ten chances to one will not be final. There is in the agitation, as far as it has yet gone, abundant evidence of the truth of what we have frequently said in these columns, and the English press now begins to acknowledge—that European radicalism, of which Fenianism is only a branch modified by more or less reverence for the church which Continental radicals do not feel, no longer stops short at the assertion of political equality. Property itself is now up for question, and will, if it is to stand, have to go through an ordeal such as it has never before been exposed to. A more striking illustration, too, than the state of things in Ireland affords of the folly of what is called "tardy justice"—that is, of denying people what on general principles they are entitled to, in the hope that they will at last give up calling for it—and of the imminent danger to which crass-headed conservatives of our day are exposing the great rule of prescription which plays so important a part in modern society, by trying to make it a cover for flagrant abuses of all sorts, it would be difficult to produce.

THE TALE OF THE "RIPE SCHOLAR."

Not many years ago, a certain traditional prestige, independent of all considerations of practical utility, attached to the scholastic character, at least in New England, where the clergy long held a monopoly of what passed for learning. New England colleges were once little more than schools for making ministers. As the clergyman has lost in influence, so the scholar has lost in repute, and the reasons are not hard to find. The really good scholars were exceptions, and very rare ones. In the matter of theology some notable results were produced, but secular scholarship was simply an exotic and a sickly one. It never recovered from its transplantation and drew no vital juices from the soil. The climate was hostile to it. All the vigor of the country drifted into practical pursuits, and the New England man of letters, when he happened not to be a minister, was usually some person whom constitutional defects, bodily or mental, had unfitted for politics or business. He was apt to be a recluse, ignorant of the world, bleached by a close room and an iron stove, never breathing the outer air when he could help it, and resembling a mediæval monk in his scorn of the body, or rather in his utter disregard of it. Sometimes he was reputed a scholar merely because he was nothing else. The products of his mind were as pallid as the hue of his face, and, like their parent, void of blood, bone, sinew, muscle, and marrow. That he should be provincial was, for a long time, inevitable, but that he was emasculate was chiefly his own fault. As his scholarship was not fruitful of any very valuable results, as it did not make itself felt in the living world that ranged around it, as, in short, it showed no vital force, it began at length to be regarded as a superfluous excrescence. Nevertheless, like the monkish learning of the middle ages, it served a good purpose in keeping alive the tradition of liberal culture against a future renaissance. We shall be told that we exaggerate, and, in one sense, this is true, for we describe not an individual, but a type, from which, however, the reality was rarely very remote, and with which it was sometimes identified. The most finished and altogether favorable example of this devitalized scholarship, with many graceful additions, was Edward Everett, and its echoes may still be heard in the halls of Congress, perplexing Western members with Latin quotations, profuse, if not always correct.

As the nation grew in importance and in sensitiveness, the want of intellectual productiveness began to trouble the popular pride, and an impatient public called on its authors to be "original." Spasmodic efforts were made to respond, and the results were such as may be supposed. The mountain went into convulsions of labor and produced a mouse, of something as ridiculous. After an analogous fashion some of the successors of our pallid, clerical scholars raise the cry, "Let us be strong," and fall into the moral and physical gymnastics of muscular Christianity. This, certainly, is no bad sign, in so far as it indicates the consciousness of a want; but neither originality nor force can be got up to order. They must spring from a deeper root and grow by laws of their own. Happily our soil has begun to put forth such a growth, promising in quality, but as yet, in quantity and in maturity, wholly inadequate to the exigent need.

In times of agitation, alive with engrossing questions of pressing moment, when all is astir with pursuit and controversy, when some are mad for gold, and some are earnest and some rabid for this cause or for that, the scholarship of the past is naturally pronounced not up with the times. Despite his manifold failings, "the self-made man," with his palatial mansion, his exploits in the gold-room, in the caucus, on the stump, in Congress, and in the presidential chair, flatters popular self-love and fills the public eye. Only a slight reason is wanted for depreciating the scholar, and a strong one is offered. Because the culture which our colleges supplied, and which too many of them still supply, was weak, thin, and unsuitable, it was easy to depreciate all culture. By culture we mean development, not polish or adornment, though these are its natural and by no means useless belongings. Using the word, then, in this sense, culture is with us a supreme necessity, not for the profit of a few but of all. The presence of minds highly and vigorously developed is the most powerful aid to popular education, and the necessary condition of its best success. In a country where the ruling power is public opinion, it is above all things necessary that the best and maturest thought should have a fair share in forming it. Such thought cannot exist in any force in the community without propagating its own image, and a class of strong thinkers is the palladium of democracy. They are the natural enemies of ignorant, ostentatious, and aggressive wealth, and the natural friends of all that is best in the popular heart. They are sure of the hatred of charlatans, demagogues, and political sharpers. They are the only hope of our civilization; without them it is a failure, a mere platitude of mediocrity, stagnant or turbid, as the case may be. The vastest aggregate of average intelligences can do nothing to supply their place, and even material growth is impeded by an ignorance of its conditions and laws. If we may be forgiven the metaphor, our civilization is at present a creature with a small and feeble head, a large, muscular, and active body, and a tail growing at such a rate that it threatens to become unmanageable and shake the balance of the vital powers.

The tendency of a partial education, such as the best popular education must of necessity be, is to produce an excess of self-confidence; and one of its results in this country is a prodigious number of persons who think, and persuade others to think, that they know everything necessary to be known, and are fully competent to form opinions and make speeches upon all questions whatever. As these are precisely the persons who make the most noise on the most momentous questions of the day, who have the most listeners and admirers, and who hold each other up as shining examples for imitation, their incompetency becomes a public evil of the first magnitude. If rash and ignorant theorizing, impulsive outcries, and social and political charlatanry of all sorts are to have the guiding of our craft, then farewell to the hope that her voyage will be a success. The remedy is to infuse into the disordered system the sedative and tonic of a broad knowledge and a vigorous reason. This means to invigorate and extend the higher education; to substitute for the effete and futile scholasticism which the popular mind justly holds in slight account, an energetic and manly development, trained to grapple with the vast questions of the present, and strong enough in numbers as well as quality to temper with its mature thought the rashness of popular speculation. Our best colleges are moving hopefully in this direction; none of them with more life and vigor than the oldest of them all. The present generation will see an increase in the number of our really efficient thinkers, but it is a positive, not a relative increase, and is far behind the fast increasing need. Powerful causes are at work against it, and we will try to explain what, to our thinking, some of these causes are.

Perhaps the most obvious of them is the ascendency of material interests among us. To the great mass of our population, the clearing of lands, the acquiring of new territory, the building of cities, the multiplication of railroads, steamboats, and telegraph lines, the growth of trade and manufactures, the opening of mines, with the resulting fine houses, fine clothes, and sumptuous fare, constitute the real sum and substance of progress and civilization. Art, literature, philosophy, and science—so far as science has no direct bearing on material interests—are regarded as decorations, agreeable and creditable, but not essential. In other words, the material basis of civilization is accepted for the entire structure. A prodigious number of persons think that money-making is the only serious business of life, and there is no corresponding number who hold a different faith. There are not a few among us who would "improve" our colleges into schools of technology, where young men may be trained with a view mainly to the production of more steamboats, railroads, and telegraphs; more breadstuffs; more iron, copper, silver, and gold; more cottons and woollens; and, consequently, more fine houses and fine clothes. All this is very well, but it does not answer the great and crying need of the time. The truth is, our material growth so greatly exceeds our other growth that the body politic suffers from diseases of repletion. A patient bloated with generous living, and marked already with the eruptions of a perverted, diseased blood, is not to be cured solely by providing him with more food.

The drift towards material activity is so powerful among us that it is very difficult for a young man to resist it; and the difficulty increases in proportion as his nature is active and energetic. Patient and devoted study is rarely long continued in the vortex of American life. The dusty arena of competition and strife has fascinations almost irresistible to one conscious of his own vigor. Intellectual tastes may, however, make a compromise. Journalism and the lecture-room offer them a field midway between the solitude of the study and the bustle of the world of business; but the journal and the lecture-room have influences powerfully adverse to solid, mature, and independent thinking. There, too, is the pulpit, for those who have a vocation that way; but in this, also, a mighty and increasing temptation besets the conscientious student. As for politics, they have fallen to such a pass that the men are rare who can mingle in them without deteriorating.

Paradoxical as it may seem, the diffusion of education and intelligence is at present acting against the free development of the highest education and intelligence. Many have hoped and still hope that by giving a partial teaching to great numbers of persons, a stimulus would be applied to the best minds among them, and a thirst for knowledge awakened which would lead to high results; but thus far these results have not equalled the expectation. There has been a vast expenditure of brick and mortar for educational purposes, and, what is more to the purpose, many excellent and faithful teachers of both sexes have labored diligently in their vocation; but the system of competitive cramming in our public schools has not borne fruits on which we have much cause to congratulate ourselves. It has produced an immense number of readers; but what thinkers are to be found may be said to exist in spite of it. The public school has put money in abundance into the pockets of the dealers in sensation stories, sensation illustrated papers, and all the swarm of trivial, sickly, and rascally literature. From this and cheap newspapers thousands—nay, millions—draw all their mental improvement, and pamper their mental stomachs with adulterated, not to say poisoned, sweetmeats, till they have neither desire nor digestion for strong and wholesome food. But we would speak rather of that truly intelligent and respectable public which forms the auditories of popular preachers and popular lecturers, which is the lavish patron of popular periodical literature, which interests itself in the questions of the day, and has keen mental appetites of a certain kind. This public is strong in numbers and very strong in collective wealth. Its voice can confer celebrity, if not reputation; and it can enrich those who win its favor. In truth, it is the American people. Now, what does this great public want? It is, in the main, busied with the active work of life, and though it thinks a little and feels a great deal on matters which ought to engage the attention of every self-governing people, yet it is impatient of continuous and cool attention to anything but its daily business, and sometimes even to that. Indeed, the exciting events of the last ten years, joined to the morbid stimulus applied to all departments of business, have greatly increased this tendency; and to-day there are fewer serious and thoughtful readers than in the last decade. More than ever before, the public demands elocution rather than reason of those who address it; something to excite the feelings and captivate the fancy rather than something to instruct the understanding. It rejoices in sweeping statements, confident assertions, bright lights and black shadows alternating with something funny. Neither does it care much for a terse, idiomatic, and pointed diction, but generally prefers the flatulent periods of the ready writers. On matters of the greatest interest it craves to be excited or amused. Lectures professing to instruct are turned to a tissue of jokes, and the pulpit itself is sometimes enlivened after a similar fashion. The pill must be sugared and the food highly seasoned, for the public mind is in a state of laxity and needs a tonic. But the public taste is very exacting, and it offers great and tempting rewards to those who please it.

That which pleases it pays so much better in money and notoriety, and is so much cheaper of production, than the better article which does not please it, that the temptation to accept light work and high wages in place of hard work and low wages is difficult to resist. Nothing but a deep love of truth or of art can stand unmoved against it. In our literary markets, educated tastes are completely outridden by uneducated or half-educated tastes, and the commodity is debased accordingly. Thus, the editor of a magazine may be a man of taste and talents; but his interests as a man of letters and his interests as a man of business are not the same. "Why don't you make your magazine what it ought to be?" we once asked of a well-known editor. "Because," he replied, "if we did, we should lose four-fifths of our circulation." A noted preacher not long ago confessed to us that the temptation to give his audience the sort of preaching which they liked to hear, instead of that which it was best that they should hear, was almost irresistible.

The amount of what we have been saying is, that the public which demands a second-rate article is so enormously large in comparison with the public which demands a first-rate article that it impairs the quality of literary production, and exercises an influence adverse to the growth of intellectual eminence. Now, what is the remedy? It seems to us to be twofold. First, to direct popular education, not to stuffing the mind with crude aggregations of imperfect knowledge, but rather to the development of its powers of observation, comparison, analysis, and reasoning; to strengthening and instructing its moral sense, and leading it to self-knowledge and consequent modesty. All this, no doubt, is vastly more difficult and far less showy in its results than the present system of competitive cramming, and requires in its teachers a high degree of good sense and sound instruction. The other remedy consists in a powerful re-enforcement of the higher education, and the consequent development of a class of persons, whether rich or poor, so well instructed and so numerous as to hold their ground against charlatanry, and propagate sound and healthy thought through the community. He who gives or bequeaths money to a well-established and wisely-conducted university confers a blessing which radiates through all the ranks of society. He does a service eminently practical, and constitutes himself the patron of the highest and best utilitarianism.

ENGLAND—THE TWELVE DAYS' MISSION.

London, December 3, 1869.

I had the curiosity, a few days ago, to pay a visit to one of the churches devoted to the "twelve days' mission," or, as some people called it, the "combined assault upon Satan." If, as I presume, others somewhat similar to that which I witnessed have been enacted in some seventy other churches in London, the phenomenon is certainly remarkable. How much Satan may be the worse for it, I will not presume to say; nor even, which is a very different thing, how much the Church of England may be the better. But certainly it is an indication of remarkable changes, upon the value of which every one may pronounce for himself. What I saw was a most gorgeously decorated church, in which an attempt seems to have been made to gain beauty by sheer lavishness of expenditure; a ceremonial indistinguishable from that of the Roman Catholic; and a crowded and attentive audience. My visits to churches of this kind are rare, and I am always struck by the rate of their progress during my absence. The men who were the leaders of the party some five or six years ago are already falling into the rear. Ceremonies which would then have been startling are now commonplace, and those who were then esteemed daring innovators seem to have sunk into old fogies. How much further things can go, I know not; but they cannot be long in reaching the furthest conceivable limits. What I heard was perhaps more remarkable than what I saw. I had been attracted to the church by a glowing description in the Times of the preacher's eloquence, and of the tears and sobs which burst from his audience. So far I was completely disappointed. The preacher belonged to the commonplace order of orators, which fancies that eloquence consists in roaring loud enough, and gesticulating with sufficient emphasis. He unluckily took the too common line of assaulting the conventional infidel; the infidel does not go to church, and when he does is little likely to be impressed by imperfect recollection of scholastic treatises basted with a great deal of aimless rhetoric. I saw no tears and no emotion, except that caused by the length of the sermon.

Yet it was, as I have said, a singular performance. In the first place, it is curious to see the extreme high-church party imitating the tactics of dissenters, and trying the ranting style of rhetoric, which they are so apt to despise in dissenting preachers. But the difference of ends is as marked as the similarity of means. The object of the dissenter is to produce that spiritual crisis which he calls conversion. The object of the high-churchman is to bring the sinner on his knees to the church, and especially to induce him to submit to confession. The Articles of the Church of England impose certain difficulties upon the open announcement that confession and absolution are to be adopted by its clergy in the same sense as by Roman Catholic priests. It has, however, been proved very frequently that articles and theological tests generally are of a singularly elastic nature, when they are systematically handled in the view to straining them to their utmost limits. At any rate, it is apparent that the great object of the ritualistic clergy in this revival is to extend the practice of confession. A great deal has been said in the papers about the duty of welcoming any party who will stir up our sense of religion, and the supposed success of the revival in attracting congregations of workingmen has been stated as an unanswerable reason for demanding our sympathies. I have some doubts as to the facts. The congregation which I saw was of the eminently respectable kind which might have been seen any time these fifty years in any London church. I believe, however, that there have been cases where churches have been filled with a really poor congregation. Every effort has been made to attract such persons. Processions have in some cases passed through the streets; there has been out-of-door preaching, and grand dramatic scenes have been got up. A congregation is collected to renew, as it is called, their baptismal vows; every man lights a taper whilst he repeats the words given out by the priest, and the whole body then perambulate the church in solemn procession; afterwards the candles are blown out, and they are recommended to take home the ends carefully and preserve them in memory of the day. Curiosity naturally attracts some even of the poorer classes to places where such sights are to be seen; and many of them receive a more permanent impression from the eloquence and undeniable earnestness of many of the preachers.

I do not, however, quite think with a very ecstatic gentleman in one of the church papers, that the result proved that the Church of England can solve the problem of democracy—whatever that problem may precisely be. Perhaps, on a liberal calculation, one man out of a thousand of the London poor has been attracted inside the church doors and been more or less impressed for the time. So far it may very likely be that good has been done. If two or three thousand men are induced to go to church occasionally instead of the public-house, they are, pro tanto, more civilized beings. If, however, this is to be done at the price of entirely altering the whole spirit of the Church of England, it may be doubted whether the transitory effect is to be compared in importance with the permanent result. It is difficult to say what would be the effect upon the country if the clergy, as a body, undergo so enormous a revolution as would be implied in their systematically practising confession. That is the point at which the most energetic and active party in the church are seeking to arrive. Although I am bound to add that their noise is, in my opinion, more than proportional to their real power, and that there is not only a strong low-church and a respectable broad-church party in the church, but also a vast mass of humdrum commonplace clergymen upon whose stolid indifference no new-fangled zeal makes much impression; yet the greatest ardor, if not the largest share of brains, in the church is plainly in the ritualist party, and from that consideration the consequences of some of their present efforts may have important results. Meanwhile, the symptoms of a precisely opposite kind are neither few nor doubtful. The most respectable and least daring members of the liberal party at Cambridge have held a meeting, at which they agreed to demand from Government a far more decisive measure than has hitherto been thought possible for the removal of all religious tests from the universities. One cause prompting to this action, although it is not openly avowed, is the rapidly increasing number of distinguished young graduates who refuse to take the tests, and in some instances have resigned the posts for which they had previously had to sign declarations of conformity to the Church of England. It is becoming clear that before long there will be an almost total divorce between the church and the universities. At the other end of the scale, the hold of the clergy upon education is equally threatened. The education league, which proposes a system of compulsory secular education, is a very powerful body, and is apparently likely to get the command of public opinion, although it is proper and usual to say that all these measures are really meant in favor of the church, and intended to relieve it from State bondage. I observe that people who are farthest removed from orthodoxy generally advocate them most strenuously; and I think it cannot be denied that along with the rapid growth of the ritualist party there is an equally rapid growth in the direction of strong hostility to all theological parties.

I may just notice the fact that the Archbishop of York has actually succeeded so far in a legal process for turning out a heretic. As a rule, every attempt to expel anybody is apt to fail in the courts of law; and we have such contrasts as Drs. Colenso, Pusey, and Temple, all in one church. Mr. Voysey, however, has at last found out how to commit a really punishable heresy. He has said very frequently and with great emphasis, that the doctrines of the atonement, of the incarnation, and others, as ordinarily understood, are not only wrong but horribly blasphemous; further, that though he does not deny the truth of the doctrines in some sense or other, he denies, and has a right to deny, any sense that anybody has ever put upon them; and, finally, that much of the Bible is false and immoral, and that in particular St. John's Gospel is so bad in its immorality and inaccuracy that it cannot be genuine. For these opinions he has been suspended from his vicarage, subject to a further appeal; but then Mr. Voysey has been rather plain-spoken. Other people can reconcile their opinions and their preferments with more skill.

The election of a Fenian convict to represent Tipperary is a very serious matter. The English papers generally seem to be in much perplexity as to the proper view to take of it. Various excuses are made, of the validity of which I am unable to judge; but it certainly seems to imply that the disaffection in Ireland is deeper and more determined than is at all pleasant to contemplate.

WOMAN'S WORK.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Preceding Herbert Spencer's very good chapter on the rights of children is one on the rights of women, upon which I doubt not you have bestowed the attention of which it is worthy. I would urge all mothers who still take care of their children, and all fathers who care for them and for future civilization, to read carefully Spencer's admirable little book on education, from which one can learn much both of the rights of children and of the duties of parents.

While I think that it is more important at this time to devise * some way by which those who are now entitled to vote may be enabled to vote with some effect, and really be represented, than to extend to the other sex our crude form of voting, it seems to me that your article in the Nation of December 9, entitled "The Rights of Children," does not sufficiently allow for two important facts in the woman question. First, hundreds of thousands of women are now pursuing avocations that take ten hours or more a day of continuous toil; they are occupied away from home, in factories and workshops, in the same way that men are, and they are doing many kinds of work which those who oppose the entire freedom of occupation for women would certainly not consider to be à priori their appropriate sphere. I think I have seen women collecting manure in the streets of Liverpool. I have certainly seen them spreading it in Switzerland; and thousands are employed in labor in cotton factories, which obliges them to be as much away from home as any man of business in town. Some of these are mule-spinners, and very good ones. I believe some men, who would not allow themselves to be in favor of "women's rights," were very glad to get women to take up this rather laborious branch of cotton-spinning (to which it had almost been considered that men had an exclusive right) when the male spinners struck.

I adduce the above examples of occupation not as equally attractive and fit, but as illustrating what men suffer in this way without remonstrance when it is something they are used to or which is for their interest. I admit it has no conclusive bearing as to what occupations are fit for women. I think if they are left free to choose, they will be the best judges of that; but certainly it would not seem that the recent extension of employment for women had been of injury either to them or to civilization.

Secondly, there are vast numbers of women who have no families or children to take care of, and of these very, very many need to work for their support. A young woman of character, who may be one of several unmarried daughters dependent solely upon their father's labor, is in an uncomfortable and rather mortifying position if all that the custom of society allows her to do is to stay at home in idleness or try to get married. In old times, she might have spun or woven, but this is impracticable now, and it does not require three or four grown women to keep the house. It is very important, then, for her and for society that occupation should be freely open to her. After a time, perhaps, she may marry; but perhaps she may not, and many do not. If she does, she will have at least lost nothing; and if a young man who is a travelling salesman marries, he very properly tries to change his business for a more stationary one. At all events, if she has an occupation that gives her a support, she will not be obliged to marry for a living; and if she has been a book-keeper or a carpenter, she will be no worse a wife than many most excellent women who have worked at a loom or a spinning-frame till they were married. And if she is not married, it will surely be well that when her father dies there should not be left three or four helpless women without means of support.

L.

[We are not opposed in any way—but the contrary—to women's seeking out and engaging in any calling for which they conceive themselves, or can show themselves, to be fitted. The enforced idleness of so many of them is, as we have often said, a great curse. The article on the rights of children was meant to be a protest against the disgraceful and dangerous doctrine which has already made its appearance on woman's rights platforms, that the care of "puling, whining children" is an inferior occupation, unworthy of woman's powers, and to which she ought not to be expected to devote herself if she can find anything else to do. It is, on the contrary, the highest occupation in which she can engage, and all others are and ought to be considered and held subsidiary and subordinate to it. Of course, the Creator has provided against the spread of this doctrine by decreeing that the race or community which embraces it shall perish off the earth; but then a great deal of mischief may be done before the penalty begins to be felt. There is no future in this world for breeds that are not satisfied with one wife or one husband, and to whom marriage is not the most sacred of contracts, the rearing of children the highest of pleasures and duties, and home the most delightful of retreats. There is no field in which they are not sure in the long run to be worsted. Hardier and purer races will supplant them, till their fields, sit by their hearths, inherit their riches, and laugh with derision over the memory of their preambles and resolutions, their "harmonies" and "affinities."—Ed. Nation.]

* Or, rather, to put in practice, for Mr. Thomas Hare has stated in his work on "Representation" a scheme which is at least of good promise.

LITERARY.

We are glad to infer from the early appearance in print of the report of Hon. Samuel B. Ruggles, the delegate of the United States Government to the late International Statistical Congress, that the instructive proceedings of that body will in future become sooner available to the general public than in the past. Mr. Ruggles's report we consider a most valuable contribution to statistical science. It consists mainly of comparative tabular statements, accompanied by appropriate comments, of the cereal production of the United States and the other grain-growing countries of the world. The collection of the proper data was commenced by Mr. Ruggles during the Paris Exposition, which he attended as one of the United States Commissioners, and completed and brought up to the present year during the past summer by means of special reports on the subject from the American Ministers and Consuls, for which the State Department called at his instance. Without asserting the absolute correctness of the figures embodied in his report, Mr. Ruggles claims for them as much accuracy as can be reasonably expected from so difficult and in some measure novel an enquiry. According to his exhibit, the total cereal product of Europe in 1868 (including wheat, rye, barley, oats, buckwheat and millet, Indian corn, and rice) was 4,784,516,604 bushels, while that of the United States in the same year amounted to 1,405,449,000 bushels. The population of Europe being, according to the best authorities, 296,123,293, and that of the United States, according to current estimates, 39,000,000 in 1868, the average product per inhabitant appears to have been 16 bushels for Europe and 36 bushels for the United States. The relatively larger production of our country, compared with the Old World as a whole, Mr. Ruggles thinks is in a great degree due to the very general adoption of labor-saving machines and implements. First among the other grain-growing countries ranks Russia, whose cereal product in 1868 was 1,484,437,500 bushels. The united product, in the year named, of the "broad and fertile flanks of civilization," as Mr. Ruggles calls the two mighty empires of the eastern and western hemispheres, was nearly one-half of the aggregate yield of the countries tabulated in the report, thus showing their joint mission as the granaries of the world, which will become even more distinct as time goes on. The report contains, in addition to grain statistics, an interesting exhibit of the relative wealth of the United States and Europe in domestic animals, which proves the preponderance of the former also as regards this source of national prosperity. The latest statistics of the international commerce in cereals are also given by Mr. Ruggles, whose praiseworthy labors at once bore fruit in the form of the passage of a resolution, on his motion, by the Statistical Congress, requesting the delegates to report at the next session, three years hence, comprehensive statistics of the agricultural products of the countries which they represent.

—A large portion of the elaborate argument in favor of additional railroad facilities from the West to the East, made by Hon. John A. Poor, of Portland, Me., in an address delivered at Rutland, Vt., last summer, and now printed in pamphlet form, is devoted to the same question of the future of the United States as a grain-growing country. Taking the agricultural and commercial statistics of this and foreign countries for a basis, Mr. Poor maintains that the production of grain in the United States will not only continue greatly to outstrip the demand for home consumption, but be largely in excess of the entire importations or necessities of Europe at large, and especially of those of Great Britain, as the largest grain importer of the Old World. Mr. Poor, in order to prove the danger of a chronic glut of cereals from our surplus production, refers to the smallness of our grain exports during the last four years, which amounted to but an aggregate of 26,835,869 bushels. Considering the variableness of the foreign demand for our surplus crops, according to the character of the harvests, from year to year, on the Continent of Europe, and the deranging effect of our inflated currency upon the prices of agricultural products, it will, perhaps, not be safe to predicate the prospect of this country as a grain exporter upon the experience of the period referred to. At the same time, no one familiar with the subject will be disposed to dispute what Mr. Poor says relative to the urgent necessity, if the profitableness of agriculture is to be maintained in the United States, of providing additional facilities for transporting the enormous surplus product of the West to the Atlantic coast and beyond. The problem of lessening the cost of carrying grain to the sea-board is inferior in importance to no other economic question now before our public. Whether this can best be done by the construction of the Transcontinental Railway, of which Mr. Poor is so able and zealous an advocate, or by increasing the capacities of the existing highways of traffic, and by compelling the great railroad combinations of the present day to reduce their freight charges, we will not venture to decide. At all events, it seems to us that the extraordinarily low prices of staple products now ruling in the West will stimulate the millions of producers to remove, in one way or another, the partial cause of the present depreciation of the fruits of their labor—the excessive cost of transporting grain from the place of growth to the Eastern markets.

—A correspondent thinks that if Mr. Gage had attempted to locate Gath on his map of Palestine (described in our last number), he would have found some difficulty in doing so, since the site of that town is not yet agreed upon as identified. If this was Mr. Gage's reason, it was a good one, and we have nothing further to say. Most respectable maps generally insert Gath, along with many other places whose site is more or less conjectural.

—The reproduction in fac-simile, by means of the carbon photograph, of the studies of the old masters, has been often mentioned in the Nation. Random specimens of these imitations have been from time to time exposed for sale in this city, and, if we are rightly informed, the agency for the remarkable series published by Braun, of Dornach on the Rhine, was offered Mr. Knoedler, but for some reason declined. It is now held by Mr. Hazeltine, of Philadelphia, and the sample-books at his print-shop contain some ten thousand specimens, or about half the entire number. They are taken in part from the cartoons preserved in the museums of London, Paris, Milan, Florence, Rome, Venice, Basle, Weimar, Vienna, etc., and in part consist of photographs of Swiss landscapes, costumes, and game-pieces, which, for made-up pictures, sell readily, at twelve dollars apiece. The agent is now engaged upon a stereotyped priced catalogue. The Library of Congress has ordered a complete set, mounted, bound, and lettered, with a full description attached to each print. We must content ourselves for the loss of this agency by praising the enterprise of Messrs. Ball, Black & Co. in being first to exhibit copies of the famous silverware unearthed a year ago at Hildesheim. Unfortunately they are not distinctly separated from other specimens in the same case, and we can only guess that there are nine or ten pieces in all, generally duplicated, and in two or three styles. They are not large, and perhaps are a trifle disappointing, especially as we miss the crater which covered the "find," and which crumbled to pieces soon after a cast had been made of it. This was the most beautiful of the lot. The second best piece is here—the Minerva Platter, and also the best of the drinking-cups. An egg-dish, with but little ornament, is as likely as any to be bought for actual use, and is well adapted for its purpose.

—Mr. J. W. Bouton has on sale a large and valuable collection of illustrated works, which it would require much time to examine even cursorily. The catalogue of it mentions nearly a dozen volumes on vellum, generally illuminated, and ranging from ten to upwards of three hundred dollars in price. There is a Bible, of the "extended" kind, in three volumes folio, having inserted plates, title-pages, etc., and valued at four hundred and fifty dollars. There are pretty full collections of the "Dance of Death," and of Cruikshankiana—the latter numbering forty-two titles, of which the first alone, a private selection, is set down at one hundred and twenty-five dollars. Besides books of this nature, there are several gems, reliquaries, bits of sculpture, and one oil-painting. Mr. Bouton's own collection is also an interesting one, but it is too extensive to be more than mentioned here.

—One of the editors of the Revue de Droit International has given in the last number a very instructive survey of the progress of public sentiment in Europe concerning patents. Neither in England nor among the Continental nations is the mode of procedure in granting patents the same as our own; and whenever attempts have been made to reform any given system, the American practice has been referred to with respect, as at least, if not perfect, an example of something better that might be adopted to advantage. No state, however, has been satisfied with its own provisions. Switzerland, for more than half a century, has had no patent laws, and has repeatedly refused to enact them. As a result, the Swiss are declared to be no whit behind their neighbors in inventiveness, but even to be eminent among them. Statesmen and other interested observers are satisfied that the protection afforded by patents is purely illusory, that the original inventor seldom reaps the fruit of his labors, and that patented inventions become "atrophied" because not allowed to attain perfection. Industry is fettered, and competition easily thwarted. Patents are bought up simply to prevent the use of them. And on the side of the government granting them, there is the difficulty of securing the profits of the patent to the person who deserves them, the impossibility of proportioning these profits to the service rendered, the inevitable inconvenience and injustice to which third parties are subjected, and, in the American system, the chances of corruption in the Patent Office, favorable to the owners of successful patents as against small inventors and less powerful capitalists. There is, besides, and before all, the question whether ideas can be regarded as absolute property; and the negative has been held by persons who fully admit the distinction between patent right and copyright. For twenty years past protests have been raised against the principle and effects of patents, in all parts of Europe, with the general verdict (not embodied as yet in legislation) that patents are injurious to the growth of public prosperity. Such was the explicit affirmation of the Economic Congress at Dresden, in September, 1863, and only a year ago Count Bismarck, as federal chancellor, presented a memorial to the federal council in which he asserted that the Prussian Government had reached a conclusion adverse to patents on three grounds: (1) that the exceptional monopoly accorded by patent could be justified only by demonstrating it to be a social necessity—which could not be done; (2) that priority of application, even if secrecy could not be preserved, would generally suffice to remunerate the inventor; (3) that, in practice, no patent legislation has succeeded in producing more good than evil results. The chancellor desired an investigation of the subject by the committee on commerce, and a report; but none appears to have been made.

—Historical studies have met, in Germany, a sort of revival, evinced by the interest in the annual gathering in Munich and by the publishers' lists. During the past year have appeared three great volumes of the "Monumenta Germaniæ Historica;" four volumes, replete with important historical documents, and also called "Monumenta," by Professor Jaffé, the industrious editor of "Regesta Pontificum;" and the second volume of the "Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum," published by the Berlin Academy, a great folio, containing a hundred sheets and two maps, bearing witness throughout, but especially in the introduction, to the industry, learning, and ingenuity of the editor, Dr. Emil Hübner. Professor Sybel, of Bonn, publishes the second volume of his "Kleinere historische Schriften" (Minor Historical Essays), entitled "Portions of Prussian History," "Germany and Denmark in the XIIIth Century," "Letters of Queen Marie Antoinette," "Emperor Leopold II.," "Austria and Prussia in the War of the Revolution," "Prussia and the Rhine Country," and "Foundation of the Bonn University." Interesting documents relating to the history of the institution accompany the latter—the rector's oration at its recent jubilee, and decidedly the best of the collection, particularly excelling a similar attempt by Professor Köpke, of Berlin, in taking the political importance of the establishment of the seminary into account. Von Ranke's "Wallenstein" has been reprinted with scarce an alteration; but the thirteenth volume of his complete works, containing materials and authorities for Prussian history, has been subjected to a thorough revision since its first appearance in 1860, and is now especially rich in long missing documents concerning the history of the Fronde. A paper read by the same author before the Berlin Academy respecting William (IV.) of Orange and Frederick the Great affords remarkable glimpses into the politics and life of the last century. Professor Eyssenhardt has re-edited the collection of minor historians of the empire known as "Historia Miscella," left without re-edition since the seventeenth century, collating anew the best manuscripts, and bringing to light hitherto inedited fragments, so that one can now follow the imperial reigns since Constantine almost without interruption. Wilhelm Parthey has published the ancient description of Rome, called "Mirabilia Urbis Romæ," according to Italian manuscripts. No copy of the earlier edition (1510) of this work was believed to be extant after the inexplicable disappearance of the one belonging to the Prussian archæological institute in Rome, but shortly after the issue of Parthey's book another was found at Naples, which shows such important differences that a new edition is desirable and will be given in the Mittheilungen of S. Calvary & Co. "Zur Topographie von Athen" (Concerning the Topography of Athens), by Ernst Curtius, gives entirely new explanations of the situation of the city and public buildings, illustrating the whole with numerous maps. Professor Bähr, of Heidelberg, has been able, by incorporating the many appendices of former editions with the text, to make a new edition of his "Geschichte der römischen Literatur" (History of Roman Literature), at once more easy of survey and a better portrait of the Roman culture. Of Teuffel's "Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur," another part has been published, embracing the poetry of the "golden age," and giving in brief compass the best picture of this epoch we know. Though merely elementary, the work is valuable as treating Roman lyric poetry from an entirely new standpoint; the two preceding parts have already been translated into Dutch and Italian.

—Our readers have already had some information concerning the Chaucer Society, which was formed in England in 1868, and which has an American secretary in the person of Professor F. J. Child. That there was great need of an effort to do justice to the poet, everybody knows who knows the condition of the published texts of those works which are his beyond a doubt, and who knows how very doubtfully his are many of the lesser works which go under his name without adding anything at all to his reputation. This effort the Society we have mentioned is making, and, so far as it has proceeded with its labor, is meeting with very gratifying success. Already we have some nine or ten publications over which lovers of Chaucer may well rejoice, for one would rather say that they make a thorough, satisfactory study of the poet now for the first time possible than that they shed merely some additional light on materials previously within reach. Indeed, much more than this can be said. Whatever humanity is going to be hereafter, it is certain that in these times the special admirers, the lovers of any poet, however great—the enthusiastic students of Chaucer, of Dante, of Homer, of Shakespeare himself—are a comparatively small class, whose pursuits interest but a few among the tribes of men. But the class of men who, in this country of ours, are now just awaking to the necessity of studying in its schools the sources of our English language, is a large one, and one that grows with rapidity. Perhaps for every two or three new universities that are provided in the West, there appears at least one man who is persuaded that a university library in an English-speaking country should afford the means of making a thorough study of the works that stand as the beginnings of our literature, past, present, and to come. Now, to this study the books of the Chaucer Society are an efficient help. Take, for example, this title-page of a book by Mr. Alexander J. Ellis, the volume before us being the second of the Society's publications: "On Early English Pronunciation, with Especial Reference to Shakespere and Chaucer; containing an investigation of the correspondence of writing with speech in England, from the Anglo Saxon Period to the present day; preceded by a systematic notation of all spoken sounds by means of the ordinary printing types. Including a rearrangement of Professor Child's memoirs on the language of Chaucer and Gower, and reprints of the rarer tracts by Galesbury on English (1547) and Welch (1567), and by Barclay on French (1521)." This surely seems to promise a book that no teacher of English grammar in the larger sense and of the use of English in writing can in anywise afford to neglect. The first in time of the society's publications is "A Six-Text Print" of the "General Prologue" to the "Canterbury Tales," and of the "Knight's Tale." It is a volume to which—as regards its size and shape—we are unable to give the right technical name; but it is oblong in shape, and is shorter from top to bottom than from the back margin of the page to the front. On each page are printed in three parallel columns about forty lines of the poetry, so that as the book lies open before the student he has under his eye at the same moment, in beautiful type and on fine paper, forty lines of Chaucer according to the Ellesmere manuscript, forty according to the Hengwrt, and the same number according to the Cambridge, Corpus, Petworth, and Lansdowne manuscripts. In course of time will follow all the other tales, printed in the same admirably beautiful and useful manner, and we shall at last have a "Chaucer" such as no Chaucerian scholar has yet had, and in a dress worthy the superiority. All those of the Society's publications arranged under the general title of "First Series" will be texts. The related literary, critical, and philological works will go into the so-called "Second Series," and it is these that the student of English who cares little for Chaucer, or who cannot afford to buy all the books he needs, may find it preferable to procure. Some few of them may be purchased separately, we believe; Mr. Ellis's certainly may. But the cost of a year's subscription is not great. Doubtless some of our readers know by experience the many small vexatious troubles of importing books, through our custom-houses or post-offices, from a country unpossessed of the fluctuating currency—and the Wall-street men who riot upon its waves—with which we here are blessed. We are glad to say that the person who decides to have dealings with the Chaucer Society will be spared all the bother and uncertainty which probably may have beset him in his dealings with similar bodies in times past. American subscriptions for 1868, 1869, and 1870 will be received on these terms: A guinea in gold shall be estimated as worth six dollars in currency, and the expenses of transportation from London to the subscriber's local post-office shall be set down at one dollar. For thirteen dollars, then, one has the books of a year; and the American subscriber may, if he chooses, transmit his money to the Society through Mr. Child, at Cambridge. Thus he gets his books a little cheaper—or, at all events, fully as cheap as if he were resident in England—and with as little personal trouble. At the risk of reminding people of the professor who, on the last page of his work upon the Athenian tragic drama, suddenly said that "the conclusion of the whole matter is that the theatre is the bane of Harvard College," we feel moved to say that one bane of American youth, wherever throughout the country they are gathered together in colleges, is the temptation that besets them to the oratorical, and ornate, and frothy, and noisy, and pinchbeck in literature, whether that of others' making or their own attempting; and we seldom have occasion to speak of the ancient wells of English without wishing that we could prevail on all educators of young men to lead thither all their flocks.

"ACROSS AMERICA AND ASIA."*

PROFESSOR RAPHAEL PUMPELLY has given us one of the most interesting books of travels we have ever read—full of graphic and lively sketches of a large portion of our earth, and of our fellow-beings who live on it. In the autumn of 1860 he started for the wilderness of Arizona, where he spent many months in mining operations, and where he encountered numerous adventures with the savage Apaches, and equally savage border-ruffians who infest that country, and from whom he often narrowly escaped with life. At length he wisely abandoned that worse than heathen land, and proceeded to California, where he heard of his appointment as a mining engineer to the Government of Japan. In November, 1861, he sailed from San Francisco across the Pacific, stopping at the Sandwich Islands long enough to make some fine sketches, and thence to Japan. He spent about a year in that country, being occupied most of the time in mining explorations, when his engagement with the Government was brought to an end by the influence of the conservative party, who were jealous of foreign employees, especially of their spying out the land. The author's sketches of Japan—the physical features of the country, the character and habits of the people, their politics and religion, and their historic antecedents—are exceedingly interesting and well drawn. From Japan he crossed over to the shores of the great continent, arriving at Shanghae in February, 1863. After passing a few weeks at this port, he went up the river Yang-tse as far as Han-kow in a steamer, and from thence to a considerable distance beyond, in a Chinese boat. His description of the magnificent scenery, and the various adventures he met with, is very fine. In the fall of this year he proceeded to Peking, and there, at the suggestion of the foreign ministers, he was employed by the Imperial Government to explore the coal mines in the north of China, but in a few months his services were dispensed with on the plea that the steamers for whose use the coal was specially designed were to be sold off. He then spent several months in travelling about the country in the neighborhood of the capital and along the Great Wall. Finally, he arranged with two other gentlemen to travel together through Tartary and Siberia to Europe, and they started on their adventurous journey on the 12th November, 1864. Each of the party was provided with a separate rude cart covered with a housing of felt, mounted on a pair of wheels without springs, and drawn by Bactrian camels, while a number of the same animals carried the baggage. In this way they journeyed over the plateau of Tartary, and across the great desert of Gobi to the frontier town of Kiakhta, which they reached in safety on the 21st December. During the journey they encountered several severe storms, and nearly perished from cold. From Kiakhta they travelled by post, and were well provided with all those appliances which Russian experience has proved to be best adapted to secure the comfort of the traveller in that country. In the middle of January they crossed Lake Baikal, driving rapidly for thirty miles over its surface of glittering ice, and arrived safely at Irkutsk, and thence onward in midwinter through the principal Siberian towns, and over the Ural Mountains to Moscow and St. Petersburg. In this journey Mr. Pumpelly sometimes found the thermometer as low as 70 degrees below zero. His narrative of what he saw and encountered from the time of leaving Peking until he crossed the Ural Mountains, although fine, is rendered tantalizing by its rapidity and brevity.

A large portion of the book is devoted to China and the Chinese, and as it is dedicated to Anson Burlingame, we may infer that Mr. Pumpelly considers this portion to be of prime importance. While we have great admiration of the book, and feel great respect for the author for his intelligence, humanity, manliness, and philosophic spirit, which are conspicuous throughout his writings, we think perhaps some exceptions should here be made, although most of it meets our hearty approval. The author says that his first impressions of the Chinese were exceedingly unfavorable, and that it was only from the time of his arrival in Peking and intercourse with Mr. Burlingame that he dates his real study of the people, and "learned to free himself from the prejudices which every traveller is apt to contract upon the China coast;" hence, he subsequently "looked upon the Chinese from an entirely different standpoint."

Now, though independence and fairness are amongst the author's most prominent characteristics, we cannot help feeling, that looking at the Chinese from some one stand-point, whether favorable or unfavorable, has exercised a warping influence on his judgment; and in trying to avoid doing the Chinese injustice, he has made their portrait a little too favorable. Mr. Pumpelly will excuse us if we recall to his notice the words of Crom well to the courtly artist. Has he not left out a spot or a wrinkle? Many, we are inclined to think; not only that, his generous advocacy has impelled him to follow the example of certain advocates at the bar who think to help the cause of their client by "attacking plaintiff's attorney"—by assaulting his opponents—for such appears to be the foreigner in relation to the Chinese. His description of the foreign residents in Shanghae is one of the most severe we have ever seen. In describing them he puts them all together and makes an average, and says that the "average foreigner in China" is wholly ignorant of everything connected with the history, social organization, and true character of the people, and that he looks down upon them as a mere swarm of chattering animals, though useful as producers of tea and consumers of opium; that however ignorant and superstitious he may be himself, he looks with disdain upon the woful superstition of the Chinese; and, for all these reasons, with a consciousness of his own superiority, he "makes the life and rights of a Chinaman subordinate to his own convenience." And then the author says, "I will here give one of the many instances which I saw illustrative of this line of conduct;" and he then describes a pleasure excursion which he took on the Wu-sung river on board a steamboat, "which was crowded with most of the leading foreigners of Shanghae," and that on approaching a narrow part of the river they met a large scow so heavily laden with brick that she was almost unmanageable by the four Chinamen who were in her, but who were straining every muscle to get out of the way, and were uttering cries for a few instants' grace, yet the captain refused to slow his speed, and cried out to the hesitating pilot to "Go ahead!" and the steamer crashed into the scow. There was a shriek—a shock—a staggering motion of the vessel—and she then steamed up the channel, leaving the crushed boat and the drowning men to their fate. No one on board but himself—and he was horrified—showed the slightest concern; and he adds, "It has long been the practice of foreign vessels to run into and sink any junk or boat that might be in their way, no matter how crowded with passengers they may be; and probably scarcely a day passed without a boat being thus sunk in Chinese waters!" And, also: "After such an occurrence I was not surprised to see foreigners walking through crowded streets and incessantly belaboring the heads of men, women, and children with heavy walking-sticks to open a path," etc. Now, what a frightful picture is this of the character and conduct of the foreigners in Shanghae. And if "most of the leading foreigners" of this place have such cold-blooded, criminal indifference to human life as they evinced on board the steamer, how awful must be the average man, let alone the lowest. We hope and believe that Mr. Pumpelly's imagination and feelings blinded his judgment when he was writing the above reports. Even his salvo of "many noble exceptions" weigh but little against his charges upon "most of the leading foreigners."

We will here say that most of the steamers which run on the inner waters of China are managed by Americans, and the commanders are strictly enjoined to exercise the utmost care to avoid all collision with native craft, large or small; that accidents now rarely occur, and whenever they do, the injured parties appeal to the consular court, where damages are always allowed, except in cases where the negligence has been so culpable as to prove a bar. It is the same under English management. This story of the steamer and the scow has been paraded in one of our leading journals as an instance of "British brutality in China;" but Mr. Pumpelly does not intimate that she was British. She was probably one of the American lines. That there are some bad specimens of Western civilization in the open ports of China, there is no doubt; but we are confident that they do not form so large a portion of the foreign community as the above charges imply.

Mr. Pumpelly is inclined to consider the Chinese naturally civil and kindly disposed, and that when they appear to the contrary it is owing to the brutal conduct of the foreigner. Although there are some instances in favor of this view, there are yet many more against it—his own experience in the town of Yan-ngan, in the far north of China, is one of them. Neither is it worth while to speculate on the honesty of the Chinese compared with other peoples, for Mr. Pumpelly shows that the honesty of the little ragged boy of Peking was counterbalanced by the attempt to rob him of his money at the village of Tan-li-chuen at the north. In truth, the Chinese are by nature but little better or worse than other people. The thieves and vagabonds which infest all their large cities, and which fly at all game, have not been created by the conduct of the outside barbarian, but they are the indigenous and natural product of the country, and they would flourish just as much as they do now if no "red-haired devil" had ever appeared among them. With these exceptions, we think that Mr. Pumpelly's sketches of the Chinese are very correct, and well drawn. We believe that the Chinese are capable of as high a civilization as any other portion of the human family, and that the principal reason why they have not made greater advance in their long career has been their almost complete isolation, which has deprived them of that wholesome friction with other peoples and other ideas which are so necessary to a vigorous development. Their slavish veneration for antiquity, and their isolation, are still the great obstacles in the way of their improvement, and we long to see them removed; but they will never be removed if a thoroughly "let-alone policy" should be fully carried out. The Western governments should be just and generous in their dealings with China, of course, and demand nothing from her which is not as much for her interest to yield as for us to receive, or which is adverse to her independence and prosperity; but, always bearing these views in mind, they may justly exercise a steady moral pressure to assist her forward motion in the path of progress.

The question of Chinese immigration into our own country is one of the gravest importance. Mr. Pumpelly's remarks upon it are entitled to much consideration, but time and experience alone will determine the great problem. The evils of class legislation on the one side, and those of universal manhood suffrage on the other, can only be avoided by the establishment of an organic law which would make the franchise dependent upon certain educational qualifications, alike applicable to all men, native or foreign born, of any race or complexion. Then all men would have a fair chance in the struggle for higher advancement, and the question of the homogeneity of races might be determined.

In writing of the fine arts of Japan in former numbers of the Nation, we have expressed regret for the almost total disregard and apparently wilful ignorance of this most interesting subject which the books of travellers display. Among the dozen or more records of travel and residence in the land of the Rising Sun, we find no hint that there is anything curious or valuable to be got out of Japanese art, whether as explanatory of the life of the people, or as historically instructive, or as faithfully representing the birds and plants and scenery of the lovely country, or, for its own sake, as a complete, harmonized, and independent school of fine art, of unexampled character, and unmatched in modern times for universal and even merit. A Frenchman voyaging in the United States may be excused for not treating of most of the specimens of the fine arts that he sees, because little of our art expresses in any way our national character or represents our life and habits. But in Japan, where, as Mr. Pumpelly tells us, confirming what we all feel, the religion and the literature are alike unknown to foreigners, and the everyday life of the people little observed, where, moreover, a very well-organized school of art does exist, every one would be supposed impatient to learn what he might by watching that account of the Japanese which their own artists have made in the only language legible to men of all tongues.

Mr. Pumpelly, it is little to say, is a traveller of another sort. Things meant to be seen and worth seeing, he has seen and remembered. The pages he gives to Japan are full of instances of close observation, and of a power of reading the language of art. The few words here and there about the peculiar features of the landscape in Japan, and the description of the Japanese houses and temples, including Daibutz, the great statue-temple at Kanagawa, are all to the point, and instructive. Serious discussion of the Japanese fine arts, in a technical way, he has left to Mr. John La Farge, the painter, who furnishes to the book one of its most valuable chapters.

If we call that chapter the most complete and intelligent essay upon Japanese art that we have read, we shall not wrong Mr. Rossetti's papers nor Mr. Feydeau's—all valuable but limited in their range—nor Mr. Leighton's pamphlet, written at a time when little knowledge of the subject was within his reach. England and France are not so hopelessly ahead of America in opportunities to study this art as they are in all that relates to European art. For study, from the artist's rather than the collector's point of view, of Japanese decoration and picture-making, Mr. La Farge has, in his own possession and Mr. Pumpelly's gatherings, as good opportunities as all the treasures of South Kensington would give him. That he has used his opportunities, that he is one of the few painters who can write, and that Mr. Pumpelly is to be thanked for having obtained this artist's exposition of a curious art, every one will feel who reads this chapter with any attention.

The many interesting questions about the dates of different kinds of lacquer and bronze-work, the processes employed for the production of strange effects in metal and wood, lacquer and enamel, processes unknown to Europe, Mr. Lafarge has not considered. He has devoted his eight pages to a close analysis of the peculiar merits of the Japanese artists considered as students of nature and designers of decoration. To satisfy one's self with quoting would be to reprint the eight pages; but we must quote this on color:

——"the very crown of that power over color always an heirloom of the East, and a separate gift from ours. To Eastern directness, fulness, and splendor, the Japanese add a sobriety, a simplicity, a love of subdued harmonies and imperceptible gradations, and what may be called an intellectual refinement akin to something in the Western mind."

And again, take this note, suggesting a thought which must occur to every student of the art in question, but to others needs to be suggested:

"I remember a print in which a silvered sickle of a moon shone through the most delicate gray fog-clouds, as correctly edged as if by the [instantaneous] photograph, and melting into the very texture of the paper. Over this were faint lines of falling rain, and an inscription, perfectly distinct, but as pale as the faintest wash of india ink. If we admire this refinement, what are we to think of that which it addresses in Japan?"

But the best part of this paper in which all is good we take to be the remarks upon the fabulous creatures in the Hoksai drawings, the bird-like men and the satyr-like demons. To the completeness of the designer's conception of these monsters, their probable appearance, as if they lived somewhere not farther away than the Antipodes, the freedom with which they are drawn in any attitude and engaged in any pursuit, we have called attention in former numbers of the Nation. Mr. La Farge, speaking with the authority of a painter of the figure and of character, comments upon the great merit of these designs considered as imaginative conceptions. Without quoting further, we refer the reader to page 199, the fac-simile engraving opposite, and the note at the foot of the page. The key-note of Japanese representative art is struck. The critic has done his duty, of pointing out the essence of the thing criticised.

DR. JOHN LORD'S ANCIENT HISTORY.*

Dr. Lord's new history contains, in some respects, even more than its plain title and brief preface promise us. It is to be a history of states and empires only, and yet it tells us all about the "Garden of Eden," "Adam and Eve," "Primeval Paradise," the "Situation of Eden," the "Glory of Eden," "The Temptation," and even "The Devil;" for, "the tempter was the devil—the antagonist of God—the evil power of the world—the principle of evil—a Satanic agency which Scripture and all nations, in some form, have recognized." It is to form "a connected narrative, without theories or comments," and yet it gives us not only speculations like that just quoted, but also suppositions and inferences of all kinds. Thus, we are told that "we may reasonably suppose" the said tempter to have been "not merely subtle, but attractive, graceful, beautiful, bewitching;" and that "it is not unreasonable to infer, though we cannot know with certainty, that the antediluvian world was more splendid and luxurious than the world in the time of Solomon and Homer—the era of the Pyramids of Egypt." The "great movements to which the Scriptures refer" are to be "briefly presented," and yet they occupy in the book about a hundred times as much space as the history of China, Hindostan, Bactria, Meroë, Egypt under the early Ptolemies, Parthia, and Neo-Persia, all put together—some of which, it is true, are only alluded to in a line or two, and others unmentioned.

Dr. Lord is, however, much less modest when he speaks of having "simplified, abridged, and condensed" "the last standard authorities," such as "Rawlinson, Grote, Thirlwall, Niebuhr, Mommsen, and Merivale"—for his work, far from being a simplification, abridgment, or condensation of standard authorities, is—we must speak it out plainly—a compilation of the poorest kind, swarming with stupid repetitions, contradictions, and inaccuracies, the number and grossness of which can only be explained on the supposition that in his haste to compile he never looked back to compare and harmonize. A few quotations, all drawn from two short chapters, will suffice to prove our assertion. On page 90 we read of "a great movement among the Turanian races (Cimmerians) living north of the Danube, which, according to Herodotus, made a great irruption into Asia Minor . . . while the Scythians, from Central Asia, overran Media." On the following page the same movement is spoken of thus: "Asia Minor was devastated by the Cimmerians—a people who came from the regions north of the Black Sea, between the Danube and the Sea of Azov, being driven away by an inundation of Scythians, like that which afterward desolated Media. These Cimmerians . . . burned the great Temple of Diana, at Ephesus, and destroyed the capital city of Sardis." Again, on page 103, we read that "the inroad of the Scythians in Media took place about the same time that the Cimmerians invaded Lydia, a nomad race which probably inhabited the Tauric Chersonesus (Crimea)," and "may have been urged forward into Asia Minor by an invasion of the Scythians themselves. . . . The Cimmerians fled before this more warlike race, abandoned their country on the northern coast of the Euxine, and invaded Asia Minor. They occupied Sardis, and threatened Ephesus." Page 90 tells us that those "nomads of Tartary, or Scythian tribes, which overran Western Asia," subsequently, "under the new names of Huns, Avari, Bulgarians, Magyars, Turks, Mongols, devastated Europe and Asia for fifteen successive centuries." Page 103 repeats it thus: "These nomadic tribes from Tartary were the precursors of Huns, Avars, Bulgarians, Magyars, Turks, Mongols, and Tartars, who, at different periods, invaded the civilized portions of Asia and Europe." That these Scythian invaders were finally vanquished by Cyaxares, we hear a number of times. That with him "the great Median kingdom really began" we read on page 90, but on page 102 we are informed that already his father, "Phraortes, son of Deioces, who [referring to Deioces] built the city of Ecbatana . . . greatly extended the empire of the Medes." That he reigned forty years, from B.C. 633 to B.C. 593, we learn on pp. 90, 91; but page 102 tells us that he reigned from B.C. 636 to B.C. 595. That "before" he made war against Alyattes of Lydia, the father of Crœsus, "he probably captured Nineveh and destroyed it," is stated on page 90; but on page 103 we hear that "shortly after" the "war between these two powers was terminated" he "laid siege to Nineveh." According to page 103, that war "was terminated by the marriage of the daughter of the Lydian king with the son of the Median monarch, Cyaxares," which is—whatever the grammar of both sentences may be—but a paraphrase of what, on page 91, we have read thus: "On the conclusion of peace, the son of the Median king, Astyages, married the daughter of the Lydian monarch, Alyattes"—Cyaxares and Alyattes denoting fathers and monarchs, and Astyages the son of both versions. This marriage made Astyages and Crœsus, the son of Alyattes, brothers-in-law, but on page 94 the former is designated the father-in-law of the latter. This Crœsus is mentioned on page 92 as "the first of the Asiatic kings who commenced hostile aggressions on the Greeks," while on the preceding page we read that it was "Gyges . . . who began those aggressions on the Grecian colonies which were consummated by Crœsus," a statement repeated on page 102, thus: "With this king [Gyges] commenced the aggressions from Sardis on the Asiatic Greeks, which ended in their subjection." According to page 91, Gyges founded his dynasty in Lydia "B.C. 724," but according to page 102 "about the year 715 B.C." Of the neighbors of Lydia in Asia Minor we read in one paragraph, pp. 100, 101, the following geographical notices: "Along the western shores of this great peninsula were Pelasgians . . . Phrygians;" "Further eastward were Lycians . . . Phrygians;" "The Phrygians, Mysians, and Teucrians were on the northwest;" "In the region of Mount Ida were the Teucrians and Mysians." And there is much more of the same kind on the few pages quoted from.

The revision of the book is quite worthy of the scholarship displayed in its composition. For illustration's sake we pick out a few of its numberless misprints: Gesen*e*us, Usshur, Amrapher, Lepides, Sotor, Eupater (repeatedly given), Sila*m*us, Gætæ, By*th*inians (repeatedly), Par*n*isus (for Pamisus), Byza*n*tium (for Byzacium, in Africa), Ta*n*agona (for Tarragona, properly Tarraco), Ta*n*aconeusis (for Tarraconensis), Peireus (for Piræus), Athenæ (as name of Minerva), Moevis (for Mœris), Rame*n*es and Rames*i*s (repeatedly, for Rameses), *T*adyattes (for Sadyattes), Urumi*z*u (for Urumieh), *T*agros (repeatedly, for Zagros), *S*ykia (for Lycia), Ahenobar*d*us (nine times, on page 590 and the annexed Genealogical Table, for Ahenobarbus, which is not once correctly given.) We presume it is not the compositor and proof-reader alone who are responsible for all these and similar mistakes, even if we are to relieve the author of a book "designed chiefly for educational purposes" of the duty of carefully revising it himself, or having it revised by a man more competent than himself. To do the latter would, in this case, certainly have been the safer, if the general impression produced on our mind by the works of Dr. Lord be correct. For we consider his competency to revise a historical proof—even of his own—to be as low as his ability to write a history. A compiler by profession, but apparently devoid of that degree of knowledge without which no one can produce even a useful compilation, he is certainly able to write out properly from a book before him such names as Sadyattes, Zagros, or Byzacium; but when his compositor changes these names into Tadyattes, Tagros, and Byzantium, his historical and geographical knowledge seems not to be sufficient to make him remember that no Tadyattes ever reigned in Lydia, that there was no mountain range called Tagros on the confines of Assyria and Media, and no Byzantium in the Roman province of Africa. No name ever strikes him as suspiciously unfamiliar, no date or statement of fact as conflicting with others given. Names, dates, facts—he has forgotten them as soon as copied.

GENERAL LIPPITT ON FIELD SERVICE.*

More than a year ago, in the Nation of June 18, 1868, we spoke with commendation of the earlier works of General Lippitt; and what we said in praise of them might be repeated in behalf of the book now before us, in which the author has condensed in an admirable manner the well-established principles which should govern field service in war. In a style peculiarly clear and intelligible, and with a crisp completeness, he has compressed into his handy volume the fundamental rules for the conduct of marches, camps and cantonments, outposts, convoys, reconnoissances, foraging, and for furnishing supplies to an army in the field. More than this, he has found room for instances taken from various campaigns to illustrate how important it is to be guided by these rules, and has given the student of war new suggestions of his own, evidently criticisms on what he has himself seen in the field.

We quote one or two instances in which we believe that the late experience of our armies has proved the wisdom of the author's advice: "Most of the employés connected with transportation teams in our service have hitherto been civilians hired by the Quartermaster's Department. It would be a great improvement to require them all to be enlisted soldiers, and to give to this branch of the service a military organization like the others." In some cases these civilian teamsters drew considerably more pay than the soldiers had, besides being fed at the Government charge, and of course this led to invidious comparisons. We have heard a story told of a soldier that he had applied to be breveted a teamster, and assigned to duty with his brevet rank. Add greater expense to the many other disadvantages urged by General Lippitt of employing civilians in the army, and there seems to be overwhelming cause why his suggestion should be adopted. And here is a recommendation which every one will echo who is fond of a horse, and hates to see him abused: "It is very unwise, as was repeatedly shown in our late war, to exhaust cavalry horses by requiring of them more picket duty than is absolutely necessary. Cavalry has enough to do in picketing for itself and for the artillery. Infantry should do its own picketing, except where special emergencies call for cavalry." We hope that before we have another war this suggestion will have grown to have the force of a law, like a good many others of our author's suggestions. We remember that through the winter of 1863–64 one of our cavalry corps—not above 10,000 horses, all told—picketed more than sixty miles of country, day and night, in rain, mud, snow, and ice, with an army of infantry behind it, mostly snug in tents; though any respectable infantryman would willingly go on picket if he knew that he would thereby help to make a good cavalry which might some day help him out of a worse scrape than having to take an occasional "turn" on post.

To some of the author's rules the merest civilian would say, "Why, of course!" and wonder that to men of sense there should be need of stating such bare-faced truisms as this, for example: "If the march of a column must be immediately reversed in order to get into battle, it must be done by a simple facing about, and not by a countermarch, which would cause an unnecessary loss of time." But this is followed by an illustration which shows its point: "At the battle of Shiloh, General Lew Wallace's division was only five miles in the rear of our right, where the fight was raging fiercest, and where it was sorely needed. It had been ordered up early in the morning, but, from mistaking the road, it was marching in the wrong direction until one o'clock P.M., when it was set right. Instead of simply facing the column about, its commander ordered a countermarch, which caused such a loss of time that the division did not arrive on the ground till seven o'clock, when its services were no longer needed."

Such incidents as these, which are freely given by way of illustration, are generally very apt and specific, giving to the book a color of history; and when names and dates are furnished we find a strong satisfaction in

* "Field Service in War: Comprising Marches, Camps and Cantonments, Outposts, Convoys, Reconnoissances, Foraging, and Notes on Logistics. By Francis J. them; it is well to have them as warnings, costly and shameful as many of them were. The military student will recognize in Banks's expedition to Shreveport, for instance, a shining example of how a march in the enemy's country ought not to be conducted, and even in its details it will fix itself in his memory by its incomparable negative excellence. We have no doubt that the author has been generally careful to take authentic examples for his purpose; but in one case he makes a very vague charge which we cannot accept without proof. He says: "The repeated hesitations, delays, and failures of the Army of the Potomac in 1863 after the battle of Gettysburg appear to have been caused mainly by our corps commanders not going personally to the front, and contenting themselves with mere reports of the enemy being in force at particular points." It is not stated where or when the corps commanders failed to go personally to the front, and we are left to wonder if the pursuit of Lee from Gettysburg is meant, or the hesitation to attack him afterward in his position on the Potomac. In our opinion this charge has no good foundation. As General Meade, in his report on the battle of Gettysburg, distinctly says so, there is no reason to doubt that he deliberately determined to follow the enemy by a flank movement on hearing from General Sedgwick, in the advance, that the Fairfield pass by which Lee's troops had retreated through the mountains was "very strong, and one in which a small force of the enemy could hold in check and delay for a considerable time any pursuing forces." Very few will believe that General Sedgwick sent such a report without first seeing for himself. It is true that General A. P. Howe, commanding a division of the sixth corps, testified before the Congressional Committee on the Conduct of the War that he notified General Sedgwick that the Fairfield pass "was a place in which we could easily attack the enemy with advantage;" but as General Sedgwick does not seem to have thought so, this is hardly proof that he contented himself with the report of his subordinate. The hesitation to attack Lee at Williamsport, on the Potomac, a few days later, could not possibly have arisen from the cause which General Lippitt alleges, the enemy's lines being plain to see from our line of battle. These being the facts, so far as we are aware of them, we think that the author should be more particular to state who were the men whose negligence is so notorious as to point a moral.

The book ends with the "Notes on Logistics" (the art of supplying and moving an army in the field), a subject "second in importance only to strategy itself." Living on the enemy's country, when practicable, is the author's mode of meeting the difficulties of this problem, "making war support war." Our Western armies furnish the proofs how well this mode may succeed; but while the author does not preach tenderness towards an enemy's larder and corn-bin even in civil war, he reprobates strongly such loose foraging as Sherman's "bummers" indulged in. With his strong views on the propriety of levying on the enemy for supplies, we commend General Lippitt for his condemnation of those rascals. General Kilpatrick had, we remember, what seemed to him an amusing story of the "bummers." One of them, far in advance of the army, went into a house and asked for tobacco, then for molasses; then he put a quid of the tobacco into the molasses jar, in hopes that some other "bummer" would come along soon, and finding the molasses bitter would suppose it was poisoned, and would thereupon set fire to the house. The tenderness of the first "bummer" in not setting it on fire himself is almost equalled by a merciful suggestion of General Lippitt's: "Even when it is not supposed that any compensation will ever be paid, it is well to offer to the owners certificates of their property having been taken for the use of the army." The second "bummer" might not come along, and the owner with the certificate might get paid. The true solution of the problem of logistics appears to be to cut down transportation, a seeming paradox, but capable of demonstration with determined effort and good example on the part of all officers.

We have skimmed over this book, touching lightly on prominent points, but leaving much unnoticed which is well worthy of attention. As a literary work, it has the merit of condensation and clearness in a high degree. For military readers the book will have a permanent value, and for the many readers to whom our own war has given an interest in military works it will be an excellent guide in judging of the merits of some of our own campaigns. We think that every reader, when he shuts the book, will agree with us that for field service in war there is one quality without which energy and bravery are as nothing; he will hope that all generals in a good cause may have it; and he will feel that most successes are due to it, as most failures are due to the want of it. We mean the homely quality of common sense.

ILLUSTRATED GIFT-BOOKS AGAIN.

THE illustrations to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," designed by Mr. Konewka,* are of a kind almost wholly new in serious art. They are full silhouettes, and represent the persons of the drama as if by their shadows on a white wall. Pictures of this kind are better known in comic journals than elsewhere, Punch having much affected them before 1850, and Cruikshank's Comic Almanac as well, though to a less extent, and although the great humorist himself did not design them, so far as we know. Those were generally on a small scale; these are larger—that is, the erect figure of a man comes out three and a half inches high. Old Egeus telling of his troubles, a single figure, very cleverly imagined; Hermia and Lysander vowing eternal faithfulness; Bottom, in 'Ercles' vein, the best design in the book; Puck and the Fairy; Oberon and Titania beginning their little quarrel. These are the first five pictures, and there are twenty more like these. Every figure has to be in profile, of course, excepting one, Demetrius, whose head only is; but in spite of this, and in spite of the very narrow limits of the style of design, there is sufficient variety and action, and the characters are well distinguished. The book affords a delightful copy of the drama, in ample pages and beautiful type, just the form in which to read it under the study-lamp and aloud; and the pictures are not unsatisfactory as illustrations.

It should be said, though, to correct some misapprehensions which were to be observed when the English edition was before the public a year ago, that drawing in this way is not more difficult, but more easy, than drawing in full light and shade. That is to say, the very limited result possible to obtain in this way is soon and simply obtained; the artist has one thing only to do, to draw such outline of features and of gesture as will express the character he imagines. If we were to take away the solid black that fills up the figure, and call upon the artist to complete the design, that would be quite another task. A hundred artists can arrive at such success as is seen here, for one who can make drawings in full light and shade that will be as successful in their way. Every one will remember the portraits of himself and friends cut out of black paper, which he has submitted to have made at fairs and the like. The victim does not suppose that the clever scissor-man who "cuts him out" in this way, however like the portrait may be, is necessarily a first-rate artist. Very probably he could not draw a mouth or an ear rightly; one thing only he had grown skilful in—catching the character of the profile of the face. A painter would rather have the credit of the engraved head on the title-page than of all the silhouettes; to have drawn that head, and still more, to have imagined it, is to have given proof of considerable strength. The other designs, slight to make and inexpensive to engrave, are just the thing for a holiday-book.

We know not how else to characterize the "Bryant Homestead Book"† than as simply preposterous. Mr. Bryant cannot be made ridiculous, certainly not by what others can do, but no man's dignity can be wholly uninjured by having such stuff put into print apropos of him and his busy and useful life. We shall quote a few lines, that every reader may take warning, and, his curiosity as to the possible badness of a book once satisfied, may keep away from this one:

"Pause: we want breath to fix this scenarium in our mind. Here is nascent drama. This climax is a duality; an antithesis. [Thanatopsis is being quoted in bits.] Will the sleep of the grave put a stop to soul progression? . . . And how many THOUSAND 'thousand years' prophecy of Dante' will roll over Bryant's earth-tomb? His grand Anthropological Cairn for ALL of mortal clay!

"Who can tell? What is DIES IRÆ? Do elements need rest? Is DIES IRÆ the final examination, and will the soul, the Life-Pupil, be put back or forward, according to progression in Life Apprenticeship? Put back to Primal Nonentity at final Revision?"

The illustrations consist of a badly focussed photographic portrait; of a clever etching by Mr. Nast; and of a number of landscape illustrations, not very unlike those which Mr. Hows often publishes. One essential part of the book is the following:

"PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

"In a volume intended to do honor to our Veteran Poet, and to gratify his hosts of friends and admirers with sketches of his home-life, in connection with themes from his works, any publisher might take pride in placing his imprint. For the plan, the matter, and the manner of this work we cannot claim credit, as they belong alone to its author, our responsibility being limited to that of our own vocation."

We sympathize with Mr. Putnam, and commend the step he takes in haking off a responsibility which would be grave even for his long-estab lished publishing-house.

Among the English books imported by our booksellers is an admirable new one, the "Fairy Land" of Mr. Doyle and Mr. Allingham.* Mr. Allingham's charming poems have been allied before this with excellent art. His little book, published some years ago, "The Music-Master, and other Poems," contained a noble design by Dante Rossetti, one by Millais, and a number by Arthur Hughes, among which was that exquisite little picture of the elves dancing in a ring under the rising moon, all reflected in still water. This picture is as sure to be remembered as the little poem of Allingham's:

"Up the airy mountain,
Down the rushy glen,
We daren't go a-milking
For fear of little men:
Wee folk, good folk,
Trooping all together,
Green jacket, red cap,
And white owl's feather."

In this volume we have our poet doing fairy work again, and with all his old gracefulness and all his old charm. As for Richard Doyle's illustrations, we have often expressed our admiration of his talent and our enjoyment of his work. The present is a subject wholly suited to his peculiar power. The engraving has been done delicately and well by Mr. Evans, and the coloring has evidently been directed by the designer. The pictures altogether are perfectly fairy-like, and wholly delightful.

Another good imported book is the "Dickens Christmas Stories," with the original illustrations,† of which the admirable etchings by Leech, illustrating the "Christmas Carol," are the best, and among Leech's best work.

A new edition has appeared of one of the best illustrated books ever published, the octavo "Tennyson," first published by Moxons in 1859.‡ It is well known, but cannot be in too many homes, nor become dear to too many young lovers of pictures. The "St. Cecilia" by Dante Rossetti, the "Godiva" by Holman Hunt, and the "Poisoned Wound of King Edward" by Millais, are among the most truly imaginative illustrations that exist, and Mulready's "Life and Thought are Gone Away" is worthy of their company. There are a dozen more designs by the same artists, all entirely above the common standard, all works of independent value and first-rate importance.

MORE CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

THERE is much to commend in the plan of Mrs. Miller's anecdotes of animals.§ They were designed to have a scientific unity which is usually wanting in similar collections, and to convey to the young some idea of the relations of species in the animal kingdom. A secondary, and still scarcely secondary, object was to draw moral inferences from the creature to the Creator, and to fortify children against that spirit which doubts the existence or goodness of God because of the evil and dangerous attributes of certain beasts. A twofold interest had therefore to be excited, and a union of two styles attempted, with manifest chance of failure. Failure is not the word we should apply to this work, neither should we call it a success, the author herself admitting that she has not written exactly to suit readers of any age, and cannot expect her narrative to be fully useful without the assistance of older persons. Her dialogues are of an unreal kind, which might or might not be detected by children, who would certainly be apt to find her style too elevated. It is sound doctrine, however, that she gives her readers when she tells them: "We must first learn to look at things exactly as they are. . . . . All that those have to do at first who study in the great book of nature is to be sure that they see right." As helps to this there are numerous engravings scattered through the text, and most of them well drawn.

A book which shows much greater aptitude for interesting and instructing the young is Saintine's "Dame Nature,"‖ as the translator dubs it. No parent need be at hand when his bright boy or girl is reading it, for it expounds itself and holds fast the reader, who thinks he is told the most charming stories when he is really listening to lectures on the origin of common things, like cotton-thread, silk, sugar, pasteboard, etc., all which is evolved out of a dispute in the game of guessing—arising from that very important first question, "Is it animal? Is it vegetable? Is it mineral?" Grandpapa's conversation abounds in humor and tender sentiment, and the little folks' responses are wonderfully natural. His audience, mixed of dolls and dolls' owners, should be indefinitely enlarged for all good children.

At the end of the third or fourth volume which Miss Warner has devoted to a story* in which spiritual exercises and tolerably carnal experiences are curiously commingled, in a way which we find entirely peculiar to this author, Daisy has come to her twenty-first year only, and in the ordinary course of things might be expected to do duty as the heroine for two or three novels more. But her lover, having been hopefully converted, is now dead, and Daisy's available life is now ended; or, as she says, it is "begun on a new basis." Miss Warner's readers, then, are probably done with her; and, considering that she has been from the first the most wearisome and self-complacent little bore that even Miss Warner ever invented, we suppose no one who has followed her progress thus far will be sorry to see her put finally on the shelf.

So far as fiction aims to assist by example in the formation of character, a tale of any one people or place is good for any other, and "Filling up the Chinks"† may profitably be read by American boys, as we doubt not it has been by English. It is a painful story, that ends brightly, but it is of a sort of life—in a large manufacturing town—which is not familiar to us in this country, and whose awful sadness consists in the hopelessness of its victims, and in the want of means of escape to a change of scene and occupation; in the fixedness of horizon, in short, which is the lot of the laboring poor in England. Whether the contrast between this state of things and the opportunities for employment and social advancement which abound among us will strike young American readers, we cannot determine; but we feel sure that, if they could choose, they would prefer a less doleful illustration of a most excellent text.

As a contributor to the Riverside Magazine, we presume "Vieux Moustache" to have written in this instance‡ rather for boys than for grown people. In either case, we consider the writing of the story the best part of it, as it is the most original. In spite of the very free use of "local color," we think we discern Oliver Twist in Robert Trulyn, and Nancy Sykes in Bella, and Jupe or Joey Grimaldi in Rolly Gray, and even Mr. Sleary in Dan Mace. Here is the author's epitome of his hero's career: "A little gentleman—a burglar's boy—a Randall's Island boy—then on a Kentucky horsery—champion rider in the circus—and last a gentleman"—last of all a cavalry officer in the Federal army. The book derives its title from the well-known physiological fact that an accident to the brain may temporarily or for ever destroy the memory of past events, and thus cut off the previous life from that which begins immediately after the accident. The author backs this up with the proper authorities in his text and in a foot-note, and appears to think that he has thus accounted for the most improbable incident of his invention. The boy's adventures, however, before he tumbles into the quarry are an unlikelihood not so easily explainable. When once that is got over, there is a good deal to interest, and nothing to offend in the narrative, much as it deals with "low down" people; and it is, as already remarked, well written.

"Nanny's Christmas"§ is a nondescript fragment, without beginning or end—without a bad boy or girl, or a moral of any kind, and with supernaturally bright children (age not stated, and only inferable from the wood-cuts), who have plenty of sleigh-riding, and coasting, and play-games, and make each other lots of presents, with inspired mottoes, like—

"Nanny gives to Cousin Will this book, And hopes in it he will often look;"

or this—

"Lucy gives you an arrow and a bow,
And hopes you will not shoot at dear Fido."

On the whole, we cannot liken this performance to anything else than fitting out a Christmas show-window, and inviting all the little penniless boys and girls of the neighborhood to come and look at it from the outside—as long as they please.

"Nidworth"* is an allegory. The three wands are Riches, Knowledge, and Love—the last being Charity in its broadest sense. The hero tries each in turn, and finds that Riches bring disgust, Knowledge discontent, but Love alone happiness. This story is one of the best of its class, being absolutely pure and high-toned, without cant of any kind. But the form in which it is cast is one to make it appeal to those young people whose consciences and imaginations are already active—and they are chiefly girls—rather than to boys, for whom we suppose it was written, and whose benevolence is the weakest part of them. Any boy who is old enough to understand the language of the book, to "analyze his feelings," to comprehend "legitimate results," or the "idea of the negative grace of self-renunciation," would be old enough to object to the magic introduced as one of the circumstances in a boy's struggle through life, and be able to point out the weaknesses which its use begets in the subject. Only one side of riches and knowledge is permitted to be shown, falsifying them, therefore, to that extent, and falsifying their effect on human character by making the hero obtain them through supernatural means and in supernatural quantities. Still, it would be too much to say that such books as "Nidworth" are without good result. They affect the religious imagination, and make the practice of virtue seem beautiful. And if they cannot convince selfish boys that it is "lots of fun" to go through a forest in the night to feed soup to a sick old hag, they will at least create a moral glow in the bosoms of all those children who are already in practice of similar goodness.

"Ting-a-ling"† is the name of the fairy-hero of this rollicking set of stories. He is the smallest kind of a fairy, as one may guess by knowing that his sweetheart, Ling-a-ting, was drowned in a lady's tear. He is the intimate friend of the largest and most amiable of giants, and the two together confound the machination of the most deformed of dwarfs, in aid of the loveliest of princesses and the most gallant of princes. The regular fairy story machinery is all put in requisition, especially that of the Arabian Nights. But as no person capable of inventing so good stories as those of the Thousand and One Nights will ever do so with the earnestness that gives those immortal tales their chief fascination, so the author of "Ting-a-ling," though he relates with an ingenuity which will claim the youthful attention, does so in such an evident spirit of burlesque that he must draw forth the protestations of all but the very youngest of his readers—or the oldest. A good deal of enjoyment, we should think, could be got out of it when the oldest read it to the youngest, especially from the account of the five magicians, and their offering to the dwarf. The pictures are notably commendable, being full of humor; and the book is altogether attractively got up.

The Pictorial Field-book of the War of 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing. (New York: Harper & Brothers.)—This is a noteworthy work, partaking of the nature of what the French call mêmoires pour servir à l'histoire, and a rich archæological collection, with its profuse and handsome illustrations in sketches, views, plans, monuments, portraits, caricatures, autographs, medals, arms, remarkable houses, and scraps of contemporaneous poetry. Not only is the history of the campaigning of 1812–14 attempted, but also that of the civil administration and leading political events of the period extending from the Revolution to the treaty of Ghent. To these are added personal sketches and biographies not only of prominent public characters, but of officers, soldiers, sailors, and scouts, ambassadors, writers, and editors, and of people not connected with either the civil or military events of the period. Note-book and pencil in hand, the author has travelled more than ten thousand miles between the great Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, visiting nearly all the scenes of the incidents recorded, receiving accounts from survivors, and sketching scenery, battle-fields, and notable localities. The result is a handsome volume of more than one thousand pages, which one may open anywhere at random and find interesting.

Criticism of the book as a history of the War of 1812, or of the civil and political events of the period, is disarmed by its title. So much diversified material enters into its composition that the unity and sequence of a strictly historical narrative must necessarily suffer. Omissions, contradictions, and confusion of detail necessarily occur. Here is one instance: Jefferson's conduct in the matter of the attacks on Washington and his administration in Freneau's paper, is an important point in the history of the political events of 1792–3. In a note (p. 71), Mr. Lossing tells us that it would be both ungenerous and unjust to believe that the bitter attacks made upon all the measures of the administration were approved by Mr. Jefferson. But in another note (p. 78) he fully convicts Mr. Jefferson of the offence by saying that his conduct was not manly; that although he had always denied complicity with Freneau, the very minutes made by Jefferson himself and printed in his Anas sufficiently indicate his relative position at that time. And to this Mr. Lossing adds testimony of the almost dying declaration of Freneau that the paper the National Gazette was entirely under the control of Jefferson, who dictated or wrote the most violent attacks on Washington. And now comes confusion of details. The text of page 71 tells us the National Gazette was Fenno's paper, "the supporter of the Government policy," made spicy by "Hamilton's vigorous retorts;" and that Freneau's United States Gazette "was believed to be under the control of" Jefferson. And yet a note appended to this very text speaks of the National Gazette as Mr. Jefferson's organ, edited by Freneau; and says that "Fenno published the United States Gazette, the supporter of the measures of the administration." Errors so glaring should be corrected; and a careful revision would cause many less glaring to disappear.

The military operations are well described for popular reading, and many of the battles, particularly the naval engagements, are admirably painted in words. A peculiar interest is thrown about many of them by the reminiscences of many who took part in them. It strikes us that Mr. Lossing disposes in somewhat too summary a manner of the "Beauty and Booty" and "Cotton-bale" features of the battle of New Orleans. They are large and distinct in the general popular belief, and should be treated in such a manner as to settle them satisfactorily as true or false. To say that the first is "doubtless wholly untrue" is perhaps rather a strong statement. The definite historical charge is that, on the 8th of January, 1815, "Beauty and Booty" were the parole and countersign of the British army. The belief in its truth at the period of the battle was founded on the concurrent report of a large number of British prisoners and deserters. That so many men, brought in from different parts of the field, and at various stages of the battle, should concur in the one statement is, to say the least, singular. The belief that General Jackson had saved New Orleans from the fate threatened by the British countersign was in good part the cause of the immense reward of gratitude which the country conceived was due him. It has been treated in the United States as a historical fact for fifty years; and having thus reached the dignity of a national accusation, it was not beneath the notice of the nation accused. If, as is claimed for England, it is a calumny, it could easily be refuted by the simple statement of the true parole and countersign which, as a matter of course, were borne on the orderly books of every corps in the army. It was correctly remarked at the time that the fame of General Pakenham and his officers, the character of the British military—strongly implicated by a charge of this nature—and the honor of the British Government, all demanded that the charge be refuted if capable of refutation. In the light of the expressed anxiety for plunder by the officers of Pakenham's army, as found in intercepted letters, the charge becomes by no means improbable. Colonel Malcolm, writing to the rear-admiral of that name, is chagrined that his share of the prize-money at St. Mary's "did not exceed five hundred pounds." Sir Thomas Cochrane laments that "if they clear thirty thousand pounds, it will be as much as they will do." Admiral Cockburn speaks of being "fortunate here in our small way." Another officer writes, "We have had some fine fun and plenty of plunder at St. Mary's. How are you off for tables and chests of drawers, etc.?" Captain Westful of the Anaconda is informed by another that "after ransacking St. Mary's we brought away property to the amount of fifty thousand pounds." From such communications as these, we can imagine the "fine fun and plenty of plunder" these gentlemen had promised themselves at New Orleans.

As to the cotton-bales, Mr. Lossing is not clear. His general proposition that "the common impression that Jackson's breastworks were constructed chiefly of cotton-bales is an erroneous one" is correct. But the further statement that "a few were used at the end next the river, but they were not useful and were rejected," is not so satisfactory. The fact appears to be, from the best authorities, that some bales of cotton were taken to form the cheeks of the embrasures—a purpose for which their size and form would make them look quite tempting; but the enemy's balls struck the bales, scattered them in all directions, and set them on fire.

†"Ting-a-ling. By Frank R. Stockton." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1870.

On the Edge of the Storm. By the author of "Mademoiselle Mori," "Sydonie's Dowry." (New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1869.)—Without any especial merits beyond its good taste and cleverness, which, however, are qualities rare enough to be noteworthy whenever they are found, this story is still very pleasant reading. Its scene is laid in France, and the time is the beginning of the Revolution. What has pleased us most in it is the even-handedness with which the author deals with both parties in the contest, neither making the aristocrats all angels nor the republicans all fiends, but describing both with impartiality. The same evenness is found in other respects throughout her work, her characters being all well and carefully drawn, and her style somewhat monotonously pure. Another pleasant thing about it is the care with which painful scenes and incidents are avoided, while, at the same time, one is made to see the possible ease with which the reader's feelings might have been harrowed. Altogether, we find the book to be the most agreeable addition Mr. Putnam has yet made to his library of European literature.

The Week.

CONGRESS has, of course, not sat during the week, and does not meet again till Jan. 10. The principal Washington news, therefore, and the one subject of Washington conversation, has been Mr. Stanton's sudden death. It appears that he has left no property, and would never during his lifetime accept anything in the nature of pecuniary compensation for the services he had rendered the country. A movement is therefore now on foot to present his family with a New Year's gift of $100,000. Perhaps one of the most pleasing results of the war has been the production of a class of men who seem in the popular eye worthy objects of this sort of testimonial. Before the war it would have been hard to find a man in public life for whom anybody would have been willing to subscribe anything after all further service had ceased to be expected of him.

Mr. Stanton occupied a more prominent place in the public eye, in connection with the late war, than any other civilian except Mr. Lincoln, and his sudden death, when just grasping a long-coveted reward, has produced a correspondingly profound sensation. He can hardly be said to have been popular. His official demeanor was anything but urbane, and he was violent in his prejudices, and inexorable in acting them out. A man in the service he took a dislike to he generally managed to ruin before he had done with him, and was not always very scrupulous in the choice of means. There are few men who had much to do with him who have not sad stories to tell on these points, and under ordinary circumstances his weaknesses of temper would perhaps have lost him the public confidence. But the circumstances of his career were not ordinary, and this fact, while it brought out his defects of character, brought out also certain great traits of it which will probably hand down his name to posterity as one of the foremost men of his time. When people saw the confusion out of which he had to evoke order; the horde of scoundrels eager for public plunder, between whom and the army and the Treasury he stood for four weary years, the principal, indeed one might almost say the only barrier, they readily forgave his imperfections; they would have forgiven them had they been twice as great. And then, as the French say, "he paid with his person." He flinched from no toil or sacrifice of personal comfort; and, indeed, may be as truly said to have laid down his life in the service as any man who died on the field. Moreover, he was one of the few men who, having had control over vast sums of money almost without check during the war, came out of it poor. This is, in our age, a fine thing to say of any man, and it should never be forgotten of any man of whom it may be said.

What perhaps did more, however, than either his self-sacrifice or his integrity to win for him the popular devotion, was the fact that he represented to perfection the popular temper during the whole struggle. He never doubted and he was never downcast, or, at all events, never showed signs of either; and to estimate this at its full value, it must be remembered that he was one of the two or three men at Washington who could derive no consolation from the newspapers, as the rest of us did day by day. He always knew the truth, and it was generally tolerably depressing truth till the last year. He knew, too, and showed he knew, as few politicians did, what war meant, and war he waged accordingly, hitting as hard as he could, never taking "counsel's opinion," showing no bowels of compassion, sparing neither life nor treasure; indefatigable, insatiable, relentless, as, in truth, a man of war has to be. He furnished oftener than was supposed the steel head to Mr. Lincoln's tough lance, and has had the good fortune to die with the memory of his services still fresh in the public mind, and the generation who watched and labored with him still standing around him. He was a respectable lawyer, but of his powers as a politician, in the best sense of the word, there is little to be said. It is not unfair to presume that he would have made little mark in the political field in peaceful times. He had one qualification for the judicial bench which, in the present condition of the bench, may safely be set down among the highest, and led us, in spite of his faults of temper, to hear of his appointment with pleasure: he was not afraid of anybody or subservient to anybody. In other words, he was a brave man; and bravery enters largely into the stuff out of which good judges under our system of government have to be made.

We have discussed the recently published correspondence on the Alabama question elsewhere. Mr. Fish's despatch, which constitutes the bulk of it, simply rehearses the causes of American dissatisfaction, but recedes from the extreme ground taken by Mr. Seward about belligerent rights. Lord Clarendon contents himself almost with a statement that he has nothing more to say. Judging from this and from the tone of the English press, it seems unlikely that any further move about the matter will be made by the English Government, and if ours means to reopen the negotiations, it must certainly make a demand for specific redress. It is not dignified or expedient to keep perpetually repeating to a listening world the story of our wrongs. Everybody now knows all about them. Everybody knows, too, that mere pecuniary damages are not considered sufficient. The Administration is now bound to say what else it wants, or let the affair drop. The United States is the plaintiff in the case, and must state the nature of the remedy it seeks. The apparent concurrence of both parties as to the propriety of transferring the negotiations to Washington, whenever they are resumed, is a step in the right direction.

The publication of the Spanish correspondence puts the United States Government in an excellent position in all that relates to Cuba. It shows that Mr. Fish has confined himself strictly to the task of keeping Spain within the limits prescribed by international law. He has successfully resisted several rather monstrous Spanish pretensions; one, an attempt to treat as pirates persons found carrying arms or munitions of war to the island, which, as long as Spain refuses to acknowledge there is formal war raging in the island, is a perfectly harmless enterprise, and which, even if she had acknowledged war to be raging, would simply be an illicit trading venture, subjecting the vessel and cargo to condemnation; another was an attempt to extract a proclamation against giving material aid to the insurgents, but without recognizing their belligerency; another was an attempt to exercise the right of search on the high seas, without conceding belligerent rights. Every one of these was abandoned on Mr. Fish's protest, and the government at Madrid has acknowledged, in very handsome terms, the good faith and fair dealing of the United States in the whole matter.

The latest "news" about Cuba appearing in the New York papers is that the Administration has undergone a great change of mind about the rebellion since the President's message was written, and is now half inclined to acknowledge the belligerency of the insurgents. What has worked this conversion does not appear. Moreover, the same chronicler says Mr. Sumner is disposed to support the recognition if it can be shown to him that the rebels have emancipated the slaves, than which nothing is easier, as Cespedes's proclamation is in everybody's hands. The news about Mr. Sumner, however, is, we are bound to presume, the composition either of a wag or a simpleton. To recognize belligerency in return for an attempt at emancipation would leave every nation free to select anything it pleased as a title to belligerency, and we should see belligerent rights conceded to "peoples, districts, and colonies" "struggling to be free," in consideration of their reading the Bible, or abstinence from intoxicating liquors, or humane treatment of the insane, or devotion to the Pope, or belief in the Immaculate Conception.

Mr. Schenck must have felt comfortable after his attempts in the House last week to prevent any participation on the part of the Government in ceremonies in honor of Mr. Peabody's memory. There has been a great deal said, and we think we have read or heard most of it, about Mr. Peabody's hostility to the cause of the Union during the war; but nothing has ever been proved against him under this head, except that he avowed throughout his affection and sorrow for the South, in which he had lived for many years. Before condemning for this atrocity a man who has devoted the proceeds of a life's labor to the promotion of the good of his kind, it would be well for some of our Congressmen to ask themselves whether they are quite sure that a hatred of the South, in addition to support of the Union, and in addition to a life of well-doing, is called for in the courts of Heaven as strictly as in the halls of the Capitol, and whether there would not be something a little ridiculous in President Grant's Administration turning the cold shoulder on a great American philanthropist for a weakness which the Ruler of the universe will, unless the world is all wrong about His code of morality, set down as a virtue.

The annual celebration in this city of the landing of the Pilgrims is now regularly marked by one little incident, which we think were better omitted, and that is a "set to" between the Mayor, as the representative of the Irish Democracy, and some descendant of the Puritans. The New England orators usually make some allusion, which the place of meeting not unnaturally suggests, to the rascalities of the New York Democracy, and to the aggressive spirit—to use no stronger term—of its principal constituent, the Irish population. Whereupon the Mayor, as in duty bound, takes up the cudgels for the city, and being ex vi termini the principal offender himself, carries the war into New England, and makes various unpleasant allusions to Yankee peculiarities. On the surface, the whole thing is a joke, or, as the reporters say, an interchange of "amenities;" but in reality there is bitterness at the bottom of it, and there ought to be, but it is hard on the Forefathers to give vent to it over their memory. If the Mayor has to be invited to these gatherings, it would, we think, best serve the cause of morality to preserve a solemn silence about the weaknesses of his supporters, or else speak about them in solemn earnest.

The troubles in the Hudson's Bay Territory, caused by the handing over of the population to the Dominion of Canada by the Home Government without asking their consent, are gradually assuming a more serious as well as more ludicrous aspect. Mr. McDougall, the governor, sent out from Canada to rule over the new acquisition, is installed ingloriously at Pembina, on the American side of the line, waiting for better days, and apparently unable to hold even a foot of ground within his legal jurisdiction. His last reported exploit appears to have been the despatch of a member of his staff to endeavor to raise a force of Indians for the Government service, but the attempt, it does not appear for what reason, failed miserably, the emissary narrowly escaping from the enraged insurgents, with whom this piece of folly will of course render all accommodation more difficult than ever, if not impossible. We see, however, that Mr. McDougall disclaims all responsibility for it. The close business and topographical relations of the rebels to Minnesota, the sympathy which the Minnesotans naturally feel for them, and cannot long avoid showing, promise to convert the movement into an international question of considerable difficulty. Moreover, pending the troubles, the Government refuses to pay over to the unfortunate Hudson's Bay Company its $1,500,000. The French and half-breeds who compose the insurrectionary force are showing unexpected talent for organization, but the English settlers have not yet declared themselves. Correspondents of the Western papers begin publishing descriptions of the insurgent chiefs which show that for personal beauty and accomplishments they have probably never been matched, unless perhaps by some of the heroes of Ossian. Eyes, teeth, muscles, figure, brow, and literary acquirements and athletic capabilities are of the first order.

There have been several stories about Mr. Burlingame, of one sort or another, afloat during the last two or three months, the first of which, that the Imperial Government had refused to ratify the treaty he had concluded with this country, was plainly untrue, because China has nothing whatever to gain by not ratifying it. She loses nothing by it; and, although it cannot be said she acquires anything either which she did not possess by other treaties already existing, except a more formal acknowledgment of her equality, the treaty has since undoubtedly been ratified. Another story is that Mr. Burlingame's commission, properly translated, accredits him to "lesser nations," or, in other words, asserts once more the ancient Chinese doctrine of the inferiority of foreign powers. This has not been contradicted, so far as we know, or explained away; and the evidence in support of it seems to accumulate. But it really makes no difference, even if true, in the relations of China with the outer world. Its importance is due to the light it throws on the intention of the Chinese in sending out the embassy. It does not, if true, raise or lower the foreigners, but it perhaps shows that the Chinese do not accept our theory of international relations with the frankness which has been ascribed to them. In the meantime, Mr. Burlingame is making good progress with his negotiations in Europe.

Mr. Fish has addressed a circular to American representatives abroad, enclosing a draft of a convention regulating the laying of cables between different countries, and urging its adoption. Its leading features are—provisions for the protection of such lines in time of peace and war; for the encouragement of the laying of them; and for the protection of messages from official scrutiny—a point which France will find it hard to yield. He has also urged, in his despatch on the Alabama matter, the settlement of the general question of neutral rights and duties, and has received, as might naturally be expected, a hearty expression of concurrence from England, which is just now in a most philosophic frame of mind. So that it would seem as if the time was propitious for a congress of the great powers to deal with a large number of problems which the growth of trade and commerce, of discovery and invention, are forcing on the attention of all governments, but for which the existing code of international law makes no provision.

The Oneida Community are engaged in a controversy with the Government which raises some interesting questions. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says, as they are one family, they are only entitled to one deduction of $1,000 on their income-tax; they say that they are an unincorporated co-operative association, in which each adult member is entitled to any legal rights he might have if he did not belong to it, and therefore each one is entitled to the $1,000 deduction; and to prove that they have no desire to shirk their due proportion of the public liabilities, they show by their tax receipts that, had the rest of the nation contributed as much to the Treasury as they have, the National Debt would by this time be wiped out, and a surplus of two billions of dollars left. The weak point in their case is that the property on which they claim exemption does not belong to each member in the sense in which it belongs to individuals in the world without, whom the statute had in view in making the exemption. No member of the community can take an equal share of the common property, as of right, and retire. Nevertheless, as Congress did not contemplate the case of these communities, and as it is clearly unjust to treat them as simply collections of individuals, there ought to be a special clause inserted for their benefit when the act comes under consideration this winter.

The New York Times informed its readers on Monday morning "that there was little doubt that the Sultan had settled his little differences with the Khedive," and that there will be no fight. This looks as if the Times had not seen the announcement in the Tribune of Dec. 21, "that private and trustworthy information" (we think we know "the reliable gentleman" who furnished it) "had reached it that war between Turkey and Egypt was almost inevitable." "We forbear," adds the cautious editor, "to state our views with the emphasis with which it has been imparted, but," etc., etc.; and then follow some paragraphs of cold-blooded speculation on the Sultan's means of offence, including 700,000 troops, of which 400,000 on a moderate calculation must be in very tight quarters in the top story of the Tribune office; that the Sultan knows nothing of them, or ever will, is certain. This being the third bloody European war which the Tribune has set agoing within the last two short years, the question arises, whether humanity does not call for interference on the part of our Government with this sanguinary newsmonger, this implacable waster of his own species. The Springfield Republican, not having the enterprise to get up "a triple alliance" of its own, tried to go shares in the Tribune's last summer, by exclaiming, in a small, meek voice, "that it had information to the same effect itself" (i.e., to the effect that France, England, and Spain were entering into an alliance against the United States). It now announces that "the danger" of said alliance is over. Thank Heaven, is all we can say; but when did it pass away, brethren? About what hour of what blessed day was that particular load taken off the breast of humanity?

The Suez Canal is going through the trials which seem to attend all the great enterprises of our time in their opening days—witness the first railroad, the first ocean steamer, the Atlantic Cable. Since the opening the public has been disposed to settle down on two conclusions—one, that the canal will not pay; and the other, that it is not now, and will never be, navigable for vessels of a large size. The first point is one which primarily concerns the stockholders, of whom the Khedive is the principal one. The total capital sunk thus far is $82,000,000, of which the French public has supplied little more than half; and it is now discovered that it will cost $10,000,000 more to make the canal what it ought to be. It needs widening and deepening at various points; there is a good deal of blasting to be done at one; and the harbor at Port Said needs extensive improvements. The maintenance of the canal will cost, it is estimated, $200,000 a year; but, all things considered, the shrewdest business heads are now of opinion that, in spite of all these burdens, it will pay a fair interest, at the present tariff of two dollars a ton, to its shareholders. The present depression about it seems to be mainly due to over-haste in opening it. The English in India are greatly excited about it, and preparations are being made at Bombay on a great scale for the navigation of it. In Liverpool a large number of the old blockade-runners are being drawn from the seclusion in which they have reposed since the close of the war, and made ready for the canal trade. An international commercial congress, which is reported to be sitting at Cairo—though how composed we do not know—has adopted a memorial in favor of the neutralization of the canal, and has also recommended the restriction of the belligerent right of blockade to fortified ports.

The controversy which has been raging about the Duke of Genoa's candidature for the Spanish throne is a curious one. The Duke is a boy at school at Harrow, and does not want to be King of Spain. His mother and his morganatic father—if that be a proper phrase—the Marquis of Rapallo, are opposed to his acceptance of the crown, and he is largely under their influence; but they are both in bad odor at the Italian court, and the King is desirous of having him accept if elected, and appears to have made an arrangement to that effect with Prim. The result has been a rather scandalous bandying of contradictions between the Marquis of Rapallo and the Spanish Government; but the difficulty seems in a fair way of being solved by the failure of the Cortes to supply the requisite majority in the Duke's favor, and it is now said that the Provisional Government intends to fix a time after which it will not urge his election.

The latest report from Italy was that the King had invited General Cialdini to form a new Cabinet in place of that of Menabrea, who has been Premier since 1867. On the 19th of November the Chamber of Deputies met to elect a President, and did so in the person of Lanza, a rigid Conservative of the Piedmontese faction, who held the same office fifteen months before, and resigned it in order to join the bitter opposition to the action of Government in regard to the tobacco monopoly. He was re-elected by 169 votes against 129 cast for the administration candidate, receiving the entire support of the Radical Left (less than a hundred strong), the Permanente, a fraction of the Right, and the Third Party. The ministry had given warning, wisely or unwisely, that they would regard the vote for President as one of confidence, and it was no sooner announced than they resigned. Days passed before the King would accept, and again before Lanza was summoned to form a ministry, he having insisted that Counts Menabrea and Cambray-Digny, with the Marquis Gualterio, should be banished from court. But even with this extraordinary concession, and after appealing to every party in the House, he could accomplish nothing. The coalition had created a majority which could not be counted on except for personal hostility to the late ministry, and the only party which has gained by it has been the Left. All the Vice-Presidents, the Secretaries and minor officers, with one or two exceptions, were appointed from the Left, which has also insisted on continuing in session during the ministerial crisis, and has even gone so far as to take the case of one of its members, Major Lobbia—convicted of simulating crime for political purposes—from the Court of Appeals in order to revise it before letting it proceed further. To this unfortunate state of things many causes, dating from Mentana and still further back, have contributed; and the prospect is that, even with fresh elections, things will grow worse in Italy before they grow better. But under the shadow of this political confusion there is going on an extraordinary revival of material enterprise and prosperity. Commerce, manufactures, arts, all feel the pulses of a new life. Real estate is rising rapidly, railroads are spreading, and, in fact, the old Italy is passing away, and a new, ten per cent., Americanized, go-ahead, and, to the artist and poet, very repulsive Italy is growing up in its stead.

The latest news from France, which has been foreshadowed by our correspondent, is, perhaps, the most important which has come from that quarter since 1851. It is neither more nor less than that the Emperor has formally surrendered personal government by requesting M. Ollivier to form a Ministry representing the majority of the Lower Chamber, thus re-establishing parliamentary government in France after eighteen years' interruption. The effect of this on the fortunes of the Orleans family, which have been steadily rising during the past year, is serious—that is, if the Emperor lives long enough to get his son ready to succeed him. The weak point in the Imperial régime is that the Liberals are loth to believe the Emperor, and doubt the permanence of all his concessions. This difficulty time alone can remove.

THE "ALABAMA" CASE AGAIN.

It was somewhat difficult to make out from the President's message what the position of the new Administration on the Alabama case was, as it contained nothing beyond an expression of dissatisfaction with the Clarendon-Johnson treaty, and of a desire for full satisfaction from England for the injuries done by the English Government and English subjects during the war. No intimation was given in it of the sentiments of the Cabinet regarding the nature or extent of this satisfaction, or the rule by which the damage suffered by the United States should be measured.

We therefore read Mr. Fish's despatch, published last week, with a good deal of curiosity, confidently expecting to find in it not simply a reiteration of the charges against England, but a frank and explicit description of the thing, whatever it is, which will have to be done in order to put the relations of the two countries once more on an amicable footing. We need not say we were disappointed. The despatch is a simple rehearsal of the reasons why Americans complain of the belligerency proclamation as premature, and of the subsequent course of the English Government as unlawful and unfriendly, and with which everybody is now familiar. We must add, however, that Mr. Fish, up to a certain point, puts that proclamation, as has never been done before, in its true place amongst the res gestæ out of which the controversy between the two countries has sprung. He takes the ground which General Grant takes in his message with regard to the duties of the United States towards Cuba, which President Woolsey took in his lectures on the Alabama case last summer, and which, we may be permitted to add, the Nation has taken from the beginning—that what is called the "concession of belligerent rights," being neither more nor less than a notice given by a government to its own citizens that it understands war to be raging in a certain place, between certain specified parties, that it intends to remain neutral between them, and that its citizens must abstain from certain acts which would be construed as violations of that neutrality, or suffer certain penalties, some emanating from the belligerents, others from the neutral government itself—it is in its very nature a discretionary act. All writers acknowledge it to be so. President Grant has proclaimed it to be so. Each nation is the sole and sovereign judge of the time and circumstances which call for it; therefore no nation owes an account to any other for issuing it. You might as well call a man to account for bolting his door and closing his shutters when he sees or thinks he sees a fight beginning in the street in front of his house.

Of course, however, an exercise of discretion may be friendly or unfriendly, or neither. It may be unfriendly in respect to the time at which it was done or the circumstances under which it was done. If I am in the fight in the street, and the owner of the house is my intimate friend, it would be a sign of unfriendliness in him to withdraw and close his doors and his windows; if he was the intimate friend of the other party, it would be unfriendly in him to me to keep them open. Moreover, if, after having closed his doors, in the exercise of his undeniable right, when the fray was beginning, he placed himself at an upper window during its progress, and occupied himself in cheering on my adversary, it would be idle for him to tell me afterwards that his sole object in shutting up was to protect his own property. But then, for the unfriendliness of a discretionary act, there is no legal remedy as between either nations or individuals. If a man does not like the moral attitude another has assumed towards him during a period of great trial and difficulty, he may take an early opportunity of punching his head, but he cannot bring him into court in an action for damages. And if a nation is not satisfied with the time at which another nation has chosen to announce its neutrality in a pending quarrel, it may go to war by way of vengeance; but there is no rule in international law defining all the casus belli. There are some wars which may be justified by precedent, but there are others which find their justification simply in national feeling. Of these latter it is useless and, indeed, childish to argue in the legal forum; they belong exclusively to the jurisdiction of conscience, and have to have their causes weighed not by lawyers but by moralists.

The English proclamation of belligerency, therefore, unfriendly as we may feel it to have been, so far from being, as has been maintained with so much rhetorical exaggeration, a wrong in itself, capable of submission to a legal tribunal, or a source of wrongs, is of no value or importance in the present controversy, except as a piece of evidence useful in fixing the animus of subsequent acts. "It was," to use Mr. Fish's language, "of itself, and by its inherent nature, of a neutral color, which, however we might condemn it in a particular case, we could not deny to be of the competency of a sovereign state." But he unfortunately goes on to say, "Other governments did the same thing, but Great Britain alone had translated a measure indefinite of itself into one of definite wrong to the United States, as evinced by the constant and effectual aid, in ships and munitions of war, which she furnished to the Confederates. . . . Thus, what in France and Spain, as their subsequent conduct showed, had been an untimely and ill-judged act of political manifestation, had in England, as her subsequent conduct showed, been a virtual act of war."

It is difficult, on reading this, to avoid a feeling of despair about the whole matter. It must be remembered that our Government has all along held that under the law of nations England was bound to have prevented the sailing of the Alabama and all other Confederate cruisers which left her ports; that the plea that her municipal law did not provide machinery for the purpose had no value, inasmuch as it is the duty of each nation to provide the machinery for the proper execution of its international obligations; that the refusal of the Palmerston Government to make good the defects in English law was a plain and shameless evasion of their duty; and that the existence of those defects aggravated instead of lessening their responsibility. Now, this rule, the existence of which nobody now denies, exists entirely independent of the proclamation of belligerency. Under it England would have been bound to prevent the sailing of the Alabama if she had never issued the proclamation; she was equally bound to prevent it after having issued the proclamation: the single fact which fixes her responsibility is that the Alabama was to be used against a power with which she was at peace. The issue of the proclamation of belligerency in reality (this may seem to some persons an extraordinary statement, but it is literally true) has in either law or morals no more influence on England's obligation than on the ebb and flow of the tide. The relation of cause and effect between the issue of the proclamation and English liability for the damage done by belligerent cruisers is a figment of the imagination of some gentlemen who have brought to this discussion a somewhat more plentiful supply of rhetoric than of brains. Had England never issued the proclamation, she would have been bound to have prevented the issue from her ports of armed vessels to prey on the commerce of a friendly power; had her municipal law provided no machinery for the purpose, she would have been bound to supply it; had the vessels sailed through the culpable negligence of her officials, she would have been bound to punish them and make good the damage. In short, we should have had her just where we have her now. The premature issue of the proclamation is of no use to us except as proof of animus. Mr. Fish's assertion that she "translated" the proclamation, the issue of which he acknowledges to have been of itself an act of legal discretion, though "an ill-judged act of political manifestation," "into a virtual act of war," has a vagueness and mistiness about it which, we are sorry to say, is well calculated to excite apprehension as to the fate of the controversy in his hands. An "ill-judged political manifestation" cannot be "translated" into an act of war. "An act of war" is an act of war by itself, and, if committed against a friendly power, has to be atoned for just as it stands. Trying to extract its guilt from a not unlawful act which went before is like trying to prove that a man's responsibility for a murder lay not so much in his having killed somebody as in his having some time before cut his acquaintance, thus "translating" simple discourtesy into wilful homicide.

If it be asked why we protest so strongly against the importance attached in this matter to the belligerency proclamation, we reply, Because it burdens the case with extraneous matter; because it forces us to get satisfaction from England for an act which we acknowledge to be within her discretion, and which no power therefore can apologize or pay damages for without humiliation; because every time we seek to connect the proclamation with the damage done by the Alabama, in the relation of cause and effect, we virtually admit that, had the proclamation not been issued, the sailing of the Alabama, other things remaining the same, would not have entailed any responsibility on England, which is not only unsound in law, but a piece of unprecedented self-stultification; and, lastly, because it diffuses through the public mind a fog which, while it lasts, makes a satisfactory settlement of the question almost impossible, serves nobody's purpose but those of that large class of political porpoises to whom international law and international relations serve simply as an elastic medium in which to spout and tumble.

THE COUNCIL: WHY IT WAS CALLED, AND WHAT IT MAY DO.

The great Councils of the Church from Nice to Trent reflect the history of theological and ecclesiastical controversies. Each of them was called into existence by some emergency of dogma or discipline, and each has left its particular mark upon the creed or the canons. The first seven Councils (from Nice A.D. 325 to Nice A.D. 787), which alone are acknowledged as Œcumenical, were largely occupied with definitions in Christology; and although such questions as the consubstantiality of the Son with the Father, and the procession of the Holy Ghost, are now remanded to the text-books of theology, they once distracted the Church with fierce disputes, and threatened the peace of the Roman Empire. Since the eighth century the great Councils have followed the line of the Latin Church, and, though universal in respect of that Church and its dependencies, have had no acknowledged relation of authority to the universal Church. The last of these, that of Trent in the sixteenth century, was summoned to confront the heresies of the Reformation; to heal, as far as possible, the breach of that great schism, and repair the waning authority of the Papal See; and the doctrine and discipline of the Church as formulated in the catechism and the canons of that Council have been regarded as final upon the issues between the Church of Rome and the Reformed churches. It has been the boast of Trent that within her sanctuary "postremum Spiritus Sanctus oracula effudit." The calling of another Council, therefore, argues the existence of some new differences within the Church, or of new questions between the Church and the world without. And yet the roots of the questions that are now to be determined at Rome as questions of the nineteenth century lie back in the sixteenth.

The order of Jesuits set up papal absolutism against the popular tendencies of the Reform, and, seizing the potent engines of education and diplomacy, sought to control the policy of Europe in the interest of Rome. In this it was inspired by the principle of unreserved submission to the papal will, making dogma, sacraments, practice, discipline, all secondary to the notion of the infallible supremacy of the Pope in the Church and over peoples and states. Said Gretser, in the seventeenth century, "When we speak of the Church, we mean the Pope." But the Reformation, which summoned into existence this reactionary propagandism of the Jesuits, spread to some extent the leaven of Liberalism within the bosom of the Church. Of this the Jansenists and the school of Port Royal, led by Pascal, Arnauld, Nicole, and Quesnel, were a notable example. The one party has aimed at the centralization of power at Rome—the concentration of authority in one personal will; the other at a measure of organic independence and of individual freedom within the Church in harmony with the progress of modern society; and since intensity of devotion to the Pope has marked the Italian clergy, while Liberalism has been more characteristic of the French, the former school has come to be known as the Ultramontane, and the latter as the Gallican. There have been, of course, fluctuations between these two schools, according to the temper of the popes and of the times, and so long as no direct issue was raised between them the Church could hold them both; but it was reserved for Pius IX. to bring these opposite principles to an issue, first in his own person, and next in the Council convened by his authority, and already so largely subject to his dictation. Scared by the ghost of Democracy that he had raised in 1848, the Pope threw himself into the hands of the Jesuits—whom the popular belief charged with instigating the assassination of the liberal Rossi—and under the lead of Antonelli he struck for the opposite extreme of absolutism and infallibility. From that day Pius IX. has grown bolder in his usurpations of prerogative within the Church, and more arrogant in his denunciations of powers, peoples, and opinions without the Church, until the former culminated in the proclamation of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin as a dogma of the Church, without the authorization of a Council, and the latter in the famous Syllabus of 1864 against the errors of modern society.

The reactionary movement at Rome, while it carried with it such French prelates as were ambitious of promotion or were wedded to ecclesiastical unity, revived in French Liberals the old free spirit of the Gallican Church. This spirit found vent in a Congress of Catholic Liberals, held at Malines in August, 1863, at which Count Montalembert made his noble declaration for liberty of conscience:

> "Of all the liberties which I have undertaken to defend, the most precious, in my view, the most sacred, the most legitimate, the most necessary, is liberty of conscience; . . . liberty for truth and liberty for error; liberty for ourselves and liberty for those who differ from us. . . . I feel an invincible horror at all punishments and all violences inflicted on mankind under pretence of serving or defending religion. The fagots lighted by the hands of Catholics are as horrible to me as the scaffolds on which Protestants have immolated so many martyrs. The gag in the mouth of any sincere preacher of his own faith I feel as if it were between my own lips, and it makes me shudder with distress."

Such sentiments, uttered with applause in an assembly of Catholics, were, in fact, a public protest against the encroachments of papal absolutism; and in the Papal Encyclical of the following year, the opinion that "liberty of conscience and of worship is the right of every man" was condemned as an error "very hurtful to the safety of the Catholic Church and of souls;" and the opinion that "the law of the Church does not demand that violations of sacred laws should be punished by temporal penalties" was also denounced as contrary to the truth. The Syllabus appended to this Encyclical, after enumerating various religious and philosophical errors for the animadversion of the faithful, denounces also the doctrine that "the Church has not the power of availing herself of force;" the doctrine that "the direction of public schools in which the youth of Christian states are educated must appertain to the civil power;" the doctrine that "marriage may be a civil contract;" and the notion "that the Roman Pontiff can and ought to reconcile himself to and agree with progress, liberalism, and modern civilization." All these opinions were condemned as damnable, and the Pope set himself resolutely against freedom of conscience, of worship, of opinion, of the press—in a word, against whatever characterizes the onward movement of modern society.

It was the foresight of the consequences of such infatuation to the Roman Catholic Church, especially in view of the progress of liberalism in France, that led Father Hyacinthe to lift up the voice of warning; and it was for this that he was required to submit his own conscience to the gag of the hierarchy at Rome. Other voices, especially in Germany, have been raised against this tendency to papal absolutism. Frohschammer, of Munich, one of the ablest scholars of the Latin Church, has published a powerful essay on the right of private judgment (Das Recht der eigenen Ueberzeugung), in which he protests against the recent attempt to restore the power of the Church to absolute dominion—a measure sought to be accomplished by the apotheosis of the Pope, by the concentration of absolutism at Rome, by Romanizing the clergy, by the churchly manipulation of the higher classes, and by the acquisition of worldly in place of spiritual goods. He demonstrates the incompatibility of the absolutism of the Catholic hierarchy with the sovereignty and autonomy of states, and concludes with the warning that the triumph of the Jesuitical hierarchy would be a calamity for the people of Europe. Similar views are expressed in that remarkable book, "The Pope and the Council," the joint production of several Catholic scholars, under the pseudonym of Janus. This book declares that "the effort at Rome is to bring the whole Catholic world to the clerico-Italian manner of thinking and feeling;" that "this reactionary movement is preparing, like an advancing flood-tide, to take possession of the whole organic life of the Church by means of this Council;" that "the Jesuits have been active for some time past in founding confraternities which bind themselves to hold and propagate papal infallibility as an article of faith;" and that "they and their Roman allies hope that the majority of the bishops present, who have been already primed for the occasion, will accede by acclamation to this suggestion, and the Holy Father will gladly yield to the pressure coming on him spontaneously and, as it were, through a sudden and irresistible inspiration from on high, and so the new dogma will be settled at one sitting, without further examination, as by the stroke of a magician's wand."

If this were really contemplated, the opportunity for such a surprise has been lost by the recess of the Council; and if the unanswerable arguments of Janus against papal infallibility, drawn from history and the reason of the case, have any influence, the whole scheme may be abandoned. It may well be doubted, however, whether the Pope would have risked the calling of the Council had he not felt sure of the endorsement of a dogma which is the logical crown of the hierarchical system of government; and so enormous is the pressure of that system that few in the Council will be able to stand before it. The rules prescribed for the introduction of matters before the Council, and the Ultramontane preponderance in its committees, will render impossible any freedom of debate. It is worthy of note that, if we are to trust the Catholic World, the American prelates are committed to the papal cause, the January number of that periodical assuring us that "the Ultramontane doctrine has been universally held and taught in the Catholic Church in the United States," and that "the clergy and laity of the United States will welcome with the greatest joy" a decision elevating the Pope's infallibility out of the rank of "a pious opinion" into that of a dogma. We think we may add that American Protestants would receive such a decision with rejoicing also. If the Council shall declare the Pope infallible and shall endorse the Syllabus, there will no longer be a Roman Catholic Church, in the sense of a communion, but a hierarchy centralized in Rome, and arrayed against the free spirit of Christianity, against the spirit of scientific enquiry, and against all the forces and tendencies of modern society. In that event, the Council will have enabled Christendom to understand the position and aims of Rome, and to define its own position towards a power so audacious in its pretensions and so portentous of evil. But though the Council should put on the appearance of unity in a result which can be reached only through a strong moral coercion, the fact of internal dissensions bordering upon schism has already been exposed; the eloquent appeal of Father Hyacinthe for "a Council really representing the Church universal, not the silence of some and the constraint of others," has rung in the ear of two continents his protest "against those doctrines and practices which call themselves Roman, but are not Christian," and "against the divorce, not less impious than mad, between the Church and the society of the nineteenth century;" and the hierarchy that shall dare this outrage stands already arraigned by Janus at the bar of history for the long series of abuses and crimes by which this culmination has been reached, and at the bar of conscience upon the indictment that "a great and searching reformation of the Church is necessary and inevitable, however long it may be evaded."

WHY JUDGE HOAR WAS NOT CONFIRMED.

It is a curious fact that what the various hostile senators were pleased to allege as their reasons for voting against Judge Hoar's appointment all turn out, when impartially examined, to be most cogent arguments in favor of it. In the first place, there were the "claims of locality," undoubtedly the most plausible objection brought forward. What an outrage, it was said, to assign to a Southern circuit a Massachusetts man! How contrary to precedent! how dangerous an example! All the Southern senators are said to have opposed the nomination on these grounds, and they are grounds which would primâ facie be entitled to the first consideration. But facts which must have been well known to every Southern senator made the objection frivolous. The real reason why the customary course of nominating a native of the circuit was not followed was unquestionably this: that there were few, if any, natives fit for the place. What with the war and reconstruction and the disqualifying acts of Congress, it may be safely said that Grant would have been puzzled to find a suitable Southern lawyer who could have taken the oath of office. He had, therefore, no choice. A Northern man must be nominated. The Southern senators, then, who opposed the President's selection must be held either to have desired the appointment of an unfit man, or else they must have had some further reason which they did not choose to avow. The former alternative is of course the most probable. The truth must be told, however, that, beneficial as reconstruction has been in other respects, the class of Southern politicians whom it has brought to the surface, and into whose hands it has given the reins of government, are as poor a race of men as ever manipulated caucuses or called conventions. They form, in fact, one of the most gigantic "rings" at present existent in the country, organized in the most careful manner throughout the South, solely for the purpose of perpetuating their own rule. This ring it is which in the main elects every Southern senator, and it is, of course, in the interest of the ring that the Southern senators vote. What they wanted at this time was, not a wise judge, nor a learned judge, nor an upright judge, but a judge of their own kind; and we have no hesitation in saying that they would have cheerfully supported the nomination of a native of Alaska, if they could have had assurances that he would have decided cases in the "carpet-bag" interest. The "shriek of locality" coming from these men is indeed one of the most amusing that was ever shrieked in the political world, because they owe their own seats to a party which has attained power by disregarding every claim of the sort. So much for locality. We think it is evident, from what we have already said, that the first objection against Judge Hoar was not weak, but was really an argument in his favor.

The other objections were, first, that he was an "enemy of Cuba"—an objection which, being interpreted, means that he has declined to advise the President to acknowledge the existence of a fact which he knew did not exist; that, as Attorney-General, he has lent all the weight of his character and intellect against infractions of law; in the second place, that his Texas opinion was not such a document as would have been written by the Hon. Fernando Wood; in the third place, that his views of politico-legal questions do not entirely coincide with those of Mr. Wade or Mr. B. F. Butler—in other words, that to the Radicals he seems a Conservative, and to Conservatives a Radical. To sum up all these various objections in one—he was objected to as having a judicial mind. This was his fault; he was not a rabid partisan. If he had been, he would have been confirmed. So far, we have considered solely the avowed reasons for the rejection of the nomination. There was probably another one, not avowed, and which is hardly capable of being put into words, but which "the average American" would probably describe by saying that there was "too much Boston" about him. "Boston," to the ordinary citizen in other parts of the country, does not mean the collection of houses, streets, and persons designated in geographies by that term, but an impalpable, subtle essence pervading men's manners, and their way of looking at men and things, and conveying the impression to the beholder that, in the opinion of Bostonians, other Americans are also God's creatures, and have been endowed by him with many fine qualities, and will probably, with time and care, come out all right in the end. But then this was not an objection which it was possible to produce in the Senate. The Westerner and Southerner reserve it for the cloak-room and the bar-room and the railroad car.

To look at the question from another point of view, it may be said, and has been said, that the real reason was the unpopularity of the nominee. This, it must be admitted, is a subject of no small delicacy, and we approach it with great caution, because we are well aware that with a certain class of people the reputation of being unpopular is the one sin never to be forgiven. Highway robbery, arson, murder—all these may be repented of, and being after all, it is said, at the most merely the results of a subjective tendency—of an affection of the mind—may be forgiven when repentance is followed by sincere exertions in the right direction; but with the unpopular man the case is different. This is no subjective difficulty which a subjective effort may remove. The stigma upon his fame is objective, visited upon him from outside; indelible, perennial, damning. The people have set their brand upon his brow, and it is a brand which the people rarely, if ever, remove.

With the class we have in view (and we mean chiefly the political class), to be unpopular is to have been formally excommunicated and outlawed for the nameless sin. To illustrate what we mean, let us select an instance from the recent history of this city. The fate of Marshal Barlow probably serves in many a politician's mind as an awful warning to himself and his descendants against the sin of unpopularity. "My son," we seem to hear such a one say, "if by any evil chance you should ever be tempted to wander from the straight path marked out for you by the voice of the people, as recorded in the great daily journals of this broad land, recollect that there was once a marshal of the city of New York who attempted the same thing. Forgetting the favors he had received at their hands, he turned upon them, and, like a thief in the night, he made himself unpopular. But mark his fate. His paltry excuses were unheeded, and in less than six months the people passed him by, and his own conscience—such is the effect of remorse—drove him into a retirement from the office which his unpopularity had disgraced."

Will the politician of the future render the same verdict in the case of the Attorney-General that the politician of to-day renders in the case of his subordinate? To say he is unpopular is the first step; to oust him from office is the next. The main question, at present, is, whether he is actually unpopular. To say he is so throughout the country at large is, of course, absurd, because he is hardly known at all throughout the country at large. To say that he is so among the office-seeking and office-dividing rings of Washington is no doubt true; but what is the precise meaning of this unpopularity? It means precisely this: that he has refused to degrade the Government by rendering dishonest opinions; that he has refused to degrade the public service by placing incompetent men in office; that he has avoided both extremes of partisan zeal, and not allowed the whisperings of malice to divert him from the path which his convictions pointed out; that he has performed the duties of his office with a keen intelligence and steady integrity that ought to make him a model for all his successors. And this it is which has made him unpopular with the time-servers who seek to make political capital out of what they choose to call the badness of Grant's nominations. For six months we have heard their virtuous outcries, and were at first inclined to trust their professions. But now we have had an opportunity of testing the real value of their homilies, and gauging the precise amount of their interest in the public service. In Hoar's case they had an excellent nomination to act upon, and no public clamor to terrify them, yet they have had the hardihood to reject the nomination, and the only ground the rejection can find to stand upon is the unpopularity of high character in a public man. Now let them confirm Sickles, and nothing will be wanting to complete the farce of the "reform movement" in the Senate.

"PENNSYLVANIA DUTCH."

It is an acknowledged fact that children of German immigrants cease to speak German properly if left to themselves, or to the mere practice afforded in the intercourse with their parents, and that the second generation, under the same conditions, almost wholly loses, if not the knowledge, at least the faculty of speaking the native tongue of their grandparents. The language hardly forms even a connecting link between the different decades of immigration. In 1819 the Germans of Philadelphia, then the most German city of this country, were no longer able to keep the records of their "society" in German, immigration having all but ceased in consequence of the great continental wars. In New York, where immigration was smaller still, the Germans were in 1794 already unable to write German. A child born here naturally receives impressions from its surroundings only. The air it breathes, the language it hears, the commonwealth in which it grows up—in short, all its relations to the outward world, are American. What a child hears about Germany from its parents, and what it afterwards learns from books about it, are acquirements, ideas, and conceptions, but no living views, no immanent reality. Thus, America, to those born here, is the native country, the home; Germany, naturally well-nigh as foreign as any other European country.

The exceptions to the rule that the grandchildren of immigrated Germans never speak German are to be found only in families of a higher culture or in some out-of-the-way rural districts. The process of forgetting the mother-tongue and acquiring the new is constantly going on, and will continue as long as immigration lasts. It is the same with the descendants of all other aliens who come here, but it is most conspicuous in the case of the Germans on account of their larger numbers. If immigration from Germany were to cease—which it is far from doing at present—we should see but few German papers published in this country, while the Germans in political or in social life would as little form a separate class as they now do in business.

The majority of German-born citizens, however, have a vague notion that they can stop this inevitable tendency by having their children taught the German language, and hence their anxiety to get instruction in German introduced into the public schools. But, just as one may learn a foreign language without denationalizing himself, so he may adhere to the language of his forefathers and yet denationalize himself. The Pennsylvania-German native-born farmers were, at the time of the native American movement, the most pronounced Know-Nothings, and many of them are still so, as every "German" settling among them soon finds out; and yet they not only speak a German dialect, mixed with words Germanized from the English, but this, their ordinary language, is also spoken by their fellow-citizens and neighbors of Celtic, Anglo-Saxon, and African descent. Indeed, the writer of these lines has seldom been more surprised and at the same time moved to hearty laughter than at being addressed by a venerable negro in a Pennsylvanian village in the most approved Pennsylvania-German dialect, and with all the nuances with which that dialect is spoken by immigrants from the Palatinate or their descendants in Pennsylvania, this very day, to the sixth generation. The idea of an African acquiring, not the German language, but a dialect of it, and that thoroughly—connecting, by the association of ideas, African barbarism with the particularism of a small German territory—seemed at first highly ludicrous. It was contrary to all experience in regard to the capacity of that race to acquire foreign idioms, while it proved, besides, the tenacity with which the dialect has taken root in that section, and thus outlived the language itself—the "Hochdeutsch" or High German originally spoken by German immigrants and lost by the second generation.

The importance of dialects has at times been undervalued by scholars; but it is now perceived that they are the roots out of which a language grows, and from which it constantly draws new nourishment. From them only arises the language of letters, or, as Max Müller expresses it, the "Hochsprache." Jacob Grimm, in his history of language, compares them to a comfortable morning-gown, in which you feel at ease, but in which you do not venture to go out. In them the greatest wealth of a language lies hidden, and it may be conceded that for the German they have been of more importance than for other languages, on account of the greater number of tribes composing the nationality. Grammars of Low-German as well as of High-German dialects have of late been published in Germany, and the success which works written in dialects have met with there shows a strong scientific and popular movement in their favor. Nor can we wonder that it be so. Fritz Reuter, the Low-German poet, owes his success not less to the poetical merit and unsurpassed humor of his works than to the happy idea of writing them in a dialect. At first it might seem as if readers not yet acquainted with it might be repulsed rather than attracted, most of them being obliged to take pains to read it; but Germans are apt to overlook that difficulty for the enjoyment they find in being reminded of "home." As to the vitality of dialects, it may be mentioned that in the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, wrested from Germany by France centuries ago, the Alsatian-German dialect is still the language of the peasants, and that only recently have the inhabitants of the latter province petitioned the Emperor to have the German language introduced into the public schools.

The Pennsylvania German is a South German dialect, composed of dialects of Franconia, the Rhenish Palatinate, and Swabian and Allemanian districts, more or less interspersed with Germanized English words, according to the settlements in certain counties, while in some places there are no foreign additions at all observable. It took root with the first settlers in the State of Pennsylvania. Germans joined the expedition of Sir William Penn in 1682, and settled in the colony, together with the Quakers from England. At about that time Zinzendorf, the German count, who founded the religious sect of the Mennonites, removed hither from Moravia with a large number of his coreligionists, who settled in and west of the Lehigh Valley. The religious denomination of the "Dunkers," which originated in Southern Germany in the year 1708, also emigrated and settled here. The name "Dunkers," from the German dialectic word dunken (High German tauchen, Engl. to dip) was originally given them as a nickname to distinguish them from the Mennonites. They are also called German-Baptists, while they call themselves Brethren. The early presence of these religious sects, who gave biblical names to their settlements, such as Lebanon, Bethlehem, Emmaus, Nazareth, Jordan, is clearly manifested, while more recent settlements mostly bear the names of their founders. Emigrants from Würtemberg and the Palatinate settled under Conrad Weiser, "the Indian interpreter," west of Reading, as far as to the Susquehanna River, and near the Blue Mountains, at that time called the "Far West." Thus it will be seen that in Berks, Lebanon, Lehigh, and Northampton counties the Germans formed a majority of settlers, while in others of Eastern Pennsylvania they were at least equal in number to the English settlers. While divine service among the Pennsylvania Germans is held in High German, and the Bible as well as the hymn-book read in the same idiom by the people, the dialect is used in everyday life. Many Pennsylvania Germans of higher culture not only understand but also speak High German, but nevertheless they use the dialect in their intercourse with others, and among themselves, just as is the custom in Northern and Southern Germany.

The Pennsylvania German is about a medium between the soft Allemanian or Swabian and the hard, glib Low German. It has greater fluency than the High German because of its tendency to shorten words, thus: heiern (heire), H. G. heirathen, E. to marry; Bu (pl. Buwa), H. G. Bube, boy; hen, H. G. haben, to have; gange, H. G. gegangen, gone. Further, all words ending in High German in en lose the final n, as, ruhe for ruhen, to rest; with perhaps other alterations, as gesehne for gesehen, seen. In the inflection of the German verbs wollen (will) and sollen (shall), the ending lst is changed whenever it occurs, in Pennsylvania German, into tt, thus: "Was witt?" for "Was willst du?" sott, for sollst; and frequently also lt is changed into tt. Diphthongs are converted by doubling the first vowel, as Beene, H. G. Beine, legs; Aage, H. G. Auge, eye. Long a in German words becomes o in the Pennsylvanian dialect—e.g., Johr from Jahr, year; Hoor, from Haar, hair; while short o becomes u, as in kumme from komme, come; genumme from genommen, taken; schun from schon, already; and i becomes e—e.g., Hert from Hirt, shepherd; Werth from Wirth, landlord. This applies chiefly to monosyllables.

The past tense of verbs is used to the almost entire exclusion of the preterite. "Veni, vidi, vici," for instance, would be translated by a Pennsylvania German: "Ich bin gekumme, ich hab' gesehne, ich hab' gesiegt (H. G. Ich kam, sah, und siegte). There is an aversion to the genitive, instead of which the dative is used. Thus: "Dem Mann sei' Buch," the man's book. Constructions are seldom borrowed from the English. A rare instance is the phrase, "Er geht auf sei' Freund' zurück," he goes back on his friends.

Intermixtures from the English are of course numerous. Nouns are mostly appropriated and used without changing their pronunciation, thus: Store, Bill, Poorhouse, Barrel, "Dady," and Kepers (capers). In the case of verbs the root only is taken from the English, while the termination and pronunciation are Germanized. For example: travele (three syllables), organize, sparke, fixe, fighte, smoke, settle, obsarve, desarve, skippe, etc. This sort of assimilation is constantly taking place, largely assisted by the younger generation; and it depends on the amount of fresh immigration whether the dialect in a given county shall be more or less Anglicized. Of single words we may instance: nied, H. G. nett, neat; law-frei, H. G. vogelfrei, law-free. The latter word is used between would-be combatants, when one asks the other, "Consider'scht de dich law-frei?"—meaning if his adversary, in accepting the fight, will forego the benefit of the law in case he gets worsted. Nau, H. G. jetzt, now; gelischt, H. G. angeworben, enlisted; sinter, H. G. seither, since; sehm, H. G. derselbe, same.

But we shall do best to offer a sample of this curious dialect as printed, and, therefore, append an apothecary's placard, from the Father Abraham print in Reading. This, as may be guessed, is the name of a paper, founded in the interest of the late President Lincoln, and which really gave its candidate, at both elections, very effective support where it was much needed. It now regularly publishes a column in the dialect under consideration. The poster can be readily interpreted by one familiar with German, save, perhaps, in a few places. The head-line means "Just look here once!" (amohl = einmal), reminding us of what we used to hear in '63, in the Cotton Factory Hospital at Harrisburg: "Doctor, won't you look at me once?" from patients who had been attended to forty times at least. Prowiers stands for H. G. probiere es, try it. And finally, we may note the the mongrel g'used:

This dialect used to be heard a good deal in Philadelphia, among the market-people from Berks, Lancaster, and Lehigh; but it has been crowded out by the public schools, and has met the disfavor of those who consider it a debased and degenerate speech. An effort is now making to resuscitate it, and there are two parties disputing as to the proper spelling of it. Many Pennsylvania Germans speak English and High German correctly, but prefer speaking the dialect. Its literature, however, is very limited as yet, consisting of a few works of fiction, and of lyric poems and sketches, which have occasionally appeared in the German press of the State. A collection of these has lately been published by L. A. Wollenweber. The fact that the High German is gaining ground through recent immigration will tend to clear the dialect of the English adulterations, and the former will at the same time itself profit by the adoption of numerous old and vigorous words which the dialect has stored away. The Pennsylvania German Press Association, which meets this week in Philadelphia, purposes to aid in this purification by urging that instruction in High-German be made part of the teaching of the public schools throughout the State, whereas it is now taught only in certain counties. In the cities, however, the English is fast superseding the dialect as the language of business.

FRANCE.—THE NEW MINISTRY—THE THEATRE.

PARIS, December 10.

THERE is no doubt of the effect produced by M. de Forcade's extraordinary speech. What will come of it in the end is quite another question; but, for the moment, it is the event of the day, and the curiosity to know its real meaning is intense. The larger number of persons take it to mean the maintenance of the present ministry as it is now constituted; some, who pass for both wise and well informed, say: "No! it is not the sign of the maintenance of the actual ministry, but merely of the possible working together of M. de Forcade and Émile Ollivier." As the source whence I derive what I am now telling you is a reliable one, I will repeat what is the conviction of persons who ought to know:

When first Ollivier was summoned by the Emperor at the opening of the session, he declared that it was impossible for him to act with M. de Forcade, and that he would accept the formation of a Cabinet, but not the co-operation of M. de Forcade in a Cabinet which he, Ollivier, had not formed. There was but one opinion amongst all impartial people, and that was, that Ollivier was thoroughly right, and that the one impossible element in a so-called Liberal Ministry was M. de Forcade. The elections had been made by him; all corruption and all despotism which had been exercised during the electoral period were traceable directly to M. de Forcade. He was the head and chief of the system, to reform if not to overthrow which M. Ollivier was about to be called in.

It was plain, with M. de Forcade Émile Ollivier could not act. It remained, therefore, a discussion whether the genuinely Liberal Cabinet was to be established or not—for, if it was to be so, Émile Ollivier was to be its head, and no other; and above all, no sign was to subsist of M. de Forcade or his principles. So matters lasted for some days, and the various evolutions of the different parliamentary factions of the Chamber succeeded each other, and the Right joined with the Centre, and the Left Centre gave signs of conciliation, and a very Liberal majority was on the eve of formation, when all at once M. de Forcade took his place at the tribune, and the entire aspect of affairs was altered. "What!" cries the Absolutist Minister of the late elections, "you ask for liberty? but we mean to give you more liberty than you have ever dreamt of! We are Ultra-Liberals! You were told the other day that 'order' could be answered for—well, order is safe; and now we mean to grant every liberty that France desires! We are all completely converted—all resolved that the country shall have no freedom left to ask for; and, as you have wished to see me at the tribune, here I am, and these are my declarations!" To be sure this is an epoch of "surprises," and the astonishment created by the Bishop of Orleans's sudden reversion to Gallicanism was not stronger than that effected by M. de Forcade's speech. Both were, to use a vulgar expression, "stunners."

Well, now for the explanation: the best informed pretend that this move of the Minister of the Interior is not an attempt to maintain the existing Cabinet in power (which every one thinks is impossible), but that it is simply the act whereby he, M. de Forcade, renders himself personally possible as Émile Ollivier's colleague. There is no doubt that Émile Ollivier is placed by M. de Forcade's new attitude in a very perplexing position; for a plain, downright opposition to the Minister is no longer so easy as it was; and if Ollivier consents to work with him he does not gain his great point—namely, the achievement of ministerial responsibility for France. M. Rouher, who was got rid of in the Chamber of Deputies, and embalmed in the Senate, has more than come to life again. M. de Forcade has more oratorical talent, as he has just proved, than M. Rouher, besides a boldness that M. Rouher wholly wanted. He possesses to the highest degree the oratorical attributes; his voice is extremely fine, and he knows how to use it; his gestures are few and imposing; he is as unscrupulous as M. Rouher, but far more political. His speech of the other day was more than an oratorical display; it was an oratorical act, and a successful one. All this combines to make of the present Minister of the Interior a very dangerous man; for no one believes that his Liberalism is sincere, yet he has made it difficult now to unseat him.

Another surprise, but of a different kind, has been produced by Rochefort. Casting the skin of the popular declaimer of Belleville and the socialist clubs, and of the satirist of the Figaro, Rochefort, irreproachably dressed, well-combed (and driven to the House in an austerely elegant coupé), distinguishes himself by the quiet appearance of his manners and the good sense of what he says. As yet he is quite unobtrusive, and, by extreme firmness and quietness, gets a hearing for all he says. The ladies who daily frequent the Chamber have all decided that "il est très-bien." The Emperor may have indulged in a laugh at the mention of M. Rochefort's name on the occasion of the opening of the Legislature (the Emperor was at the Louvre that day and had it all his own way); but the Comte de Rochefort de Luçay took his revenge amply, two days ago there, where he as a deputy was "at home." When the assembly was perfectly quiet, and there was a lull in the general excitement, Rochefort alluded with a graceful kind of irony to what had passed, and said: "It is stated the chief of the state held me to be a fit subject for ridicule. Well, all I can say is that I never paraded myself anywhere with a tame eagle on my wrist!" The effect was irresistible. The tone was so calm and inoffensive, and the image evoked was so true and ludicrous, that "Monsieur le Comte de Rochefort" had "les rieurs de son côté" against his imperial adversary.

To turn from politics to the drama and to literature, there are two things which have produced a great sensation: one, the tremendous success of a new actress; the other, the failure of an old author. The piece at the Gymnase, "Frou-Frou," and Mlle. Desclée as the heroine, is the evening occupation of all Paris. Everybody who is anybody must have seen "Frou-Frou," or be ranked as nobody. It is, as I remarked in one of my late letters, another attack upon la cocodetterie, another attempt to vindicate honesty and morality, and to throw odium upon the fast clique which has brought so much disgrace socially upon France. In the play itself, and the manner in which it is written, there is but little talent, but the subject and, above all, the tendency are thoroughly congenial to the present temper of the public mind, and Mlle. Desclée is a dramatic genius—a "revelation," as they style it here! There is, consequently, more than enough to account for the vogue of "Frou-Frou," and the vogue is immense.

What is perhaps less explicable is the total failure of M. Augier's new piece. "Lions et Renards" is not very inferior to some of Émile Augier's creations which have had a great success; but it would seem not to square precisely with the humor of the public, and it is (as so many of Augier's productions are) entirely without elevation or ideal. It was extremely well acted by the élite of the Théâtre Français—by Brepaut, Delaunay, and Mlle. Favart; but of its complete failure there can be no doubt: and so much so that many of Augier's friends advise him to withdraw it from the stage.

The movement here in the way of literature and art is well worth studying just now. There is a fierce reaction against the so-called "école réaliste," and it is declared that the Théâtre Français has not done its duty in favoring as it has done all the dramas founded on adultery and crime and assize-court proceedings. The failure of Augier's play, however, puts the director of the Théâtre Français into a serious dilemma, for he had counted on "Lions et Renards" as a bridge over which to pass from the realistic drama to something more artistic. Augier's new piece is not precisely immoral, but it is uninteresting and commonplace, and has the one crowning fault that it does not suit the public. But, then, what will? The director of the first theatre in France had thought of reviving Victor Hugo's plays; but the Government absolutely refused its permission. This permission is now granted; but it is asked, will "Marion Delorme" and others of its kind achieve the success of "Hernani"? There is the question, and the director of the Théâtre Français is putting it anxiously to himself.

Another course is open to him, and he is strongly urged to resort to it. This is no other than to revive some of the genuine classical dramas of the old répertoire. The two suggested are "The Cid" and "Bérénice"—the former Corneille's, the latter Racine's. Delaunay and, above all, Mlle. Favart are exceedingly anxious to appear before the Parisian public in the characters of the classic stage, and it is asserted that the essay will be made. Of "The Cid" I think it would be unsafe to predict anything; but "Bérénice" might possibly have a very great success. It is the least known of Racine's plays abroad, and perhaps the most beautiful, certainly the most touching. It is essentially modern and sentimental, and in no novel of George Sand's is there a more close and affecting analysis of the human heart. It runs entirely on the separation of Titus from Queen Bérénice, whom in the end he sacrifices to Rome and to his public duty. It is a thorough home-drama, and I have no doubt that, played by Delaunay and Mlle. Favart, it would for a time captivate the public.

Notes.

LITERARY.

THE Graphic, a new illustrated paper, published in London, and intended to beat the Illustrated London News, will call out some new designers for the press, and will cause increased activity among those artists already known in journalism. Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co., whether moved by the solicitation of the projectors of the new paper or obeying the spirit of enterprise which latterly has carried them so far into various fields, have decided on taking advantage of the opportunity offered them by this accession to the forces of pictorial journalism, and the eclectic reading-matter of Every Saturday will henceforth be supplemented by eclectic engravings. The pictures in the Graphic—as bad a name, by the by, as any one need desire—will be engraved on duplicate blocks, and will be printed almost simultaneously in the English paper and the American. The latter has been transformed into a sixteen page imperial folio, and is printed on paper peculiarly adapted to the display of highly-finished engravings. Du Maurier, say the publishers, Frith, Faed, Marcus Stone, Sir Francis Grant, Le Jeune, Harrison Weir, and a score or two more, are among "the distinguished artists who will be represented"—by which somewhat ambiguous words it is perhaps meant that all the men named will work for the paper or, perhaps, some of them will only figure in it as being painters of pictures of which Every Saturday and the Graphic will give engravings. Whether our native artists are to expect any direct good from the new projects we do not know, but we see no mention made of any intention to employ them, and suppose that all the pictures as well as all the rest of the paper are to be borrowed from abroad. Indirect good they may probably get, for the familiarity of our public with well-executed engravings, after designs by the best English draughtsmen for the press, will, by and by, bear fruit in better work by American designers. Every Saturday will still give its accustomed quantity of selected reading. We may add that Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. intend making their Quarterly somewhat smaller. The North American Review for April next will contain two hundred pages, and thereafter that will be the regular number of pages. Rumors to the effect that the Social Science Association's proceedings will form a part of the contents of the Review are without foundation—figments of the brain, inventions of Boston correspondents of country papers.

—Nearly as much as Cambridge, Concord has celebrity among American towns as being the home of men of genius and literary culture. We do not ourselves feel any thrill when we think of the works of Mr. Channing, resident in Concord, whom Mr. Emerson is said to have called "the poets' poet;" nor should we grieve if we never tasted the books of Mr. Thoreau again, fresh a taste as they leave on the palate; nor is the perusal of Mr. Bronson Alcott's works, nor the listening to his discourses, among our desires; neither are we attracted by Margaret Fuller much more than by the half a dozen American women whom the countess would have talked deaf, dumb, and blind in the less æsthetic half of a short evening. That all these authors live or lived beautiful lives we concede, for it is often said by people who know; but we find ourselves willing and, indeed, not unanxious to live our own beautiful life at a convenient distance from most of them. As the bad Democrat would not go to Mr. Lincoln's house, fearing that if he did he should like him too much, and should afterwards be ashamed to abuse him and to "filibuster" in the House, so we find ourselves turning our back upon Concord, and professing to be bored when its name is mentioned. In this habit we are greatly strengthened and confirmed, we may add, by the noise about Concord things kept up by the second and third-rate luminaries of that place, and by some of the more intelligible among the many scatterbrained pilgrims to the shrine—by the excessive Concordism of those flowers which are not the rose but which have lived near it, and which smell of it as hard as they can. There are plenty such. Did it not much amuse Miss Bremer when she was in this country to find in the parts adjacent to Concord many delicate, æsthetic persons who took in daily some three or four pounds of transcendental ice, and thereupon behaved as if the eternal snows of the highest Concord peaks were theirs in fee? Still, "there is Concord," as Webster said; and the American lover of literature must say it in his capacity of lover of literature no less gratefully and respectfully than in his capacity of lover of his country. Hawthorne lived there, and Emerson lives there; thence proceeded and proceeds the best work yet done in American literature, and the most fruitful native influence that has yet reached the scholarly mind of the country. At all events, it is with Concord that Hawthorne is associated in the popular mind; and as for Emerson, it may be said that his home has always been there. Many persons, then, both here and abroad, will be pleased to hear of the new book of Concord Sketches which Messrs. Ticknor & Fields are about to publish—or, rather, of which they are selling at private sale a small edition. It is a large folio volume, containing twelve photographs from sketches made by Miss May Alcott. Each one represents some scene in the village and its environs which has found mention in the books of Hawthorne, Emerson, Alcott, and Thoreau. "The rude bridge that arched the flood"—

> "Where once the embattled farmers stood > And fired the shot heard round the world;"—

the Old Manse; the hut of Walden Pond, where the conceited and perverse Thoreau played hermit in so curious a fashion; Emerson's house; Hawthorne's wayside bench; and half a dozen more spots—some of them known to the admirers of the poet and the romancer, and none of them without interest—have given Miss Alcott her subjects. The sketches are not pretentious at all, but they answer their purpose very well indeed. That is, they do if they are as truthful as we suppose—a point we cannot settle. Thinking of the bad mess of it which an Idle Scholar has just made in her memorial volume of Bryant's honor, we do not know whether or not to say that the book would have been better if there had been more letter-press. There is a very little; enough to serve as the titles of the pictures.

—There are few tracts on the Atlantic seaboard, of equal size, which, physically or politically, surpass in historic interest the outlying fragment of New England known as Long Island. For thorough study, too, it offers peculiar advantages, and any one tolerably acquainted with it must have been glad to hear of the founding of the "Long Island Historical Society" in 1863, and to know of its brilliant development since that date. The striking facts of its growth are: that it now reckons 300 life members, 958 annual members, and 59 honorary and corresponding members; that its library contains more than 17,000 bound volumes, and about 20,000 unbound volumes and pamphlets, "especially rich in the departments of American History and Biography, French History, the History of Fine Art, of the Natural Sciences, and of the Science and Art of Medicine;" that its library fund is $70,000; and that it now has a building fund which promises soon to secure for the Society suitable and permanent accommodations, with increased usefulness. History and natural history are the principal fields of its activity, and the latter is illustrated by a museum rich in collections pertaining to the island, but also in portraits, busts, bronzes, medals, and curiosities from all parts of the world. These two departments are also the occasion of lectures for members and their families, to whom the reading-room is always open. And, finally, the Society has a publishing fund, well bestowed, which enables it to publish "Memoirs" as rapidly as they are disposed of—a condition which is to some extent, and was probably meant to be, a measure of the Society's vitality. The general public, however, are directly interested in the two volumes thus far issued—the "Journal of a Voyage to New York and a Tour in several of the American Colonies in 1679–80, by Jasper Dankers and Peter Sluyter" (1867), and "The Battle of Long Island," just issued. The former described the adventures of a couple of Dutch Labadists, precursors in this country of a religious colony afterwards established in Maryland, and which survived the parent society in Friesland. Their testimony of what they saw is remarkably minute and altogether trustworthy; and the maps and drawings which accompany the original manuscript and are here reproduced in fac-simile, portraying the size, condition, and surroundings of New York City at the time they visited it, have, we presume, a very high value. In Cambridge, Mass., their expectations of the college and printing-office there were greatly disappointed; in Boston they found the ministers' prayers too long, but they were well pleased with the Apostle Eliot, whom they called on in Roxbury. The present volume was prepared by Mr. Thomas W. Field, and is the work of a specialist. The battle which it traces by means of maps and contemporary documents was a national event, and on this account should find a wide circle of readers outside of the Society, while at the same time it will peculiarly attract attention in Brooklyn. Both memoirs confirm the good judgment of the publishing committee, of which the Rev. Dr. Storrs is chairman; and to say that he has been foremost in promoting the progress of the Society is to speak only a portion of the praise due him. The men whom he has gathered to his support are of a kind that give liberally during their lives, and in their wills do not forget the objects which have been dear to them.

—A list of the benefactors of the Brooklyn Mercantile Library would agree in large part with that of the Historical Society. That is to say, there is no lack of public spirit on the other side of the river. Of the two the Library answers best the popular need, of course; and since it has been removed to its present quarters, its capacity has been much enlarged, and its rate of increase correspondingly quickened. In the first Bulletin just issued by the librarian, the number of volumes is set at 24,000, and it is estimated that four years hence they will be doubled. The collection will still not be large, when compared with other city libraries; but it will more than meet the ordinary demand upon it—that of a circulating library. Meantime, any book not already on its shelves will be procured at the instance of any member, unless for some good reason to the contrary. In respect to current periodical literature, the reading-rooms are unusually well supplied. The Bulletin has a classified catalogue of the books added during the first ten months of the present year, the author's name being prefixed to each title, except under the head of novels. It should not be forgotten that after the closer connection with Brooklyn promised us by the bridge, this and the Historical Society's library will be in a sense annexed to New York; and by day it will probably be easier to consult either of them than the Mercantile or Astor Library up town. The Bulletins might, therefore, well be preserved for reference.

—The University Lectures on philosophy and literature at Harvard College have had better success than was at first expected, and are not only to be continued, but are to be enlarged. Next year there will be a greater number of lecturers and a larger variety of subjects; and each lecturer will deliver more lectures. It is understood that the future pupil, who may wish to hear some one particular lecturer or to pursue some particular branch of study, will not be required to pay the price of admission to all the lectures of the philosophical course or the literary, as the case may be, but will be permitted to choose what lectures he will hear and what decline to hear; and will be asked to pay only for what he chooses. Thus, a man or woman who is anxious to hear what some one man has to say about logic will not be obliged, in order to do so, to pay for the lectures on metaphysics of half a dozen men from whom he does not care to learn. And the courses will be so arranged that closely-connected subjects will be treated of at about the same time, and thus no long period of residence will be necessary for attending on the instruction of the three or four or five men whom the student of a given subject may wish to hear. The names of the new lecturers are not yet fully decided upon.

—A valuable work which has been till now appearing in parts is just concluded—Dr. A. S. Packard, jr.'s "Guide to the Study of Insects, and a treatise on those injurious and beneficial to crops: for the use of colleges, farm-schools, and agriculturists" (Salem). It is one of the fruits of the Peabody Academy of Science, and in every particular of text, illustrations, and manufacture, is thoroughly well done. We are glad to learn through the American Naturalist that the first edition has been exhausted, and that the "Guide" is already in use as a text-book. The practical side of it will in time ensure its purchase by most intelligent farmers and gardeners, for whom an entomological calendar is affixed that should prove a useful warning against insect pests.

THE LAST OF THE CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

"Erling the Bold"* breathes a spirit which perhaps meets with more favor in England and with English school-boys than here, where athletics, and personal daring for the sake of gratifying the Berserker spirit and not for the attainment of any definite object, are not held in the highest esteem. "To do" something—that is, to have a business and follow it closely—is so much the rule in this country that there is hardly one of the American men who are most nearly boys' heroes who has not performed his exploits as means to a tangible and mercantile end. If he has shot rapids and lived in snow-drifts, it has been as a peltry hunter; if he has fought grizzlies, it has been as a route-explorer or gold-digger; if he has stood sieges by Indians or taken the war-path himself, it has been in the interest of stock-raising or the clearing of his "quarter-section." Still, a boy is a boy, whether or not he is going to be a Yankee afterwards; and this story, taken from the Icelandic sagas—a record of fierce fighting and bold sailing, of the prowess of the vikings and their sea-kings, of the treacheries skilfully planned and skilfully thwarted and bloodily punished—is so full of energy, and courage, and excitement, that it will be a favorite on this side of the water as well as in the native home of the brutal young Muscular Christian. And perhaps our young Nervous Pagan, as some one has abusively called the æsthetical but rather thin young Unitarian and eclectic philosopher who is not uncommon in parts of the old thirteen colonies, may have more need than we think to read books like this of Mr. Ballantyne's; and its effect here may be more purely good than in its own country. We must not forget to say that "Erling the Bold" is not without historical value, and is all the more to be put into the hands of young readers because, interesting as is the history of the Norsemen, it has yet to be put into a readable form in English. There is, indeed, a little volume of Scandinavian history by Professor Sinding; but that it is generally readable is rather more than we would undertake to say.

For a thousand years, we suppose, we shall have books like Mr. Alger's "Rough and Ready,"† and, as they say in the South, for our own part "we have no use for them." From the South, by the way, has recently come something that may be taken as a good enough criticism of all the sort of literature to which "Rough and Ready" belongs. For years Mr. Parker Pillsbury was a praiser of the negro. Old farmers still walk among us who have many a time put their dinners into little tin pails, and, driving away from home in the morning of a Sunday, have hitched their horses to the fence around some remote district school-house, and listened by the hour together, forenoon and afternoon, while Mr. Pillsbury denounced slavery, banned the slaveholder, and held up the negro to admiration. He seemed to think that "Uncle Tom" was a fair average type of the Southern agricultural laborer; and as he had not himself had any very large personal knowledge of the negro's nature and habits, there is little doubt that he had formed his opinion from the writings and the talk of men and women who habitually overstated the excellences of the slave's character, and habitually understated or concealed his grave defects. But now, within the year, Mr. Pillsbury has paid a visit to some parts of the South, and, hearing his present talk about the negro, one is forced to think that he is experiencing the full force of the reaction caused by the sudden confronting of the ideal negro in his own mind with the actual negro of South Carolina. He is almost as inaccurate and unjust and unwisely despondent to-day as ten or fifteen years ago he was unwisely and unjustifiably hopeful and confident. We do not know if he is feeling any resentment against himself and others for having misled him; but it would be natural if he should; and, as everybody knows who knows of Adam's fall, and of the conflict with slavery, there is a good deal of human nature in Mr. Pillsbury. There is more or less of it in us too, and we confess to some dislike of master "Rough and Ready;" for, clearly, he is going to deceive many who believe in him. He is a most noble, generous, just newsboy—full as he can hold of good thoughts and good works. But will Mr. Alger figure to himself, now, some nice little boy, with a clean collar on, and his hair neatly brushed, and with fists not quite so hard as brass knuckles, and a face unmarked by war-paint, and a hat somewhere near the size of his head? And now, next, will he please figure this pride of his mamma undertaking a half-hour's stay in Printing House Square when the young gentlemen who sell extras are congregated there? Or the City Hall Park will do, and the array of boot-blacks will answer the purpose as well as their friends the newsboys; they are equal in attainments and character. And, having obliged us so far, will Mr. Alger maintain that either of them would not certainly, in a very brief time, cause a temporarily complete and painful change in our clean young wayfarer's views of life? So far as we have the pleasure of his acquaintance, the newsboy indulges but very few of the softer emotions. He smokes ends of cigars which he picks up in the street; he much prefers lemonade from the street stalls to the performance of good actions; he would far rather see virtue defended up in the Bowery Theatre than rescue little girls from cellars in which their stepmothers ill-use them; it has been doubted, indeed, if he has ever conceived of virtue without a basket-hilted sword and a white dress presenting themselves to his imagination at the same time. That he ever volunteered to wake up a drunken gentleman who had fallen asleep in a ferry-boat, no one will believe who is in the habit of crossing the North or East Rivers. In short, he is not pious, and does not order his life well; and there is a certainty that whoever bases his notions of the newsboy's character on a belief in the truthfulness of Mr. Alger's romance will get false notions of the character of the average newsboy, and most probably will not get true notions of the character of any newsboy, average or otherwise, who has ever with free foot trod the foot-stool. And, next, perhaps the real newsboy will reveal himself to this deceived reader of "Rough and Ready;" and from that day out we have in him an enemy of the Newsboy's Home, and a man who peremptorily declines to contribute anything towards giving the young gentlemen their Thanksgiving dinner. As it happens, Mr. Alger has no excuse that we hear of for doing as he has done. The newsboy is not a Christian of the first two centuries; but he has his good points, too; and at any rate he is an interesting figure as he stands. He is affable, a good comrade, shrewdly intelligent, very enterprising, laborious, frequently civil, good-natured in all weathers, not seldom witty, and, although intolerant if his preserves are poached upon, capable of charity and generosity. Under temptation, and in the way of business, he will tell falsehoods. His idea of a joke is, that, logically developed and carried out fully, the person on whom the jest is broken would suffer pain of body, acute and prolonged, as well as anguish of mind. He is ready at giving the lie to his young companions, and very ready with his fists, though he shows almost unerring judgment in the selection of the person on whom to exercise them. Profanity—and this often vociferously—is a vice that he practises. But after all is said, there is no need of depicting him in any imaginary aspect to make him both respectable and interesting. The newsboys who read "Rough and Ready," however they may approve it as a work of fiction, will say "my eye" when asked to lay it to heart and make it a practical guide. So, them the author has not benefited. And the layman will, as we have said, form false notions of the being which it is intended to depict; and that is never well.

"Joe and the Howards"* is a sensible, pleasant book that it will do most boys and girls good to read. "I think," says its author in the preface—for they have prefaces in children's books too—"I am right in supposing that a child's book should be at once instructive, entertaining, and true to nature." So she goes on to make a book by using what she herself has learned in some of her open-air study of natural history, choosing for presentation facts that the children may themselves observe any day that they like to look for them. But, facts being dry things, our author puts them into a story; and this she does so well—not making the story servile to the facts, as do most writers who make her attempt, and not giving us impossible personages, but personages really well drawn—that she fairly earns the praise she hoped for, of being both entertaining and true to nature. "Joe and the Howards" is primarily instructive, to be sure, but it is not so very obtrusively so, and its author is a writer whom the buyers of "juveniles" may very properly encourage.

"Stories from My Attic"† is a volume of graceful and gracefully written sketches and short stories—more or less fanciful, most of them—by the author of "Dream Children." There is just the least suggestion of undue delicacy and nicety in much of this author's writing, and he is perhaps more in sympathy with the pensive shade of his own youth than with the actual living youth incarnate in the boys and girls around him. It is as if a man of more refinement of feeling than strength of feeling, and more tendency to reverie than to thinking, had set himself to writing for the young in the manner in which, some twenty years ago, Mr. Ik Marvel was writing for the callow. But this fault—for we call it so—is not nearly so manifest in "Stories from My Attic" as it seemed to us to be in "Dream Children." This year's book is as well finished in style as last year's, and that is saying a good deal, for the author of "Dream Children" is a writer who very sedulously elaborates his work. And in matter it is to our mind superior to its predecessor; for while it shows its author's grace of fancy and his gentle sympathies quite as well as that book does, it is, as we have said, decidedly less mild, and gentle, and pretty, and is more robust. Then, too, it is less subjective and more objective, although still the writer is often a little over the heads of the probable reader. What, for instance, will a small youth or maid do with the very pretty little piece called the "Rocket"? It would be worthy of Andersen if its significance had been a little more effectually clothed with the flesh and blood of probable, apprehensible incident. As it is, we have the moral for the man, but we hardly have the story for the child. Andersen gives the boy and girl his homely stories, and when the boy and girl are man and woman they discern that these things were a mystery, simple as they were; that the nut they used to play with has meat within; that the ugly duck is not always of the feathered kind. But it is hard thinking and not pleasing reverie which takes pretty suggestions and so works with them as to make of them parables and proverbs adapted to all men's use and all children's pleasure.

Krilof, the Russian fabulist, who flourished some hundred years ago, was one of the natural-born makers of parables, and the collection of his fables, in the manner of Æsop's, which Mr. W. R. S. Ralston has translated, is all good reading.* Several of the fables will be found to be new and the translation is tolerably easy English, though in this respect it might, without very much trouble, be bettered. In a prefatory note, in Russian, Mr. Ralston requests the Russians who may read the book not to hold him responsible for the pictures; but though they may, perhaps, be not very faithful to Russian life, they are certainly not bad as illustrating the fables. Apart from its general interest—or, we may say, its universal interest, for, usually, it deals with primary social facts, and often with facts of human nature wherever found—Krilof's book has some slight value for the light it throws on the ways of the Russian peasant and office-holder.

Mr. T. B. Aldrich's "Story of a Bad Boy"† they have rather stupidly re-christened in England, and there it is the story of "a not very bad boy." He was indeed about as bad—our young hero who went to school at Rivermouth—as the boys usually are who get the name he got, and his English godfathers were not far out of the way. He is certainly an amusing and interesting person, and the narrative of his various adventures is such as boys will recognize as possible and probable, while the older reader will find in it a humorous and clever record of the impressions made upon them by boyish performances—whether their own as they recollect them, or those of boys who are living under their observant eyes. This is perhaps hinting pretty strongly that Mr. Aldrich's book produces a slightly confused impression, and that we have boy and man mingled in its pages in a way not possible out of literature, and in perfect literature not possible either. But perfect books are a little scarce, and so are pleasant books; and among the not many pleasant books for boys which this year has given us, the "Story of a Bad Boy" takes a high place. It is healthy reading, and may be safely commended to all buyers of holiday wares.

"Glimpses of Pleasant Homes"‡ any Roman Catholic boy or girl who is old enough to be somewhat thoughtful, will find enjoyable and profitable. It is well written, it is not controversial, and we have found it agreeable reading, because of its unaffected and unobtrusive piety and morality. The volume is exceedingly well printed, and as pretty in every way as needs be.

What to say about "The Mystic Bell"§ we do not very well know It is an incoherent fairy story; and the cold, ungenial Reviewer, in presence of such productions, usually endeavors to shirk the performance of his duty—confesses that he is a creature of the mere understanding; that airy beauty knocks him speechless; that the higher reason and the imagination are wanting in him; that he has formed a habit of measuring the most impalpable soul-essences by rule of thumb; that, in short, he does not know what on earth to say. He may have his doubts, however; as we have in this instance. We doubt if we should buy the "Mystic Bell" for our own offspring. Because, whatever good there may be hidden in it, there certainly is patent and staring a most violent tale of the wicked love which an Asiatic magician bore to a ravishing girl whom he destined to add to the one hundred and fifty maids whom, after pretending to marry them, he had by-and-by shut up in subterranean dungeons. And we find nothing among the wild improbabilities of the story—to call it so—which seems likely to dilute this potion to the degree suitable to untried stomachs. The illustrations by Mr. E. L. Kuntze are a trifle better than the text.

Everybody knows how the author of "Mary Powell" writes, and the book which she offers her friends for this holiday season is "a story of the Bible in Spain," under the title of "The Spanish Barber."* Just how true it all is we cannot say, and perhaps that same thing it might puzzle our author herself to tell; but it reads very well, and we may safely declare that there is nothing in it to offend the most confirmed Protestant. We are glad to mention it if only to praise George Borrow's very singular and excellent "Bible in Spain," which is so remarkably good, that how anybody but a professed book-maker could follow in his track we do not see. It is a pity that there is no complete edition of the works of an author who, besides being sui generis, is so instructive, so fresh and surprising, and so admirable a writer as Borrow almost always is. The novelists are very few who are so readable, the travellers are very few who have so much that is new to tell us, the historians are few who have given us more vivid pictures of the people whose story they have attempted to tell, and, as we have said, he adds to these merits, as a worker in literature, a singular charm of personality—or rather a spell compounded of curiosity as to such a mystery of a man, and of willing admiration for a person of such resource, intelligence, courage, and earnestness. He is a man too little known. It is, perhaps, in his "Bible in Spain" that he is best seen; but all that he has done is worth some attention.

One more book that we can cheerfully commend to the favorable attention of young readers is Mrs. H. C. Weeks's "White and Red"†—a record of a stay at Red Lake, in Minnesota, among the Indians. It is done realistically, is apparently truthful, and is instructive, we take it, as well as much to be desired for its sledding, and shooting, and fishing, and wandering in the big pine forest of the North-west.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JANUARY.

The Atlantic is true to our recently established American custom—a custom that seems not to be everywhere rooting itself vigorously—and gives us as contributors to this January number many very well known and some distinguished names. How entirely this is a stroke of publishers' business, and how little it can be said to be done in the interest of readers, and what it is that it tells us of the average magazine reader or of the publisher's estimate of him, any one may see who will take the trouble of looking back at the last few New Year's numbers of most of our magazines. The articles of distinguished merit he will find by no means so numerous as the distinguished contributors. And if he does not find some articles that have no merit whatever as reading matter, and whose whole value is value to the publisher, and whose value to the publisher lies in the names appended to them, he will be much luckier than we have thought ourselves—in our capacity of devourers of magazines—during these last three or four Januaries. It would be as well for the reader if the distinguished name merely were sold as in the old times in England, and nowadays, once in a while, in France, and if the real work were left to be done by some journeyman needing to turn a penny. And we were going to say it would be as well for the author; but the case is not altogether so bad as that, though nothing is surer than that the habit into which many men of distinction, both here and in England, have fallen—the habit of yielding to the solicitations of publishers and selling their signatures with comparatively worthless things attached, has cheapened many reputations, and has done serious hurt to literature in two ways—by fooling inexperienced readers and inexperienced writers into thinking poor or bad work good work, and also by inducing in able writers, who should be examples to others and strict masters of themselves, a disregard of the sound, profitable, only safe rule to do always their best.

From a publisher's point of view the matter is, of course, different, and there is no doubt that, temporarily at least, he makes a pecuniary success by filling his table of contents with well-known names. The long run may be in this respect another affair. But the average reader of magazines cannot nerve his timorous poor soul into resisting—at least not into openly resisting—the index of contributors, whatever he may in his secret heart have been thinking of the relative merits of the anonymous system and the system of signatures; and however he may, when among his familiar friends and in his inner chamber, flout the name and fame of some of "our most cultivated and recherché essayists," nevertheless, when the publisher gives him a little jog by means of one of those printed sheets of extracts which all the publishers now send to all the papers, at once he prepares his first class notice, and the distinguished names are published in the paper he controls or to which he has access. The newspapers are hundreds, no doubt, which within the last fortnight have been telling their subscribers that "the Atlantic for January is a rare treat, an unsurpassed number of this splendid magazine"—not because of Mr. Lowell's poem, and the sketch of life among the Isles of Shoals, and Mr. Howells's charming essay about the Boston and Cambridge horse-cars and they that go down therein, and the seasonable, instructive, and forcible article entitled "What to do with the Surplus," but because "in its list of contributors we recognize the names of Colonel T. W. Higginson, one of our most scholarly and finished writers; of Bayard Taylor; of John G. Whittier, the Quaker poet; of William Cullen Bryant; of O. W. Holmes, who furnishes a charming sonnet, which our readers will find in another column; of W. D. Howells, a clever writer, whose style reminds us of that of the delightful author of 'Dream Children;' of Doctor Hayes, the successor of the heroic E. K. Kane; of J. R. Lowell, and of Professor Goldwin Smith, who knows more, we guess, about 'The Study of History' than he does about our institutions. This is a roll of names that it would be hard to beat, and which speaks volumes for the enterprise of the publishers. There is also the usual variety of other interesting matter."

Mr. Lowell's fine poem, "The Cathedral," is already out, somewhat altered, in the form of a book, and we shall hereafter give to a notice of it greater space than we can give to it here. It is longer in the book than in the magazine. Mr. Whittier's "Nauhaught" is in what we think the author's best style; and if it were not, it could not be read without pleasure. Nauhaught is a convert from heathenism, who has been made a deacon of the church. In a time of distress, his wife being ill, and his boy starving, for there is neither bread nor medicine in his house, he walks out to examine the traps he has set, and goes into the woods with a heavy heart, although not without some hope, for he has dreamed of an angel from God, who, as it seems, met him, and gave him a bright piece of gold. Suddenly, as he is thinking of his troubles, for his traps he finds empty, he comes upon a purse with ten gold pieces. One needs not to have been born a savage and to have doubts about the superiority of one's fellow-deacons, who grow rich by selling fire-water to the Indians, to feel, under the circumstances, a temptation to appropriate such windfalls. But the old man resists; and returning to the village he seeks the loser of the purse, and finds him, at the tavern, in the shape of a sea-captain, who puts into his hands one of the ten coins. There is a touch of Mr. Whittier's peculiar unescapable dominating morality in the finding of the angel under the familiar pea-jacket and glazed hat of the Wellfleet skipper; but not the less is the piece very likable. It breathes of old New England; it is touching in its sympathy and benignity, and, like most of Mr. Whittier's work in blank verse, it is free from all his obvious minor faults. Doctor Holmes's and Doctor Parsons's poems are both sonnets, and Doctor Parsons's will please everybody who likes Guido's "Aurora." Most of Doctor Parsons's poetry is of a kind to be called "occasional," though perhaps hardly to be so called if we give that word its strict sense as applied to verses, and it would be, we suppose, impossible to find among American poets any one who has done so many so good occasional pieces. He is not, however, as are nine in ten of the occasionalists, a poet whose inspiration is all in the occasion; and in poetry, as in other things, it is requisite if one would fill a place well that he should be too big for it, and better than able merely to fill it. Mr. Bryant's lines are a part of his translation of the Iliad, and will confirm the reader in the impression he doubtless had since extracts from the new version began to appear—that Homer's weary waiting for a translator is not done yet. He always nods now, and was nearer waking a couple of hundred years ago than since rendering him into English has become another solace of English and American age.

"What to do with the Surplus" is a paper which will no doubt do much good, for it is written in such a way that it will attract perusal, and that no one however unfamiliar with finance can fail to understand its author's meaning. "The Woman Thou gavest with me," by Mr. Henry James, will be to many persons agreeable reading. For one thing, it proves that both parties to the woman's rights dispute are all wrong, or nearly so. Mr. Epes Sargent, and Mr. Mill, and Dr. Bushnell, and Mr. Fulton, and Dr. Todd, and G. F. Train, and the women of the Revolution—none of them has the rights of the matter; and none of them will, nor any more will any of the rest of us, till he or she comes to look on man and woman as "two contrasted terms of a great creative allegory in which man stands for what we call the World, meaning thereby human nature in moral or voluntary revolt from God; and woman, for what we call the Church, meaning thereby human nature in spiritual or spontaneous accord with its divine source." Meantime, as in the days of Noah, the world, if it takes our advice, or even if it doesn't, will go on marrying and giving in marriage, and until the flood comes a certain number of the wedded, and a certain larger number of the unwedded, will have various notions as to what great moral allegory the estate of marriage illustrates.

Mr. Taylor's "Joseph and his Friend" we have not begun to read. "Was he Dead?" by an anonymous writer, is a story of a very unsatisfactory kind, but is not without some clever—too clever—conversation. "Among the Isles of Shoals," by Celia Thaxter, is very good indeed. It is realistic in its description of the strange inhabitants of the very strangest part of New England—the part where the original stock has grown wild and borne the queerest and gnarliest fruit on the eastern coast of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and the weather-beaten islands which lie adjacent.

Mr. Smith's "Study of History" is a lecture delivered at Cornell, and will not be found to contain much that is new by those who are acquainted with his published lectures. The opening remarks, however, on the uses of history as a study in educational courses, are profitable, whether new or old. We do not know, we may say, that the typical "man of science" would assent to Mr. Smith's remarks in the first half of the fifty-first page. As a man of science, pure and simple, he is apt to think that he has no business at all with the question of the existence of God. What would the "man of science" as such say to Mr. Smith's proposition that the basis of science is, that the intelligence of God is what shows itself in the uniformity of law throughout the creation? If we know him, he would not say yes; but would either say no, that it is not, or else would decline to discuss the question. Mr. Higginson's notion of "Americanism" in literature is "an attitude of hopefulness"—"an attitude not necessarily connected with culture, but with the consciousness of a new impulse given to all human progress," and much more of the same sort, which may be true or may be not. The question itself, we confess, is not much to our taste, and we vote for its being left to the foreign critics and other outsiders. Of one thing we may all feel assured—and meantime let us trust that the weary may soon cease from troubling, and the feeble may be at rest—that we may as well go on and get our literature without concerning ourselves beforehand about whether or not it is going to be American. Beyond a doubt it will be as American as the writers of it; and it will not be the more American for any man's sitting down and seeking inside and outside and feeling after Americanism, if haply he may find out what it is, and then getting up and putting some of the same into his writing. That would be the way to be a person who should make, more or less well, writings of a given kind—the way, for instance, for an Englishman of our day to write "great dramas" of our day. But it is not so that any true great dramas were written. They, like other things in literature that live, were the genuine thought of thinking souls; and always the soul is to be got first. Otherwise, flowers are to be had without the preliminary germinating seed. What is true of literature in general is true of any desired variety, however slightly different from other varieties. The different man must first be had, and then, if he is much worth hearing, there is but the slightest danger that when he expresses himself, it will not be himself that he expresses. We observe that Mr. Higginson seems to be not wholly free from the old delusion that, to be American, our writers must use strictly American properties. He warmly praises Emerson's "Humblebee" for "stooping to be familiar"—as was then disparagingly said—and for being first to break the spell under the influence of which our poets had gone on singing, to the neglect of the bobolink, the nightingale, and skylark, and otherwise imitating foreigners. But the American cataract of Niagara, and picturesque autumn foliage, and the noble savage, and boundless prairie have received poetical attentions that they have never got over since before Mr. Emerson began writing poetry. Long ago there were men who thought to assert their independence by doing everything when they got free in a manner precisely contrary to that which they had used when dependent; who, in liberty's name, reversed the law of liberty, and were slaves to "that freedom which is perfect servitude." However, this is not a matter that it is necessary to dwell upon.

Mr. Howells's essay is very delicately humorous—so delicately humorous, for example, that, in a certain place where the humor is satirical, one fancies for a minute that the polite essayist is seriously praising the civility of ladies, one to another, as they ride together in the horse-cars. He makes some startling revelations in regard to the behavior of the young Bostonians to the young women of Athens, and seems to corroborate the testimony of the philosophizing Frenchman, who says that the American man's politeness to women was owing to the fact that when our ancestors came over here first, women were scarce, and in consequence prized above their intrinsic value—which error had become worked into the blood, the Frenchman thought. But such things can be worked out of the blood; and now for some years there have been from twenty to thirty-odd thousand superfluous women in Massachusetts.

The Galaxy begins its promised course of articles, called "Ten Years in Rome," the author of which is a clergyman, formerly of the Romish Church, but now a convert to Protestantism His proof-reader has done him sad injustice, or else his stay in Italy was not of all the service it should have been to his Italian, which is defective. We can see no reason for advising our readers to expect from him anything very important, and we think that in this article, and that about the Cardinal D'Andrea in the last Galaxy, we saw more than one indication that what he says may be taken with a grain or two of allowance.

In "Brother of All with Generous Hand" the late Mr. Peabody comes into monthly literature under the auspices of Mr. Whitman, and worse auspices he could not very easily have. Since Mr. Whitman has ceased to pour out the sort of transcendentalism which he had just discovered and seemed to think he had invented, and which in him was not only unreasoning, but seemed to be unintellectual also, and an expression of the animal senses; and since he has left off the indecencies he used to indulge in—for indecencies also occur to the man and brother, and, occurring to him, shall he not blurt them out?—he has made several attempts at expressing himself in human fashion. Those who have seen the first edition of his "Leaves of Grass" know that in the preface to that work the author shook from his neck the tyranny of the comma and of the semi-colon, and of the colon, and of the point of interrogation, and of all points. We forget whether "the child of Libertad" did not free himself from the use of capital letters, but we think not. Afterwards, in the second edition, he became less amorphous, if we remember; and in the war-time he was bound with several of the chains of form, such as metre, rhyme, and the like. The little volume of "Drum Taps" was articulate speech, at least, and had not many typographical oddities in the printing of it. But, from the day of the punctuated "Leaves of Grass," the discerning could see that the distinctive Walt Whitman was in the way of disappearing. What is the wild man of the woods, though he never put on good clothes, if he consents to come out of the forest, scrape the hair off him, sleep in the outhouses, wear an old silk hat, and earn and eat the bread of civilization? He has lost his distinctive character, and is a very inferior man in place of being a monster of more or less superiority; so it was with Mr. Whitman, who has lost most of his physical transcendentalism, and condescends to be particular about his proofs, and talks clearly, and who keeps little or nothing of his old sense but his incoherency. This piece before us is a meaningless, tedious page or two, suggesting that Mr. Peabody gave away much money, and gave it with good intent. It is as truly poetry or literature in any reasonably good sense of the word as would be the talk of a child who should look out of a Broadway stage-window, and read the signs aloud, and tell of some of the things that passed before her eyes on the cobblestones and the sidewalk.

Mr. Grant White's second article on journalism deals with the writer of "personals," and is very good. Very good, too, is Mr. A. S. Evans's account of a journey that he made in the alkaline desert—New Mexico, as we make out. There is a sad and strange thing to associate in one's mind hereafter with the mistletoe. The Coahuila Indians get the greater part of their food from the pods of the mesquite tree, which grows in small thickets in the one river-valley which they possess, and out of which these poor people dare not wander from fear of their murderous enemies. And now the mistletoe has fastened with fatal tenacity upon the mesquite trees, and as fruit-bearers they are nearly ruined. As Mr. Evans, after a terrible journey through the salt desert, in which he steered his course by a smoke-cloud in the distance, reached the huts of the Coahuilas, he found that the smoke was that of the burning mesquite, the Indians having resolved to destroy the worst-infected clumps, and hoping to save the others.

A new feature of the Galaxy is a review of current French and German literature, more critical and far more readable and instructive to him who reads than the scrappy bits of bald information which it has been the habit of our magazine editors to deal out to their readers. For the rest, the Galaxy has a poem by Dr. Parsons; a sketch of Mr. A. T. Stewart and his retail store; more of "Put Yourself in his Place," which continues to be exciting; a chapter by Dr. J. C. Draper on "Poisoned Air;" a lively article on "Science and Orthodoxy in England," including judicious remarks on Tyndall, Huxley, and others, by Mr. Justin McCarthy; "Driftwood" in good quantity; and a poem by Mr. Stedman in honor of Admiral Stewart. Why admirals and other sea-fighters should be praised in so irregular metres we see no good reason. They are, though, ever since Campbell did it.

Lippincott's is livelier this month than for some time, and contains one or two clever short stories. One is of a young lover who, going to a party in Boston with his sweetheart, was sent back to the house they had just left to bring an emerald bracelet which had been left behind. He was a doctor. On his way back to Tremont Street a train of cars stopped, and a maniac was about to be put off the cars, had he not undertaken to quiet him. This adventure led him out of town, for the train started while he was on it; and then come a series of mishaps, all plausibly connected and interdependent, which finally takes him all over the world and into all sorts of scrapes. If the author had only had the experiences he pretends to, he might write a novel of adventure of the "Anastatius" kind which would live long. Another good thing—for its comparative freshness, to say nothing of other good qualities—is "Sue and I," and still another is an essay, neither unphilosophical nor unreadable, on "The Philosophy of Self-Interest." The heavy article is an essay on "International Coinage," and the pièce de résistance is an instalment of Mr. Trollope's novel.

Hours at Home comes out as an illustrated magazine this month, its pictures being taken from "The Infinitely Great and the Infinitely Little," a work which Messrs. Scribner & Co. have recently published. "The Coming Chinaman" contains hopeful prognostications of the effect which the influx of Chinese will have upon our political and social future, and is as neatly and pleasantly written as most of what the Rev. George Bacon writes. He is worth hearing, too, what is more than can be said for many of the magazine writers who have snapped up the new immigrant and utilized him as magazine padding, for Mr. Bacon has seen him in many parts of the world, and knows him not only as native, but as colonist also. He calls attention to the fact that the Chinaman is by no means a person who necessarily believes that he must go home or be sent home to be buried, but that he can, without horror, rock his cradles, and dig his graves, and rear his children in many barbarian lands. Mr. Bacon expects to live long enough to see Yellow John, as they call him in California, a regular resident, and looks forward, not without equanimity, to see him in common councils, side by side with gentlemen who so well illustrate "six hundred years of wrong" in the past, to say nothing of some odd years passed in this country. "The Bedouin Arabs" is another article worth reading, but is too sketchy to be so useful as it should have been. "Real Christmas"—that is to say, the children's, the Christmas fully believed in—is a pleasant piece by Mary E. Dodge, and the spirit of Christmas-time is present in a Christmas story called "St. Ephrem." But it is present in a much exaggerated shape, and the story goes into the treacly class of Christmas fiction. Not thus is the hard-hearted stock-broker softened, we can tell H. F. E. Still, if the tale does "slop over," it is a little puddle of good-heartedness and kindness that it makes, and perhaps some other season of the year would be a better time for finding fault with our artist.

"Leisure Moments" tells three or four good stories of the Abbé Correa du Serra, who, years ago, was the Portuguese Minister at Washington; there are some readable remarks on Sir William Hamilton's life and character; there is another chapter of Professor Noah Porter's "Books and Reading," in which the odd statement is made that books of biography are generally disliked; there is poetry, much below her usual level of cleverness, by "H. H."; there are some four reviews in Literature of the Day; there are instalments of novels by Georgiana M. Craik and by "The Author of Mary Powell"; and so the magazine is filled with matter generally good and worth reading.

Putnam's does well to present its readers with Mr. John Bigelow's careful article on Father Hyacinthe, and with an article not so careful—but still the best thing that the sympathizers with Cuba have yet offered the public—on the affairs of Cuba. "A French Salon" is a clever little story of Parisian life, and is worth a thousand of such stories as "Concerning Charlotte," and fifteen or sixteen hundred of "A Woman's Right," both of which novels begin in this number of Putnam's. The former of the two last, however, is in some places bright, and has a crisp kind of smartness; but it gives no promise of anything really good. "American Hotels," by "A Cosmopolitan," is a prize essay, and might have been done by a gentleman whose travels had led him through some half-dozen magazines and newspapers, for there is nothing in it in any way new.

From the Catholic World for January, any one who will may learn that there is at present no diminution in the birth-rate of young women who modestly but firmly tell the savants of their acquaintance that for their part they look on "science" as a child's game of playing with colored balls; who smile an amused smile when their new friend, meeting them at half-past six in the morning coming from the cathedral, asks them if they really are Catholics—Roman Catholics—and not merely Catholics in the true sense of the word; who say with clear, low voices, in the ball-room where they alone are cool, that they "never dance round dances"—while flushed Protestant girls, with eyes less serene and hair more frizzed, whirl in the waltz; who by all these arts stun and captivate, and lead into marriage the young man of brilliant abilities, but sceptical and indifferent; the ship of whose life, for want of being beached on the Rock of Peter, goes sailing about as if it were not the business of a ship to run ashore. There are not less than two or three such ladies in this month's Catholic World, and let us hope that they may go on increasing in numbers till some of us also get a chance to see them.

For the rest, this magazine as good as predicts that the Œcumenical Council will declare the Pope infallible; gives a good account of poor Vansleb, the Oriental traveller and scholar of two centuries ago, whose much-damaged reputation has recently been so well restored by the labors of M. Champollion Figeac; is bitter upon Gallicanism; makes replication to the rejoinder in Putnam's to a contradiction in a former Catholic World of Putnam's statement that in this State the Romish Church is as good as established; translates a weak Italian lecture on St. Augustine's Philosophy; and, generally, is very Romanist and not very literary.

In Harper's the "Easy Chair" makes some good talk about prohibitory laws, and also engages itself in the task of "making it pleasant all round" for the gentlemen who have lost control and the gentlemen who have gained control of the National Academy. These latter will no doubt be amenable to reason, as they seem tolerably happy just now. Mr. M. D. Conway tells of Leigh Hunt and the memorial monument; and, besides, there are tales of love and Christmas, and illustrated popularized science, and summaries of news enough to fill the magazine, which apparently is above the need of getting out "a New Year's number."

TO HORSE OWNERS.

The most valuable New Year's Present that a Gentleman can make to his Coachman or Groom is a copy of

HIRAM WOODRUFF'S HORSE-BOOK,

The Trotting Horse of America:

HOW TO TRAIN AND DRIVE HIM.

With Reminiscences of the Trotting Turf. A handsome 12mo, with a splendid steel-plate portrait of Hiram Woodruff. Price, extra cloth, $2 25; half-calf, $4; full calf, $5.

The New York Tribune says: "This is a masterly treatise by the master of his profession—the ripened product of forty years' experience in handling, training, riding, and driving the trotting horse. There is no book like it in any language on the subject of which it treats."

BONNER says in the Ledger: "It is a book for which EVERY MAN WHO OWNS A HORSE ought to subscribe. The information which it contains is worth ten times its cost."
